He had learned much regarding his route and destination during the day, from a caballero of the noble profession of beggary, who, motionless as a statue, had been standing near him, with his hand extended in supplication to the passers-by. Prominently displayed upon the beggar's ragged cloak, along with the brass license badge of the government, hung a crest which proclaimed him to be the proud descendant of an old grandee family.

Despite his illustrious lineage and his absurd airs of superiority on that account, he proved himself a sociable and obliging fellow, especially after having been made approachable through the medium of the wine-skin, from which he drank by dexterously shooting a stream into his mouth while holding the skin at full arm's length.

Juan eagerly devoured all the beggar told him; it was all grist to his mill, and even though some of the information did confuse him and add new difficulties to those he already saw, it did not discourage him. His project was one for which he could form no plans, but must feel his way darkly, step by step. He could only observe and learn, and be freely and constantly dependent upon the inspiration of the next moment. His determination, however, inspired a confidence in himself. He had learned, among other things, that the Gipsy King was considered the best guitar-player in Spain. This was important, for, if Juan could do one thing well, it was play upon the guitar.

A long hillside, literally honeycombed with the caves of Gitanos, and dotted here and there with the dilapidated remains of an old Moorish house; irregular, tortuous streets, filled to overflowing with an ever-shifting mass of humanity; the weirdest and most filthy beggars, the loudest and most importunate tradesmen, the laziest and most dilatory workmen, manufacturing rude plates and articles of iron and leather, the ugliest and dirtiest brown women sewing and weaving cloth, all carrying on their occupations in the streets, and children, dogs, and squalor everywhere; such Juan found the Gipsy quarter and its people to be. The whole place, with its teeming population and its underground homes, reminded him of a vast colony of gigantic ants, although he thought they might emulate the industrious habits of that insect with profit to themselves. However, that was their affair, and his present business was not with the common people, but with their king.

For a week he had been in this miserable place, living among the people, keeping his eyes and ears open, and seeking an opportunity to get within the king's palace. He had thought of many plans for effecting this, but rejected them all, upon consideration, as impracticable. He even thought seriously at one time of tunnelling under the walls, and explored the ground about the palace with that object, but was unable to find a spot sufficiently secluded for his operations.

Digitized by Google

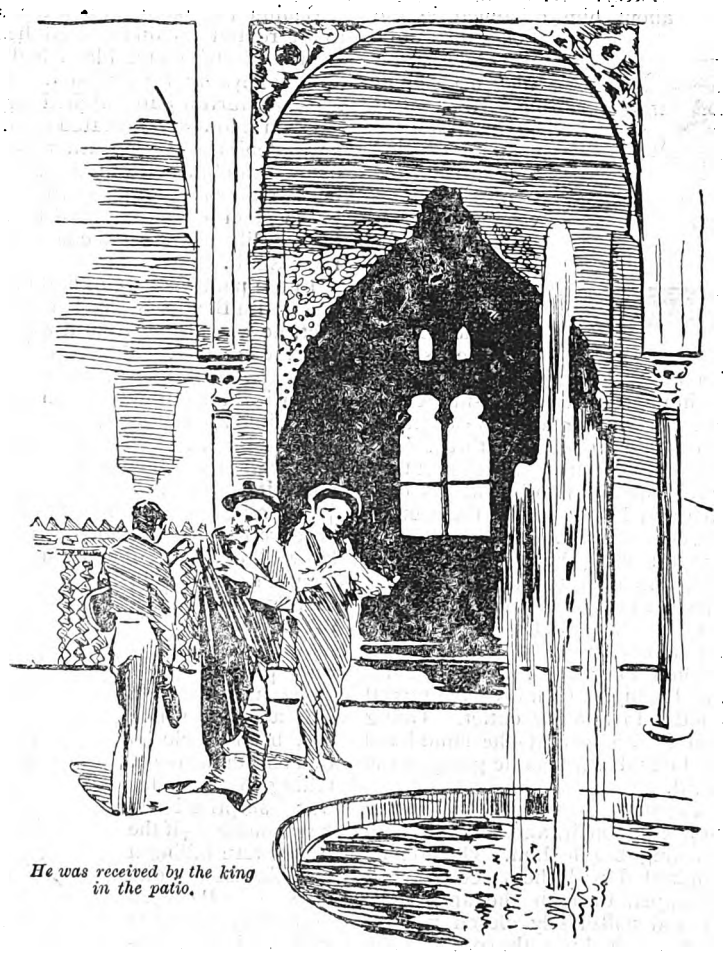
His chief amusement during this time had been playing the guitar. Your true Spaniard is always powerless to resist the attractions of his favourite instrument and will, at any and all times, postpone a journey, put off a duty or stop work—especially stop work—at the first twang of the strings. The children seem born with a knowledge and love for the national fandango dance, so early do they acquire it. Juan's fame as a guitarist had soon spread among the gipsies, and wherever he went he was quickly surrounded by a crowd of brown loafers who, with handclappings and exclamations, encouraged the younger ones as they danced the exciting fandango. His fame had even penetrated to royal ears, and it was in answer to a summons from the palace that he was now on his way thither.

The imperial residence had at one time been a stately structure, rich with ornamentation and architectural beauty and a pride to its Moorish builders; but time and man had, through successive years, despoiled its beauty, until it now appeared, upon the outside, little more than a group of graceful columns and a reddish stone wall supporting a roof of earth, stones and rubbish. Inside the small spike-studded door, however, more traces of the old-time beauty appeared. Floors inlaid with red and blue tiles, arranged in pleasing mosaics; walls adorned with graceful and ingenious arabesques; doorways with the superb horse-shoe arch above them and with borders of stone coloured differently from the walls and inscribed in letters of azure, crimson and gold with the religious precepts of the Arabs. But even in the most beautiful parts Juan found dirt and squalor to prevail, and fowls roosted on the handsomely carved ornamentations.



He was received by the king in the patio.

He was received by the king in the patio. It may be easily imagined that he regarded with much interest the fountain which played in the centre with a soft murmur, serenely unconscious of the secret which it guarded beneath its rippling waters. Unversed in kings, he had expected a certain amount of ceremony would be connected with his reception, but he was unprepared for the democratic freedom which characterised the court of this gipsy ruler, if the three or four out-at-elbow hangers-on who loafed about the patio could be called by so dignified a name. Their time seemed taken up with their cigarettes, wine-skins, and garlic pots, to the exclusion of any mere matters of state.

When Juan presented himself, the king said simply: "I have heard from many sources that thou canst play upon the guitar with excellence. I have sent for thee; for if thou art as skilful in thy performance as I have heard of thee, thou canst be of service to me. Let me hear thee play."

Presently, as Juan played, there came through a doorway at the end of the patio the five daughters of the king in gaily coloured dresses, with castanets and tambourines, pirouetting and dancing. There was an incessant clapping of hands, and clatter of castanets and rattling of tambourines and stamping of heels upon the tiled floor, accompanied by a low, mournful wail and an agonised twisting and swaying of their bodies as they danced their wild, weird dance.

Among the dancers was one tall, dark woman—Benita, he afterwards learned her name to be—who often swept close to him, flashing a daring look from her black eyes over her shoulder as she passed. To this language of the eye he was not slow to respond in kind. To himself he excused this little faithlessness to Carlota on the ground that it was but a means unto an end—an end with Carlota—and meant nothing. He was of necessity bound to accept every opportunity that offered itself to ingratiate himself in the royal household, he reasoned, for to strengthen himself here was to strengthen his chance of obtaining the treasure, and to obtain that was to obtain Carlota. Looking at it in this light he felt quite virtuous. The dancers filed out, Benita venturing a last look as she disappeared, and he ceased playing.

"Caramba!" exclaimed the king, "my people have spoken truly; thou dost play well indeed. To-morrow my daughters dance in Granada for the pleasure of a party of English travellers, and thou shalt again play for them."

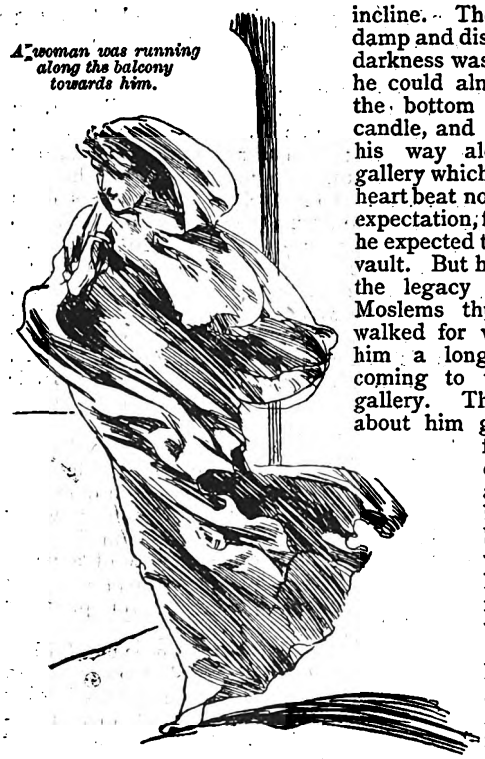
Juan had to be careful lest he betrayed too great an eagerness in expressing his pleasure at such an arrangement. The first, and what he thought to be the hardest, step was now accomplished. He was installed upon a certain footing at the entrance to the hiding-place of the Moorish treasure, and he was not the man he thought himself to be if he did not soon possess it. That night he remained within the palace walls.

He determined to make his first attempt that very night. He could see nothing to be gained by waiting—indeed, the night seemed specially favourable for his project. A thunderstorm was noisily rolling and rumbling up in the mountains, and a strong wind was rising. This would aid him by drowning any accidental noise, and his impatience made him think lightly of ordinary risks. Once with the gold actually in his possession, he would snap his fingers at this patronising king of a race of beggars, build a palace that would put his dilapidated old pile to disgrace, and kick any itinerary musician out of doors who presumed to call him brother.

As soon as the quietness about the palace assured him that its inmates had all retired, he stole out into the patio. He had long ago provided himself with candles and matches and a coil of light rope, with a hook fastened in one end, in anticipation of this occasion. He shut the water off from the foundation and watched it sink in the basin until the marble bottom was exposed, then, leaping down, eagerly felt in the darkness under the rim for the opening. It was an anxious moment. Ah! it was there.

Profiting by the experience of the first explorers, he fastened his hook over the end of the hole, boldly climbed in, uncoiled his rope, and, hand over hand, let himself down the steep incline. The place smelled damp and disagreeable. The darkness was so intense that he could almost feel it. At the bottom he lighted his candle, and carefully groped his way along the rocky gallery which he found. His heart beat now with hope and expectation, for every moment he expected to come upon the vault. But he was not to win the legacy of the ancient Moslems thus easily. He walked for what seemed to him a long way without coming to the end of the gallery. The damp rocks about him glistened in the flickering light of his candle, and an occasional bat, frightened by this unwonted visitor, startled him as it darted from some crevice.

Digitized by Google



A woman was running along the balcony towards him.

Suddenly he heard a quick, angry hissing. At the same moment he saw a large snake coiled upon the stones before him. Under ordinary circumstances Juan was not lacking in physical courage—in fact, he prided himself upon his fearlessness; but when he counted, rising in rapid succession about him, one, two, three, four, five hissing and venomous heads, fear drove all thoughts of further search for the treasure from his mind, and his only concern was for his safety. Already he saw one of the reptiles writhing toward him. He turned and ran. A stone tripped and threw him violently, extinguishing his candle. Now utterly panic-stricken with terror, he arose and dashed forward in the darkness, nor did he slacken his speed until he reached the end of the gallery. There he felt about for his rope. To his surprise he could not find it, but, in its place, a ladder, which felt like iron, and seemed to mount a perpendicular shaft. He concluded that, in his flight, he must have turned into a side passage which led into another outlet. Going back was not to be considered for an instant—he shuddered when he thought of what was behind him—so he grasped the rusty rounds and started upward.

When he had climbed some distance he felt one of the rounds yield slightly as he stepped upon it, and a draught of cold, damp air revealed an opening beside him. Outside he heard the noise of the storm, mingled with the voices of men talking excitedly. As he stepped through the aperture a stone moved up behind him and noiselessly closed it. He found himself upon a gallery overlooking the patio. The storm was now raging violently and the rain falling fast.

To his alarm he saw that many of the household were moving about the patio with lights. He wondered, anxiously, if they had discovered the empty fountain, and if they were searching for him. A woman was running along the balcony towards him. By the light of the hissing and spluttering torches below he saw it was Benita, and he caught her as she came up.

"What has happened?" he asked, at a venture.

She clung to him affrightedly, and looked pale and scared.

"I do not know, I heard an awful crash," she said. Her answer was reassuring to Juan; at least, he was not the cause of the trouble.

At one end of the balcony one of the curtains—which ran on wires from one side of the palace to the other and served as a roof to screen the patio when the sunshine became too fierce—was not fully drawn, and offered a protection from the storm. He drew her beneath this shelter. There they learned, from the conversation of the men below, the crash had been caused by the falling of an already dilapidated outside wall, which the wind had blown down.

The alarm ended, Juan drew his companion further into the shadow and tried to quiet her fears, for she still trembled with excitement.

The household had again settled down into quietness, and the storm abated before he crossed the patio on the way to his room, and turned the water again into the fountain. Above him, standing in a doorway, her tall, graceful figure in silhouette against the light of the room behind her, he could see Benita waving a kiss into the darkness to him.

His hopes had receded far in the past two hours, but he had at least strengthened his position, for he knew that Benita loved him.

. . . . . .

Behind the palace, upon the hillside, a dismantled watch-tower reared its dilapidated head, a mute reminder of the scenes of strife and bloodshed which the surrounding hills and valleys had witnessed. There, centuries before, the Moslem warrior had watched for his Christian enemy.

Upon a low stone, seated at the entrance of the tower, Juan and Benita sat one afternoon, about a week after his unsuccessful attempt to find the secreted gold. Below them lay the swarming gipsy town, and, further down, the beautiful green plain of Vega, dotted here and there with little white houses, like pearls set in emerald, and bounded by the gleaming river Xenil.

In the past week Juan had made much progress in his love affair with Benita, but little towards the object of his travels; in fact, he was further from it now than he had been at any time since his arrival. That very day he had been turned from the palace by the king, who had discovered the love of his daughter. A musical adventurer was all very well in his sphere, but, in the opinion of the gipsy ruler, his sphere was not that of his daughter's suitor. The daughter, however, thought differently, and, while the father in his palace below indulged in his afternoon siesta, she and her lover planned an elopement. Not that Juan had given up hope of finding the treasure, and was going to leave it. His one object was still to possess it. But he knew his only hope of regaining an entrance to the palace was as Benita's husband; therefore he desired to marry her.

As they talked, he idly picked up a stone, and tossed it into a cavity which had been disclosed by a part of the tower falling away. He was surprised to hear sounds as if the stone were falling a considerable distance. Benita noticed it, and said: "There is a tradition that this tower is connected with the palace by an underground passage, but no one has ever been able to discover it."

This was enough to excite Juan, and in a moment he had entered the cavity, and, candle in hand, was descending the steep passage which he found, closely followed by the

The senorita had come out upon the balcony.

Digitized by Google

astonished Benita. Unlike the other gallery he had been into, this one was perfectly dry, and soon became high enough to allow them to walk but slightly stooped. They went down, down, until they felt sure they must be under the palace. Suddenly Benita clutched his arm. In the dust beneath them were footprints, and then, a few feet further on, they came upon the white bones of a skeleton. The sight filled Juan with a wild delight. "I have found it! I have found it!" he cried, hurrying forward, dragging his companion after him, at the imminent risk of breaking both their heads.

In a moment the passage widened into a circular room. There, as the dying peasant had told, lay the golden treasure of the Moors. Benita sank upon her knees and piously crossed herself. Juan touched it: first, as if it were something to be feared, then ecstatically gloated over it, running his hands through the pile of shining, jingling pieces, fondling them and murmuring, "Mine! mine at last!"

Taking Benita's shawl from her shoulders, they piled the gold upon it and gathered the four corners together. It made a load so heavy he could scarcely carry it alone. Between them they carried it up to the watch-tower. There, he said to her softly, "At midnight, my beloved, meet me here, and to-morrow we shall be one in name and soul."

He waited until darkness began to gather, and then, as the stars were taking their places one by one in the clear sky above him, he fled—alone.

. . . . . .

A cavalier was serenading his señorita beneath her cross-barred and balconied window. The music was Juan's, but the player was hardly recognisable in the broad-brimmed silky beaver, the fine broadcloth cloak with its crimson velvet lining, and the slashed trousers which he wore.

The señorita had come out upon the balcony to answer his song with one of her own as sweet as his. At last his dream was realised. The low music filled him with rapture, for it was Carlota's song he heard.

Suddenly a tall dark figure confronted him—a knife-blade gleamed an instant in the moonlight.

"Holy Virgin! Benita! Have mercy!" But once—twice the long blade is quickly buried in his breast, and the swooning señorita above sees only the ghastly face of her cavalier fixed in death.

A TURKISH HYPNOTIST

"You are all alike, you English; really you believe that all sciences, all curious discoveries emanate from your brains, when often you only bring to light what was once known. You spoke of the remarkable progress which occult science has made in England the past few years. Well, if you would like, I will tell you an absolutely authentic story, which will prove to you that one hundred years ago hypnotism was not only known in Turkey, but even practised advantageously."

I accepted, and my friend Hamed Pasha began:

"No one has ever seen a similar epistle to that which the Pasha of Kars sent, one hundred years ago, to His Highness the Sultan Selim, third of that name. It was not written upon vellum nor upon parchment; it did not bear a wax-signet, nor any seal whatever, but when the gracious Padishah received it he fell backward upon the thick carpet formed of the skins of Nubian lions.

"This strange missive was composed of eight signs, which, taken together, formed two words of terrible signification, causing the Sultan frightful anger upon reading it. These two words were given out in the morning, at sunrise, by the Pasha of Kars, and at evening, when the last rays of the setting sun gilded the high minarets and the golden domes of the Mosques at Stamboul, like so many gigantic scarabees, the glorious Selim received the fearful message in his palace of Yidiz-Kiosk. How could these eight letters cross in a day the distance which separates Kars in Armenia from the Bosphorus? How could the missive of the Pasha in a few hours reach his august majesty, when the best cavalier, mounted upon the most rapid horse, could not accomplish the distance in less than eight days?

"It happened that my ingenious ancestor, before the invention of the telegraph, contrived means of rapid communication. In the afternoon, by order of the Pasha, the sentinel who stood steadfast upon the highest battlement of the fort took in both hands his long black mantle and waved it once in the air. The soldiers on duty upon the rock of Muzurdagh made the same movement with their mantles, and from point to point, summit to summit, the entire length of the chain of Akdagh, as well as in the plain of Kyzyl, Irmach, and Scutari, one series of black mantles waved once in the air. The scribe of the Sultan, who stood attentively upon the highest tower of the palace watching the horizon, upon seeing this sign wrote, with the end of a pointed reed which served for a pen, a B upon the open parchment before him.

"The sentinel at Kars reversed his mantle, and waved it again, showing the lining of a brilliant red. In less than an hour, from the Caucasus to the Golden Horn, several hundred mantles were waving the red signal. The scribe of the Sultan wrote an A upon the parchment. For an hour the mantles continued to wave from the summits, sometimes red, sometimes black, following the code. At evening, when the muezzins were calling the faithful to prayer, the scribe of Selim wrote upon his parchment the last letter of the winged message from the Pasha of Kars.

"'BARUT JPL' ('Powder given out'), said the Pasha.

"The news was serious; for if the Pasha had no more powder how could he repulse the assault of the Russians? He would have to surrender, and Kars, the key of the Caucasus, would fall into the hands of the soldiers of the great Catherine. The poor secretary of Selim thought of the consequences of the news, and slowly and timidly approached the apartments of his master. The unfortunate scribe had reason to fear, for scarcely had the Sultan glanced at the parchment when, as a messenger of bad news, the scribe received forty blows—five for each letter.

"'Happily,' said the faithful servitor to himself, with that resigned philosophy which forms the Mussulman character, 'the Pasha of Kars confined himself to a telegraphic style, for if he had used the usual formula: "Glory of the Universe, Master of all Sovereigns, of all Power, thy Enchained Slave, striking his humble forehead, the lowest before thy brilliant throne, which touches Heaven," etc., etc., I would be dead.'

"This brutality only slightly appeased the anger of the Sultan, who now summoned his Grand Vizier. He was called Ibrahim, an old and ugly man, but very intelligent. When he entered, bent in executing the many salamaleks prescribed by etiquette, the amiable Padishah, instead of saluting, hit him on the head. This did not forebode an agreeable conversation, so he prostrated himself still lower to escape the storm.

"'Ah, rascal! Miscreant!' roared His Highness, greatly exasperated. 'Is this the way you watch over my army? I am no longer astonished that the cursed Muscovites check our brave soldiers if all my generals are in the same predicament as my captain at Kars! Without powder, indeed! But explain how it happens that a fort so important as that of Kars should want ammunition.'

Digitized by Google

"'Probably it has burned its last cartridge,' humbly suggests the Grand Vizier without daring to rise.

"'You are an imbecile, Ibrahim. I have a mind to throw you in prison at once. If the Pasha has no powder, he probably has no money to buy it; so to-morrow morning, at daybreak, you start out a caravan filled with a thousand purses of silver.'

"'I have the purses, Gracious Majesty, but where shall I get the silver to fill them?'

"'That does not concern me. Apply to my Green banker, unless you prefer to ask the Persian financier, who lent me money the other day.'

"'Your orders shall be obeyed, your Majesty,' replied Ibrahim with humility. 'To-morrow a thousand purses will set out for Kars.'

"Happy to have escaped so easily, the Grand Vizier left the palace and proceeded slowly to the residence of the brave Hassan, from whom he expected to borrow the necessary money. This cunning Persian was a man of precaution, and never allowed a sum of money to leave the bank without at first deducting an honest interest of twenty per cent. Thus, instead of one thousand purses, Hassan counted out only eight hundred; but the Sultan wanted a thousand, so the Grand Vizier signed a note for two thousand and received sixteen hundred.

"Reaching home, the faithful Ibrahim took the superfluous six hundred and hid them under the mattress of the divan, then sent for the Khaznadar Pasha (Treasurer General), to confide the care of sending the silver into Asia Minor.

"Ibrahim was a true Turkish functionary, and the sight of the little purses, methodically arranged on the carpet, made him reflect:

"'You pretty silver things! You are destined to be devoured by the cannon! The noble metal of which you are made will go up in smoke, and shall I do nothing to stop this vandalism? No, Allah would not pardon me if I did not make the attempt. If I cannot save you all, at least it is my duty to protect some of you. Since the Pasha wishes to kill the Russians, he should put in two shells in each cannon, thus using only half as much powder; consequently he does not need but half this sum.'

"Thanks to this subtle reasoning, Ibrahim, finding his conscience at peace, hurried to put away five hundred purses under the mattress with the others.

"What is most astonishing, when the Khaznadar took possession of the remaining five hundred he reflected also:

"'O Allah,' said he, 'if the Pasha was not an imbecile he would know how to spare his ammunition. Instead of sending useless balls and bullets great distances, he ought to let the enemy approach, then massacre them with cartridges. Why should I prevent this brave Pasha from giving proof of his bravery? It is my duty to furnish an occasion for it. Then, here are two hundred and fifty purses for him and the same for me.'

"The Karavanbachi (chief of the caravan) said in turn:

"'Two hundred and fifty purses are too heavy for one camel, and too light for two. I know I ought not to maltreat an animal, the Koran forbids it. My duty is, then, to divide this sum evenly.'

"It was done.

"The janizary who set out with some soldiers to escort the camel loaded with the one hundred and twenty-five purses unceremoniously helped himself to half the load, deeming it useless to trouble his subaltern mind with ingenious reasoning.

"Reaching Kars unimpeded, he placed the sixty-two and one-half purses at the feet of the Pasha.

"'Sixty-two purses and a half,' said the captain to himself, 'That is very little to buy ammunition. What will I do? Ah! I will give it to my secretary, who complained just now of having no more sand to dry his writing. In this way one of us, at least, will have what is wanting.'

"He called his secretary, and said to him: 'The Sultan, our glorious sovereign, is a master who lets nothing escape him. He has learned you needed sand for your writing, and he has sent you sixty-two purses and a half, full of white pieces, with which you can buy sand and fill your office for several years.'

"Eight days later, the Pasha of Kars sent to his majesty the Sultan Selim, a new winged message, laconic and terrible. The mantles of the sentinels were not waved very long from the summits. Three signs sufficed to transmit the fatal news: 'Taken.' Kars was taken.

"The unfortunate Pasha was sent at once to Constantinople and thrown into prison. During the several days which were spent in the dungeon the ex-Governor of Kars had the pleasure of reflecting upon his situation, and of preparing his defence. One morning they brought him before His Highness. The Pasha allowed the reproaches which his master heaped upon him on entering to pass unnoticed, then, when he judged the anger of the terrible Sultan had subsided somewhat, he began to plead his cause boldly and frankly.

"'You say, Light of the Faithful, that you sent me one thousand purses to enable me to buy some powder. Now, if I had received them, I would have been able to check the Russians. Kars would still belong to your Majesty. I swear upon the Koran I received only sixty-two purses and a half. Here is a mystery which at first appears incomprehensible, but upon reflecting a little the explanation is easy. If you will permit your faithful servant to give it, you will speedily see that he is not guilty. You sent one thousand purses, but only sixty-two and a half reached me; it is because the sum has been divided by two four times. In other terms, you have been robbed four times, glorious Padishah. Now, if you desire to know the names of the robbers, nothing would be more easy. They are those through whose hands the money passed:

"'The first is surely the Grand Vizier, who pocketed five hundred purses; the second could only be the Khaznadar, who took two hundred and fifty; the third would be the Karavanbachi, who carried off one hundred and twenty-five; and the fourth must be the janizary of the escort, who kept sixty-two and a half. See, great Seigneur, how simple that is.'

"During all this discourse the Sultan Selim remained quiet, then spoke in a perfectly composed manner:

"'Very well, Ali; you are a good soldier and a loyal servant, who has not yet learned the art of lying. You will re-enter my good graces, and I will return all your grades and privileges. As for this miserable Ibrahim, the first and greatest robber of the four, he will pay dearly for his infamous action. I will teach him what the Sultan Selim does to a Grand Vizier who has the audacity to rob his master. You go, my faithful Ali, and find him this evening, before the hour of prayer, and present to him this noose of red silk. He will understand. Go!'

"For the first time in his life Ali Pasha paled upon hearing this sentence of death pronounced in so tranquil a tone. To strike an enemy in the face with arms when he could defend himself; to struggle with a warrior who was armed as well as he, was for him only pleasure; but to send someone into the other world with a little silk cord revolted him. However, the order of the Sultan was absolute; he must submit. So the brave Ali left the palace, wondering how he should execute the sentence.

"In his sumptuous palace of Ortakoe, whose terraced gardens descended to the sea, the Grand Vizier Ibrahim reposed, leaning against a pile of pillows, fingering his amber beard; before him, in a basin, burned a perfumed mixture, whose fragrance filled the place.

"Suddenly the heavy hanging which concealed the door lifted, and Ali Pasha entered. Upon seeing before him one whom he believed was still in prison Ibrahim felt a sinister presentiment.

"'Let your last hour be happy,' said Ali in a grave voice, standing in the doorway.

Digitized by Google

"Ibrahim did not misunderstand the sense of these words; he knew by the salute that Ali could only be a messenger of death, and that he held concealed in the folds of his cafetan the terrible silken noose. Still the face of Ibrahim remained passive; his eyes burned a little bright. Slowly he said: 'Allah wishes it! Allah is powerful! We are at his feet only miserable worms of the dust. Let his will be accomplished. Render me this last service of waiting a moment, and let me finish my ablutions and my prayers. You know Mahomet has proclaimed sacred the vows of the dying.'

"'Your pardon,' replied Ali; 'but my orders are absolute. I cannot lose you from sight a moment. Moreover, what good would it do you to leave the room? Look out of the window! There are more than a thousand janizaries surrounding your palace. Do you not hear the clash of arms? They are the guards of His Majesty who have invaded your palace. You see it is in vain to try to escape.'

"'Of which I never dreamed,' replied Ibrahim. 'Reassure yourself, Ali, I will not keep you waiting long. Please be seated.'

"He struck his hands three times, and two Nubian slaves appeared. They tremblingly brought in an ewer and a basin and a prayer-rug.

"Ibrahim then raised his mantle, and slowly made his ablutions. No one would have thought, seeing him so calm, that in a few minutes the fatal cord would encircle his brown neck. Outside, upon the high minarets of the city, the muezzins intoned their soft and monotonous chant announcing to the faithful the decline of day.

"When the Grand Vizier plunged his head in the basin, Ali, thrusting his hand under his cafetan, drew out the cord of red silk, and placed it in the hand of one of the slaves. The slaves understood.

"Upon delivering this deadly noose, which he would receive again only after its mission was accomplished, the soldier trembled. He had seen thousands of men fall upon the battle-field without flinching, but upon contemplating this full, plump face, which in a few minutes would be only an inert mass, he was horrified. Ah! a terrible business that of an executioner.

"While Ali Pasha was thus sadly reflecting the Grand Vizier finished his ablutions. With slow, measured, and majestic step he advanced toward the prayer-rug, upon which he stood with his head high and proud, his body erect, in order to isolate himself from the rest of the world, so that no terrestial noise should interrupt his ecstatic meditations.

"The Grand Vizier very slowly raised his arms, and placed the palms of his hands over his ears. His large black eyes, burning with a strange fire, rested upon Ali Pasha. The brave captain, nervous and troubled, did not know how to account for this singular attitude. Why did not the doomed man say his prayers like a good Mussulman? Why did those eyes, which gleamed in the dark like the dagger of an assassin, rest upon him?

"The poor Pasha did not seek the key of the mystery very long; little by little, a strange, inexplicable happiness overcame him; it seemed to him that his body and his mind, detached from terrestial things, floated in the pure regions of ether, softly cradled by perfumed zephyrs. Slowly his eyes closed, his head inclined upon his breast, and, leaning against the divan where he had fallen, he slept.

"Ibrahim, finally abandoning his meditative attitude, approached Ali, and raised one of his eyelids—the eye was without expression or life.

"'He sleeps,' cried the Grand Vizier with a triumphant joy. Then, seating himself gravely upon the divan in front of his victim, whom he watched constantly, Ibrahim began the following recital, articulating each word slowly, as if he wished to thoroughly engrave the words upon the mind of his auditor:

"'When I first delivered the fatal news, he made his ablutions, then prayed prostrated as the Koran prescribes. His prayer finished, he seated himself upon a divan, and, taking from the slave the cord, he made a sliding knot, passing it round his neck. He looked at me for the last time, crossed his arms upon his breast and made a sign to the slaves, who seized each an end and drew it with all their might. It was a horrible sight; his face swelled out, reddened, then grew purple; his eyes left their orbits; his tongue hung out of his mouth black and lifeless. The slaves redoubled their efforts; one would have thought the soul hesitated to leave its earthly habitation. Finally, a last jolt, a supreme convulsion, the head fell back, the arms dropped inert; it was over. One of the slaves detached the cord. What a horrible black mark it left in the flesh! They covered the corpse with a mantle. Your justice was satisfied, O Sublime Selim.'

"When Ibrahim had finished his recital, he extended himself on the ground, one of the slaves covered him with his mantle, then approaching Ali Pasha, he struck him twice upon his face.

"The brave Captain opened his eyes and looked round as though he had had a painful dream. The slave, inclining profoundly before him, returned the red noose. This movement completely recalled to his mind the order of the Sultan, and seizing the fatal cord Ali concealed it in his breast. Then, rising he glanced furtively upon the human form stretched under the mantle, and advanced toward the door.

"'Pardon, noble Pasha,' said the slave, 'would you not like to see him?'

"'Never, unfortunate one,' replied Ali, with horror. 'I should never sleep again.' He went out, and signed to the officer to retire with his men.

"'Death has no need of a sentinel,' said he. The chief of the janizaries and Ali mounted horses and set off in the direction of Yidiz-Kiosk.

"'Peace be with him,' said the faithful servant to the gracious Sultan Selim, when reciting the details of the death of the Grand Vizier.

"'You say the agony was very long?' added the Padishah.

"'Terrible, your Majesty,' responded Ali. 'One would have thought he had seven souls nailed to his body.'

"'Glorious Majesty,' added Ali, 'I am your faithful slave; I am ready to suffer death for you. Say the word and I will meet death, without trembling, in the midst of shot and shell, but, I beg you, never send me on a like mission.'

"'Be tranquil, my brave Ali, thy prayer shall be answered. But thou art my faithful servant. Another might have let this cunning rascal escape; he was a great knave, between you and me. The clemency of Allah descend upon him,' added Selim in a funereal tone.

. . . . . .

"At midnight, when the moon concealed his silver disc behind the mountains, a fine 'tartan,' with its dark sails, glided rapidly and silently upon the gentle waves of the Bosphorus. Upon the deck the ex-Grand Vizier Ibrahim, surrounded by his wives and children, was seated.

"'Confess, my sweet Kadite,' said Ibrahim to the eldest of his companions, 'that it would have been too beastly to die for five hundred purses of silver. Once again have I cause to know that I made a good purchase when I bought you at the market at Cairo. It was you that revealed to me the secret of the women of Egypt, this secret, thanks to which one can put to sleep his neighbour. It is not at all difficult, and I am astonished there are so few who know how to practise this precious art.

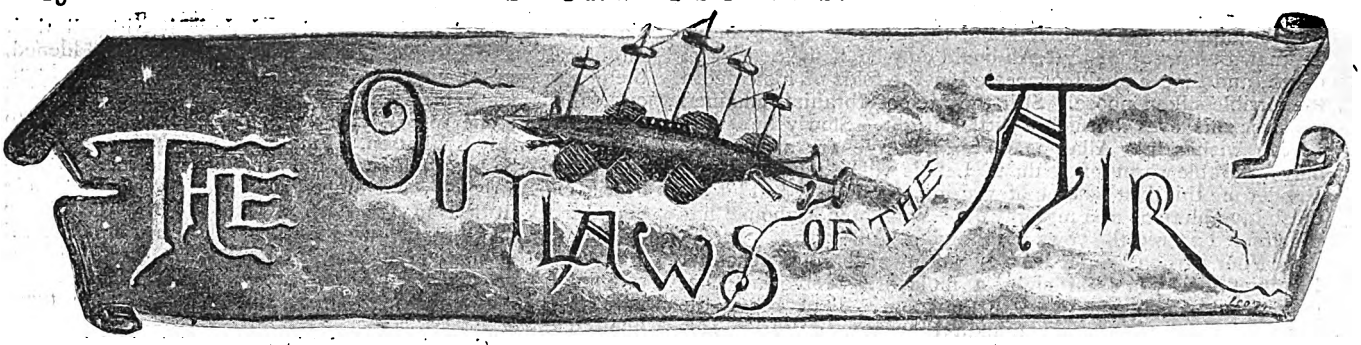
"'To put that poor Ali to sleep was only child's play. I would like to know what punishment His Highness will inflict upon him when, wishing to proceed with my interment, he will perceive that I have fooled them. Poor Ali! what a pity he is so honest! I could have taken him with me. The Tsarine would have made him a colonel, as she will make me a general. The great Catherine is a good and hospitable person, especially to Turks, particularly when they know the secrets of all the strong places of the Danube.'

"With these hopeful words Ibrahim stretched himself upon the mats and slept the sleep of the just."

. . . . . .

"Well," said my friend Hamed Pasha, after finishing his recital, "do you still pretend that hypnotism is a recent invention, improved by nervous Englishmen? And do you think we Turks need the experiences of your doctors in order to probe the secrets of suggestive science?"

Digitized by Google



By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault, the leading spirit of the Anarchist "Autonomie Group No. 7," meets his colleagues in a club near the Caledonian Road on the eve of President Carnot's assassination. He shoots a traitor who has almost betrayed the Group and so saved Carnot's life. Then he tells them that he is about to emigrate with a society of Socialists, one of whom, Frederick Austen, a wealthy engineer who has been converted to Socialism, takes out with him a working model of an aerial vessel. This air-ship Renault determines to steal when complete, and use for the purpose of bringing about an Anarchist reign of terror. Meanwhile, Franz Hartog is to steal a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer, which is to be built at Elbing for the Russian Government, and, with her, to levy blackmail on the Atlantic, and so raise funds to build an Anarchist aerial fleet.

On Christmas Day, 1898, the Calypso, a steam yacht belonging to Sir Harry Milton, sights an island in the South Pacific, from which an electric launch, the Mermaid, puts off and tows the yacht in. Frank Markham, in command of the launch, tells Sir Harry, with whom are travelling his sister, Violet, and Herbert Wyndham, a lieutenant in the British Navy, on sick leave, that the island is Utopia, a Socialist Colony, founded some three years before by emigrants from England. On the island Sir Harry finds Frederick Austen, an old friend of his father's, who introduces the visitors to Edward Adams and Max Renault and the rest of the Utopians, and after lunch tells them the story of Utopia. Later on, Lieutenant Wyndham describes the outrages committed by the vessel Hartog has stolen from Elbing—on the Atlantic, and Mr. Austen vows that if no one else can sink the Destroyer the Utopians will. Wyndham inspects the Nautilus, which the Utopians are building, and which he finds to be a novel but most formidable craft, and late that night, when the Lieutenant and Sir Harry are taking a stroll upon the hills, they are astounded by the apparition of an air-ship soaring across the mountains in the interior of the island. The next morning Sir Harry and Wyndham further discuss the problem raised by the appearance of the air-ship, and the latter determines to resign his commission and throw in his lot with the Utopians; but just as he is telling Sir Harry this, Renault appears unexpectedly and interrupts their conversation. A week later, a pic-nic is held on Mount Plato. Wyndham and Violet are lost sight of during the afternoon, and, as the others are searching for them, they see the air-ship rise from the crater of Mount Orient, and as it does so something white falls from its deck back into the crater. Sir Harry, Adams, and Dora go to Mount Orient to investigate, while Lucy Summers rides back for help. Wyndham is found stabbed in the back on the platform on which Adams tells Sir Harry that the air-ship was built, while Violet is discovered suspended in the top of a great palm-tree on to which she has fallen in throwing herself out of the air-ship in which Renault has tried to carry her off. They rescue her, and find her alive though still unconscious. Meanwhile the rest of the party have arrived at the crater. Sir Harry tells the Utopians that he has determined to devote his life and fortune to punishing Renault, and when Wyndham recovers consciousness he remembers when he last saw Renault in England—in the Dock at Bow Street charged with being an Anarchist.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

CHAPTER XI.

A Soliloquy in Mid-Air.

"'Monarch of all I survey.' Ah! I wonder what poor old Cowper would have made Robinson Crusoe say if he could have imagined him in such a position as this. 'Free as air' is not the word for it, for the air isn't free, because I am its master. No, riding on the wings of the wind—that is more like it, and yet even that doesn't do, for my wings are my own by right of, well, we'll say conquest, though I suppose respectable society would find another name for it, and the wind—the tamed, subjugated wind—only holds them up like the passive, conquered slave that I have made it!

"No, there are no words to describe it. It is too glorious, too transcendent for words, this conquest of the air really achieved at last, the realisation of all the dreams of flight from the days of Dædalus until now. Look, look, my eyes, for you have never beheld such a scene as this before nor have the eyes of any mortal man before me, moi, Max Renault, véritable roi des airs! For what is mere commonplace ballooning to this when you know that your balloon is but the slave, the plaything, of every breath of air that blows, a mere helpless straw floating about without will hither and thither in the currents of the ocean of atmosphere?

"Bah, what is that compared with this? A touch on one lever or another and I fly to right or left, dive to the surface of the sea or soar beyond the clouds, just as my turn of fancy may suggest. And look at those islands down yonder, those snow-ringed gems of emerald set on the sapphire shield of the sea, look how they rise in front of me and go dropping away behind me, and how those few fleecy clouds that I could leap over with a single bound come flying towards me as if to greet their new comrade of the air!

"Ah! a hundred miles an hour, with another twenty or thirty in hand for a pinch, and an ocean of which I am the only navigator stretching above me and below me, in front and behind and on either hand, wider than the wide world itself, open and free and all mine, mine alone among all the sons of men. I, the Magellan, the Columbus of the new world, the realm of air that I have conquered; I, to whom land and sea and air are open; to whom the most secret places of the world, where no human foot has trodden, must be open as the daylight; whose gaze, if I but will it, may explore even the unseen solitudes of the Poles; I, who can outsoar the vultures and outrace the storm.

"Glorious! glorious! and yet, alas! not quite so glorious as it might have been. Ah, ma belle Violette, why were you such a misguided little fool as to go and break that pretty neck of yours on those pitiless rocks instead of being sensible and coming to share this empire of the air

"The unseen solitudes of the Poles."

Digitized by Google

with me—with me who loved you, for the time being at any rate, better than Anarchy itself, or even Lea, the proud and fair, herself—fairest of the Daughters of Destruction?

"Peste, what a fool the girl was to lose her life and a share of the empire of the world, for a silly superstition called honour, and because she thought she loved someone else, as I suppose she did. And that Lieutenant, qui le diable l'emporte—as he possibly has done by this time.

"I think I struck home, for he went over like a stuck sheep—better, in fact, for he never gave a kick—and he deserved it, for if it hadn't been for him I could have worked that beautiful scheme of mine out to the end, and shouldn't have been forced to come away in a hurry like this without a bomb or a gun or an ounce of ammunition on board, except a rifle and a couple of revolvers, and a few hundred cartridges.

"I wonder what evil twist of fate brought him to Utopia, just him—one man out of the few dozens that were in the police-court that day and saw me in the dock from which British justice so kindly released me. He must have remembered sooner or later, and then I suppose he would have denounced me as an Anarchist and member of Autonomie Group No. 7, and then—malediction!—he might have spoiled everything, for those virtuous Socialists might have believed him, and requested me to leave—without the air-ship—or, anyhow, they'd have watched me so that I couldn't have got her.

"No, I think I was right to take Fortune by the forelock when I did. At any rate, I have got the ship, and that's the main thing, and as soon as I can get her armed, with the able assistance of Franz and the others, I'll go back to Utopia and make a wilderness of it. I wish I'd had a chance of killing old Austen before I left. I wonder whether he has told the secret to Adams or anyone else; but if he hasn't, he's bound to do so now, and I'll have to wipe the lot out before they can build another air-ship.

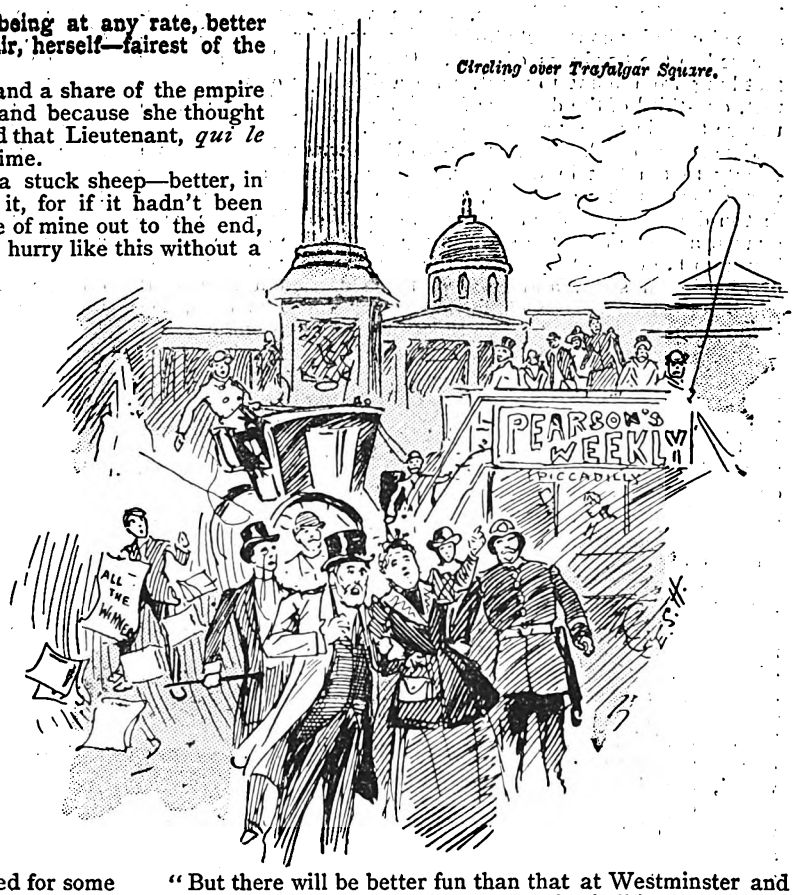
"I don't expect they'll get the Nautilus launched for some time if that battery that I connected with the fuel reservoir only works properly. I think the clockwork was all right, and would make the connection at the proper time. If it does, it will blow half of her into the basin, and not leave much of the other half together. Pity I had to do the work in the dark, but if I'd showed a light some prying fool would have been sure to see it, and then—phew! they'd have hung me like a dog, and I suppose in one sense I should have deserved it!

"Ah, well, I must look for the best, and get back there as soon as I can. What a scare there must have been in Utopia last night. By the way, what shall I call my pretty cruiser of the air? They were going to call her the Volante, but I think I must have something a bit more appropriate than that.

"Yes, that will do; I'll call her the Vengeur, since she is to be the first instrument of my revenge upon the accursed society that guillotined my French father for strangling a thief of a lawyer who had ruined him and drove my English mother to—bah! there is no use in troubling about that now. The day of vengeance will soon come now, and when it comes, sacre! what fun there will be when Franz has made me some guns and some of those pretty little projectiles that he used to talk about!

"Imagine my beautiful Vengeur being sighted some fine morning circling over Trafalgar Square, or the Place de la Concorde, or Broadway, or the Nevski Prospekt. Ah! I can fancy how the crowds will collect under me, how the people would rush out of the houses and the shops, crawling about, like the earth-worms that they are, and pointing up at me and wondering what I am going to do.

"And then think of the fun of a little aerial artillery practice at their expense. The bombs bursting in the middle of the crowds and scattering them, mostly in pieces, in every direction! Think how they'll run shrieking and raising their arms aloft for mercy until they were knocked over just as helpless as a flock of sheep would be in front of a machine gun.



Circling over Trafalgar Square.

"But there will be better fun than that at Westminster and over the Chamber of Deputies on the Quai d'Orsay. Think of the effects of a nicely planted projectile through the windows of what those English call their gilded chamber! A charge of gun-cotton will make a nice mixture with the contents of the Woolsack, and the fragments of M. le President flying about the Chamber of Deputies will be a sight for all the oppressed of the earth to laugh at.

"And it is possible now, all possible! The Queen of England in Windsor Castle, or the Tsar surrounded by all his slavish millions will be no safer from me than the man who is walking along the street. What will the trifling, though meritorious, work of Vaillant and Henri, of Ravachol and Santo, be to what I shall do, flinging my thunderbolts from my aerial throne? Yes, it is splendid, this realisation of the long dreamt-of ideal of human flight! Splendid, splendid!"

Thus mused Max Renault, now no longer a mere conspirator against society, lurking in slums and by-streets, and passing under false guises among his fellow men, but master of an engine of destruction which, if the remainder of his plans only succeeded as his first venture had done, would enable him to bid defiance to the world from the unattainable altitudes of the air; and, more than that, to hurl death and destruction, to which no effective reply could be made, wherever his fancy bade him strike his blows.

Somewhat bombastic as his soliloquy would no doubt have sounded had there been other ears than his own to listen to it, yet, when stripped of the rhetoric with which his French blood endowed it, it was nothing but sober fact. He had boasted of nothing that he could not accomplish. For the time being he was master of the air, and therefore an enemy that the mightiest State on earth would have good reason to fear, since he alone of all its enemies would strike straight at its heart, paralyse its directing will, and reduce its organisation to chaos in a few days or weeks of terrorism, as the case might be.

The craft that was bearing him through the air at a speed of a hundred miles an hour, two thousand feet above the sun-lit bosom of the broad Pacific, was a very elongated cigar-shaped cylinder constructed of papier maché, rolled and compressed to the hardness of steel. It was a hundred and fifty feet long from point to point, with a diameter of twenty-five feet, one-third of the distance from its forward point, and from thence tapering away astern to four feet.

Digitized by Google

Five horizontal helices, or six-bladed screws, ranging from twenty to ten feet in diameter, worked on five short strong vertical masts above the hull, and three propellors, each seven feet in diameter, revolved on shafts, one projecting from each quarter and one from the stern in the middle line of the vessel. Through the cross-diameter of the hull ran four hollow shafts of aluminium steel, and each of these carried a somewhat wing-shaped aeroplane of lattice work, the slats of which could be opened and shut like those of a venetian blind.

The upper part of the hull was fitted with long windows of toughened glass, covered with external blinds to moderate the light in the interior or to keep off the too intense heat of the sun when necessary. In the sides and bow there were other windows which, on emergency, could be protected by slides of aluminium steel, which gave an uninterrupted view ahead and on either side of the air-ship.

Forward of the foremost mast was a conning-tower of oval shape, seven feet by five, and projecting three feet above the hull. This contained the steering wheel, the lever which controlled the slats of the air-planes and the switches which regulated the speed of the engines, together with a compass, barometer, and a speed-gauge, which indicated at the same time the velocity of the ship and the pressure of the wind on her air-planes.

Renault saw the harbour and city of New York.

It was in this conning-tower that Renault was sitting, with windows on every side of him, commanding an uninterrupted view in every direction as he indulged, as men are wont to do when they are as absolutely alone as he was, in his soliloquy on the prospects that were visible from the extraordinary situation in which he found himself. He had locked the steering wheel and the levers, and the air-ship was speeding along through the uninterrupted ocean of air independently of his attention, needing no further control until it should be necessary to increase her elevation, in order to rise out of sight from the sea or to pass over mountains on land.

It was a couple of hours after sunrise, on the 2nd of January. He had been in the air for a little more than twelve hours, and in that time had traversed over a thousand miles on his way from the Pacific to the Atlantic, across the Isthmus of Panama towards which he was now steering. He had brought away provisions that would last him for a month and there was sufficient supply of motor-fuel on board the air-ship to carry him a distance of twenty thousand miles, or nearly double the distance that he expected to travel before getting into communication with his friends in the Destroyer.

The engines of the Vengeur were of the same type as those of the Nautilus, but, of course, of much lighter build. They were capable of exerting a total force of three thousand horse-power, and were so arranged that the power of the two side engines could be diverted from the quarter propellors and concentrated on the lifting helices when it was necessary to raise the ship vertically from the ground or propel her at such a low speed that the air-planes would not support her of themselves.

The machinery was situated mostly amidships, with the saloon and twelve living cabins forward of it. The hull was pierced for eight guns, two pointing ahead, two astern, and two on each broadside; and there were also five apertures in the floor of the hull for vertical-firing tubes, through which projectiles could be launched at objects directly underneath. All these port-holes were now, of course, covered by aluminium steel slides, and even when the vessel was fully armed none of her armament would be visible until the time came to run the guns out and open fire.

Always flying at the uniform rate of a hundred miles an hour, the Vengeur passed north-eastward over the Pacific, across the Isthmus of Panama, at an elevation of six thousand feet, sped unseen over the West Indian archipelago, and then, swinging slightly to the northward ran up the Atlantic, until, on the morning of the fifth day, Renault saw the harbour and city of New York through the breaks in the sunlit ocean of rolling billowy clouds which lay between earth and sea in the serene and cloudless atmosphere in which the Vengeur was floating.

CHAPTER XII.

On the Scene of Action.

In reaching New York in command of the air-ship, Renault had carried out the first and most important part of his scheme, but from this point his plans were necessarily rather vague.

Before he could do anything definite it was absolutely necessary that he should put himself into communication with Franz Hartog, on whom he would now be obliged to look as his right hand in carrying out the designs on the peace and safety of society at large which had been shaping themselves in his brain for the past three years.

He had accomplished the first and greatest achievement of the war which had already been definitely declared against the established Powers of the world. He had assisted Mr. Austen to work out and put into material form the ideas which his son had conceived, but which he had been destined never to see realised. He had improved upon these, and he had assisted in the working out of every detail with an anxious care which the Utopians had taken as pure zeal for the welfare of the colony.

With his own hands he had worked at the building of the air-ship and the construction of her engines and equipment, and then, when everything was complete, he had made the bold and successful stroke which had deprived those who had trusted in him of the fruit of their joint labours and placed him in possession of the only machine in existence that was capable of navigating the air.

Digitized by Google

This was much, very much, but more had to be done before the Vengeur could become the irresistible engine of destruction that he intended her to be. He knew that, skilful and far in advance of his age as he was himself in mechanical genius, he was but as a child in comparison with the eccentric little German who was all brain and no heart, and who, before his departure to Utopia, had furnished him with the plans and designs which had enabled him to pose before his late fellow-colonists as a mechanical inventor of the first order.

He knew that to Franz Hartog, and to him alone, he would have to look for the guns and projectiles which would form the offensive armament of the Vengeur. Without his aid she was merely an aerial pleasure cruiser; with it she could be transformed into a war-ship of such terrible power that neither fleets nor fortresses could offer her any resistance worth the mentioning.

Beyond all question Hartog was absolutely necessary to him. So, too, would be a crew of at least eight men to work the ship and man the guns in time of action if the Vengeur was to be brought up to the highest possible point of efficiency. There was no doubt about this; but with the conviction of this necessity came an uncomfortable doubt about the possibility of trusting to anyone save himself—yes, even to Franz Hartog, faithful and all as he be eved him to be.

As commander of the Vengeur he would occupy an absolutely unique position, a position never before paralleled in the history of the world. He would be above and beyond the reach of all human laws, the wielder of such a power as the earth had never trembled at before, a power which would offer the most dazzling and perhaps irresistible temptation to the usurper who might aspire to reign in his stead.

The buccaneers and pirates of past ages had, with more or less success, held control over their lawless crews, partly by force of personal influence, but chiefly because in their case failure meant capture and capture meant either death on the high seas or a dance on nothing at Execution Dock. Hence, as a rule, the rank and file had preferred to trust themselves to the guidance of the master spirit lest worse might befall them; but there would be no fear of this sort before the eyes of the crew of the Vengeur.

To be in possession of the only air-ship in existence meant at once the impossibility of failure and the certainty of escape. There could be no pursuit, and so no capture. The most inaccessible parts of the world would be open to them, and they could take their choice of refuges in a thousand places where no man could follow them.

To command a crew and to keep them disciplined and faithful under such circumstances would mean the exercise of qualities which he might or might not be proved to possess when the hour of trial came. To possess them meant the command of an empire such as no man had ever ruled over before; to be found wanting would mean death by assassination and the ignominious failure of all his splendid and far-reaching plans. That was the alternative, and in the long hours of leisure that the flight of the almost automatic Vengeur had afforded him, he had deliberately faced the contingencies in theory and made himself ready to meet them in practice.

And now all there was to be done was to pick up the Destroyer, in whatever part of the ocean she might be cruising, accompany her to the secret stronghold which by this time her crew must have discovered, and there elaborate the plans for future action. There was only one course which made it at all possible to arrive at this result, and that course he took.

"This is Saturday morning," he said to himself, "and therefore the very day of all days in the week that I ought to be here, except perhaps Wednesday. Most of the big boats will be leaving New York for England to-day, and if Hartog is still playing the same game, I ought to stand a good chance of falling in with him if I pick up one of the big ones as she passes Sandy Hook and follow her across.

"It'll be rather slow work for a craft like this, but still I can amuse myself running about a bit and seeing if there's any other game in sight. I don't suppose concealment matters very much now, and I may as well go down and see what there is to be seen."

So saying, he left the conning-tower, and went to the engine-room and turned the power of the port and starboard engines on to the horizontal fans. These were so constructed that when they were not in use their blades, working on hinges, fell down beside the masts like the ribs of an umbrella when closed, and could be locked in that position so as to offer the least possible resistance to the air. As soon as they were unlocked and the masts began to revolve they opened automatically and spread themselves out, and the higher the speed at which they revolved the more rigidly they were retained in their proper position.

Revolving at half-speed they just sustained the weight of the air-ship without the assistance of the air-planes. With the midship engine driving the vessel at forty miles an hour, the air-planes would sustain her without the assistance of the helices. From this it will be seen that the Vengeur possessed an ample margin of power to suffice for the performance of any possible manœuvres.

With the suspensory fans revolving at half speed, and the midship propellor working just fast enough to give steering way to the vessel, Max dropped her gently through the clouds, and in half-an-hour was hanging close under them, and about fifteen hundred feet over New York Harbour. Every part of the Vengeur was painted a dull neutral grey, and he felt pretty well satisfied that at that altitude it would be quite impossible for anyone on land or water to make him out against the grey background of the clouds.

The wharves of Hoboken, Jersey City, and Brooklyn were already busy in preparation for the departure of the out-bound liners, and Renault, with a pair of powerful field-glasses, watched them carefully for the first signs of the big ships putting to sea. The morning, though cloudy, was a good one for seeing, and he could easily make out the distinguishing funnels of the different liners as they lay alongside their wharves.

He saw the red funnels with black tops and two black lines under them of a big Cunarder; the black funnels with the horizontal white stripe of a ship of the American line; the plain yellow funnels of a North German Lloyd boat over on the Hoboken side; and the black-topped yellow funnels of a huge White Star liner on the New York side.

All these had the Blue Peter flying, showing that they were ready to put to sea as soon as the tide suited. Nine o'clock came after he had waited nearly an hour and a half, and then one by one they began to cast off and work out into the stream. They steamed away slowly at first, but with ever-increasing speed, past the Battery, between Brooklyn and the Statue of Liberty, through the Narrows, and so on round Sandy Hook. Huge as they were, they looked little more than toy steamboats floating on the surface of a lake at the altitude from which Renault watched them.

Gradually one of them, a great three-funnelled

"Hullo, what the deuce are those things out there?"

Digitized by Google

White Star liner, began to draw ahead of the others, fast as they were now going.

"Ah, I suppose that's the White Star boat Gigantic that they were building when I left England to beat the Campania and Lucania," said Renault, as he put the Vengeur after them, keeping her close up under the clouds. "It doesn't matter which the others are, she's my game for the present. I can't go very far wrong in keeping her in sight, but I daresay they will keep pretty much together for the rest of the day. They are travelling pretty fast, considering the great lumbering floating hotels that they are.

"The Gigantic, if it's her, is not making much less than twenty-five knots, but what's that to the forty the little Destroyer can do, or the hundred and forty that I could make the Vengeur fly at if I was in a hurry! If I only had her properly armed and could pick Franz up out in mid-Atlantic, we'd hold the whole crowd up between us, as the Yankees would say, and—tonnerre de Dieu—what tons of plunder we'd get out of them! We should have to collar one of them to take it home with us, wherever home may be for us.

"Hullo, what the deuce are those things out there? A couple of cruisers as sure as I'm lord of the air! Yes, and a brace of torpedo boats in attendance on each of them. That means a convoy. Bravo Franz! You must have made it pretty hot for them on the Atlantic to make anything like that necessary, and it also means that you're expected, so I suppose we shall see some fun before we get across.

"Oh, that I only had my guns and ammunition on board, and then I wouldn't mind if they had a fleet waiting for you!"

Renault had drawn his conclusions correctly. The terrorism exercised by the Anarchists afloat on the Atlantic had reached such a pitch that the American and British Governments had been compelled to enter into an agreement in virtue of which an American squadron of fast cruisers and torpedo boats convoyed each flotilla of liners from New York to a midway station on the Atlantic, where they were met by a similar British squadron which convoyed the liners into English waters. In addition to this precaution all the liners had themselves been converted into cruisers and fitted with quick-firing and machine guns so as to be able to take care of themselves in an emergency.

To within 800 feet of the masthead of the "Gigantic."

As soon as they were picked up by the liners the cruisers stationed themselves one on each side of the line which they formed at a distance of about four miles. Two of the torpedo boats ran out a couple of miles ahead as scouts and the other two brought up the rear about the same distance astern, and so, apparently secure from any attack save by an overwhelming force which under the circumstances could not possibly be brought against them, the flotilla proceeded on its way.

There was only one weak point in the arrangement, and that was due to the inevitable rivalry of the competing lines. The Blue Ribbon of the Atlantic was still as jealously coveted and as eagerly striven for as ever, pirate or no pirate. The Gigantic—for such the White Star liner really was—had been built to cross the ocean in five days, and she was expected to do it, so she took up the running and gradually forged ahead.

When the second morning dawned, Renault, looking down from the clouds, saw her over fifteen miles ahead of the other liners and about ten miles ahead of the foremost cruiser, with the two torpedo boats some four miles off either quarter. Behind the cruiser came the Cunarder, and far away astern he could just make out the smoke of the Lloyd and American liners and the two torpedo boats that were bringing up the rear of the long procession. Another twenty-four hours' run would bring the White Star boat within touch of the British squadron, and two or three hours after her the others would come up.

Every now and then other liners, with here and there a cruiser and a torpedo boat or two, were met coming in the other direction. In fact, as Renault said to himself, the Atlantic looked more as though half the nations of Europe were at war rather than an ocean highway in time of perfect international peace.

The second night came down dark and misty, but on a moderately smooth sea, and Renault, showing no lights, ran down to within eight hundred feet of the mast-heads of the Gigantic. She was now nearly twenty miles ahead of the rest of the flotilla. He could make her out easily by the lights that were gleaming from her decks and port holes, and he recognised that if Franz was on the war-path on the Atlantic track and had any designs upon her, as he probably would have, seeing that she was the fastest, biggest, and richest prize of the lot, he would have to act before morning, for by daybreak the British squadron would probably be in sight, and he would also have to run the gauntlet of the more numerous convoys and other warships that might possibly be cruising in the more crowded waters of the Eastern Atlantic.

Considering the force that was within such a short distance,

Digitized by Google

Max, in spite of his anxiety to fall in with his comrades, half hoped that they would keep out of the way. Perhaps they were not on that part of the Atlantic at all. They might be on the African coast in the track of the Cape steamers, or down South waiting for some of the South American liners bound to Colon or Monte Video, or even away in the Indian Ocean playing havoc among the east bound steamers.

Thus, turning over the chances in his mind, he kept in touch of the Gigantic until close on midnight. The two torpedo boats were now about eight miles astern of her and the cruiser five miles behind them. Suddenly a beam of light shot up out of the ocean astern, then vanished, and was repeated again three times in quick succession. Renault didn't understand it, but those on board the Gigantic recognised it as a danger signal which meant "stop and close up."

"Ah, that means something," said Renault, "I'll go back and see what it's all about."

He had taken what sleep he needed during the day, so that he could spend the night on watch in the conning-tower, for he felt sure that if anything happened it would be under cover of the darkness. He swung the Vengeur round, and, quickening her up to sixty miles an hour, darted back towards the cruiser which had shown the signal. Less than fifteen minutes brought him over the war-ship, which was now flashing her electric rays rapidly in all directions over the water. He stopped and watched for a few minutes, circling slowly overhead, and soon their light revealed a strange spectacle to him.

The two torpedo boats, evidently badly rammed, were fast settling down, and the cruiser was rushing up to them at full speed, still flashing her search-lights ahead and to both sides of her. Just as she came up with them, one of the long beams fell upon a grey, low-lying, swiftly-moving object in the dark water to the south-east. Instantly a storm of thunder and flame burst from her decks, and a tempest of projectiles swept over the waves in the direction of the fast flying assailant that had done her work so silently and with such terrible effect.

(To be continued.)

BROWN BREDD.

JUST as sure as a man is mentally lopsided, just so sure is he, sooner or later, to ring my doorbell. I am his Mecca; and he travels in my direction with a degree of persistency which has at times been appalling.

John Brown Bredd was one of this sort. He was the most pathetic and simple-hearted creature I ever saw. The first time he called on me he brought a picture for sale.

"I don't claim to be an artist," he said in plaintive tones, as he uncovered the picture for my inspection; "but I hope to be. That, at any rate," and he sighed profoundly, "is my dream."

I couldn't say much to encourage him, for the work was badly done.

"No, it's not worthy of a place on your walls," he continued, in a broken voice. "Ah! that is a Leighton. And that is a Herkomer, and here is a Solomon."

He stood for several minutes examining these pictures without saying a word. "I think I had better take my canvas away," he moaned at length.

"Some time, perhaps, you may be willing to purchase an example of my work; but," with a shake of the head, "not now—not now. I am convinced of that."

I couldn't stand the man's tragic manner and thrust a £5 note into his hands.

"Oh, no," he cried, in broken tones, "not that. Please don't offer me charity, I couldn't endure to take money from a stranger." He placed the note on the table, looked at it for an instant as though his heart would break, and then turned abruptly away.

Of course, I bought the picture. I would have done so if it had taken my last shilling. Poor Brown! He had no more power to cope with the world than a child has to wrestle with a giant. In stature he was a man; in all other respects he was a baby in arms.

The constant hunt for something to eat was his torment. "When I get to heaven," he piteously said, on one occasion, "I shall have a body minus digestive organs. That is something I look forward to with very high anticipations. Just think of it! We shall not need to eat! What a glorious prospect!"

And yet Brown had an aspiration, and because of that aspiration I thought him a crank.

One day we sat together in his studio, talking. I had visited him quite a number of times, and was getting to be fond of the unpractical fellow. My interest in him had warmed his heart, a smile lighted up his face, and he became communicative.

On the easel was a portrait which I had never seen before. It was really a superb piece of work, and I wondered where he had borrowed it. Indeed, I hinted as much, but he replied:

"No, I painted that myself. I have been at it now for four years and six months. I don't believe I shall live to finish it. Do you like it?"

"Why, Brown," I answered, "you've got genius. Nothing but the 'divine afflatus' could account for what you have done. As for these landscapes——"

"Don't mention them," he broke in, with strange impetuosity. "They are nothing. I earn my bread with them; but I hope, some time, to earn fame with this."

"That flesh tint is really fine," I said with enthusiasm. "And those eyes——; but tell me, Brown, is it an ideal or a portrait?"

"A portrait," he answered, and I noticed that his lips trembled. "Ah, I can never do her justice. She is beyond my skill; and yet, you see, I am trying my best."

"You must introduce me when she comes to sit," I suggested. "Such a beautiful creature is worth knowing."

"She is beautiful, isn't she?" Then he laid down his pipe. "So—so—so very beautiful!" and he fell into a reverie.

"May I not see her?" I asked.

"In good time, perhaps," he answered.

"Pray when, my dear fellow? You see I am beginning to get excited."

"After death; not before," he replied, with solemn emphasis. "Then you shall pay us a visit. She will be glad to see you, and grateful for what you have done."

"But her name?" I asked.

"I don't know; I have forgotten," he replied; and a profound shade of sadness fell on his face. He sank into a chair, heaved a deep sigh; and it seemed to me that there were tears in his eyes.

"I don't know her name, my friend; I have really forgotten it."

"And you don't know anything about her, Brown?" I inquired, with marked surprise.

"Yes, I know something; but not much."

"And you will tell me?"

"Certainly, if you wish to know. She is my wife."

"Come," I said, going to his side and placing my hand on his shoulder—"come, Brown, your nerves are unstrung. Get out of this dingy hole into the fresh air. It will brighten you up. You've been working too hard, and it has told on you."

Digitized by Google

He looked up at me wearily. "No; I don't need fresh air. I get all I want here. I need to die, that is all. This life is my nightmare. I shake myself a dozen times a day to wake myself up. In vain. I must work the problem out as best I can. But"—and he rose to his feet and stood facing me, white as snow—"but no man longs for death as I do. The galley slave looks forward to the time when his chains will drop. He plies the oar with a bleeding heart, and yet there is a ray of hope in his life. I am that slave. I have that hope. By-and-bye I shall really wake up, and then I shall begin to live."

I was too astonished to speak.

"Can I tell you a secret?" he asked.

"Of course, Brown; tell me everything," I answered.

There was a wild gleam in his eyes, like that of a hunted deer, which touched me to the heart. "They call it catalepsy, but it isn't. I tell you on my honour, it isn't. They don't know what they are talking about. They are all fools, to whom the mysteries of the other life are incomprehensible."

"You have been talking with a doctor, then?"

"Yes, yes; a dozen of them," he answered impatiently, and with a gesture of the hand as though he brushed them all aside. "They are interested in my case, and tell me it is unlike anything in the books."

"Catalepsy, Brown?"

"Bah!" he cried with disdain. "What do they know about it? I tell you it is not catalepsy. On the contrary, it is the only thing that makes my life endurable. I wouldn't give it up for the right to pawn the Koh-i-Noor."

"But tell me about it," I cried. "Give me the details, and let me judge for myself."

"Sit down, then," he said, very gloomily. I noticed that his lips were twitching, and he had no rest for a few minutes before he could begin the recital of his strange experiences.

"You will hold this secret sacred?"

What a pathos there was in his tones. He seemed like a man pleading for his life.

"I couldn't tell everyone," he said slowly, almost under his breath, "but somehow I feel safe with you. I can't keep it to myself any longer, for fear——," and he hesitated.

"For fear of what, Brown?"

"For fear I might be buried alive!" and he shuddered. "You will see that that never happens to me, won't you?"

I assured him that I would take charge of his body if anything that resembled death should supervene; and he breathed more freely.

"You see," he continued, "I have had these alleged attacks for nearly five years; it will be five years on the fifteenth of next month. They come regularly twice a week, and last on an average four hours, though once in a while much longer."

I nodded my head, and he went on:

"When I fall into this state my soul is wide awake, but my body becomes entirely useless. I am like a man who has been chained to a ringbolt in the floor. I tug at my bonds, and, so far, have always managed to slip my hands through them. Until I have done that I suffer agonies which can't be described. But when I am free, when I have got away from my body, oh, how beautiful it all is!

"My dear friend, it may seem incredible to you, but my real life is the one I then enjoy. This, which you call life, is a dreadful nightmare. I don't belong here, I belong there. The moment I get out of my body I find myself at the garden gate of my other home, and am met by my wife and our three children."

I opened my eyes in wonder. What was coming next?

"Yes," he went on mournfully, "there is no reason why you shouldn't be like the rest of them and vote me a maniac. Still, I am telling you the exact truth.

"My estate over yonder is a very valuable one; it is situated on the banks of a river, which a few miles further on stretches out into a lake. My orchards are rich in fruit, and from their character, I judge that the house is situated somewhere in the Tropics. I have orange and lemon trees in large abundance, and pomegranates and figs, and everything that the appetite can desire. Poor as I am while here, I am rich the instant I get there.

"The hours during which my catalepsy lasts are changed into weeks on the further shore. And how I enjoy them! wandering along the highway with my little ones climbing the hill-tops to get a glimpse of the far-away mountains, sitting during the placid and heavenly evening with my dear wife, reading some favourite author or discussing some favourite theme."

"And that?" I said, pointing to the easel.

"That is a portrait of my wife," he answered, growing pale as he spoke, and heaving a deep sigh. "But it doesn't do her justice. The poor pigments with which I work lack brilliancy of colour, and the genius in my finger-tips is too—too meagre. Ah, you should see that woman, my friend—you should see her!"

There were tears in his eyes.

"I am sure you will like her," he continued; "and she would certainly like you, both for yourself and for what you have done in my behalf.

"When my respite is at an end I hear distant bells ring; and the family go with me as far as the walls which limit our property, and bid me good-bye.

"I come back to the dingy apartment, and crawl into my half-worn body. My eyes open, the past returns to me like a dream, and I take up once more the dull routine of an unhappy life."

"But, my dear Brown," I asked, "when you are once away, and in such a glorious environment, why don't you stay away?"

"I dare not," he answered. "It would be a crime. I have been tempted to do so; but no, it wouldn't be right. For some reason beyond my ken, fate dooms me to return. There will come a time, however," and his eyes glistened—"there will come a time when fate shall say, 'Go back no more'; and then, shall I not be glad?"

"And you wish me——," I asked.

"To keep guard over my body until it is quite certain I shall not return, and then see that it is properly buried. Look, here is a second key to my room. Come when you please, and if I, my soul, am not here to greet you, do for me what I would gladly do for you under like circumstances. I know I am asking a great deal, but there is no one else in whom I can confide."

I gave the required promise and went home.

Three days afterward I saw him, and said jocosely: "Well, Brown, you are still here."

"Yes," he replied, "but I don't believe it is for long. The picture is well nigh finished. It is not what it should be, but it's all I can hope to make it. That done, I shall go."

"Cheer up, my dear fellow, cheer up. There's many a year for you yet, and perhaps good luck besides."

But I couldn't move him to a smile. "I shall cheer up," he said, "when I feel that this strange servitude to the flesh is over, and I can be permanently with those I love. That, my friend, will be good luck indeed."

I visited him frequently. He chatted very freely about the other home, told me of various dimly-remembered incidents which had occurred in his family, and seemed, on the whole, to be getting into a brighter mood than in the old days.

This cheerfulness increased perceptibly. He reminded me constantly of a man who is packing up his worldly goods and making ready for a glorious meeting with those from whom he has long been separated.

The last time I saw him he was decidedly jovial. "It is done," he cried, pointing to the portrait. "I have laid the brush to the canvas for the last time."

"And now, what will you do with it?" I asked.

"My hope of being remembered by my kind," he answered, very impressively, "rests on that picture. It is my life's work. You have been kind enough to say that it shows genius. If others agree with you, I am satisfied; yes, much more than satisfied. I shall go hence with the consciousness that I have not lived in vain."

He hesitated, and for a moment seemed absorbed in meditation. Then, looking up, he continued: "I would like, if it is possible, and if I am not present at the time, to have you take charge of it. Perhaps the committee at the Academy may be willing to accept it. Then you will see that it is properly hung."

Digitized by Google

I was deeply touched by the poor fellow's manner and by his modesty. The picture was certainly worthy of exhibition, and I had very little doubt that it would attract popular attention.

I recalled a line written by Richard Crashaw more than two hundred years ago—one line, which keeps his memory green. It is embedded in the memory and the admiration of mankind. It runs thus :—

"The conscious water saw its God and blushed."

That line is immortal; it cannot die. So long as this language lasts it will be repeated. Two centuries have not dimmed its lustre. Twenty more will pass, and these words will retain their beauty. The ordinary scholar knows little of Crashaw, and cares less.

He did not fill a large place in the literature of the world; but he left one line, eight wonderful words, which will give him a warm place in our hearts until the sun sets for the last time. He wrote very extensively, and it has all some degree of merit; but his fame is held secure by that line alone.

My good friend Bredd, I thought, displayed no genius in his other works; but this one—well, it is a miracle. It ought to make him known; and I will use my best endeavour to afford him fair play with the public. It was easy for me, therefore, to promise that I would urge his claim at the Academy.

He took my hand in both his and said, in a choked and broken voice: "Sometime I will tell you how grateful I am. It is not for my sake, however, that I desire this, but for hers. Yes," he added slowly, "I think it will please her."

"Well, my dear Brown," I said, "there is one thing more."

"What is that?"

"I would like to know what final disposition you would like made of that picture. The exhibition will be open for only a few weeks, and then?"

"What would please me best——" he began, and then stopped.

"Well? Lay your heart bare, Bredd."

"What would please me best would be to know that it was hung on the walls of some public gallery where people might see it. And yet——"

"Speak your wish, my dear fellow, and if it is within the range of my personal influence, it shall be accomplished."

"I know it—I know it," he replied. "If you won't think me presumptuous——"

"Go on, tell me all. You may not have another chance."

"True, very true. Then, if you are willing to accept the picture as a token of my regard, I should like to think of it on your walls in company with the great artists whose works are already there."

"What! Do you mean that you will give the picture to me?"

"For the term of your natural life, yes. After your death, perhaps, you will bequeath it to the National Gallery, or some other institution of that sort. Will you accept it?"

I confess that the fellow nearly broke my heart with his tenderness and gentleness, his plaintive tone, and the air of sadness which seemed to envelop him.

"Accept it!" I replied eagerly. "With a thousand thanks, and a thousand more when those are done. But, see! You have forgotten to put your name in the corner."

With a few deft strokes of the brush he wrote on the edge of the robe which fell from the shoulders of the portrait, Brown Bredd.

"Now then, my work-day is over. As for these traps," turning to various pictures scattered over the room, "I don't care what becomes of them. Let them go. But this one——"

"Shall be my chief treasure," I said.

He nodded his head, and the subject was dropped.

That was on Wednesday. Two days later I received a scrawl from him. It was evidently written with a trembling hand, and the signature could hardly be identified. He was apparently labouring under some great excitement. The note said:

"Bring your key and come into my studio to-morrow about sundown. I think I shall not return this time; but I may be mistaken. If I do, I shall be glad to greet you; if not, God bless you and good-bye. Remember my last wishes; and, when you leave, take the portrait with you."

"After all," I said to myself, "this is a mere hallucination. Brown Bredd is an interesting crank, nothing more. These travels of which he has spoken are beautiful delusions. They are, of course, the result of some nervous disease, and he's just as likely to live as I am."

Still, when I knocked at his door I was not surprised to receive no answer. Then I knocked louder; but there was no response. After fumbling over my bunch I found the right key, and with it effected an entrance.

Looking towards the bed, on which he usually lay when these curious attacks came on, I saw that it was empty. I shrugged my shoulders, with the feeling that I had been duped, that my sympathy with the painter had run away with my common sense.

Almost instantly, however, I saw a sight that made my heart stand still. There, in the high-backed chair, directly in front of the easel, sat Brown Bredd, his face as white as the snows of December. He was leaning back, as artists frequently do when critically examining a new picture; and his eyes were half shut, apparently to get the full effect of the work.

His hands hung at his side, from one of which had dropped the brush and from the other the pallet. On his lips was a pleasant smile, as though he were in the act of bidding some one good morning.

It was a strange and thrilling spectacle, and it seemed almost gruesome to be alone with him in the deepening shadows of that room. I couldn't believe my eyes at first, and so cried: "Well, Brown, how goes it?" He did not stir. I put my hand on his brow! It was stone cold.

That wonderful story that he had told me came vividly to mind with painful violence. It was true, after all; and after all Brown Bredd was not so much a crank as I had supposed.

The portrait now hangs in my room, the souvenir of a very odd experience. And every time I look at it I say: "Brown is happy now with his family amid the orange groves of that other shore."

£2 2s. FOR A PLOT.

I take it for granted that, on the whole, the readers of this paper are very fair judges of a good story. Moreover, there are undoubtedly a large number of people among them who are capable of devising excellent plots for stories, while they are not gifted with the necessary ability for working them up into readable form.

It seems to me a pity that such good material should be forced by lack of opportunity to lie dormant, and with a view to seeing what readers are capable of in this direction, I offer a couple of Guineas for what I consider to be the most striking plot for a short story.

The scene may be laid anywhere, and only a rough outline should be given, embodied in a paragraph of not more than a hundred and fifty words. Any number of attempts may be sent by each competitor, but each attempt must be on a separate sheet of paper, with the name and address of the sender on the back. Competitions to be enclosed in an envelope marked "PLOT," and to reach this office by Tuesday, October 30th.

Digitized by Google

A TRAPPER TRAGEDY.

THE first gleam of dawn quivers in the eastern sky over the snow-covered plains that stretch away to the cities. The settlement by the shores of Lake Winnipeg lies hushed in sleep. Not a voice nor a footfall breaks the cold silence that reigns over the few log cabins, where live the grave-faced trappers of the lakes.

The snow has ceased falling, but a few feathery flakes hover in the chilly air, sinking slowly, swayed from side to side by the soft current of air that is too weak even to move the snow-laden branches of the pines.

Hark! An angry voice!

A fierce hubbub follows, shrieks and cries rend the air for a few moments, and then all is silent.

The trappers come out of their log cabins one by one and hurry towards the spot where lies the victim of this, the first murder that has ever sullied the record of the settlement.

They gather round the little form, whose life's blood is staining the trodden snow by her side. They carry her tenderly into the nearest hut and lay her before the log fire, staunching the blood with their handkerchiefs and bathing the wound with warm water.

Poor little Nell! There was not a man among them who would have spoken a harsh word to her, much less have raised his hand to strike her. She had brought sunshine into their thankless, dreary lives, and to her they had shown all the tenderness of which they were capable.

The rugged faces that stared in through the narrow doorway were graver than ever, and more than one pair of eyes glistened with a brightness that betrayed the presence of unwonted moisture. To lose Nell was to lose a loving friend the world could never replace in their hearts.

But what of the murderer? He stood defiantly in the midst of a group of hard-visaged men, awaiting the sentence which all knew must come. The mad rage which had prompted him to do the deed still burned in his heart, and every rude buffet and bitter word was met with low mutterings, the significance of which was fully understood.

He was not one of them. Only the day before had he come into the settlement with another trapper, and on the morrow they were going on their way. But only one of them would go, the other would stop; the grim, hard-faced men who stood about him would answer for that.

There seemed to be no motive for the foul deed. Nell, poor little Nell, shared a cabin with Mother Samson, and was the old woman's pet. Mother Samson, when she came on the scene, declared solemnly that she had seen Nell into her bed the previous night, and that everything about the house was snug and in order, and that there was no obvious reason whatever why she should have gone out during the hours of darkness. The door was ajar when she got up, and Nell must have gone out that way.

Had this blackhearted villain, this Donald, as he was called, induced her to leave her home and escape with him to the cities? And had she repented at the last moment, and attempted to return to her home, while he, in a paroxysm of rage, had fallen upon her and murdered her? Or had he entered the cabin and stolen her from her bed, killing her when she awoke and cried for help?

They removed him to an empty hut and locked him inside, one of them mounting guard over the door with a loaded gun, primarily with the object of preventing his escape, and secondarily for stopping any one of their number who, through feelings of humanity, might be tempted to let him go free and unpunished.

During the next hour, as dawn broadened into daylight, anxious inquirers were continually passing to and from the log cabin where little Nell lay slowly dying; for all knew too well that the terrible gash across her fair throat was her death wound.

Nor were they mistaken. Before another half hour had passed the news flew from mouth to mouth that their little friend, the cheerer of their rugged hearts, the sunshine of their lives, little Nell, had passed away.

Under the shadow of a great pine, close to the frozen waters that fringed the banks of the great lake, they dug a little grave in the snow, and laid to rest the last remains of her who had come out from the Old Country years ago, and grown up and lived amongst them, beloved by all.

Then, sad at heart, the little group tramped over the crisp snow back to the settlement, the sorrow in their breasts, as they neared the presence of the murderer, becoming smothered by a yearning for revenge, a longing desire to satiate their anger on the body of the brute who had taken from them their little Nell.

At the prison door they paused.

What form should the punishment take? This they had not yet decided.

"I be for shootin' 'im, right thar," said Denvers, a grizzled old trappist, fingering his Colt.

"Yes, rope 'im up with a dozen yards, an' let 'im dodge the slugs."

"Two shots apiece at fifty yards."

"Agreed."

They opened the door, looked inside, and found Donald lying peacefully sleeping in a corner, on a heap of straw.

He was seized and led along the open way between the two rows of huts that in any civilised village would have been called a street.

Several of the men dropped into their cabins as they passed to get their revolvers, in anticipation of the sport to come.

Mother Samson came to her door with the express purpose of shouting her last maledictions upon the head of her darling's murderer. She was a forcible woman at all times, and now the men who formed the body-guard had some difficulty in preventing her from attacking the doomed Donald, who walked defenceless in their midst.

A stake was driven through the snow, into the hard ground beneath, and to this the victim was fastened by a thong round his neck, with a sufficiently lengthy piece of rope to permit his moving freely in a circle of about five yards radius.

Then the whole band moved off to a distance, and prepared to shoot.

The victim stood resolutely facing his torturers, his eyes fixed steadily on all their movements.

Denvers, by reason of his age and experience, invariably took the lead in all the combined movements of the settlement, and selected himself to take first shot.

Stepping forward in advance of his comrades, he levelled his revolver, and aimed at Donald's legs. The shot struck the ground a few inches to the left, sending up a shower of fine snow, and ricocheted away over the plains.

Donald started and moved quickly aside, with a frightened look in his eyes. Before he had time to realise the horror of his helpless situation, a second shot struck him in the chest, and leaping into the air, he fell with a dull thud on the hard, crisp snow.

A pause. Then an irregular volley from a dozen revolvers; a little cloud of snow as the shots strike the ground about the prostrate body; a murmur of approval among the men with the smoking weapons; and little Nell is avenged!

But it really is not so very dreadful, after all, because, you see, Donald was a Scotch collie, and Nell a little Irish terrier.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

IZOD'S

LONG WAISTED. A GREAT SUCCESS.

THE LONG WAISTED.

200 Dozen or 2,400 Pairs of this Celebrated Make alone delivered this season in London per Day. The great question of the day with all Ladies is the Fashion in Corsets, which grows year by year, until our Special Artistes have produced corsets for every type of figure.—IZOD'S CORSETS are cut on scientific principles, with a precision of accuracy formerly unknown.—IZODS draw Ladies' attention to their Long Waisted Corsets, which have been designed by their British and Foreign Artistes, which are the best the world produces.—The Ladies' Tailors always recommend these celebrated goods for the elegance with which they set off a tailor-made dress and create a long waist and graceful figure. They are made in a variety of qualities, and are beautiful and inexpensive. Every pair stamped on busk Izod's Long Waisted, and also on lid of the box.—To be had of all Drapers and Ladies' Outfitters in Europe, India, Canada, United States, Australia, the whole of the British Colonies, and throughout the world.—Write for our Sheet of Drawings.

IZOD'S LONG WAISTED

E. IZOD & SON, 30, MILK ST., LONDON, E.C.

Manufactory: LANDPORT, HANTS.

VELVETEENS.

1/9 per yd.	DIRECT FROM THE	1/9 per yd.
1/9 per yd.	MAKERS.	1/9 per yd.
1/9 per yd.		1/9 p r yd.
1/9 per yd.	Extraordinary	1/9 per yd
1/9 per yd.	Value.	1/9 per yd.

Silk-finished. Twilled-back. Fast Pile. Fast Dye. Black and all fashionable shades.

SEND POST CARD FOR PATTERNS, WHICH MAY BE KEPT.

ADDRESS:

BRIDGEWATER MILLS CO.,

(S. S. Department),

Great Bridgewater Street, MANCHESTER.

For LOVERS and MOTHERS.

The New (No. 2) Design True Lovers' Knot

"MIZPAH" BROOCH.

The most popular piece of Jewellery in the World. Every purchaser delighted. Each Brooch Hall Marked, and in handsome heart-shaped plush case.

Silver, 5s.; Gold, 30s.; Post Free.

Engagement Jewellery a Speciality. Catalogue (618 Illustrations) Post-free.

MASTERS, Jeweller, RYE, SUSSEX.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."

EASY PAYMENTS

WITH EXPRESSION STOP

ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.

Plays hymns, popular airs, quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, hornpipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by any one. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30s. Terms 4s. deposit and 4s. monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.

Write for list of music and full particulars.

(Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, Blackburn.

HAIR DESTROYED.

The PERSIAN DEPILATORY absolutely exterminates without pain or injury to the most sensitive skin. It never fails to permanently destroy root and branch. Every case a success or no charge made. Send stamped addressed envelope to the "MANAGERESS," Oriental Toilet, Company, 87, Strand, London. (Mention this paper).

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" give relief, and a few more applications effect a cure

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., os 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY, 83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

Book on the Skin and Diet free.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

25% Saved by Purchasing

All Your Swiss Embroidery, Fancy Laces, Lace Curtains, &c. &c. Straight from the Loom. Patterns Per Return.

FROM THE DIRECT TRADING CO.

Flannelettes (with Embroidery to Match)

19 Mount Street Manchester.

ALL ORDERS CARRIAGE PAID. When writing for Patterns, please address Dept. S., The DIRECT TRADING CO., 19, Mount Street, MANCHESTER.

DIRECT FROM THE LOOMS.

FLANNELETTES.

"The STORNAWAY" Fancy Stripe, 28 ins. wide, 5d. per yard. "The ORKNEY" Fancy Stripe, 28 ins. wide, 6d. per yard. The Shetland Self Colours, 30 ins. wide, 6½d. per yard. Embroideries to match. Patterns sent per return. Price Lists Free. All Orders Carriage Paid.

The DIRECT TRADING Co. Offices: 19, Mount Street, MANCHESTER,

LACE CURTAINS.

THE MARVEL OF THE AGE.

Lace Curtains at first cost, direct from the looms, 1s. 9d. to 45s. per pair. Send for sample pair of our leading A B C line, fern and daisy pattern, taped border, white or ecru, 41 ins. wide, 3 yds. long, price 3s. 3d. carriage paid. Write for Illustrated book of registered designs. CATALOGUE of our noted specialities free. Orders carriage paid.

The DIRECT TRADING Co. Offices: 19, Mount Street, MANCHESTER,

SWISS EMBROIDERIES AND FANCY LACES.

GREAT SAVING. IMPORTED DIRECT.

Our new range of Swiss works now complete, comprising all the latest novelties, from 1½d. to 5s. per yard. Black or White Laces in latest designs from 1d. to 30s. per yard. Patterns sent per return. Price Lists Free. All orders carriage paid.

The DIRECT TRADING Co. Offices: 19, Mount Street, MANCHESTER,

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise. LADIES

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case. LADIES

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope. LADIES

Write privately to— LADIES

Mrs. P. S. S., LADIES

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W. LADIES

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A phamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS

FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 18 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,

GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

Digitized by Google

A FRESH "HALL" MARK.

MR. HALL CAINE,

Author of "THE DEEMSTER," "THE BONDMAN," "THE MANXMAN," &c., when speaking on criticism, recently, said:—

"When a thing that is advertised greatly is good, it goes, and goes permanently; when it is bad, it only goes for a while; the public finds it out."—(See Idler, September, 1894.)

Mr. Hall Caine never wrote or gave expression to an opinion so incontrovertible. Who has not read from time to time the following bold announcement:—

"It is a fallacy to imagine that anything will sell just because it is advertised. How many nostrums have been started with glare and snuffed out in gloom? The fact is, a man is not easily gulled a second time; every dissatisfied purchaser does ten times more harm than one satisfied does good. Assuredly the sale of per annum, after a public trial of Half a Century, is conclusive testimony of their popularity, superiority, and proverbial worth."

6,000,000

BOXES OF

BEECHAM'S PILLS

THIS ALSO IS ABSOLUTELY INCONTROVERTIBLE.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 304. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 27, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,
Hyson Green Works,
NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

One little bottle of Norton's Pills
Is not guaranteed to cure all ills,
But one little bottle, beyond all question,
Will thoroughly conquer Indigestion!

TRADE MARK.
NORTON'S
ONE LITTLE BOTTLE.

100 years' Reputation as an unequalled remedy for Indigestion, Sick Headache, Biliousness, Stomach and Liver Complaints. In Bottles 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/-, of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World. Ask for NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS and do not take a substitute.
Prepared by NORTON'S, Ltd., 21, Spital Square, London, E.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

THREE HALF CROWNS

IT IS A STARTLING FACT that Three Half-Crowns (7/6) will purchase a beautiful SERGE DRESS LENGTH in any of the following colours:—Black, Blue, Brown, Green, Claret, Nut Brown, Chestnut, Mulberry, Ruby, Red, Moss, Olive, Myrtle, Bronze, &c., also several very pretty and effective mixtures.

Full Dress Length (Carriage Paid) FOR 7/6

Money returned if not approved.

20,000 Sets of Patterns now ready, write at once. Patterns are sent Post Free and need not be returned.

These beautiful Serges are specially manufactured for Autumn and Winter wear, elegant in appearance and are not heavy as most Serges are. They will not spot with rain or wear threadbare.

£5,000 to be Given Away in Presents to Purchasers.
Thousands of Testimonials from all parts of the World.

Cloth Table Covers, 2 yds. square, 4s. 9d. each, in Crimson, Claret, Tan, or Emerald. Remnant Bundles of Serge, 5s. and 10s. each, carriage paid. Write to-day for Patterns of Dress Materials, post free to any address.

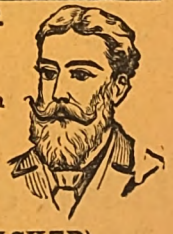
LUTAS LEATHLEY & Co., Dept. 21, The Dress Warehouse, Armley, Leeds.

FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES & C°

(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID

No. 1 Black
No. 2 Dark Brown
No. 3 Light Brown
No. 4 Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 Pure Golden
No. 6 Brodie's Hair Grower and Restorer



Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED).

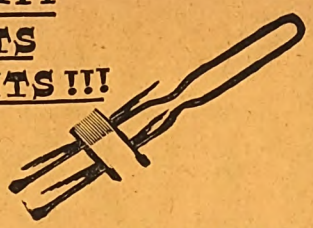
J. BRODIE, 41 MUSEUM STREET, LONDON

Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

Digitized by Google

A HAIR PIN WITHOUT POINTS HAS GOOD POINTS!!!

SEE THE POINT?



Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.

For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

For LOVERS and MOTHERS.

The New (No. 2) Design True Lovers' Knot

"MIZPAH" BROOCH.

The most popular piece of Jewellery in the World. Every purchaser delighted. Each Brooch Hall Marked, and in handsome heart-shaped plush case.

Silver, 5s.; Gold, 30s.; Post Free.

Engagement Jewellery a Speciality.

Catalogue (618 Illustrations) Post-free.

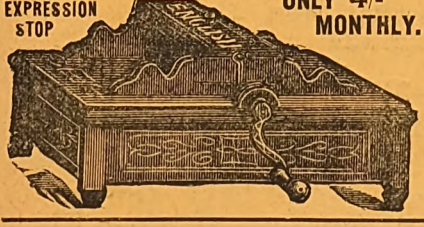
MASTERS, Jeweller, RYE, SUSSEX.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."

EASY PAYMENTS

WITH EXPRESSION STOP

ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.



Plays hymns, popular airs, quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, hornpipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by any one. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30s. Terms 4s. deposit and 4s. monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.

Write for list of music and full particulars.

(Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER,

Organette Works, Blackburn.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" give relief, and a few more applications effect a cure

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., os 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY, 83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

Book on the Skin and Diet free.

HAIR DESTROYED.

The PERSIAN DEPILATORY absolutely exterminates without pain or injury to the most sensitive skin. It never fails to permanently destroy root and branch. Every case a success or no charge made. Send stamped addressed envelope to the "MANAGERESS," Oriental Toilet, Company, 87, Strand, London. (Mention this paper).

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,

8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

WE ALL WANT

to have beautiful and luxuriant hair, but it is almost impossible, leading the artificial life we do, unless we use WHITE'S QUICKENER—that will ensure it. Carriage paid 1s. 3d. per bottle. ARTHUR WHITE, 34, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

MELVILLE'S

NEW UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. For beauty and resonance of sound, for delicacy and brilliancy of touch, for exquisite modulation and the perfection of workmanship it cannot be excelled. It has all the latest improvements, including entire Iron Frame (suspended), Harmonic Bar, Best Check Action, Double Covered Machine Hammers, Bushed Keys, &c., Marqueterie or Chased Gilt Embossed Panels and Gilded Bracket Trusses. Supplied in Walnut, Rosewood, or Ebonised, and the net cash price is 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE, 61, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,

GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. P. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

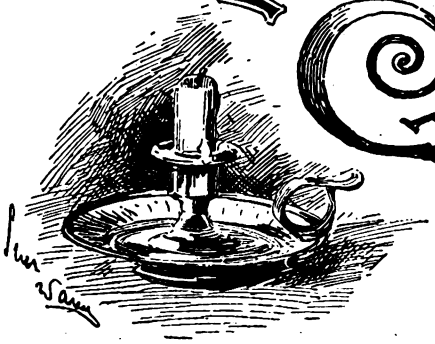
Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 304.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 27, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY

A BIT OF CANDLE



IT was truly a most agreeable surprise. Benton and I had not set eyes on one another since we were hobbledehoys at school together. And now to think that, after fifteen years of almost antipodean peregrination, we should suddenly find ourselves vis-à-vis at the dining table of a Melbourne hotel.

Of course, we had a world of matters to discuss; and that we might do it uninterruptedly Benton asked for a private room. The apartment into which we were shown was on the ground floor. It was comfortably furnished, and looked out upon a wide verandah. Here we sat and chatted and smoked cheroots until ten o'clock, when a startling thing happened. We were both engineers, and up to this time our conversation had been largely of a shoppy character; but at last professional experiences seemed to be exhausted, and we had branched off into annother theme.

"Married yet, Benton?" I inquired.

"My dear fellow," he replied, his eyes kindling with enthusiasm; "I've got the most precious little wife this side of Paradise. She——but wait a moment, that reminds me——"

The window-shade was only two-thirds drawn, and Benton rose to pull it completely down. As he did so a bullet crashed through the glass and, barely grazing his shoulder, buried itself in the opposite wall of the room. Benton's look as he stepped back was one of disgust rather than surprise.

"That fiend of a Spaniard again!" he cried. "I sincerely trust the fellow will soon tire of his amusement. It is becoming positively annoying."

"Amusement."

"Yes, the game of revenge the blackhearted scoundrel calls it. That is the fourth attempt on my life in two years. A big price to pay for a wife, is it not?"

"I doubt if the best woman in the world is worth it," I responded; "but explain. How on earth, my dear Benton, did you come to get Nemesis for a mother-in-law?"

After describing his assailant to those who had rushed in on hearing the report, and desiring the landlord to place the matter at once in the hands of the police, Benton lit a fresh cheroot and related the following peculiar experience:

"Two years ago," said he, "I was commissioned by the mining company for which I worked to look closely into the condition of several of their Mexican mines. After making a considerable circuit, I came at last to Palos de Santa Fé.

"This was a picturesque little village situated in a luxuriant valley. Looking from it up the mountain one could see the entrance to the mines, suggesting to the mind so many rat-holes in the hillside. One would scarcely have imagined, gazing over this peaceful valley, that a terror had for years sat brooding above it. Yet such was the case, and it was to find out whether or not there was any immediate danger of that terror stooping to clutch its victims that I had been sent there.

"In plain words there was known to be stored somewhere among those mountain peaks incalculable masses of water which our workings, if we continued them, were bound to tap sooner or later, and involve the destruction of hundreds of human lives. Such, then, was the state of affairs.

"I should tell you, by the way, that since we were at school together I have added to my profession of engineer that of geologist. I was stopping at a little posada, perched a mile or so above the village.

"It was kept by one Diez, an old Spaniard with a villainous face and a record that was far from enviable. This posada was a sort of meeting-place for the miners, and when the rough fellows became aware of the nature of my errand, they looked upon me with rather an unwelcome interest.

"As my work progressed and I saw it would be necessary to advise the immediate closing of the mine, my position among these reckless miners grew more and more unpleasant. On my report hung the prosperity, nay, the very existence of their village, and as for my landlord, Diez, he would have to shut up shop, and, like the miners, make a livelihood elsewhere.

"To be such an important factor in the success or ruin of hundreds of rough, revengeful miners entailed, as you can well understand, great personal responsibility. Of course, I had no intention of taking them into my confidence as to the real condition of things, and on this fact I counted for my safety.

"Unconsciously, however, I must have let out my secret; indeed, it was a very easy lesson in physiognomy, for the anxiety and worry on my face grew deeper and deeper as the conviction impressed itself upon me that my report must doom the village and cast its dwellers out of employment.

"Why otherwise, they argued, should I be anxious and worried. I believe I am not a coward, yet a fear for my life took possession of me, and I was careful to be continually armed, and avoid anything that looked like a trap of the enemy's.

"Now Diez, my landlord, had a daughter, a beautiful girl, as sweet and innocent as her alleged father was sour and villainous. Her mother she had never seen.

"On my previous visit to Palos on less important affairs I had always put up at this posada, and as I watched the girl develop from childhood to womanhood, my interest in her grew stronger than I would have cared at the time to confess.

"Juanita had always been extremely attentive to my necessities, and we had become fast friends. As for looking upon the girl as a sweetheart, that I would not permit myself to do, seeing her father intended for her an alliance with his nephew Antonio.

"It was easy to be seen, however, that Juanita did not favour his suit. She had no smiles for Antonio and she repulsed his attentions at every opportunity. So at any rate it appeared to me for a week or two after my arrival.

"Latterly, however, she seemed to have changed towards

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

him. Hitherto she was rarely to be seen behind the bar where Antonio attended, but now she lingered about the room apparently with no other object than to be in the young man's presence.

"Then, too, to his great delight, for the fellow really loved her, she submitted shyly to his caresses. A close observer, however, might have seen enough to make him suspicious of her sincerity. As for me, I was pained to observe that she shunned my presence and treated me with considerable coldness. One day, finding her alone, I ventured to address her in words of reproach.

"'Hush!' she exclaimed, laying her finger on her lips warningly, 'You must have patience. I cannot explain just now, but, oh, be very careful!'

"And with a look mysterious, but yet not unfriendly, she hastened from the room.

"At length my stay drew to a close. My report was finished, and early to-morrow morning I should be off. I was in better spirits that evening than I had been for weeks. The prospect of soon being relieved from my terrors lifted my heart into a freer atmosphere. Still my pleasure was tinged with two regrets. The first was that I should be the instrument used to depopulate this peaceful little village, and the second concerned Juanita. The girl was absent somewhere. I had not seen her pretty face for a whole day. In vain I tried to drive her out of my mind; the thought intruded itself that I might never see her again.

"'Shall I have the privilege of saying good-bye to señorita?' I inquired of Diez, after paying my bill, so as to be ready for an early start in the morning.

"'I fear not, señor, my daughter will not return until late to-morrow. Cannot señor wait a day longer?'

"'Impossible,' I said, 'I must be off in the morning, so you will please convey to señorita on her return my message and regrets.'

"'Will señor do me the favour of joining me in a bottle. I would esteem it a mark of parting goodwill?'

"I assented, and a bottle of his best champagne being brought, we drank health and prosperity to each other in several glasses. The old villain, to think that all the time he had murder in his heart, and was but preparing his victim for the slaughter. This parting interview took place on the verandah. The evening was dark, and scarcely a breath of air was stirring. It was about 9.30. Presently I rose to go to my room, the door communicating with which was at the further end of the house, and round the corner some forty feet away.

Laying her finger on her lips

"'One moment, señor,' said Diez, entering the house, 'I will bring you your light.'

"The champagne had made me quite lively, and I whistled a merry tune as I waited for his return. In a minute or two he returned, bearing a short stump of candle in a socket. This candle he at once proceeded to light.

"I was too unsuspicious at the time to take much notice of the fact, but I remembered afterward that his hands trembled and his face showed ghastly as the gleam fell upon it.

"'There is no air stirring,' he said by way of excuse for lighting it; 'and besides, the verandah is somewhat littered and señor might stumble. Good night.'

"'Good night,' I said, taking the candle. 'Don't forget to——.' On looking round I discovered that my worthy landlord had taken a most unceremonious departure.

"'Oh, well, it's no matter,' I said to myself; and resuming my merry tune, I whistled my way along the verandah toward my room.

"What's the matter?"

"I had just turned the corner when suddenly the white-robed figure of a girl with pale face and startled eyes confronted me, and without a word snatched the candle from my hand and with a swift movement hurled it over the railing into the ravine below.

"'Juanita! You here! What's the matter?' I cried, considerably startled.

"There was no need for a reply, for just then came the sound of a loud explosion from the place into which the candle had fallen.

"'Come away!' she said, seizing me by the arm. 'They had sworn to kill you. Let us go quickly.'

"Without a minute's delay we fled down the steps and out into the darkness. Travelling all night, the dawn of the morning saw us safe and sound within a convent on the other side of the mountain.

"On the way the brave girl told me how it was to save me she had loitered round the bar listening to the plottings of the men.

"They had decided to do away with me by means of a candle, hollowed out underneath so as to make room for a small dynamite cartridge. A minute's burning of the treacherous affair, and the bearer of it would be hastened into eternity.

"The horrible plot became known to Juanita so suddenly that unwittingly she gave utterance to an exclamation which aroused the suspicion of the conspirators, and she was confined in the outhouse of a distant corral, so that she might not prevent the accomplishment of the dastardly deed.

"How she struggled to escape from her prison her dear fingers show to this day, but the precious little woman never looks regretfully at the scars, for you see they always remind her of how she saved her husband's life.

"As for the other gentleman who has left his card upon the wall yonder," said Benton, pointing to the mark of the bullet, "you have doubtless by this time guessed that his name is Antonio."

Digitized by Google

"SEND Mr. Harding in."

The managing editor irritably dropped the speaking tube, and exclaimed half to himself, "Why couldn't those confounded Lancashire miners have taken some other time to air their grievances?"

The managing editor did not mean to be unreasonable; but he did wish that the pitmen had not chosen for their strike a time when every news-field was overcrowding the paper, and when an unusually active political campaign was beginning.

He drew his hand wearily across his forehead with the gesture of a man whose brain is overworked.

At this moment an alert and very young man scarcely more than a boy, clear-eyed and frank in appearance, looked in at the door.

"Come in, Mr. Harding. I shall have to send you away on special work. Those everlasting miners have struck. I want you to get up there by the first train to-morrow morning. You know upon such a matter it won't do for the Magnet to be beaten; and I needn't tell you that the Magnet wants the whole truth about it. That's one reason why I send you."

"Thank you, sir, I shall be glad to go."

"I'll put some one else on that matter of Colonel Benson's murder. And, Harding——"

"Yes?"

"Return to-morrow night, if you can. If you cannot, stay on; but see it through, if it takes a month."

Harding was full of enthusiasm in his work. He exulted boyishly in the important assignment thus committed to him, for he knew that a good performance of such a duty would contribute to his advancement.

When the Daily Magnet's special correspondent alighted from the morning train, the coal mines were deserted, and angry and discontented miners were gathered round the pit mouths.

All that day Harding went from place to place, winning the confidence of the owners by his frank and gentlemanly bearing, and that of the leaders of the strike by his evident fairness and desire to get at the exact truth.

He found that he could return on the evening express; and when he took the train at a quarter-past seven, his report of the matter was already nearly completed.

Under the dim swaying oil lamp he scribbled on industriously, sure of triumph. The other newspapers, he had found, were depending upon inefficient local correspondents for their accounts of the matter.

The train rushed through the gathering darkness. The sparks swept back from the throbbing engine in golden showers, like the tail of a comet. Harding worked on, concentrating all his energy upon writing a graphic account of the strike.

The lights of the town of Bedford were shining, only two or three miles distant, when the whistle sounded a wild, shrill note of alarm. Then came a crash, the splitting and shattering of timbers, the snapping of iron and steel, and above all other sounds the cries of human agony.

The express train with its burden of people, crushed, mangled, dead, or dying, lay piled upon the line, a ghastly wreck in the summer night.

It was the old story. Some one had blundered, and the fruits of the blunder were reaped in human lives.

Tom Harding was stunned by a broken board, but only for a short time. He roused himself with a half-dazed consciousness of disaster, that left no room for an immediate sense of pain. He thought of his mother—then of his newspaper.

This thought roused him to a consciousness that he had work to do; and in the sudden awakening to the realities of the situation, he became aware that his legs were so pinioned that he could not move, and that pains were darting through his body—unaccountable pains growing constantly more intense.

He moved slightly, and would have cried out, but that the piercing screams about him kept him still from very shame. His nervous grasp tightened on the note-book and pencil which he still held in his hand.

Men approached with lanterns. He called to them, and they came and relieved the pressure about his legs, waiting for him to climb out of the wreck.

"I don't know what's the matter," he said, painfully, "but I'm hurt somewhere. I can't move alone. Will you help me?"

He was raised and laid at one side upon the ground wet with dew. A flask was held to his lips, and a swallow from it revived his strength.

"Where are we?" he said. "Is there a telegraph office near?"

One of the men, who had remained for a minute beside him to see what care he might need, answered, "This is Bedford near by."

"I must get a telegram to the post-office—quickly. It is of the greatest importance."

"I'd make it short. They'll be busy enough to-night. Here!" the man called to a boy from a neighbouring farm-house. "My boy, you can make yourself useful. Here's a man who's been hurt, and wants to send a telegram. There'll be other errands you can do in town. The men are all needed here."

The boy, his face white and his eyes big with horror at the scene round him, came and stood by Tom, who had written the direction with difficulty, and was tearing the leaves from his note-book. Handing them to the boy, he said:

"Tell the man to send all he can of this before half-past two o'clock certain." Then he added, "Wait," and wrote hurriedly:

"The up express leaving Liverpool at a quarter-past seven struck a luggage train just north of Bedford and was completely wrecked."

A physician approached and stopped to look at Harding.

"Are you badly hurt?" he asked.

"I don't seem to be hurt externally," said Harding, "but sharp pains keep shooting through my body, and I can't move."

The physician, grave and compassionate, knelt, and, with quick, skilful touch, examined the young man. He asked a few questions, and shook his head sadly. The eager, brave young face, drawn with pain, interested and touched him.

Meanwhile Tom had made a few rapid inquiries of the doctor about the disaster, jotting them down to fill in his message. He then said, quietly:

"How is it with me, doctor?"

"Can you bear the truth?" asked the physician.

"Do you mean that I am going? Yes; I can bear it. How soon?"

"Very soon, I fear."

"Doctor, my name is Harding—Thomas Harding. I am a reporter for the Daily Magnet. I was on my way to London with an account of the labour troubles in Lancashire. It must be in the Magnet office before half-past two. Here I have scribbled a story of this accident. You've given me nearly everything but the names of the killed and wounded—I can't get those. Doctor, will you see that my paper has those names? Can I trouble you so much?"

Dr. May knew that he had a night of anxious work before him; but he could not refuse the pleading look in the boy's white face. The request, conveyed in those words, wrung out suffering, appearing so singular and extraordinary, and spoken rapidly, as by one whose life was short, and whose work was very important, moved him greatly.

Digitized by Google

"Yes," said the physician. "I will see that it is done."

"Oh, thank you, doctor!" Harding's voice had almost a ring of triumph in it. "Your name is——"

"May."

Tom added a few words to his despatch.

"Can't get list killed and wounded. Doctor May will send it. This is my last message. Tell mother. Good-bye.—Harding."

As the boy took the finished lines, Harding said—

"Tell the clerk I have left money with Doctor May to pay for hurrying this through. The Magnet will give anything for this report."

The doctor added a word to the boy, and hurried him off through the darkness.

"Doctor, you will find in my pocket-book money enough to meet all expenses. Take it and pay what should be paid. Never mind about me. Others need you more. I couldn't do anything else just now—I might as well do the best—I could—for my paper."

Harding's voice had sunk almost to a whisper, and he caught his breath painfully. Then his breath faltered, and died away altogether.

The work of caring for the wounded and dying went on round Tom's body, now left alone.

It was two o'clock in the morning in the office of the Magnet. The roll of the ponderous trucks overhead told that the first formes were being rushed down to the stereotyping room.

The telegraph attendant waited at his machine. The editor laid aside the last tiresome sheet of type-written paper, and looking through the window between his own and the telegraph room, asked if nothing had been heard from Lancashire—a question he had asked several times in the last hour.

The managing editor came in with a worried look on his face.

"Nothing from Lancashire?" he said. "What can be the matter with Harding? If he were not coming back to-night he would have wired long ago; and if he were coming, he would have been here before now."

Just then a reporter brought word of a bad accident to the northern express.

"Send down at once for particulars," said the managing editor.

"I have sent."

"Hold the wire open till the last minute," was the managing editor's next order. "Harding will be heard from yet."

Just then came the office call on the telegraph instrument. The clerk answered, and began to write. The managing editor leaned eagerly over his shoulder.

Handed in at Bedford? What did it mean? It appeared to be Harding's account of the Lancashire strike.

Page after page came rapidly from under the clerk's hand. The story was vivid, graphic, and complete.

The editor read it rapidly, sending it sheet by sheet to the composing room. At last the signature was reached.

"It is a swindle!" exclaimed the managing editor.

"Probably Tom was stopped by the accident, and had to send his account from Bedford," suggested the editor.

But the click of the instrument had begun again.

"Bedford, July 14th. The up-express, leaving Liverpool at a quarter-past seven, struck a luggage train just north of Bedford, and was completely wrecked."

Then followed the brief but vivid story of the accident, read eagerly and anxiously by the strong men who stood about the operator.

"Another 'fake!'" exclaimed the editor—and then stopped, for the last page was reached.

The clerk had grown white, and his hand twitched nervously as he laid down his pen, and touched the key. The managing editor was the first to read the sheet, with the ink still wet on its brave words.

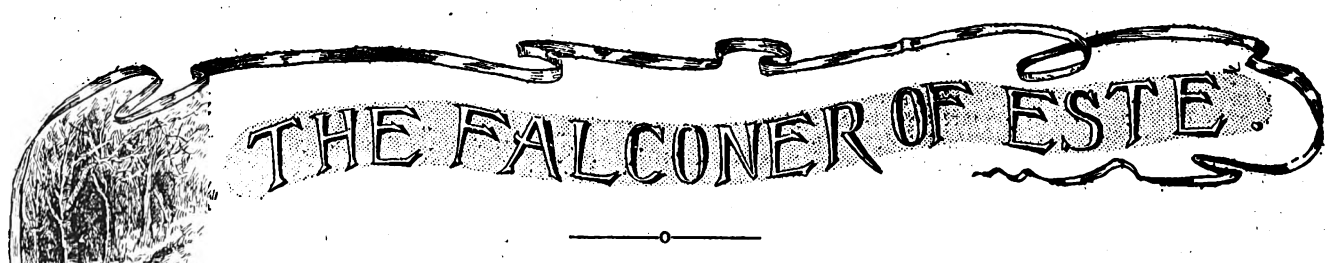
"Can't get list of killed and wounded. Doctor May will send it. This is my last message. Tell mother. Good-bye. —Harding."

The managing editor dropped the sheet and turned away.

The Magnet that morning contained two special reports which attracted extraordinary attention. Contrary to the usual custom of the paper, both of these bore signatures, and in each case the name signed was that of Thomas Harding.

Above the telegram telling the story of the disaster, first in the death-roll that was anxiously scanned by so many eyes, stood the name of Thomas Harding, reporter.

That was all; but the world soon learned the story.



ER name was Nerina. It was Travers' first evening in Italy.

San Remo, in the daytime, wore that look of lovely desolation which it is wont to assume after the breaking up of the winter colony. Travers, who had passed by Cannes, Nice, and Monte Carlo with scarce a regret, in his eagerness to cross the Italian frontier, paused now at the threshold of the promised land, because he had a letter of introduction from a Parisian artist friend, Lucien D'Aren, to present here.

The letter was addressed to the Count Chevandier-Waldron; but in reality the visit was for the sake of a young woman, who, while serving in the capacity of governess to the old Count's two little grandsons, was, in point of fact, a kind of adopted daughter of the house. She was Italian; but the history of her relation with the Chevandiers Travers had never learned. D'Aren had more than once intimated that her family connections in Italy were ancient and noble.

It was at a reception in the Chevandiers' Paris hotel that he had first met her, the autumn previous. He had run down to San Remo at Carnival time, some two months before the passing thither of his American friend. Now he was chained to the capital, having arrived at that critical point of his artistic career where the spark of patronage had at last faintly caught, and needed the most assiduous fanning to coax it into the promise of a comfortable surety. Hence his commission to Travers, passant.

That this commission was of a delicate and somewhat equivocal nature the young American comprehended; but D'Aren had volunteered few specific confidences—disappointed, possibly, that they had not been asked.

Being sufficiently occupied with affairs of his own, Travers did not avail himself of the privilege even of drawing conclusions as to those of his friend.

Digitized by Google

Having forwarded his letter, he received at his hotel, an hour later, an invitation to a kind of informal reception to be held at the Chevandier villa that same evening as it chanced, in honour of a yachting party from Nice.

Thus he gained an opportunity to observe the Signorina herself, who had graciously acted as intermediary in the presentations.

Yes, she was beautiful, in the style cultivated by certain painters. Travers thought instantly of his friend's master, Lefebre, whose work is intensely modern, yet strongly imbued with mystic and classical suggestion. Nerina's charm, however, so far as the physical element of it was concerned, was not too subtle or elusive. It must have impressed itself upon every observer irrespective of individual predilections. She represented neither of the familiar contrasted Italian types of vaporous blonde and raven brunette.

Her complexion was a warm, bright olive colour; her rich hair was dark brown and straight; her eyes, two liquid, shining orbs, that by daylight were probably violet-grey. She was slender and rather tall, and moved with the lithe, rapid grace of a wild creature. What she wore that evening Travers could not afterwards recall, save that it was a simply-made gown of some dark, soft, clinging stuff that seemed a part of the wearer herself rather than an artificial vestment.

Here, thought Travers, was a rare type—an anachronism—an exquisite surviving product of ages of luxury and refinement, perhaps of something more sinister. Her features, her entire individuality, bore in a singular degree the cast of that pride of race, that legendary hauteur, which the young American had first observed with an involuntary thrill of admiration amongst those stately women of Arles and Avignon, who claim descent from antique Rome and Greece.

A Mascagni waltz drew most of the party into its bewitching vortex, and Travers found himself gliding with the rest over waxen floors. This was the providential prelude to a turn in the garden, which needed not even to be intimated by a word, for Nerina was his partner; and a moment later they were alone in the myrtle-bowered paths, beaconed rather than illuminated, by Chinese lanterns hanging here and there like glowing fruit amongst spicy laurel-rose shrubberies.

Paused to read the letter by the crimson light of a paper lantern.

Then, in her low, monotonous tones, yet with something of the delicious impetuosity of intimacy, she asked:

"Tell me what he said—Lucien, your friend. You have left him——."

"The day before yesterday, in Paris. Permit me—he can best speak for himself."

He gave her the letter, which, not to be intrusted to the hazards of the regular post, had been placed in his hands for safe delivery into her own. She touched it to her lips, then paused to read the letter by the crimson light of a paper lantern hanging in one of the dense laurel-trees overarching the path.

Travers was more than content to stand awhile in contemplation of the picture, keeping, at the same time, a watchful eye in the direction of the house, so as to be on guard against a possible interruption. Finally he said, for want of something better to break the spell:

"This is indeed sub rosa!"

Lifting her eyes from the letter, she regarded him fixedly, and answered, mixing as usual an Italian word or two with her somewhat halting French:

"He speaks molto bene of you."

"Thanks!" Travers cried joyously. "Do try and believe it. Lucien is the most charming fellow in the world, and deserves to be, as now I know he is, the happiest of men."

"He thinks of me sometimes?"

"More than sometimes. And it is thinking, with a difference."

"Then he has told you much about me?"

"Not so much. I am speaking now on my own responsibility."

"He will be coming here," she continued, glancing again at the letter. "And you, how long shall you remain in San Remo?"

"Only until to-morrow morning."

Something like a sigh accompanied this declaration. What sudden determination prompted it Travers could not have explained, nor why the utterance of it caused him a feeling of relief.

They were now at the open window-door of the salon, having retraced their steps as other promenaders came into the garden. It was necessary merely to show themselves for a moment indoors, and exchange a word or two with the host and those about him, then the pair were at liberty to resume their interview al fresco. This time they continued their walk to the foot of the garden, where a marble seat was placed in a dusky bower amidst a clump of pines and acacias.

"The attractions of San Remo then, are so quickly exhausted?" she asked, as though there had been no break in the conversation.

"On the contrary, it is the seduction of the place that I fear. If I were to yield to it now, perhaps I should never get any further; and there are some other places in Italy that I had set my heart upon visiting."

"Ah, yes! You will go to Florence——"

From the shadowy acacias a bird's nocturne gushed forth in such a rapture of melody, that the girl's own kindred voice as suddenly ceased its flow.

"There!" exclaimed her companion, at the fall of a cadence. "There is an example now of the fatal fascination to which a susceptible stranger is exposed here. That nightingale——"

"Oh, no!" she interrupted laughingly, "it is not the nightingale. That is the caponero—our little Italian fauvette, with the black bonnet and the golden throat, who makes many sweet songs for which the master-singer gets credit. That is unjust, for the nightingale has gifts and glory enough of his own. Now I will teach you to distinguish between them."

And forthwith she began imitating, in a sort of warbling whistle, the song of the bird in the acacias—so perfectly, that it seemed a continuation of that which had at first fallen so sweetly upon the dreamy darkness.

"And now," she continued, animated by her own ecstatic roulades, "you shall hear how the nightingale discourses. He doesn't repeat set phrases—he talks, improvises. He begins by coaxing you to listen, and then pours out his whole heart—so!"

It was indeed the nightingale's song, but with a soul in it

Digitized by Google

that she gave. Then she imitated the haunting cry of the owl and half-a-dozen other birds—

"Most musical, most melancholy."

The performance of Nerina seemed really as marvellous as it was unique, and Travers scarcely knew how to express his appreciation and wonder.

"You are like the mocking-bird of the Southern wilds, in America," he said. "What an original accomplishment! I can't imagine how you came to acquire it."

"Oh, the birds taught me. We used to be neighbours, once upon a time. I understand them intimately."

"Do they understand you, I wonder?"

She arose quickly—not in consequence of his involuntary query, but, as he now perceived, because somebody was passing their nook. It was a solitary person, evidently, as his footfalls were almost inaudible, and the only visible indication of his passing was the glowing spark of a cigar-end. Yet the girl seemed to see clearly enough, or else it was intuition.

"It is M. Chevandier the younger—the old Count's son," she whispered. "He has just arrived from Nice. We must go in."

Travers was formally presented to M. Chevandier fils—the father of the two boys under Nerina's care. This virtually ended the visit, as it was plain that there would be no more tête-à-tête with the signorina that evening. She gave him, as he fancied, a significant pressure of the hand at parting.

He returned to his hotel to write to D'Aren, and could not but wonder at the unwonted restraint he felt in reporting to his friend the incidents and impressions of the evening. Early the next morning he took train for Genoa.

"Angel or syren?" was the query that kept reiterating itself in his mind. "Who knows—and who cares? Not I, forsooth. Whatever the burden of her song, my ears are sealed to it—not, indeed, as Ulysses' were, but with the ringing in them of the magic name—Italy! Italy!"

The olives shimmered in silver and grey shade. Here and there a sentinel cypress rose like a velvet plume. The breeze bore a strange thymy odour, and the sound of running waters was joyous, like singing. San Miniato, the Viale dei Colli, Fiesole, Vallombrosa, all that cluster of idyllic mountains which environ Florence and outline the Val d'Arno, lay lilac in light and purple in shadow, so softened, so transfigured in the gold-suffused atmosphere of the late afternoon, that the pale-faced villas on their terraced slopes, were more like phantasmal bits of cloud than realities of common day.

The point of view was the Bellosguardo, whither, in company with Professor Fiske, Travers had climbed to visit a renowned old Tuscan convent-fortress, the Certosa d'Ema.

Professor Fiske had been the most popular member of the faculty at University, in the young man's student days. With the tastes and habits of a scholar, he enjoyed the independence of wealth, so that of late years he had turned Florentine, to the delight of the cosmopolitan colony in winter, no less than of certain stray Britons in summer.

The two had paused by the grey ruined wall of Monte-Ajuto, that ancient stronghold of the Templars, when suddenly the Professor made a gesture enjoining silence, and whispered:

"I'll wager, there's Bebbo. The cunning rascal! Yes, it is he, sure enough."

"Who? What? Where?" asked the startled Travers.

"Bebbo, the bird-catcher. See—yonder, in the grass, by the big cypress-tree."

Travers looked in the direction indicated, but at first could perceive nothing animate save the innumerable little bright-eyed lizards that darted about or peered curiously out from the luxuriant herbage. Then suddenly he became aware of the figure of a man, crouching, or rather lying full length, amongst some weed-grown fragments of carved stone, a few rods distant.

"He is well worth your attention," continued the professor, "for he is a character unique in Florence, and, so far as I know in all Italy. He is a bird charmer, is Bebbo—a veritable uccelliere of the middle ages—a birdsman, of a race practically extinct for centuries past, who lives solely by birds, with and for birds. Thanks to his diabolical snares and nets, his silent spring gun, his trained wolfish dog of the Maremma, his imitative whistles and calls, and I don't know how many other marvellously ingenious contrivances of his own, this fellow has wrought more devastation among the game and singing birds of the country hereabouts than any hundred ordinary fowlers."

Travers' curiosity was piqued, and he imitated his friend's caution as they approached the spot where Bebbo lay.

Bebbo was not asleep; on the contrary, he was intensely awake, though motionless as a graven image.

"Good-day to your lordships," he said courteously, but without raising his eyes or relaxing the fine cord which, wound thrice about his hand, passed along the mossy turf and out of sight in the distance. Nor did he drop the spray of aromatic flowers held between his teeth, and upon which he gently ruminated, as another might have done with a cigar or pipe. In place of a hat, the cowl-like hood of a lucco—the classic Florentine head-dress—covered his iron-grey curls and mysteriously shadowed his face.

And what an extraordinary face was that! Travers was at a loss to define the singular impression the sight of it made upon him, until the professor said, later:

"You see in Bebbo a direct descendant of the falconers of the House of Este."

Again there flashed across the young American's mind the thought of that occult, avatar-like transmission of physical, no less than psychical, traits across the abyss of centuries, which he had more than once fancied he discovered in these old lands of romance and mythology. This inscrutable birdsman, with his slight, lithe frame and keen features, his hook-nose, like the beak of a vulture, and the fascinating fixity of his large, round, yellow eyes, was he not the living embodiment of the Greek faun, or satyr? Doubtless his hood concealed a pair of pointed ears.

When Bebbo replied to the badinage which the Professor, with the freedom of long acquaintance, presently directed against him, it was with a keen, Attic wit, coupled with an almost insolent imperturbability; while his language, far from being flavoured with the local patois, seemed actually Archaic in its purity. It was, the Professor declared, like his signature, which, scrawled in great Gothic characters with an eagle's quill, resembled the sign-manual of a grand seigneur of the fifteenth century.

"And how is it with the birds to-day, Master Bebbo?"

"Dio mio! the birds? There are no more in Italy, Signor Professore. Ah! it goes very badly."

"No more birds, eh? Well, and who is to blame for that, if not yourself? But, of course, you are lying, as usual. Let us see what you have caught."

"Oh, nothing at all, signor; nothing worth speaking about."

"Show us, at all events," insisted the Professor.

"Gesù m'aiuta! Wait a moment. Keep quiet, gentlemen; don't stir. Look! the net, yonder. Via!"

Bebbo gave a sharp pull at the cord he was holding, and lo! a hundred yards distant, a net which the two strangers had not hitherto perceived closed upon the ground like magic, enmeshing a whole flock of downy, fluttering creatures.

"That makes eleven more," he said, looking up with his malevolent smile.

There were, in fact, just eleven birds—mostly linnets and goldfinches—in the net; and Bebbo removed them with the utmost adroitness, transferring them one at a time, without ruffling a feather, to the compartments of a pair of large cages which he kept covered with a russet basket. Here were scores of other winged captives of various species, including finches, fauvettes, redbreasts, larks, and some less familiar birds, known only to their captor.

"The pity of it!" exclaimed Travers; and his companion repeated his remark in Italian.

"Oh, it is not at my hands they suffer," retorted Bebbo. "I don't blind them."

"Blind them? Is it possible such barbarous cruelty can be practised upon these poor little creatures?"

"Dio mio! such is the custom—and custom, you know, goes a long way in this country. Yes, the best singers, such as the nightingales, are often deprived of their sight, as otherwise it would be difficult to make them sing in captivity.

Digitized by Google

"In fact, the grand seigneurs of former times used to cause them to be stimulated by having musical instruments played in their hearing. You remember, Signor Professore, the engravings of Tempesta and of Villamena, in my rare edition of Pietro Olina's 'Uccelliera,' Roma, 1622? The prick of a red-hot needle, or a drop of boiling oil in the bird's eye, and it's all over. Thenceforth, your nightingale can sing to his heart's content, night or day, always fancying himself in the deepest shadows of the forest Ecco! You have heard the Pope's choir in the Sistine Chapel, eh? But, as for me, I am content merely to catch the birds and teach them pretty airs. And then, after all, I must live, poverino Bebbo!"

"Poverino Bebbo, indeed! Why, you scoundrel, how about the two houses they say you own and let? And your vineyard down the Arno, yonder?"

For all the answer, the falconer of the East turned to his bird-cages and began to whistle ironically, imitating successively the singing blackbird, the thrush, the red and the grey partridge, the skylark, the cuckoo, the aziola owl, the nightingale, and, finally, the caponero—all with amazing ease and fidelity.

Travers recalled the "lesson" of Nerina at San Remo, and asked his friend:

"Is this sort of think a common acquirement in Italy?"

"Hardly," was the Professor's reply. "In fact, it is safe to say that, in his mastery of this, as of the other branches of his profession, Bebbo is unique."

"But I have already heard another such performance of bird imitation, and, in my judgment, it was not less perfect than this of Bebbo's."

"Then it must have been by a pupil of his; for in the domain of bird-lore there can be but one—the original and inimitable Bebbo. You shall decide for yourself, if I can draw him out a bit."

By force of judicious compliments and leading questions, Professor Fiske succeeded in breaking through the professional reserve of the Florentine, who explained the construction and operation of some of his most effective nets, the trapping of birds with the aid of a decoy, etc. He said, moreover, that the trouble of catching the birds was as nothing compared with the subsequent care and rearing of them—the putting in cage, watching their moultings and maladies, "stimulating" them to sing, preparing their pasta, and a hundred other attentions demanding science and skill.

At the same time, Bebbo was plainly becoming restive under the questionings of his visitors, and cast frequent glances in the direction of the net, which he had promptly reset. The hour, too, was growing late.

The professor and Travers turned their faces cityward, and, as they descended the winding route, the former resumed:

"I always endeavour to hold converse with Bebbo in something like his own fashion—it is the only way to get on with him. And yet, although we have been acquainted now for several years, I have never been able to make any further progress with him than what you have just witnessed. Perhaps, as you say, he is a belated faun, a sort of surviving devotee of Pan. Certain it is that he passes his time, for the most part, as we have just seen him, roving from hill to hill, from boschetto to boschetto, from the Arno valley to the top of the Apennines. And he appears to possess a physical constitution quite distinct from that common humanity, rendering him superbly indifferent to changing skies and seasons, to midnight moons and moistening dews, to all the innumerable hazards of his calling.

"Yet all this represents only one side of his complex character. Dreamer, sceptic and voluptuary that he is at heart, he has accumulated a fund of cynical-philosophic reflections which furnish him with sharp and ever-ready repartee. You remember his observation to-day, when I taxed him with cruelty: 'Cruel—barbarous?' he repeated. 'No more so than the gardener who cuts his roses, the farmer who reaps his grain, or the king who mows down men!'" His erudition is such that he can quote you epicurean verses from Ovid and Horace, or cite approbatory texts from the Uccelliera of Pope Gregory XV.—'Given at Rome, at Santa Maria Maggiore, under the seal of the fisher—sub annulo piscatoris—the eighth day of November, 1521, of our Pontificate, Anno I.'

"What with his field-craft and bird-lore, his knowledge of nature and men, and his independent habits, Bebbo has lived well and joyously, not to say voluptuously. If certain old women's gossip hereabout be true, our bird-charmer has been a wild gallant in his day. In fact, the romance of Bebbo's daughter comes down to my own time here in Florence—and a sinister enough romance it was, too."

"Bebbo's daughter! He has a daughter, then?" questioned Travers, who had listened with growing eagerness to the Professor's narrative.

"He had until about three years ago. That is to say, there was a superb, spirited young creature whom Bebbo had mysteriously brought to Florence as an infant. She was generally known as his daughter. He occupied himself with her education—it was his only extravagance. The crafty birdsman saw in the girl a rare decoy; and she would have been sold—that is to say, married—to a rich old sybarite, the Prince D——, immediately upon leaving her convent, had she not suddenly taken flight. She was a match for Bebbo himself in wit and finesse, and she found a protector—some say a lover—in a distinguished family of forestieri who was ministering here. Since then, not a word, not a trace of her. But Bebbo's vengeful hatred, none can doubt, will last as long as he does."

"What would he do, if he were to find her?"

"He would kill her—perhaps do away with her by means of one of those subtle and deadly poisons he knows so well how to distil. She would have no more chance for her life than a bird in his snare."

The Professor said this with such an air of settled conviction, and it formed so startling a climax to the preceding revelations, that Travers excitedly confided to him the story of Lucien D'Aren's love affair, and his own encounter with Nerina at San Remo.

"Now, what ought I to do, under the circumstances?" he asked in conclusion. "If I should go and tell D'Aren?"

The elder man looked into his eyes before replying—

"My dear boy, M. D'Aren is your friend, and you are mine. I couldn't think of interposing an offhand opinion, in a case like this. Reflect over the matter by yourself until the next time we meet, and then tell me if you really want it."

Two days later, Travers, on the eve of departure from Florence, sought out his friend and thanked him cordially for the advice he had not given.

"It is clear enough to me now," he said. "The fact that I have stumbled upon a combination of circumstances is no reason why I should never mention the falconer of Este. Yet, surely, Professor, this dilemma is a peculiar one for a loyal friend to be placed in. I never heard of anyone else adopting precisely this course."

"Naturally. You hear of it only when they do the reverse. Leaving heaven out of the count, there are more things in this world, Horatio, than ever were dreamt of in your social philosophy. Adieu! You will find compensation for your forbearance, it may be, in watching your mystery work itself out."

Price Sixpence. Still on Sale.

A GIRL WITHOUT A NAME.

Complete Novel. More than 100 Illustrations.

This is the First of the Series of Powerful Stories which are to be issued under the General Heading of

PEARSON'S LIBRARY.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies, &c."

SUMMARY.

MAX RENAULT—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialist colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

FRANZ HARTOG—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

SIR HARRY MILTON—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

HERBERT WYNDHAM—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who resigns his commission and couples his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

FREDERICK AUSTEN—the inventor of the Utopian air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

VIOLET MILTON—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is permanently crippled by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

DORA MERTON—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

LUCY SUMMERS—another fair Utopian.

Max Renault has made his way to New York Harbour on the air-ship and sees four huge liners start in a fleet, under convoy of two cruisers and four torpedo boats. He follows them, and on the second night Hartog appears upon the scene in his fast torpedo boat, the Destroyer, and commences to attack.

With the flames showing a yard above their funnels.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE "DESTROYER" AT WORK.

IT was of course impossible for Renault to see whether or not the broadside fired from the cruiser had taken any effect on the flying Destroyer, given that the assailant who had so mysteriously disabled the two torpedo boats was, as was most probable, the now famous pirate craft. Moving, as she would do, at a speed of some twelve hundred yards a minute, the searchlights had no sooner picked her up than they lost her again, and, as the night, although calm and cold, was now rather thick, the electric rays had only a short range, and a very few moments would take her beyond their radius.

For nearly half-an-hour he watched with interest that fast intensified into anxiety as nothing further happened. The Gigantic had slowed down, and he could see from the moving lights on her deck that she was getting her own guns ready for action. The cruiser, after picking up the crews of the sinking torpedo boats, had overtaken her and exchanged signals with her, and the other members of the flotilla were rapidly coming up astern.

Still cursing the lack of weapons which made him a helpless spectator of the drama which had already become a tragedy, he was just beginning to fear that the war-ship's broadside had blown the Destroyer out of the water when he saw a quick, pale flash to the northward, followed by the outburst of a sphere of brilliant flame on the cruiser's deck. By the momentary blaze of light he saw human forms hurled in all directions prone on her upper deck. Then came, almost immediately afterwards, the short, sharp bang of the explosion.

Then long streams of flame burst out from her side and the roar of a second broadside mounted to his ears. Hardly had it died away than another pale flash gleamed out from the northward, fully a thousand yards from where the first had shown, and a moment later a second shell burst on the cruiser's deck, this time square between her funnels.

"Bravo, friend Franz!" cried Max in his conning-tower, "they haven't hit you yet and you've hit them twice. That's something like shooting! There goes another broadside. Missed him again, of course. Who could hit a thing they can't see and which doesn't stop in the same place two seconds together? Fancy the little Destroyer tackling a big cruiser and a couple of torpedo boats like that. It's just the sort of daring that commands success.

"Ha! there's the other fellow coming into action. They'll try to head him off between them, I suppose. I wonder what the other two torpedo boats are up to. Ah, there they are, running out to the northward full speed, with the flames showing a yard above their funnels. Good to shoot at that, I should think; and Franz hasn't shown a light or a spark of flame yet except from his guns.

"Ah, there he is again! That second cruiser's searchlight just got him for an instant. Cæsar, what a speed he's going at! Forty knots if it's a yard. Another broadside—blaze away, mes amis, you're only firing into the sea. Hullo, what's that? One of the torpedo boats gone. He's rammed her, I suppose. Only one lot of flames now. Bang—there goes the other one. Blown her clean out of the water.

"I wonder what those shells of Franz's are. He doesn't need to strike twice with them, anyhow. I'd give something for a handy gun and a few of them up here. Wouldn't I give those two cruisers fits, firing down on their deck without their being able to send a shot back! Yes, that'll be something like business when we can do that. I wonder what he's up to now. Vanished again. He's picked his night well with this haze; those search-lights don't show anything half a mile off, and that gun of his carries a good two miles.

"Ha! there he is again, south of them now. He's sailed half round them while they've been wondering where he was. That was a nasty one for cruiser number two. Smashed up her forward funnel, as far as I can see. That'll knock a knot or two off her speed. I'll be hanged if I don't think he'll smash the pair of them up before daylight."

Digitized by Google

Extraordinary as it seemed, the running commentary that Max kept up in describing to himself the fight that was going on beneath him was not very far from the sober truth. Overwhelming as the numerical odds were against him, the pirate had one enormous advantage over his adversaries. In the nature of the case they were forced to keep their lights going to guard against a sudden rush and a torpedo attack, which, if successful, would send them to the bottom in ten minutes.

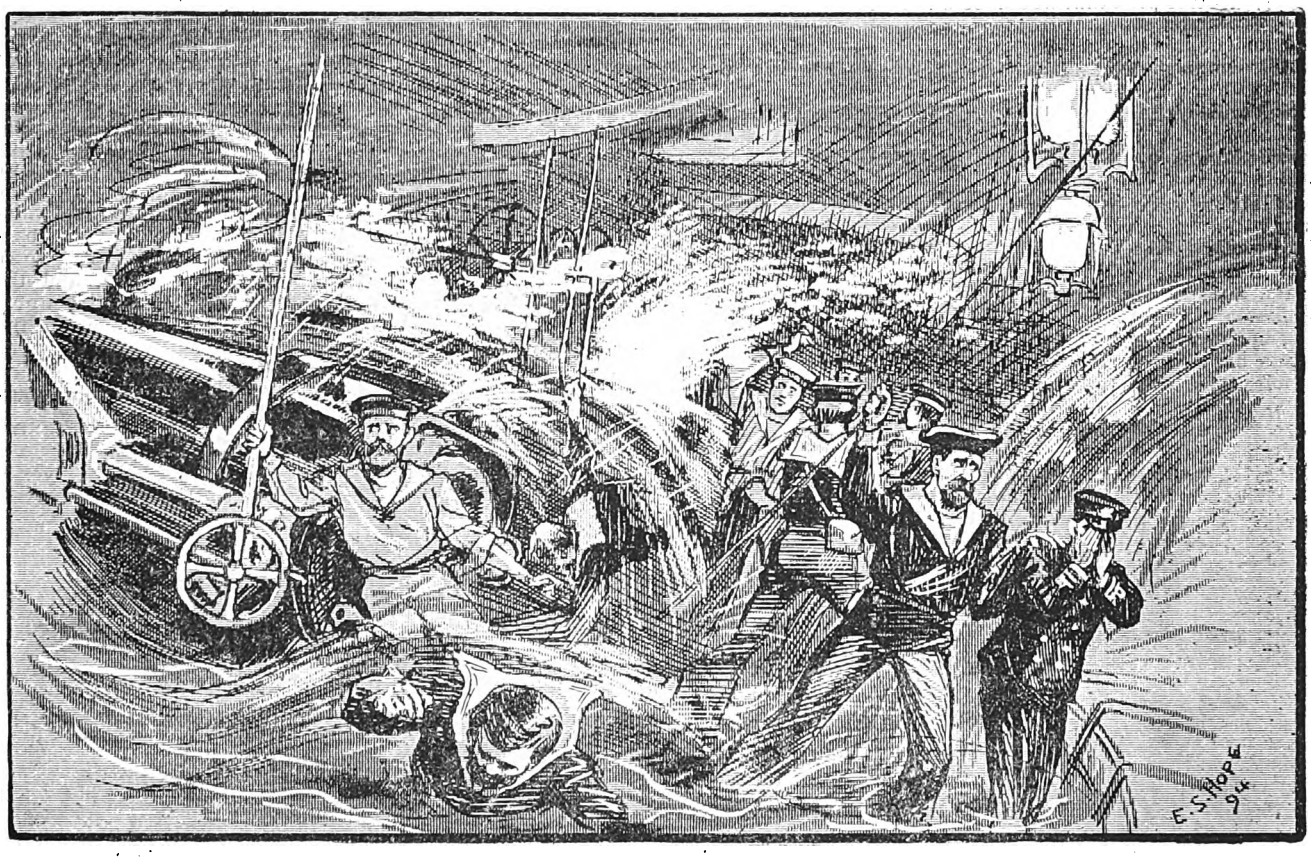
This made them conspicuous marks for his guns, which were evidently of considerable range and wonderful accuracy, while he, showing no lights, and moving through the water at nearly twice their highest speed, could laugh at their heavy broadsides with impunity. It was, of course, exasperatingly humiliating to the commanders of the warships, but there was no help for it. Shell after shell of tremendous explosive energy, considering their size, was fired into them, never twice from the same position, and they could only shoot at random into the darkness in reply.

None of the liners had been touched, but before the fight had been going on for an hour the two cruisers were practically hors de combat. Their decks were little better than shambles, their funnels and steam-pipes were twisted and battered into uselessness, and, worse than all, their searchlights extinguished. One after the other the well-aimed shells had smashed the projectors to atoms and left the warships defenceless against the deadliest attack of all.

"There goes a torpedo home at last!" cried Max in a tone of savage exultation as a dull roar came up from the surface of the water and the few remaining lights of the first cruiser swerved slowly to one side and then one by one disappeared. That was all he saw, but it meant a tragedy in which five hundred gallant fellows lost their lives in the space of a few minutes, most of them drowned like rats in a trap as the great ship went down nearly broken in two by the explosion of the terrible missile which had come out of the darkness to strike its irresistible blow.

The second cruiser was now near enough to see the catastrophe that had overwhelmed her unhappy consort. Her searchlights were instantly concentrated in a broad fan of light which overspread the area of swirling eddies sprinkled with life-buoys, hen-coops, overturned boats, and odds and ends of flotsam and scores of struggling forms of men making a last struggle for life.

In two minutes her boats were in the water and pulling hard on their errand of mercy. But here they had reckoned without the pitiless ferocity of their invisible assailant. This was just the opportunity that the pirates had counted on to enable them to complete their triumph in the strangely unequal battle in which speed, cunning, and dexterity had so hopelessly outmatched a force apparently so vastly superior.



Most of them drowned like rats in a trap.

No sooner did the searchlights betray the position of the second cruiser than shell after shell came up out of the darkness, never twice from the same point of the compass, and burst in her upper works, shattering her projectors, and spreading death and ruin about her decks. So rapidly did they come and so widely distant were the points of fire that it seemed as though the pirates numbered three or four instead of only one vessel Before the work of rescue was nearly accomplished the cruiser had been put into total darkness, and was unable to show a single ray of light that would have enabled her crew to guard against the last deadly assault that was now inevitable.

Rashly enough, the American liner began to use her projector in the hope of picking up the pirate and making it possible to pour the united fire of the five vessels on her, but the moment the electric ray gleamed out a shell, fired almost at right angles to the beam, pierced her thin plates and exploded, as ill-luck would have it, in her engine-room and burst the steam-pipe of her starboard engine. A moment later a hail of six-ounce shot from a machine gun crumpled up her projector, and the other boats, taking the hint, abstained from showing their lights.

Digitized by Google

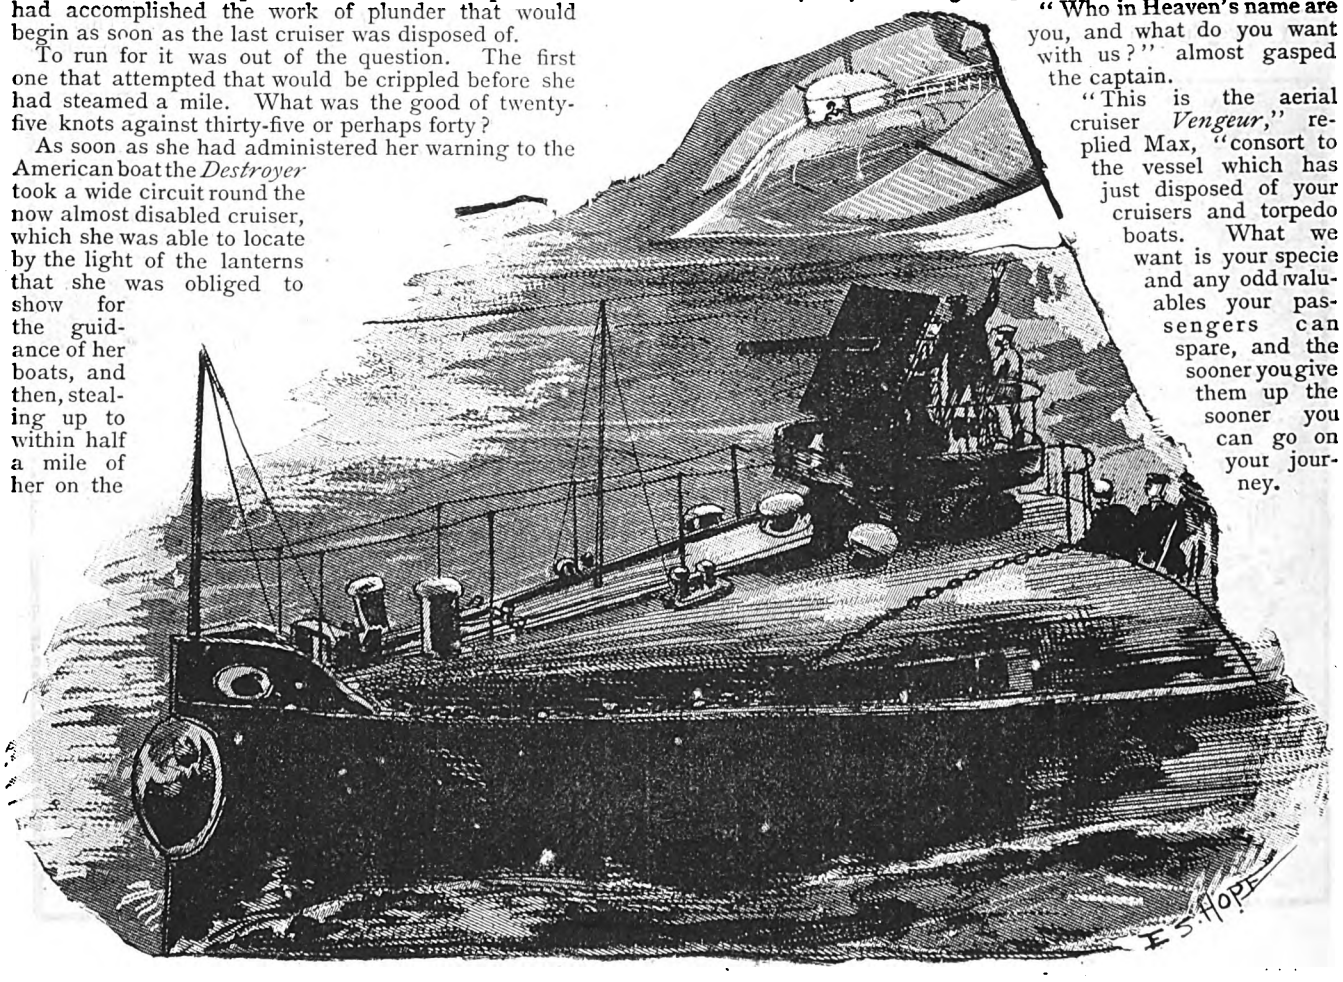
It was hard, but it was necessary. Armed and all as they were, it was quite impossible for the liners to fight under the circumstances. The captain of each of them was responsible for more than a thousand lives, and the unseen enemy had by this time conclusively proved that he could sink them one by one without giving them a chance to retaliate. All they could do was to wait and hope that the morning would bring help that would compel the retreat of the pirate before he had accomplished the work of plunder that would begin as soon as the last cruiser was disposed of.

To run for it was out of the question. The first one that attempted that would be crippled before she had steamed a mile. What was the good of twenty-five knots against thirty-five or perhaps forty?

As soon as she had administered her warning to the American boat the Destroyer took a wide circuit round the now almost disabled cruiser, which she was able to locate by the light of the lanterns that she was obliged to show for the guidance of her boats, and then, stealing up to within half a mile of her on the opposite side, turned round, backed slowly up for another hundred yards or so, and deliberately discharged her two stern torpedoes at her.



"'Destroyer,' ahoy!

The aim was carefully taken, and both the missiles took effect, one under the quarter and the other under the side. The roar of the combined explosions told those in the boats and on board the liners that the last fatal blow had been struck, and that the four big ships, with all the lives and treasure on board of them, now lay practically at the mercy of the pirates.

"Splendidly fought, mon brave Franz!" exclaimed Max as the sorely stricken warship literally doubled up and went down like a mass of iron plunged into the water. "That ends the fighting part of the business, I should think. Now I fancy I can do something for you. A little timely bravado will make those four liners deliver themselves into our hands as tamely as though they hadn't a gun on board."

Five minutes after he had said this to himself the officers and crew of the Gigantic—all the passengers had of course been sent below long ago—were almost paralysed with amazement, not altogether unmixed with fear, by the apparition of a huge floating shape which suddenly dropped from the clouds and darkness over their heads and flashed a blinding dazzling ray of light down on her deck. It moved to and fro for a moment or two and then stopped over the bridge on which the bewildered captain was standing staring upwards in the midst of a group of his equally bewildered officers.

"Steam to the northward and signal to your consorts to do the same at ten knots. Quick, or I'll sink you where you lie. Do as I tell and every life shall be spared, and when we've done with you, you shall go in peace."

"Who in Heaven's name are you, and what do you want with us?" almost gasped the captain.

"This is the aerial cruiser Vengeur," replied Max, "consort to the vessel which has just disposed of your cruisers and torpedo boats. What we want is your specie and any odd valuables your passengers can spare, and the sooner you give them up the sooner you can go on your journey.

"Now which is it—surrender or fight?"

To those on board the Gigantic the question was the merest mockery. How could there be any possible alternative to surrender for them now that the terrible assailant that had destroyed their protectors one by one had been joined by this mysterious and seemingly still more terrible auxiliary from the air? For all they knew some at least of the shells which had crippled the two cruisers had been hurled upon them from the clouds by this hitherto unseen enemy.

But even more potent than this conviction was the bewilderment, amounting almost to stupefaction with which they found themselves confronted under such fearful circumstances and without the slightest warning by the greatest mechanical triumph of all the ages, that wonderful machine of which men had dreamt vainly for centuries, in the hands of the avowed enemies of society.

Digitized by Google

"Fight!" exclaimed the captain of the Gigantic, in a tone in which wonder and disgust were about equally blended, "how can we fight? Make the course north, Mr. Thomson," he continued to his chief officer. "It's no good. We must think of the lives of the passengers first. That fellow could blow us to bits at his ease and we couldn't touch him with a shot. A whole fleet couldn't fight an air ship, and that's one, there's no doubt about it. It's horrible, but there's nothing else to do. We're helpless. Put the helm over."

"I'm glad to see you take such a sensible view of the situation, Captain," said Renault, as he saw the great liner swing round to the northward in obedience to his order. "You have saved a needless slaughter that I should have regretted very much. Can you signal to the others to follow you, as I asked you to do?"

"No," shortly replied the Captain, "I can't; and if I could, they mightn't obey me."

"Very well," said Max, "then I'll go and tell them what to do myself. Keep due north, and mind, if you fire a gun or attempt to make a signal I'll blow you out of the water."

While this conversation was going on the Destroyer had prudently kept out of sight. Franz Hartog, who was in command of her, startled as he at first was by the sudden and unexpected appearance of the air-ship, was not long in coming to the conclusion, from what he saw, that she could only be the long-expected craft which Max had promised to bring from Utopia nearly four years before. Why he had taken no part in the battle until now he could not understand, but he was quite content to wait for an explanation, and that he very soon got. He exhibited a flash-light for an instant, and Max, divining his intention, swooped down to where he was lying a couple of miles astern of the Gigantic.

"Destroyer, ahoy!" he sang out as the Vengeur sank gently down to the surface of the water alongside the dim grey shape of the pirate craft, "Is Franz Hartog on board?"

"Ja, mein lieber Max, he is here," replied a familiar voice. "And is dot you at last mit der air-ship? I always said you vould come some time, but you haf been der teufel's own time coming, and vy der donnerwetter didn't you help us to smash up dem cruisers ven you haf a beautiful air-ship like dot—and, mein Gott, she is a beauty, vot I can see of her?"

"Because I couldn't, Franz," laughed Max in reply. "I haven't a gun or a shell on board. I had to come away in a hurry with this thing or I shouldn't have got her at all. I've nothing better than a rifle and a revolver with me, and they wouldn't be much good, but those fellows don't know that, so I've told the big one to steer off due north at ten knots and not fire a shot or make a signal or I'll blow him to bits. He believed me, and he's doing as I told him. Now I'm going to tell the others the same thing. Can you spare me a few shells just to convince them with in case they don't see the force of the argument?"

"Ja, mein friend, you can haf as many as you like," replied the little German, delighted at the idea of Renault's ruse. "Dere is nothing like cheek in fighting—unless it is goot machinery and guns. By tam! they could haf clipped your wings for you, if they had only known. Come as close as you can and we vill pass you der shells up. Gott, vat a beautiful ship! Ven ve gets a few more like her ve vill gif someones fits and no mistake."

Max brought the Vengeur down lower still until a sliding door in her hull amidships was level with the bridge of the Destroyer, and through this a couple of dozen twelve-pounder percussion shells were rapidly passed to him.

"Do you vant a man or two to help you?" asked Franz, when the operation had been completed.

"No, thanks," replied Max, "they wouldn't be any use yet. They wouldn't understand the way of working things, and I do. Good-bye for the present. I think we'd better run these fellows due north till daylight to get them out of the track of the other ships and then unload the stuff at our leisure where we shan't be interrupted. What do you think?"

"Ja, dat is goot," said Hartog approvingly, "I haf been wondering all night how der teufel ve vas going to do it, but now you haf come it is all right. I tink ve had better take one of dem with us. Ve vant a transport to carry ze plunder. Dot North German boat vill be useful, she can steam twenty-two knots in a hurry."

"Very well," replied Max, "we can arrange that later on. Now I'll get away and start them off. Good-bye for the present."

"Goot-bye—auf wiedersehn!" cried Franz, as the Vengeur slowly soared upwards, and melted away into the gloom. "Mein Gott, vat a beautiful ship! Vait till ve get a fleet like her, and donnerwetter, vont ve vake de vorld up a bit and make it see some snakes! Ah, dot vill be a goot and a glorious time. Half speed ahead dere, and let us get dose fellows into marching order."

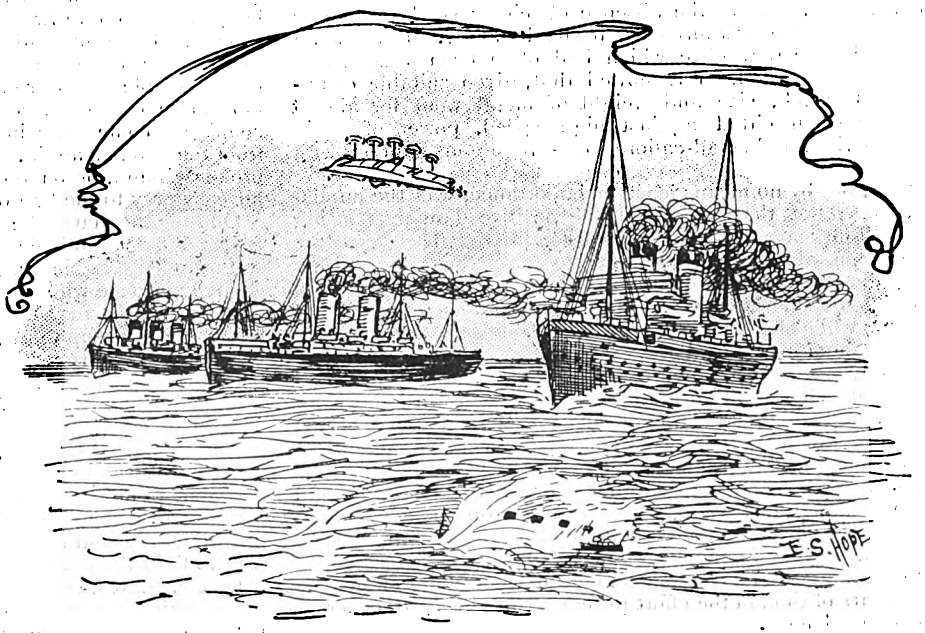
CHAPTER XIV.

THE EXPLOIT AND ITS MORAL.

HALF speed with the Destroyer meant something like eighteen knots an hour, so it didn't take very long for her to run round the other three liners, the crews of which had already been thrown into a condition bordering on panic by the astounding vision of the air-ship coming towards them with her single brilliant ray of light projected almost vertically downwards.

The first on whose decks it fell was the Cunarder Morania, a big boat built on the model of the Lucania and Campania, but with triple screws and a speed of twenty-four knots, or rather more than half a knot less than that of her huge rival the Gigantic. The same orders were given to her as had been given to the White Star boat, and perforce obeyed under similar compulsion.

Then the Vengeur visited in turn the American and North German boats, and within twenty minutes the four captured liners were on their way northward at ten knots, the highest speed that the crippled American boat could make, with the Vengeur flying to and fro in a zigzag course over their mast-heads and the Destroyer bringing up the rear about half a mile astern. No lights were permitted, and, of course, none were shown by the captors.



The liners were halted.

Digitized by Google

It was now a few minutes after one in the morning, and therefore, as the sun would not rise till ten minutes past eight, they had seven hours' steaming before daylight, enough to carry them well northward of the winter tracks of all the Trans-Atlantic lines, excepting that of Halifax to Liverpool. Twenty miles south of this track the flotilla was halted, and the American boat was ordered to transhipher specie and valuables to the North German liner Bremen, the smallest of the four, but a fast, handy boat, which the pirates had decided to take as their transport for the time being.

The Destroyer put a dozen men armed to the teeth on board the American boat to watch the transhipment of the specie and to collect the money and valuables which the passengers were compelled to surrender. The fate of the New York was still too fresh in their memories for anyone to dream of resistance. The transfer was rapidly and quietly effected, and then the half-disabled boat was dismissed to make the best of her way to port. The other three were then ordered to resume the northward course at the highest speed of which the Bremen was capable—that is to say, about twenty-two and a half knots.

Morning at length broke grey and dull and cold over a sea on which not a sail or a smoke cloud was visible. By mid-day on the 6th they had reached a region which is totally unfrequented from the beginning of the winter to the end, and which is only traversed even in summer by the Greenland whalers and a few adventurous yachts.

Here the liners were halted and ordered to bank their fires, so that as little smoke as possible might show from their funnels. The specie and everything that was worth taking was transhipped from the Gigantic and the Morania to the Bremen, and the passengers and officers of the North German boat were divided between the Cunarder and the White Star liner, and these two, after their guns had been rendered useless, and their ammunition taken out of them, were allowed to depart in peace, which they promptly did at full speed to the eastward.

Thus was accomplished, as the newspapers put it when the amazing story was made public, the greatest, the most daring, and the most successful act of piracy ever perpetrated on the high seas. A single small vessel had deliberately waylaid four of the swiftest and largest liners on the Atlantic, convoyed by two powerful cruisers and four torpedo boats. She had rammed three of the torpedo boats and sunk the fourth with a well-aimed shell, and, after practically disabling the two warships, she had torpedoed and sunk them.

This astonishing result had been achieved by pure skill and daring assisted by far superior speed, straight shooting, and dexterity of handling, combined with the enormous advantage of invisibility due to the absence of either smoke or flame from the Destroyer's furnaces, if she had any. It formed a lesson in naval warfare which had often been taught and mainly disregarded, for it showed that, given suitable conditions of attack, size and weight of metal went for almost nothing when pitted against high speed, power of rapid manœuvring, and small-calibre long-range guns handled with precision.

Last, but by no means least in importance, was the unmistakable proof that it gave of the positive danger of using searchlights save under very special conditions. The Destroyer had been able to cripple and to sink the two cruisers one after the other simply because she had been able to remain invisible outside the range of their lights and shell them at her leisure, while she herself remained invisible save for the brief pale flash of her guns.

But even this last exploit of the now dreaded pirate was of secondary interest to the world in comparison with the story which the two liners took home about the appearance of the air-ship which had come upon the scene of action so opportunely for the pirates.

For several years past the problem of aerial navigation had been assuming larger and more definite proportions. It had advanced from the realm of dreaming and theory into that of practical work. Eminent scientists had soberly discussed it, and distinguished inventors had spent thousands of pounds and years of time in the effort to reduce the theory to concrete mechanical form.

Quite recently distinct and undeniable success had rewarded their efforts, and now—to the dismay no less than to the disgust of everybody; of the inventors who saw themselves outstripped in the race; the public, which accepted with all the avidity of alarm the newspaper forecasts of calamities to come; and the Government whose permanent officials had jealously and doggedly thwarted and discouraged all attempts to obtain the encouragement and support of the State for the most important of all warlike researches—the world was suddenly and without the slightest warning confronted with the realisation of the long-sought ideal in the shape of an almost irresistible engine of warfare in the hands of the most implacable enemies that Society had ever bred in its slums or let loose from its goals.

The pirates, or Anarchists, as they were variously called in the papers of the day, had proved themselves more than sufficiently formidable with the one incomparable sea-going craft which had just inflicted its last and bitterest humiliation on those who had undertaken to safeguard the Atlantic traffic. But what, asked the leader writers of a hundred journals, from the Times itself down to the suburban local with its circulation of five hundred copies a week—what was to happen now that, having proved themselves uncatchable, and to all intents and purposes irresistible upon the water, they had invaded and conquered the regions of the air as well?

What new reign of terror was Society about to be subjected to? What was to become of crowded centres of population when their swarming millions should lie helpless beneath the indescribable horrors of a bombardment from the clouds by an enemy that could be expected to obey neither the rules of modern warfare nor the promptings of common humanity? Was there a weapon or a machine in existence that would enable Society to effectively reply to the attack which might now be made upon it any day without warning?

The question was asked universally and had to be answered with a direct and unanimous negative. The nearest approach to anything like an air-ship was Mr. Hiram Maxim's aeroplane. Indeed, saving the mysterious craft in the possession of the Anarchists, it was the only flying machine that had ever taken a flight through the air and come down again safe and sound.

But as soon as its actual performances came to be contrasted with what had been actually seen of the Vengeur from the decks of the liners, the difference between the mere flying machine and the really navigable cruiser of the air became strikingly and ominously apparent.

The aeroplane would rise from the earth, but only after a lengthy run on railway metals or quite level unobstructed ground. Its flights had been limited in height and confined to a comparatively small radius by conditions of fuel. It was totally unable to hover or soar, and the moment it ceased to move at a certain speed it began to descend; and, lastly, it could only come down in certain places if it was ever to rise from the ground again. To descend in a forest or on rough broken ground, or on the water, meant to stop there and fall an easy prey to the first enemy that attacked it.

On the other hand, the Vengeur could soar vertically, remain suspended and motionless in the air, sink to the surface of the water and rise again, and fly to and fro at such a speed that it easily kept pace with the liners steaming at twenty-two knots an hour, flying to and fro over their mastheads, and occasionally soaring up to a height of two and three thousand feet to search the horizon for vessels.

Of the efficiency of her armament, whatever it was, no proof had, it is true, been given, but even if she was only armed with tubes for dropping bombs and a few machine guns, she was obviously so far superior to the aeroplane that it would be sheer madness to pit it against her as an adversary. Thus, as a weapon of defence, the flying machine could only be ignored. To match it against a craft like the Vengeur would be as absurd as it would be to send an old-fashioned ten-gun sailing brig to fight the newest type of torpedo destroyer.

Of course, it was impossible for the newspapers to refrain from asking, as none of them had ever thought of doing before, how it was that, with the exception of a few trumpery balloon experiments the results of which would now be of less use than ever, the War Office had never given the slightest encouragement to the inventors who had spent their time and money in tackling a problem of the highest national importance?

Digitized by Google

Breaking into exclamations of irrepressible delight.

Hundreds of thousands of pounds had been thrown away in the rashest experimentalising with ships, guns, and armour which were found to be obsolete almost as soon as their first unsatisfactory trials were over. Thousands more had been frittered away in tinkering with uniforms and playing at mobilisation, but not a sixpence had been spent in any attempt to solve the problem which everyone admitted must one day be solved, and whose solution by the enemies of Society now left the Governments of the world looking at each other in helpless disgust.

It is always the unexpected that happens. In this case the unexpected had happened with a vengeance, and all the resources of civilisation stood confessedly impotent to defend it from the enemy whose hand was against every man. It was the old story. Officialism laughing complacently at the dream till individual genius and enterprise replaced it by the deed; but in this case there was this difference. The air-ship was not for sale as the guns, the armour, and the machinery of the past had been. It was to be used as a means of plunder and terrorism, and the nations, armed from head to heel against each other, stood defenceless before their common enemies.

While in Europe and America the exploits of the Destroyer and the Vengeur were being thus anxiously and angrily debated, the chief actors in the ocean tragedy were securing their enormous booty and laughing over the discomfiture of their plundered foes.

In a deep rock-bound creek on the north-west coast of Africa, between Cape Bojador and Cape Garnett, protected seaward by reefs and shoals, and landward by the illimitable wastes of burning sand which none but a few wandering Arabs ever thought it worth while to cross, lay the Destroyer and the Vengeur with their treasure-laden prize.

The sailors and firemen and engineers of the Bremen had been compelled under pain of immediate shooting to work the vessel to within two hundred miles of the coast. Then they had been given her boats with sails, provisions, weapons and ammunition, and £50 a man for their services, and told to make the best of their way to the Canaries. This had been done just before night-fall, and the next morning there was not a trace of the pirates or their prize to be seen.

The inlet was one of a dozen equally well-chosen refuges which Hartog had picked out in different parts of the Atlantic, and he had so far followed the traditions of his predecessors in piracy that in every one of them he had concealed treasure to a very large amount. He had been very careful never to visit the same hiding-place twice in succession, so that, in case of his being seen entering one of them and information being given to the warships on the look out for him, it would be no use for them to go and lie in wait for him there.

In half a dozen secret depôts on each side of the Atlantic he had laid up stores of ammunition and the condensed petroleum fuel, treated according to a secret process known only to himself, which was burnt in the smokeless furnaces of the Destroyer, and the positions of these had been so skilfully chosen that he was never more than a couple of thousand miles from a refuge that was at once a hiding-place and a depôt.

As the Destroyer could steam four thousand miles at full speed, and over seven thousand at half speed, without refilling her fuel bunkers, his capture was to all intents and purposes an impossibility, unless a collapse of the machinery or some very improbable accident put him at the mercy of his enemies.

Heartless and soulless as the little engineer was with regard to all other subjects, he was something more than an enthusiast where machinery was concerned. He was wont to say that his heart only beat properly while his engines were working. He loved them with an affection surpassing the love of man for man, or even for woman, and it is probable that if he had been confronted with a really perfect machine he would have fallen down and worshipped it as the best possible substitute for the Deity in whose existence he did not believe.

To attempt to describe his raptures when Max, on their trip to the inlet, took him for his first flight above the clouds in the Vengeur would be to attempt the impossible. He himself totally failed to give it utterance. The new sensation of skimming hither and thither at will through the yielding air, of soaring or sinking as the fancy took them, and of travelling at a speed that reduced even the forty knots of the Destroyer to the merest crawl, filled him with emotion which for the time being struck him dumb with sheer rapture.

He went from end to end of the craft, examining everything, stroking and caressing the framework of the vessel and the metal of her engines as though they had been the sentient frame of some adored human mystery, muttering incoherently to himself, and every now and then breaking out into exclamations of irrepressible delight.

He was all eagerness to get the Vengeur into commission, as he put it; and before even the brief voyage was ended he had designed an armament for her which, if it did anything like what he promised for it, would render her terrible to her enemies beyond Renault's wildest dreams of destruction.

"I tell you, friend Max," he said as they were sitting together in the air-ship's saloon, a thousand feet above the inlet, on the evening of their arrival, "dat ven I haf done mit dis craft she vill be a holy terror to all der vorld both on land and sea, and ven we haf built a score or so like her, as ve vill do pretty soon, you shall do vat you like mit der earth and der fulness dereof.

"And now, I suppose you vant to hear vat ve and der comrades haf been doing all dese times you haf been away. Very well, dot vill be a bit of a long story, so ve vill haf some more drinks and smokes, and den I vill tell you all about it."

(To be continued.)

£2 2s. FOR A PLOT.

I take it for granted that, on the whole, the readers of this paper are very fair judges of a good story. Moreover, there are undoubtedly a large number of people among them who are capable of devising excellent plots for stories, while they are not gifted with the necessary ability for working them out into readable form.

It seems to me a pity that such good material should be forced by lack of opportunity to lie dormant, and, with a view to seeing what readers are capable of in this direction, I offer a couple of Guineas for what I consider to be the most striking plot for a short story.

The scene may be laid anywhere, and only a rough outline should be given, embodied in a paragraph of not more than a hundred and fifty words. Any number of attempts may be sent by each competitor, but each attempt must be on a separate sheet of paper, with the name and address of the sender on the back. Competitions to be enclosed in an envelope marked "PLOT," and to reach this office by Tuesday, October 30th.

Digitized by Google

THE HANGMAN'S DAUGHTER.

SINCE the death of Calcraft, the notorious public executioner of England, the press has contained numerous incidents and anecdotes of his strangely isolated life and unenviable career; but I have only the barest mention of his daughter's name, whose unhappy love-story constituted, perhaps, the one real and familiar romance of interest connected with his personal affairs.

I knew the odd, shrinking, white-bearded, little old man very well, and, being a near neighbour of his, frequently visited his house a number of years ago. I almost always found him in the flower-garden attached to his suburban residence in London. He was passionately fond of flowers, and our common botanical tastes had much to do with the pleasant relations that were in a short time established between us.

I frequently saw his daughter Millicent, an only child, wandering among the cramped, but admirably kept, parterres in his company, but my entrance was always the signal for her instant retirement.

She was a pale and very pretty girl, about two and twenty, and, from the brief interviews into which I managed to surprise her, it was easily seen that she possessed both natural refinement and educational requirements considerably above her position in life, while her father's doting love for her was apparent from the first. But she was a prey to hopeless melancholy, and I don't think I ever saw her smile.

I had heard that she had been crossed in love, chiefly through the stigma resting upon her father's profession, and more than once hinted to him a desire to know her story. It was only after repeated requests that he at length consented to give it to me, and I will present it to the reader, as near as I can recollect, in his own words:

"It was several months after my execution of Mrs. Manning, the notorious murderess," said he, when we were seated in his little summer-house one day, "that I began to notice a change in my daughter. You remember the Manning case, don't you? No! She was a woman of gentle breeding and captivating manners, but no one questioned the justice of her conviction, and she was sentenced to be hanged. She preserved her sweetness of disposition to the very last to every one but me.

"During my few preliminary visits to her cell, she evinced only a shuddering, loathing fear of me, which would have been natural enough, but that it was accompanied by a violent personal hatred, at which I was as much grieved as mystified.

"'Headsman,' 'cut-throat,' 'paid assassin,' 'legal murderer,' 'blood-stained tool,' and 'master hangman' were amongst the epithets she would hurl upon me; and she would repeatedly hiss out between her clenched teeth:

"'I have one son in the world, Calcraft—just one—whom I have taken pains to notify of the services I am to owe to you, and he will avenge me. Oh, you wretch, he will seek you out when I am no more. He will strangle you in your bed, as you are about to strangle me on the scaffold! Then, Calcraft—then will my phantom rise out of my ignominious grave to mock and jeer at you! It will gaze upon your starting eyeballs and your swollen tongue—it will caress the clutch that fastens on your throat—it will curse, curse, curse you to the end!'

"I tried my best to reason her out of this absurd and unjust prejudice against me, but in vain. The expostulations of the chaplain, to whom she was otherwise quite tractable, had no better effect. Finally, as the day drew near, I ceased to pay any attention to her threats. I had good reason to believe that her vituperations were nothing more than insane ravings, merely calculated to strike me with affright, for it was generally understood that she was childless.

"When, at last, she stood upon the scaffold, and my final attentions were required, she did not, it is true, venture to abuse me openly, but her cold, grey eyes still rested upon me with the burning, deadly hate that I knew would only be extinguished with her life.

"You, who know me so well, must, of course, be aware that I did not reciprocate her sentiments towards me. On the contrary, I pitied her from the bottom of my heart, as I have always pitied every person in a similar position. She looked so white and horrified, indeed, when, after adjusting the noose, I was about to pull the black cap down over her face, that I whispered a few soothing words into her ear.

"How do you think she rewarded my kindness? She merely hissed out the word 'Remember!' and then she bit through the cap and through the ball of my thumb to the bone. The next instant the trap fell, and she was launched into eternity.

"You can see the cruel scar which she left me for remembrance," continued my narrator, after a moment's pause, during which he showed me the thumb of his right hand, upon which the livid impress of four teeth was distinctly visible.

"Well, I had forgotten all about the affair, and it was three or four months afterwards that I noticed the change in my daughter that I have spoken of. From being gay and cheerful, she became melancholy and dejected, and would pass hours in sombre reverie. She had looked upon me as her confidential friend as well as her father from the time when she lost her mother in her infancy, but now she grew shy of me, as though fearing I would read her thoughts.

"At last I became convinced that she must have fallen in love. I told her as much, and besought her to unbosom herself freely.

"'You know that I have nothing but your future happiness in view, Milly,' said I. 'Much as I should grieve to lose you, I am not blind to the fact that you are now a well-grown young woman, full of youth and hope, and, if you found a lover in a good man and true, and one who will make you a worthy husband, heaven knows you are welcome to my blessing, as well as to the snug little dowry I have put away for you. We have lived so long alone together, under the same ostracism entailed upon us by my unfortunate profession——'

"'That is just it,' she cried, interrupting me with a sudden burst of passionate weeping. 'He loves me—loves me to adoration—and yet I dare not tell him what you are; I dare not even tell him my last name!'

"After much difficulty, I obtained the story of her trouble. While walking in the public square, according to her custom, some weeks before, she had met a young man, the mate of a vessel in the East India trade, whose acquaintance had gradually grown to intimacy, and thence to mutual love and esteem.

"Her lover gave his name as Pitt—Mr. Pitt—which, however, he confessed to be only his Christian name. He had for ever abandoned his surname, he said, on account of a dark stain having been cast upon it by a member of his family.

"When, therefore, Millicent had persisted, in her turn, in the concealment of her own surname, he had only laughed, and said that Millicent was in itself an all-sufficient name for him to make love to, but that it would be convenient to know her family in order to press his suit for her hand in due form.

"You see, he already wished to marry her, and declared that he only desired her family's acquaintance for the sake of expediting the matter, and having them inquire into his character and business prospects, which he represented as unexceptionable.

Digitized by Google

"Millicent had, however, though in love, persisted in her secrecy, and it was this dilemma that had occasioned her unwonted sadness. She now wished me to let her have her lover come to see her at the house, while I still kept him ignorant of my name and vocation. I laughed at the absurdity of such a thing, and at once tried to reason her out of it.

"'Why, sooner or later, your Mr. Pitt must find out our name from some one of the neighbours, at all events,' said I. 'You know there are busybodies enough to give him hints as to my name and its significance. Why not honestly avow the truth, when, if he loves you, he cannot fail to continue doing so? Besides, there is no stain upon our name, as he confesses there is upon his; but on the shadow cast by prejudice.'

"No; she wouldn't listen to it. She would have him visit us under the distinct understanding that he should make no inquiry into our surname. Then, after she was perfectly sure that a knowledge of it would make no difference in his sentiments towards her, she would herself make known the secret, and abide the issue.

"For a long time I would not listen to her proposal, but her requests were so tearful and vehement, she implored and intreated me with such forlorn, desperate earnestness, that at last, in a moment of weakness, for which I have never forgiven myself, I consented.

"The next day Millicent brought her lover and introduced him to me in this garden, and not far from where we are now sitting. He was a fine-looking fellow, with all a sailor's proverbial honesty in his talk and bearing.

"I liked him from the first, and certain subsequent inquiries that I made at the East India offices having been answered very satisfactorily concerning his character and prospects, he presently came to see us almost every day. He had been assigned to permanent shore duty on the docks belonging to the shipowners, for whom he had been previously employed in the capacity of ship's second officer; the position was a lucrative one, and, moreover, gave plenty of time to devote to his love-making, at which he was about as industrious and absorbed as any young fellow I ever saw.

"Millicent became as happy as a butterfly in the sunshine. I was present at many of their interviews, and it really did brighten my old heart to see how thoroughly and prettily they revelled in each other's love.

"At last there came a day when the young man boldly said to me, in the presence of Milly:

"'I say, Mr. Blank'—as he was in the habit of addressing me—'I am in a quandary that you must help me out of. I want to marry Milly as soon as possible, and you have already given your consent. But how is it to be done, unless I know her name and yours? It won't be exactly legal to marry her as Miss Millicent Blank, will it?"

"'Hardly,' I replied. 'But I washed my hands of the entire affair at the outset. I must refer you to her.'

"'Let the secret rest for just one month,' cried Milly, with a nervous laugh, which could not conceal from me the anxiety she was suffering.

"'But you promised to become my wife within six weeks,' said her lover.

"'Well, then,' answered my daughter, 'on the day before the banns are published I will tell you my surname.'

"'All right,' he exclaimed, kissing her. 'So long as you finally become Mrs. Pitt, it's little matter to me what name you may have borne before, my darling. Let it be Smith, Brown, Jones, or Robinson, or fifty times commoner, it'll be all the same then.'

"But he was not destined to wait a month, or even a week, to have his curiosity satisfied.

"The very next day, while Milly and he were sitting in this self-same arbour, the catastrophe came upon us like a thunderbolt out of a blue sky. I had left the house by the street door yonder, and, seeing them sitting here, was turning the corner and strolling towards them through the laburnums, when one of my neighbours, who chanced to have something important to communicate, leaned over the front gate there, and shouted after me, at the top of his voice:

"'Calcraft, a word with you. Hullo, Calcraft, I want to speak to you.'

"Without thinking anything of the circumstance at the moment, I returned to the gate, disposed of my neighbour, and then proceeded towards the lovers. No sooner, however, did I set eyes on Milly's lover, than I saw that he had overheard my name, and that it had a terrible effect upon him.

"He had half risen from his seat, and Milly, pale as death, was grasping his arm, as he stood, crouchingly, as though in the act of springing at my throat, with a horrible expression of mingled astonishment and fury wrinkling his face, and such a look of hate and revenge leaping out of his eyes as I had never encountered before.

"'Did I hear aright?' he gasped. 'Calcraft! Is that your name?'

"'It is,' I replied, 'and if I had had my way, you would have known it from the first.'

"'Great heaven! And you are——'

"'The public executioner of England, at your service!' I filled in.

"He sprang towards me as though to clutch my throat, but then recoiled, glaring at me, but with his hands still threateningly extended, the fingers hooked like the talons of a bird.

"'Murderer of my mother!' he almost shrieked. 'Hangman! Blood-stained slave! Do you know that, if I would obey her dying injunction, I should this moment dye my hands with your coward blood?'

"'So,' said I, drawing a long breath, 'you are, then, the son of Mrs. Manning?'

"'Ay; and bore her name until the first whisper of the crime for which she died—died at your hangman's hands—compelled me to abandon it for ever!' he yelled. 'I did not intend to pay attention to her dying injunction; it reached me on the ocean, far away, and with the knowledge of her shameful death. But now—now, when I see how you have cheated me, the trap you have set for me—I could tear you limb from limb!'

"'I have neither trapped nor cheated you, sir!' I exclaimed, thoroughly provoked, and ready to defend myself from any attack he might meditate. 'Remember that you initiated this foolish mystery with my daughter by concealing your own name. You have surely more cause to blush for it than I have for mine.'

"Then I believe he would have sprung upon me, had not Millicent at that moment rushed out of the arbour, where she had been sitting in terrible agitation, and thrown her arms round him.

"'Speak to me, darling—speak to me!' she cried. 'He is my father, and good and gentle, as he is honest and worthy. Am I not still the same to you?'

"'You?' he shouted, casting her from him. 'What! the hangman's daughter? Ha! ha! ha!'

"And then, with a wild, hysterical laugh, he rushed out of the garden like a madman.

"We never saw him again. Millicent swooned away, and then had a terrible brain fever, which lasted for months. She recovered her bodily health, but has been plunged in hopeless melancholy ever since. She will be quite well off at my death, but I do not think there is any probability of her ever marrying."

"But the recreant lover—what became of him?" I asked, after Calcraft had remained silent for a long time.

"The body of Mr. Pitt Manning was taken out of the Thames on the following morning with a bullet in the breast," replied my informant, in a low voice. "There is little doubt that he first shot himself, and then plunged into the river.

"Poor Millicent! The shadow of her father's vocation has been terribly visited upon her beautiful and innocent head."

So I thought at the time, and so I still think. She survives him, I believe, but there can be little more of joy or peace for her in this world. And such was the one romantic episode in the career of Calcraft, the hangman.

Digitized by Google

OLD SHIPMATES

IT does not seem natural for an old warrior to die outside the scene of actual strife. Nelson in Hardy's arms, Wolfe on the plains of Abraham, fulfilled their destiny; but to die in bed, after escaping the storm of shot and shell, the perils of flood and field, that seems puerile.

Yet there was nothing puerile about the Admiral as he lay dying on the great canopied bed in that sunny room. There was no pallor on the ruddy face—the sun of sixty years and every clime had burned its mark too indelibly for that—and the great grey eyes were fearlessly open.

Then there came a rumbling word or two sounding somewhere in the front of the house. The landlord's voice was heard in reply, and then more rumbling. Then a pause, followed by the landlord's footsteps on the stairs.

"He says—it's a stranger to me—his name's Huckins, he says," came in strangulated whispers from the landlord to the doctor, "and he wants to see the Admiral."

The doctor made a frowning gesture of dissent.

"Yes, I know—I told him that," returned the landlord, shuffling uneasily, "but he won't go 'way—said he'd walked fourteen mile just to see the old man—that's what he called him," he hastened to add, apologetically.

"Tell him——" began the doctor.

"What is it?" asked the Admiral, turning his head.

"A man—Huckins," explained the landlord.

"Know me, does he?"

"Says he does. Yes, sir. Says he was a sailor—got sailor's clothes on."

"A sailor! Well, well," said the Admiral shortly, "if he wants to see me, why not?"

The landlord looked at the doctor; the doctor nodded acquiescence, although with a frown, and the landlord faded away.

The clock ticked a few more noisy minutes, and then the door opened to admit the sailor. He was an old fellow, with scanty hair brushed neatly, clean-shaven face, showing a square jaw, big blue eyes, and a skin like old sole leather—tough, brown, and wrinkled. He wore a man-o'-war's man's suit, faded, but brushed as clean as a lady's glove, and his shoes were polished like mirrors. A bright white knife lanyard crossed his shirt front, and there were a few faded letters on his cap, which he whipped off on entering.

The Admiral lifted his eyes slowly and looked at him.

"Well, my man?" he said at length, with the same intonation he had used a thousand times at sea.

The sailor brought up his hand in a salute.

"It's him," he said in a hoarse voice that smacked of fogs and salt air; "it's Old Blue!"

The doctor and the nurse looked shocked, and the landlord shivered. On the Admiral the effect was electric.

"I says to myself when I hears of you bein' here," continued the sailor, coming closer, "it's Old Blue for a hundred pounds; and it is! I'd a knowed them powder-marks on your neck among a thousand. And I walked fourteen mile to see you, and see if you remembered Bill Huckins, as was master-at-arms on the old Pioneer?"

"Huckins?" the Admiral raised himself on his elbow with a mighty effort. "Ah, yes, I remember you now."

He held out his hand, and then sank back on his pillow.

"You came to see me, Bill?"

"Yes, sir. Heard you was on the sick-list, and I come to cheer you up a bit. I was laid up last winter myself with a crick in my back."

"You are in some sailors' Home, I suppose?"

"Home? Bless your heart, sir, no! I raked up these togs for old times' sake—seemed more natural-like. I've got a boy that's makin' his £2 a week, and I've got a pension of 30s. a month. That's for a rap I got from a shell nigh thirty year ago."

"When was that, Bill?"

"Same day you got them marks on your neck from the breach of No. 2 gun. Don't you remember when we steamed up to the fort, when the guns was double-shotted and slappin' into us every ten feet? That was on the old Vincent."

"Yes, I remember," assented the Admiral, with glistening eyes.

"You was captain then, and when Lieutenant Fifer says to you, 'You go aft,' says he, ''cause there's sharp-shooters behind that ridge,' you says, says you, 'You go to the devil!' I was workin' a six-pounder near by, and I laughed right out at that, although 'twasn't no laughin' times then."

"No, indeed; no, indeed. But we silenced the fort, didn't we, Bill?"

"Didn't we, though! Knocked it clean out of sight! You couldn't play with the Vincent that trip. And two months later, d'ye remember how we sunk the Rouen, in the Gulf, after a runnin' fight of a day and a night?"

"Ah, Bill, those were famous times," said the Admiral, gazing fixedly into the air with his great eyes.

"Warn't they, though! And when we went up the Straits together in the Eagle, when you's just got your Commodore's pennant and took charge of the squadron—seems like it was always my luck to be shipmates with you, and I didn't want nothin' better."

"And here you are again, Bill," said the Admiral.

"Yes, sir, here I am, on deck again. When I heard you was here, I said to Tom, my son, 'I'm goin' to see the old man once more.' And Tom—he's never been to sea and don' know much—he says, 'Sho! he won't see you.' And I says, 'He was a shipmate of mine for mor'n fifteen years, and I always did my dooty. I could take my tod with any blue-jacket, and more'n once it took the whole marine guard to get me over the side, but I never shirked, and if Old Blue ain't got a good word for me, he ain't the Old Blue he used to be.'"

"Right, Bill, right," said the Admiral, smiling through the wave of pain that rippled across his face. "You were always a good sailor, Bill, but you're an old hulk now, like me."

"Sure enough, sir, we're laid up in ordinary now, sir; but there ain't nothin' can wipe out them old days from the log-book, if they have gone by."

The Admiral closed his eyes and murmured, "Gone? Ah!"

"Yes, they're gone, and we're goin'," said Bill, his voice thickening, "but we did our dooty, a' no man can say 'no' to that."

"Yes, we did our duty, old shipmate," said the Admiral, in a voice that had become thin and weak.

"Where are you, Bill? It is getting dark——"

Bill's cap dropped on the floor, and he seized the Admiral's hand in his. The others drew back without a word.

"Shipmate," said the Admiral, once more.

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"I'm on my last cruise, Bill."

"God bless you, sir, you're comin' straight into port, but you ain't dropped anchor yet."

"Just going to, shipmate," said the Admiral, while the great grey eyes stared straight ahead.

"Stand by," said the sailor-man softly.

A convulsive clasp of the withered and the brawny hand, a sigh, and Bill's grizzled head sunk on his breast.

The long voyage was over, and the Admiral had dropped his anchor.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Should Stout Persons STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever which was, perhaps, indirectly responsible for the untimely end, in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeeds only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic trouble which will be difficult to overcome.

The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite be appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, takes a different course. He says, "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2 lb. to 12 lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr. Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning, but on the contrary he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get this book, the price of which is only 4d. It is entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It can be had direct, or through any bookseller.—The Million.

A POSITIVE REMEDY FOR CORPULENCE

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is a cheap issue (only 4d.), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes:—"Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for, in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner, he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more, if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid:—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos=i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes:—'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes:—'I am just half the size.' A fourth:—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes:—'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes:—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again a lady says:—'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says:—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor :

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

FOR

TRADESMEN'S WINDOWS, FASCIAS, SIGNS, OR TABLETS.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

Most Effective Medium

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

ENAMELLED IRON PLATES.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

Call and see our Stock, or send for Price Lists.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

Only Address—

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

BE ADVISED

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities, as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states:—"Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA COMPANY, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 305. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 3, 1894 [PRICE ONE PENNY.

IF YOU INTEND TO BUY

Buy New Carpets at the Price of Old.

It would be ridiculous to buy old carpets, old designs, shop-worn, out-of-date goods, when you can purchase a stylish GENUINE, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE TRIUMPH CARPET suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., for

4/- Each. 4s. Postal Order or 50 Stamps, 4/- Each.

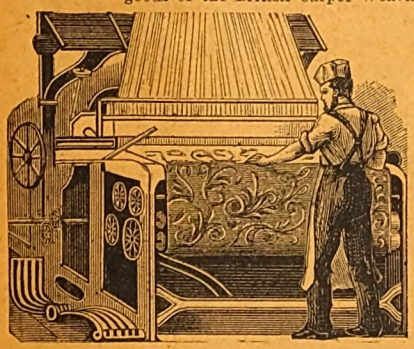
handsomely bordered and woven in fifty different patterns and colourings, to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY-SIZED ROOM. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, below the actual cost of production. Thousands have already been sold at almost double above prices.



With every carpet we shall supply a very handsome Rug to match, for 1s. 3d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER—Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9s. 6d.; Four Carpets and Four Rugs for 18s.; Eight Carpets and Eight Rugs for 35s.

Money willingly returned if not approved.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value."

Hundreds of unsolicited testimonials are being received from delighted purchasers who have had these carpets in use for years.

Stafford Road Post Office, Wolverhampton. M. A. Dudley, writes:—"Having purchased two of your Carpets between three and four years ago, I am thoroughly satisfied, and have recommended them to several people, who I know have tried them, and are equally satisfied."

65, Abbey Street, Nuneaton, Warwickshire. "Mrs. Bostock will thank the British Carpet Weaving Co. to send her one of their Carpets, for which she encloses postal order. She has had one of these Carpets in constant wear for some years now, and finds it the best wearing and cheapest carpet she can get."

Do not miss this opportunity, it may not occur again.

CARPET ORDER FORM.

On receipt of this order form, and Postal Order or stamps, we guarantee to send any goods, as above, to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Money returned if not approved.

(Signed) THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

All orders despatched in rotation same day as received. Cheques and Postal orders to be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Secretary, and crossed "UNION BANK." Address—

The British Carpet Weaving Company,

31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

One little bottle of Norton's Pills
Is not guaranteed to cure all ills,
But one little bottle, beyond all question,
Will thoroughly conquer Indigestion!

TRADE MARK.

NORTON'S

ONE LITTLE BOTTLE.

100 years' Reputation as an unequalled remedy for Indigestion, Sick Headache, Biliousness, Stomach and Liver Complaints. In Bottles 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/-, of all Medicine Vendors throughout the World. Ask for NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS and do not take a substitute.

Prepared by NORTON'S, Ltd., 21, Spital Square, London, E.

IZOD'S

LONG WAISTED. A GREAT SUCCESS.

THE LONG WAISTED.

200 Dozen or 2,400 Pairs of this Celebrated Make alone delivered this season in London per Day. The great question of the day with all Ladies is the Fashion in Corsets, which grows year by year, until our Special Artistes have produced corsets for every type of figure.—IZOD'S CORSETS are cut on scientific principles, with a precision of accuracy formerly unknown.——IZODS draw Ladies' attention to their Long Waisted Corsets, which have been designed by their British and Foreign Artistes, which are the best the world produces.—The Ladies' Tailors always recommend these celebrated goods for the elegance with which they set off a tailor-made dress and create a long waist and graceful figure. They are made in a variety of qualities, and are beautiful and inexpensive. Every pair stamped on busk Izod's Long Waisted, and also on lid of the box.——To be had of all Drapers and Ladies' Outfitters in Europe, India, Canada, United States, Australia, the whole of the British Colonies, and throughout the world.——Write for our Sheet of Drawings.

IZOD'S LONG WAISTED

E. IZOD & SON, 30, MILK ST., LONDON, E.C.

Manufactory: LANDPORT, HANTS.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

BAKER'S NOVELTIES.

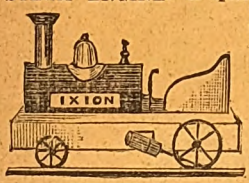
THE NEW "ECLIPSE" MODEL STEAM ENGINE.—The rage of the Season. These wonderful Engines work with a real oscillating cylinder (which if purchased by itself cost 1s.), strong metal boiler, funnel, large fly wheel, with pulley wheel attached for working other models, furnace, and filler complete. Carriage free 1s. 6d. Smaller size 1s.

Don't miss this grand opportunity.

THE MARVELLOUS "CHAMPION" SLIDE VALVE STEAM ENGINE.—As is no doubt well known, a slide valve cylinder is the most expensive kind made, and in fact our lowest for a slide valve cylinder itself is 7s., yet we now offer a large substantial Engine with powerful boiler, stand, furnace, fly wheel, pulley wheel, governors, metal supports, and slide valve cylinder, complete, 5s. 6d., with whistle, water tap, steam tap, very superior, 10s. 6d. These engines are sufficiently powerful to work all the models sold by us.

THE EXPRESS STEAM LOCOMOTIVE.—A beautifully japanned locomotive, with all brass fittings, dome, whistle, safety valve, starting lever, 6 wheels (all flanged), and two powerful cylinders. Only 10s. 6d., free 11s.

THE "IXION" LOCOMOTIVE STEAM ENGINE.—A splendid locomotive engine on four wheels with funnel, safety valve, dome handrails, starting lever, two powerful cylinders with furnace complete. The cheapest locomotive out. 5s., free 5s. 6d., or with whistle 5s. 6d., free 6s. Without name plate 4s. 6d., free 5s.



THE ECLIPSE ELECTRIC COIL.—We are offering the most wonderful value in Electric Coils for this Season, as special leading lines. Each one guaranteed to work, and to administer good strong shocks. No. 1 Coil 1s finished complete, and mounted on stand with handles and connecting wires. Price 1s., post free 1s. 3d. No. 2 Coil is a larger and more powerful ditto, better finished, and furnished with brass terminals, and is a very superior article, 2s. 6d., post free 2s. 9d. No. 3 Coil is equal to many charged 10s. 6d. for. This Coil has a regulating handle for increasing or decreasing the strength as required, and is fit for any Drawing Room, Bazaar, Lecture Hall, &c. Price 5s. 6d., post free 6s. No. 4, very handsome large Coil, with reversing motion, 10s. 6d. Any ordinary Bichromate Batteries will work these Coils, and as most people have batteries now-a-days, no further expense is incurred; but if needful, we supply a strong Bichromate Battery suitable for working No. 1 and 2 Coils for 1s. 3d., post free; or a larger ditto for the 5s. 6d and 10s. 6d. Coil, for 2s., post free 2s. 4½d. We now give a small Battery free with every Coil sold.

THE ELECTRICAL DANCING NIGGER.—A great curiosity and a wonderful working model. The climax of electrical ingenuity and skill. By means of a powerful Electro Motor and Battery the Nigger will dance on the platform for half-an-hour at a time. A capital window attraction. Nigger, Motor, Battery, Platform, Connecting Wires, and everything complete. Price 3s. 6d., carriage free 3s. 10d.

ELECTRIC MOTORS for working Models, Machinery, &c.—All guaranteed to work, and speedily value for money. A beautiful little Motor on stand complete, only 1s., free 1s. 3d. No. 2 size much larger ditto, better finished and more powerful, with fittings, 2s. 6d., free 2s. 9d. No. 3 size, a really superior and very powerful motor, on polished stand, with brass wheel, brass terminals, and fittings, 5s. 6d., free 6s. Any bichromate battery will work these, or we supply battery for Nos. 1 and 2 Motors for 1s., free 1s. 3d.; and a powerful ditto for No. 3 for 2s., free 2s. 4½d.

Grand Illustrated Novelty Catalogue, 64 pp., 1,000 Illustrations. 1d. stamp.

BAKER & COMPANY, 34, Beech Street, Barbican, London, E.C.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."

EASY PAYMENTS

WITH EXPRESSION STOP

ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.

Plays hymns, popular airs, quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, horn-pipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by any one. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30s. Terms 4s. deposit and 4s. monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.

Write for list of music and full particulars.

(Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER,

Organette Works, Blackburn.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,

GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

Adresse de M. SUEZ, 9, Rue de Prony, PARIS

VINAIGRE LACTE de SUEZ POUR LA TOILETTE

EAU de SUEZ

VACCINE for the MOUTH

Strengthens the Gums

Perfumes the Breath

The only Dentifrice securing

BEAUTIFUL TEETH

POUDRE et PATE DENTIFRICES DE SUEZ

London Agents: WILCOX & Co., 239, Oxford Street.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES

Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,

GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. P. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

BALDNESS CURED

in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, by Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

For LOVERS and MOTHERS.

The New (No. 2) Design True Lovers' Knot

"MIZPAH" BROOCH.

The most popular piece of Jewellery in the World. Every purchaser delighted. Each Brooch Hall Marked, and in handsome heart-shaped plush case.

Silver, 5s.; Gold, 30s.; Post Free.

Engagement Jewellery a Speciality.

Catalogue (618 Illustrations) Post-free.

MASTERS, Jeweller, RYE, SUSSEX.

LADY FLORENCE L—— writes:—"I am more than pleased with the success of your 'QUICKENER,'; it has beautified my hair immensely," Indispensable for the seaside. Carriage paid, 1s. 3d. per bottle. ARTHUR WHITE, 34, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED.

The PERSIAN DEPILATORY absolutely exterminates without pain or injury to the most sensitive skin. It never fails to permanently destroy root and branch. Every case a success or no charge made. Send stamped addressed envelope to the "MANAGERESS," Oriental Toilet, Company, 87, Strand, London. (Mention this paper).

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.

For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc, Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,

8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" give relief, and a few more applications effect a cure

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY, 83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

Book on the Skin and Diet free.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades

ESTIMATES FREE.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 14, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 305.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 3, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

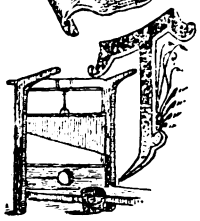
RIPE FOR THE GUILLOTINE



"TWO bad boys don't make a good one," I said to my two youngsters, with whom I had been arguing this interesting point, "any more than two bad jokes make a good one."

"Well," replied Leonard, the elder lad, with a half smile, "but two good boys don't make a bad one; and I don't see why you should conclude we are going to do something bad because we want to do it together."

There was a humorous force in the retort which one could not but admit; but it had not, at the moment, the slightest influence with me. The fact was they had just been making me such an extraordinary request, that I did not feel it necessary to discuss the matter at all. It was holiday time, and they had suddenly come and requested my permission to go off to Paris together, "only for a few days."

The idea of allowing two lads of fifteen and seventeen to run away on a jaunt to Paris alone was one which, I considered, no reasonable parent could entertain; and they knew that business engagements at that time made it quite impossible for me to accompany them. Certainly, they had both been there before, with me; and my younger boy, Antholin, was a remarkably good French scholar; but that made no difference to the absurdity of their present petition.

"Well, there, get away," I said; "I'm busy, and we'll talk about it in the morning."

"But, please, we ought to start in the morning," urged Leonard—"by the boat train at eleven o'clock."

Antholin's face bore a look of anxiety that vexed me. Why on earth did they say "we ought to start"?

"Nonsense!" I exclaimed, "you must not bother. I have to go out directly. Wait till to-night, anyhow."

I left the house shortly after; and in passing down the Cromwell Road, where we lived, I ran against an old American friend, Captain Hawkes, whom I had not seen since I was across the ocean some years before; and he greeted me very cordially.

"Why, this is quite a lucky rencontre" (ren-counter, he called it)—"I've only been in your city two days, and am off to the Continent to-morrow."

"To the Continent!" I said; "and where are you bound for?"

"Pa-wris" (American for Paris), he replied; "eleven o'clock from Victoria; a boat train, they call it."

"The eleven o'clock!" I answered, as a thought flashed into my mind. "Would you mind doing a little kindness for me?"

"Any amount of 'em, inside of ten thousand dollars."

I laughed at the characteristic answer.

"No, no, I'm not broke yet. You don't know my two boys by sight, do you?"

"No, sir."

"Well, you can't mistake them, they are so nearly of a height, though there's two years between them; and Antholin, the youngest, is the image of his mother, whom you do know. They are going over together for a few days, and I want you kindly to keep an eye upon them, as well as you can, and just let me know how they get on. But I want you to do it without making yourself known. I have a reason."

"Well, that's a freak," laughed my friend; but I saw that he thought it nothing peculiar. "I'll look out for them on the boat, and write you."

I walked on, with my thoughts turned upon business affairs, and on a little domestic annoyance which had occurred to me just then. A youth of Spanish extraction, whom I had taken into the house on good recommendations as assistant to my butler, had fallen out with me the day before about some trivial matter of his household duties, and I had had occasion to speak to him rather sharply. The next morning (the same day of which I write) he had disappeared—apparently for good. But as he took nothing away with him except his own property, I was not much troubled, and rather looked upon it as a good riddance. It was inconvenient having to replace him; but it never occurred to me to connect the matter with any other events of the moment. I thought it likely he would turn up penitent in a few days, and get his final dismissal.

On returning home, as I passed down the hall, I heard the boys' voices in my study, apparently in earnest conference. As I entered I said:

"Well, boys—no more news of Sanchez, I suppose?"

"No, papa, not a trace," replied Leonard.

Antholin came close up to me, with that same curious expression of suppressed anxiety on his face which I had never seen there until now. His voice quavered slightly as he said, "Dad, dear, we don't want to worry, but have you thought any more about our going to-morrow!"

"Well, I don't know," I replied, "perhaps you might go to the Baronne de Marcuard; she wouldn't mind having you for a few days. But, of course, you ought to have written first."

Antholin's face lightened as he saw that he had gained his point; yet he did not look like himself.

"Can we go by that train then?"

"Yes, I suppose so. What money shall you want?"

They both looked at me gratefully, but seeming to say mutely that, though they knew I was mystified, they could not enlighten me. I provided them with the necessary supplies, and they prepared methodically for their visit.

The following morning, which was a cold and dreary one, I saw the boys off from Victoria, and they started with seeming contentment, though without any of the boyish delight which would usually accompany such a trip.

. . . . . .

The boys wrote to me soon after their arrival in Paris, in a satisfactory tone generally, but without saying much of what they were doing, and without fixing their date of return.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

I saw the boys off from Victoria.

When the eighth day after their departure had passed I was getting uneasy, and had made up my mind to write decisively and call them back. But on the morning of the ninth day I received the following letter :—

"Hotel Continental, Paris.

"DEAR SIR LEONARD HARSTON,

"Your two chaps are all right, so far as I know, but they have the quaintest notions of spending a holiday I ever saw. I talked to them (as a stranger) on the boat coming over, and again when I met them here; they seem to be staying at a house on the Avenue de la Grande Armée, which, according to the directory, belongs to a Baroness Somebody-or-other. They don't seem to go to any of the show places, nor to have any fun, yet are always on the run, as if the business of the state depended on them. I didn't write sooner, because I know you have heard from them; but yesterday I met them on the Rue St. Roch, with a solid, respectable-looking Frenchman, who, I hear, is a distinguished sergeant of police. Just what they are after I can't give you an idea; but, by their looks, it certainly wasn't any amusement, and I am sure it can't be any harm. I thought you might like to hear; but probably by this time you know more about it than I do. It seemed odd, because that officer is said to be specially engaged on the trial of the Anarchists. I shall come to see you on my return.

"Respectfully,

SIMEON HAWKES."

I could make nothing of this but further mystification. I knew well enough the boys could be doing no intentional mischief. They were all safe with our friend the Baronne; and a well-known police officer could surely mean them no harm. But what trouble they might get into innocently it was impossible to foresee, and my anxiety increased. I was utterly puzzled how to act in order to relieve it. What on earth could it all mean?

I could not fix my mind upon anything else, and remained in my study all the morning, fidgeting about, straightening things up and putting them crooked again, in a state of nervous agitation. Just as I was trying to reach an old hat-box which someone had placed upside down on the top of a book-stand, a servant entered and put into my hands a telegram from Paris, which I anxiously tore open. It was written in French, to this effect :—

"Father, do not fail to lock the study instantly, and let no one go near it until I see you. Will be back to-morrow.

"ANTHOLIN."

I shall be excused if I thought that either my boy or I myself must have gone crazy. Yet the earnestness and urgency of this strange instruction seemed unmistakable. Lock up the study? In the name of patience, what for? But if I knew my boy at all, he meant what he said—and meant it more than seriously. I threw myself into my chair to consider for a moment whether I should apparently make a fool of myself by obeying his order. The room was always open to the family; and how should I account for such an unusual and seemingly idiotic proceeding?

As I pondered, the morning paper lay on the table before me, and my eye fell upon this paragraph :—

ARREST OF THE ANARCHIST ROQUELIN.

The man Roquelin, who has passed by the names of Calverley, Sanchez, Montano, and other aliases, was at last arrested this evening on the Boulevard Mont Parnasse. He arrived last week from London, where he had lately taken service in a private house, which he made an attempt to wreck by violent means. His purpose is said to have been frustrated by the efforts of two young sons of the family, who succeeded in tracking him to Paris; but the details of this story are not yet confirmed.

The names suddenly fixed my rambling attention. Sanchez! Could this have been my hot-tempered under-butler? And the "two young sons"—good heavens, was the mystery explaining itself in this way? It seemed almost absurd to connect the two events, and yet the double coincidence was singular. I am not usually of a vacillating turn, nor yet given to hasty conclusions; but within two minutes I had risen from my seat, left the room, turned the key in the lock, and put it in my pocket. Meeting the upper housemaid in the hall I told her that I wished some things in the study to remain undisturbed for a day or two, and would keep the door fastened.

Then I forcibly turned my attention to other matters, and put the best curb I could on my impatience. My wife arrived home from the north in the evening, and we discussed the whole question anxiously, but without result. The boys were coming home; and my trust in them was supreme.

If I were restless the previous night, it was nothing to the apprehension which kept me wakeful now. At an early hour the following morning we were again in the drawing-room, talking over the mystery and trying to decide on some plan of action. Just before the breakfast hour the door opened and Leonard rushed in.

"It's all right, papa—we have found it out!"

Before we could reply, Antholin followed. He was not, as a rule, a demonstrative boy; but now he passed before his brother and threw himself into my arms with a single sob of mixed excitement, anxiety, and relief.

"Oh, dad—you are safe up to now! Don't punish us—we couldn't manage it any other way."

"My dear boy, I am not thinking of punishing you," I answered, "but you must explain at once what all this means."

"Is the study all safe?" he asked breathlessly.

A telegram from Paris.

Digitized by Google

"It is locked up since I had your message."

Antholin sighed, and recovered himself partially.

"You tell the story, Lenny," he said, under his breath.

"Well, papa," said Leonard—"but you had better send for the police first. You will want them, anyhow."

I thought there was sufficient reason, and did so at once. In ten minutes an inspector was announced from the nearest station.

"Now go ahead and tell your tale, Leonard," I said, when the officer had been shown into the room.

"Well, father, you must know that very early on the morning when Sanchez ran away, Antholin went downstairs to get some matches, and he heard Sanchez talking very loudly in the small pantry, and being answered by a strange voice. And the first thing he said was that he had fixed up something in the study which would send you—and he called you a horrid name—into everlasting shivers. He said that in English; and then he went on in French, and told how he had arranged to go to Paris, en prince, by the club train the next day 'in this get-up'; and Antholin peeped in at the door, and saw what the disguise was, so that we knew him again. And then we talked about it together, and decided we would go too, and we made you let us; and we had an awful scramble to keep out of his sight at Victoria. We tracked him in Paris to a place in the Quartier Latin, and a man told us he was one of the Anarchist people; then one of the police came to us at the Baronne's, and we told an American gentleman we had met on the steamer about it—after he saw us with the sergeant; and he helped us ever so much, and we went together and got into a room next to the one where Sanchez was telling three other men about you, and so we found out at last what he had done."

"And now—now," put in Antholin, with all a boy's eagerness for a suitable dénouement, "if you come down to the study, we can show you where it is—but you will have to be terribly careful!"

The police inspector listened to all this hurried description with a grave smile, and, after asking the boys a few pointed questions, he turned to me:

"Will you please wait an hour, Sir Leonard, while I communicate with headquarters; and then we shall be ready to investigate the matter and place your house in safety. Meanwhile keep your study carefully secured. This was the man who was wanted in Paris for——" and he named a recent catastrophe which had stirred the indignation of the whole world.

We breakfasted quietly, listening to the boys' story in full detail; and in less than an hour the inspector returned accompanied by two other officials, one of whom I found was a chemist. A few more questions followed, after which we proceeded to the study, and I unlocked and opened the door. Antholin walked boldly in; but my wife being present, the rest of us held back—I must confess with some trepidation.

"Now," said Antholin from the middle of the room, "do you know what I am looking at?"

I followed his gaze, which was directed to the top of a bookcase where there happened to be an old valise and hat-box of mine—the latter of which I have mentioned before.

"Great Heaven—not the hat-box?" I exclaimed, as a pang of recollection shot through me.

"Yes," replied my boy, looking at me with some surprise; "you had better take it down, now; but for your life don't turn it over!"

The chemist approached the bookstand, and mounting a chair, carefully lifted the hat-box down without changing its position, which, as I said before, was bottom upwards. The cover was loose, and he pulled it open downwards. The mouth of the box was stuffed with some crumpled newspaper, and this he gently drew out. Inside, and resting on the paper, was a common round tin case, such as people keep tea or tobacco in, also placed with the lid downwards. Antholin instinctively drew back towards us.

My heart thrilled as I thought how narrowly I had escaped turning the hat-box over (thinking it had been inadvertently upset) when the opportune arrival of Antholin's message had so strangely held my hand.

Placed the tin in a full basin of water.

"We will examine this now," said the chemist. "Have you some water?"

We led him into the adjoining lavatory, where he placed the tin in a full basin of water, and then carefully worked the lid off. As he did this, a brownish liquid ran out into the water. "An acid," the chemist said, dipping his finger and putting it to his tongue.

The case was divided inside by a tin partition which had been soldered in, and pierced with a few small holes. Above this was a quantity of yellowish white powder.

I told them how nearly I had turned the hat-box right side up, the previous day.

"Had you done so, Sir Leonard," said the expert, "you would not have been here now. The box was evidently so placed in order to induce anyone who noticed it to turn it over. In which case this acid would at once have filtered through on to the powder, and——"

We shuddered as he left us to picture the consequence. The two boys pressed to my side, and Antholin squeezed my hand silently.

"But," I exclaimed presently, "why on earth——." I paused suddenly, for the truth was dawning upon me. But I finished my sentence.

"Why on earth didn't you tell me all about this at once, when you had heard what Sanchez said? Think of the awful trouble and anxiety it would have saved!"

"Why, papa," said Antholin, with moistening eyes and a smile—his mother's own smile—"if we had come and told you there was danger somewhere in the study, and we didn't know where it was, what would you have done?"

I could not answer. Of course I knew perfectly well that the first thing I should have done would have been to go ramping round the room, turning everything inside out and upside down to find out where the peril lay!

I could not but feel the deepest admiration for the astuteness and forethought with which my dear lad, in the presence of an urgent danger to all of us, had restrained his impulse, and courageously followed out the only course which was likely to ensure protection to our home. His knowledge of French had indeed stood him in good stead, for when Captain Hawkes had succeeded in gaining access to the haunt of the conspirators, they had heard Roquelin describe every detail of the arrangement to his fellow rascals; and without this happy chance the mystery would only have been solved at a cost terrible to think of.

A few weeks later the penalty was paid. The head of the wretched Roquelin fell under the knife reserved for it at the hands of M. Deibler.

If the tie of affection between myself and my younger son could possibly have been strengthened by anything, I would say that it was now rendered eternal by the fact that I owed him a life—if not more.

Digitized by Google

CONSTABLE CHISWICK'S FORTUNE

OH, yes! a policeman's luck's 'ard enough, and as that hoperatic fellow says, speakin' up for the sympathetic portion of the public—which it allus appeared to me was a mighty blamed small contingent—'is lot ain't an 'appy one. But there's welcome breaks occasionly—things happen wot encourages a man, and although they don't happen to hisself, leads 'im to 'ope as how they may one day, if fortune ain't right dead agin 'im."

In this wise a guardian of the peace on a Regent Street beat some little time ago. I had failed to catch my last 'bus home, and at one o'clock in the morning I was slowly driving shanks' pony in a westerly direction.

It was lovely weather and the streets were tranquil. The big city of London seemed wrapped in the happy thrall of its beauty sleep. The surrounding quiet, the balmy air, and—a circumstance which it would be unfair to a gracious goddess to omit to mention—the presence between my teeth of a pipe in whose bowl a plug of navy cut was slowly undergoing fragrant incineration, all combined to induce a meditative frame of mind, which would have continued until I had arrived at my own distant doorstep, no doubt, had I not in turning into a bye-thoroughfare launched suddenly into a lonely constable, whose stalwart form had been hidden in a dense shadow thrown by the building against which he had been leaning.

"Where are you a-goin'?" he asked, as he courteously picked up my pipe, which the force of the collision had projected into the roadway, over which the scattered and burning ashes forthwith chased each other playfully. I explained; he tendered certain good-humoured advice, which I laughingly promised to follow exactly, and then we dropped into a friendly conversation, which, in due course, led up to the two or three remarks which combine to form the introductory paragraph of this narrative.

"Now, for instance," he continued, pulling vigorously at a cigar I had given him, and which he had lit, after assuring himself that neither sergeant-in-charge nor inspector was at hand, "there's Jack Chiswick, an' 'is little experience, as comes forcibly to my mind just now."

"Ah!" I queried, feeling interested, "and who was Jack Chiswick?"

"Well, Jack was a copper, you know—same as me, when I furst knowed 'im, and through bein' on beats as adjined Jack's very often, I becomes very familiar with 'im in course o' time. If you said we wus pals, you wouldn't be far out. Lor' bless you, I recollects it all so clearly, it might a' 'appened yesterday, but it didn't. More'n three years 'as travelled since Jack made 'is fortune."

It is so very seldom—more's the pity!—that one hears of a constable making his fortune, and when one does hear of such an occurrence it is such a dead certainty that the fortune has been attained in some altogether extraordinary way, that I encouraged my friend, the policeman, to proceed.

"Jack was workin' the beat over there," he went on. "It runs from that block"—which he pointed to with his index-finger, and which was plainly discernable over the way—"to yon corner, and then down Trevelyan Street until you gets to Chalker's Open, where the tenements are. He'd bin on it a fortnight, and was glad that 'e was goin' to 'ave a change I dessay—anyhow, I allus felt glad when the change had come, when I've been workin' it—for there are so many tip-top shops and stores, and there are so many thieves' dens lyin' scrooged up again' them, that a policeman feels very anxious while 'e's doin' duty there, and jolly satisfied when the orders come for 'im to be took off.

"Course, I'm talkin' about night duty. A kid could keep things going durin' the day. It was Sunday night, the last o' Jack's fortnight, and as Sunday is allus very quiet he considered, I suppose, that he was about as good as done with Number 10 (which is the number of the beat), and looked forward to takin' things in a easy way. It appears that he was a-standing at yon corner Trevelyan Street, ye know, yonder: see?—just about this time, too, when 'e 'ears a cry of 'Murder!' comin' from the direction o' the tenements.

"Jack was allus impulsive, or he might 'a' got the man who was workin' this beat to go along with 'im. But no, off 'e rushes hisself, drawin' 'is baton as he gets near the place from which the shouts was proceedin'. There seemed to be a downright scuffle goin' on, from the row, and as Jack turned into Chalker's Open he comes a-top o' the scrimmage—slap, bang! Somebody was yelling 'Murder' for all he was worth; but it was a dark night, and although Jack could see there were four or five men tussling, he couldn't rightly say all at once which was the fellow as wus doin' the screamin'. However, he soon found out—trust Jack for that!—an' started in. He let 'em have it as well as he knew how, and fought 'is way through the gang until 'e got at the man who was bein' stuck up—for it was a clear case o' robbery from the pusson, and the gang 'ad evidently pounced upon the gentleman as 'e was parsin' the Open. The toff was lying on the ground, with another feller grippin' 'im, when Jack let sling with his baton.

"The baton struck something that giv' out a ring-like metal, and sent a knife swingin' through the air. 'Oho!' thought Jack, 'this is attempted murder, and 'e blows his whistle, and then as 'e rolls the footpad from atop of the toff 'e gets a staggerer over the skull with a crowbar, an' that's the end o' Jack Chiswick for the time bein'. When the other men got up they found both the gent and Jack lyin' unconscious, the former with every valuable gone, and off they trundles 'em both to the nearest 'orspital. They wus both bad, an' no kid, but Jack was the wurst o' the two. The blow was a stunner, there wus concussion o' the brain, and for a long time it looked as if he wus a-going to lose 'is life. 'Owsumnever, he comes round, an' in a month or so they thinks 'e's able to leaves the 'orspital, an' they packs 'im off to 'is own friends.

"There ain't many men as wud 'ave taken the same interest in a policeman, even suppose 'e 'ad saved their lives, as the gent did in Jack. He sent 'im calves-foot jelly, and chickens, and port wine, and all sorts o' delicacies while 'e wus in the 'orspital, and after 'e left continued to visit 'im now an' then, an' take 'im out for short walks in the park. One day, Jack an' the gent wus a-sittin' together on a seat in Regent's, when the talk turned upon clever criminals. Jack thought that England could show about the cleverest blackguards unhung; but the gent, whose name was Walter Jordan, and who belonged to Australia, would not give in to this, an' 'eld as how Melbourne could give London or any part of the British Hempire a start an' a beatin' in that very respect. Then 'e began to mention cases of which he knowed, and among others told Jack the following story:—

"'For cool audacity,' says this 'ere Mr. Jordan, in the way as educated gentlemen talk, for he was educated an' very clever, 'I don't think you can easily match the crime I am going to tell you about in your English records. A few months ago, just before I left Australia, a man walked into the shop of a manufacturer of rubber stamps in Melbourne, and ordered a stamp. The inscription to be put on it was merely this, "Goldtown Tramway Company, Limited. Scrip in Office." "We want this stamp," said he to the attendant, "as quickly as possible. Our present one is old and worn out, and there are a lot of share transfers, which require to be stamped without delay." The stamp was made, and the same person called for it on the following day and took it away. Then the young man began to transfer hundreds of shares in the Goldtown Tramway Company—marking the transfers with this duplicate of the official "Scrip-in-office" stamp—and to receive hard cash for them. Inside of a week he had negotiated advances to himself of £15,000 on shares, and got the money, when, as a matter of fact, he was not a shareholder in the company at all. The transfers were sent into the head office of the company to be cleared, and then the gaff was blown. But the thief had disappeared, and, although the detectives were put on his trail, they didn't catch him. In an up-country town, lying close, he amused himself for days reading the newspaper accounts of his little swindle. And then the chase grew less hot, and he got out of the country, coming to England at his convenience. How does that strike you for nerve?'

Digitized by Google

"Jack laughed, an' giv' the opinion that the bloke wus sharp enough to cut sausages.

"'Well, since he arrived here,' went on the toff, 'rewards amounting to £3,000 have been offered for his apprehension, and,' the gent went on in a quiet tone o' voice, 'if you want to do a good thing for yourself, I can put you in the way of earning the money.'

"Jack 'ad been listenin' very interestedly to Mister Jordan's story, an' 'e says, ''Ow?'

"'All you've got to do,' continues the gent, 'is to arrest me, because I'm the man who forged the transfers.'

"Jack looks at 'im in a dazed fashion, an' rememberin' 'ow kind Jordan 'ad bin to 'im in 'is illness, motioned with 'is 'and as though he didn't want to be told any more. But Jordan keeps 'arpin' away on 'is guilt, an' finally says, 'Jack Chiswick, if you don't arrest me, I shall go out of this park, and give myself into the hands of the first policeman I meet. I'm sick of being here in this strange country of yours, where I know nobody. I have determined to go back to Melbourne. I shall get five years, I know, but I shall go back and serve it, and I have good friends who will look after me when I come out again. I am determined that you shall have those rewards. You saved my life; I've got very little money left—none that would be an adequate recompense. You shall, therefore, have the £3,000 which those who take an interest in me are willing to pay to see me back among them again.'

"Well, wot was Jack to do? Off they marches to the nearest police-station, Jordan goin' on ahead, and Jack laggin' behind, as if he wus the prisoner and not the uther. Jordan tells his yarn, gives Jack the credit of the arrest, and they locks 'im up. In course of time, when Jordan 'ad got back to Melbourne, an' was comfortably stowed away in a stone jug, the three thou' comes over here for Jack Chiswick, and 'e is a made man to-day, standing behind 'is own little bar in the Edgware Road, on the highway to unlimited prosperity. These are the things that only 'appens once in awhile, but they do 'appen, an' may I be the next to fall on my feet is the 'umble prayer of yours trooly."

I questioned whether the risk involved in a broken head was not too great to be undertaken even if three thousand golden sovereigns were of an absolute certainty at the end of a sojourn in the hospital ward, but my friend the policeman was perfectly satisfied that it was not too great, and emphatically expressed the pleasure it would afford him to have an opportunity of bringing his belief to the touchstone of practical experience. With an admonition to him to be very careful, as the force could ill spare a fine fellow like himself—a compliment which seemed to afford him some gratification—I re-lit my pipe, bade him good-night, and resumed my reverie at the point of interruption.

I WAS sitting in a large and comfortable easy chair opposite my old friend Garston in front of a cheery fire that burned in the grate of his snug library. Outside, the large flakes were silently falling, shrouding the road and housetop in white, while the low tinkling of the sheep bell from the neighbouring farm across the road broke intermittently upon the intense silence which at that moment pervaded the room.

It was close upon one o'clock.

Both Garston and I were feeling drowsy, and, at each pause in the conversation, our heads gradually dropped on our breasts, and Morpheus pressed his soft fingers on our eyelids.

That afternoon I had arrived at his house after an absence of a year, and, even in this comparatively brief interval, we had found that his excellent Burgundy roused our memories, and supplied us with sufficient talking material to last for six consecutive hours.

Between us, on the tiger-skin hearthrug lay Garston's bulldog, a magnificent creature, for whom I felt a strong attachment directly I saw him. I am a lover of dogs, and appreciate a good specimen when it comes under my notice.

As the clock chimed the three-quarters, Garston raised his head suddenly.

"It has just struck me, Lingley, that I forgot to tell you about a most exciting experience we had only a week ago with a couple of burglars, who got into the house while we were in the town. The wife and I had been to see some friends, and had left the house in the care of the housemaid, who has not been with us very long, and when we came back we were considerably surprised to see a couple of men coming out of the front door carrying an enormous bundle each, which they let drop, and ran away.

"I skipped out of the dog-cart and caught one of the beggars, and he is doing time in the county gaol; but yesterday I received a letter from the man who appears to be his accomplice, intimating that, before the week is out, I shall be cold meat, or words to that effect.

"The police have got the letter, which I think is only bluff. What do you think?"

"I should say ditto," I replied. "The game wouldn't be worth the candle. It would mean the gallows for the chap, and brotherly love among backguards of that profession is not so powerful as to induce one of them to run his neck into a noose for the other."

"That's what I say. But my wife is dreadfully nervous about the matter. She was glad when you came, for that reason."

"Oh," I said. To tell the candid truth, this new light on the state of affairs did not tend to enchance my peace of mind, because it struck me that perhaps this desperate burglar, whoever he may be, might after all attempt to carry out his threat, and that in a way which would imperil my own personal comfort.

I thought of my room, and remembered that it was on the ground floor, and had a couple of French windows leading out into the orchard, and that, after all, so long as somebody suffered for the indignity imposed upon the captured thief, it would not matter whether the master of the house met with his death or anyone else connected with the establishment.

Digitized by Google

My throat got dry, and I reached out for my glass, but it was empty. Garston noticed this, although he had nearly dropped off to sleep.

"Fill up again, old boy; don't be afraid, there's more in the cellar."

But the bottle happened to be empty; I got three or four drops out of it, and then banged it on the table, a little aggravated, for I was tremendously thirsty.

"I'll get some more," said Garston, raising himself on the arms of his chair.

"No, no, don't trouble, old man," I said, putting up my hand as an indication for him to sit down again. But, ignoring my half-hearted and insincere protest, he got up, stretched himself, yawned, and went out of the room.

He closed the door behind him, and I heard his soft footfalls die away.

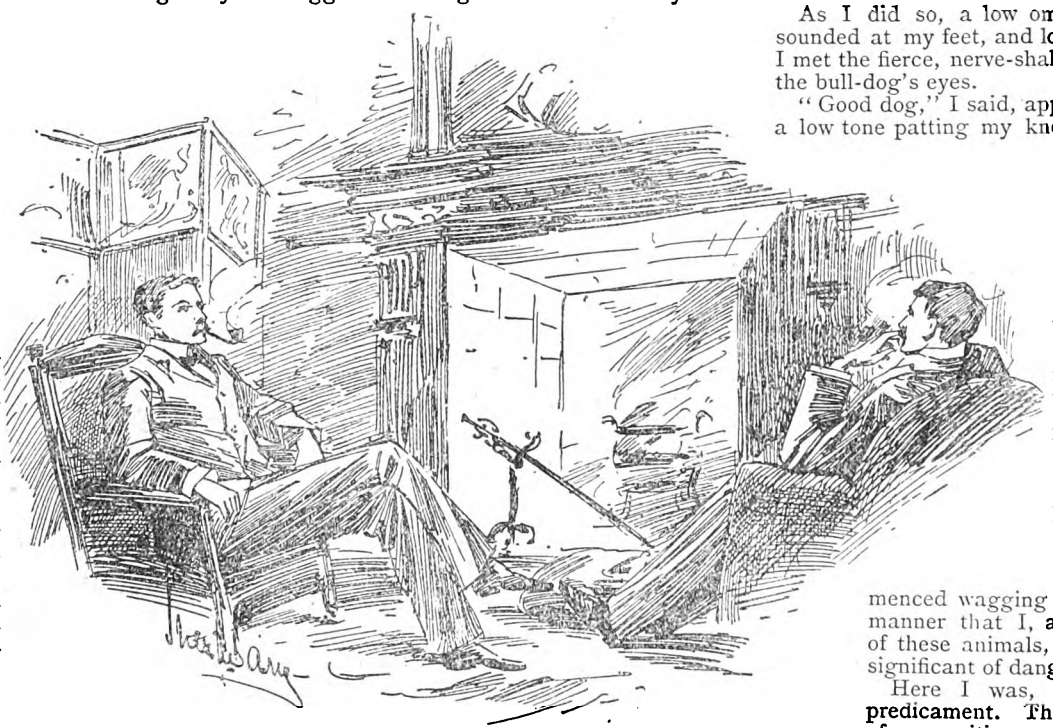
Everything was intensely silent. It was a silence that oppresses one, a silence in which the nerves become highly strung, and the whole frame seems on the alert.

I leaned back in the chair, staring at the flickering flames, with my pipe resting lightly between my fingers, puffing thoughtfully, and turning over in my mind the likelihood of my being assassinated that night by the aggressive burglar. Under the glamour of good Burgundy, the brain becomes highly imaginative. At least, that is the effect it has upon me.

A slight burring noise, and then a sharp bang!

I started up with a jump. A cold perspiration broke out on my forehead, and the pipe tumbled over my legs to the floor. Then I fell back, and forced a laugh.

It was only the clock, which had struck one.



"My wife is dreadfully nervous about the matter."

Stooping, I picked up my pipe, and, knocking the ashes out, commenced to refill it, slowly and deliberately; but my hands still shook with the effects of the silly fright. The dog, which had raised its head and growled at my erratic movement, once more placed its nozzle between its fore paws, and closed its eyes.

The pipe comfortably filled, I felt for a match, and struck it. Again the dog raised its head and looked at me fiercely.

Then I lay back and began to think. Not until then did it dawn upon me that Garston was still absent on his errand, and a strange foreboding took possession of me. What on earth had kept him so long? He certainly ought not to have been gone more than five minutes, or ten at the outside, and it was now close upon a quarter of an hour.

Again, after a moment's thought, I laughed to myself.

"Faugh! What a fool I am getting. Of course, he's only hunting about for the best bottles, and doing that with a lighted candle in a cellar is not an easy job."

But, when the quarter had chimed and sent me into the cold shivers, I began to get anxious about his safety. Could he have slipped and fallen and broken his leg in that wretched hole under the ground, where his cries for help were muffled within the four walls? Had he met with any other sort of accident that prevented his returning?

"If he doesn't come back in another five minutes, I shall go and hunt for him," I said to myself, and puffed nervously at my meerschaum.

The flames got smaller and smaller, flickering and dancing, and casting most uncanny and fantastic shadows on the wall. I saw outlined grinning heads of impossible monsters, long skinny hands with equally long skinny fingers that clutched at nothing, and then disappeared, only to be succeeded by writhing forms of lean people that danced and contorted their bodies from ceiling to wall and from wall to ceiling.

The five minutes seemed as if they would never elapse, and a dozen times I leaned forward and strained my eyes to see the face of the clock in the semi-darkness, for my own watch I had inadvertently left on the dressing-table of my room.

At last the minute-hand pointed to twenty past, and I rose, determined to search the place and discover what had become of my unfortunate friend.

As I did so, a low ominous growl sounded at my feet, and looking down I met the fierce, nerve-shaking glare of the bull-dog's eyes.

"Good dog," I said, appeasingly, in a low tone patting my knee affectionately. "Poor old boy! Good dog!"

The sound of my own voice echoed through the silent chamber, and sounded fearfully unnatural. The gentle creature, however, refused to be appeased, and rose to his four feet, and commenced wagging his tail in a manner that I, as a student of these animals, knew to be significant of danger.

Here I was, in a pretty predicament. The realisation of my position sent a thrill of trepidation through my already slowly chilling body, and I sat down to think. As I did so, the dog resumed his former position.

Not a sound broke the stillness, save the ticking of the clock and the occasional shifting of an ember in the dying fire. A cold wind seemed to drift in under the door and through the joints of the window, and chill me to the bone.

My pipe had gone out, and I was too nervous to relight it, lest the performance should arouse the anger of the dog and cause him to attack me. I placed it very quietly in my pocket, then gave myself up to propound impossible theories to account for Garston's prolonged absence.

I do not know why the idea had not occurred to me before; but when the gist of the piece of news he had imparted to me before going out suddenly came into my head, my heart stopped beating altogether for a second, and my teeth literally chattered with cold and fear combined.

Fool that I was, why had I not thought of it before? The dread message contained in that letter had probably been carried out only too well, and my poor friend might at that moment be lying with a knife in his heart, while the perpetrator was miles away.

Digitized by Google

I conjured up in my imagination a picture of poor old Garston lying in a pool of his life's blood, the victim of a cowardly assault. For all I knew he was within a few feet of the door, perhaps outside on the very mat. The deed could have been perpetrated absolutely without noise. A blow, and all would have been over.

"Heaven help me, I must make an effort to rouse the household," I muttered. But the dog raised his head and, so thoroughly unstrung were my nerves, that I literally cowered before his gaze. If I shouted, he would spring upon me, and I knew too well the result of an attack from a bulldog. It would avail nothing, so I kept silence, racking my brain for a way of circumventing him.

The burring and sharp twanging of the clock made me start once more, and, in a fit of desperation, I rose and stopped it altogether. A continuation of these sudden jars would turn my hair grey in another hour.

But, when I had sunk back into my chair, and tried to continue to think, the silence was even greater than before, and I missed the amiable ticking of the pendulum. The dog, which had jumped up savagely when I touched the clock, now sat grimly watching me, fully wide awake, and prepared to resent any further attempt on my part to move away from the chair on which I sat.

I tried coaxing, speaking in a low tone, fearing to hear my own voice; and then I threatened him. I commanded him to lie down, to get out of the room, to seize an imaginary person at the door, until I scared myself more than I did the dog.

It was awful. Bravely as I strove to dispel the idea which had rooted itself in my mind that anything had happened to Garston, it was in vain. Instinct told me only too well that my old friend had gone to his last account, and by the hand of an assassin. Gladly would have I gone in his stead. I was a bachelor, with only a maiden aunt left to me among my relations, while he was a rising young fellow with a sweet wife and a little girl, a little angel, whose lips would never form themselves to say "daddy" without sending a pang through the widowed mother's heart.

All this I thought of, and began to feel hysterical. I wanted to cry, and yet I had a desire to laugh at my own fortunate escape. After all, what was Garston to me, that I should wish to die in his stead? He was a young man, full of life, and with prospects. So was I. Moreover, he had been the means of bringing misery and sorrow on a fellow creature, while I, so far as I knew, had not. And he, in addition, was guilty of possessing a bulldog that I would have given a ten pound note to have the means of shooting there and then.

He got up and stretched himself.

The fire had gone completely out. The wind was rising, and began to moan weirdly round the house. The dog shivered once or twice, and got nearer the dead embers, trying to extract a little warmth from them, and, finding them cold, began to walk about the room, always keeping his eyes on me. I could not see his body, but the two green orbs shone with awful distinctness, moving here and there, now disappearing behind a chair, now appearing close to my side.

Gradually I fell into a fit of shivering. My brain became numbed with the cold, and where my fingers touched the chair I could not feel. I had no idea of the time, for had I not stopped the clock? To me it appeared as if the whole week had dragged itself out, but I knew that perhaps I had been there only an hour.

I saw dimly through the darkness the figure of a woman.

Morning would bring the servants. I should hear their footfalls on the stairs, and their shrieks of horror as they caught sight of the bleeding corpse of the master. I should——

Someone was moving outside.

The dog growled, and walked in stately dignity to the door, sniffing.

The growling ceased, and the door opened. I saw dimly through the darkness the figure of a woman. His wife, perhaps, come to find why he had not yet gone to bed.

I tried to speak, to tell her her husband's awful fate, but a guttural sound was the only result. She cried out, and fled, the dog after her. Nerved by his departure I ran out, crying insanely, looking about in the passage for the corpse.

At the top of the stairs appeared the figure of a man. Ha! The murderer, the assassin. I bounded up towards him, shouting that I would avenge Garston, and he turned and fled into a room, I following closely.

The force with which I struck the door burst it open from its lock, and I stumbled into a bedroom.

"What in heaven's name is the matter with you, Lingley?" shouted a familar voice, as a familar form stood before me, armed with a brass candlestick.

I remember the room swimming round, and then I fell.

Garston told me all about it afterwards. He was most profuse in his apologies, and this ring on my finger is a little gift with which he sought to propitiate me.

It appears that he went upstairs to fetch the keys of the cellar from his bedroom, and saw a copy of Home Notes which his wife had left on the dressing-table. He had first glanced at it, and, as something of interest caught his eye, he read the article. When he had finished, he had entirely forgotten his errand and my existence, and had, tired and worn out, slipped off his things and got into bed, where he immediately fell asleep, waking only at the shrieks of the servant.

100 Pages. 100 Illustrations.

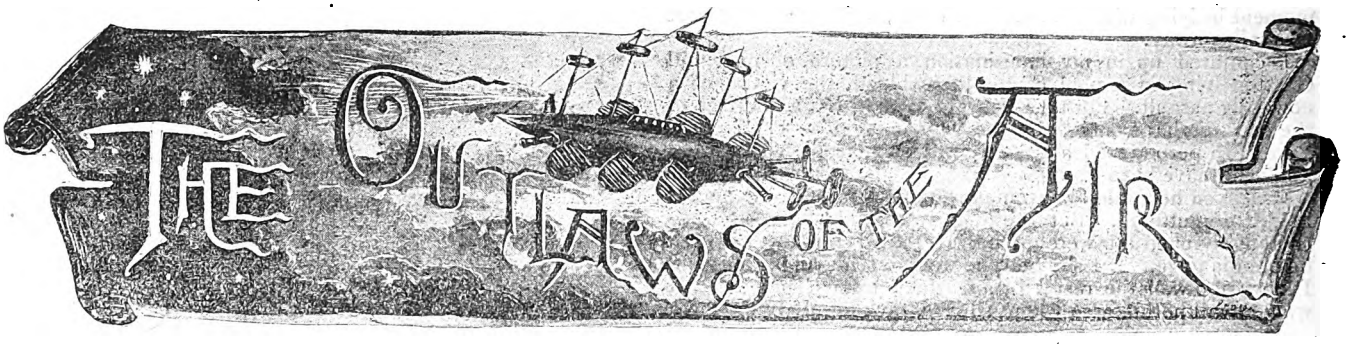
PEARSON'S LIBRARY.

No. 1. "A GIRL WITHOUT A NAME."
NOW ON SALE.

No. 2. "THE ADVENTURES OF AN UGLY GIRL."
ON SALE, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 1ST.

Each of the above is a complete novel, powerfully written and profusely illustrated. Price SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google



By George Griffith,
Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

Franz Hartog—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

Sir Harry Milton—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

Herbert Wyndham—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who resigns his commission and couples his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

Frederick Austen—the inventor of the Utopian air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

Violet Milton—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is permanently crippled by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

Dora Merton—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

Lucy Summers—another fair Utopian.

Max Renault has made his way to New York Harbour on the air-ship and sees four huge liners start in a fleet, under convoy of two cruisers and four torpedo boats. He follows them, and on the second night Hartog appears upon the scene in his fast torpedo boat, the Destroyer, and destroys the warships and torpedo boats. After the action, Renault makes himself known to Hartog. The specie on board two of the liners is transhipped to the third, her crew are turned adrift in boats, and she is brought to Hartog's hiding place on the North-West Coast of Africa.

CHAPTER XV.

Anarchy Up-to-Date.

"In de first place," said Franz, settling himself to his narrative after he had lit a long black cigar, through the smoke of which his little eyes twinkled almost merrily at Max, "you must understand dat after dat unpleasant affair vich dat scoundrel Berthauld must haf brought on us before you found him out and stopped his tongue, de Group broke up for de time being.

"Ve thought it vas safer to do dat and go back to de old plan of individual action until it vas time to do something big, as ve haf done. Lea Cassilis settled down quietly to her artistic dressmaking business in London, till she got a chance to go to New York, and vent, partly for de dollars, and partly to begin a little scheme dat I vill tell you more about afterwards. Sophie Vronsky and Marie Rolland stopped in London mit Marie's husband, and I vent back to Elbing to make out my engagement with Schichau.

"Dere vere several delays before ve could get properly to vork on de Tsar's boat, and de consequence vas dat she vas not launched until nearly two years later. Improvements in engines and guns kept cropping up, de English kept on building faster and faster boats, and as de strict contract vas dat she should beat everyding that floated, ve had to keep on doing things over again, even after ve had got dem finished.

"Dis vas goot for me, because it gave me more time to get fellows into de works dat I could depend on, and ven she at last vent on her trial trip I had tirty of dem on board her, stokers, firemen, engineers and sailors. As dere vas only forty on board altogether, and as ve had took care to get de cook who prepared de luncheon dat de swells had on board between de runs on our side, dere vas not very much difficulty in settling mid dose who thought dat de boat should go back to Elbing ven ve vanted to take her someveres else.

"As goot luck vould haf it, one of de Baltic fogs came down like vet blankets so dat you could not see from de nose of de boat to de stern. Dot was our opportunity, so ve took it; and some of de highest officials of Schichau's yard and de two Russian officers vat had come to vatch de trial met mit some serious accidents vich completely prevented dem from svimming home."

"Ah," said Max quietly, "I was afraid you would have to do something of that sort. Had you much of a row?"

"No," replied Hartog with an expressive gesture. "Dere vas no row at all. Ve got dem all into de vard room, shut dem up dere, put a strong guard over dem, and ven ve had run far enough out to sea through de fog ve vent in and fetched zem out von by von, tied deir hands behind deir backs, fixed a pig of iron ballast to deir feet and dropped dem oferboard.

"Ve thought dat vas de most convenient vay of disposing of dem. If ve had shot dem someone might haf heard de shots, and if ve had cut deir throats it vould haf made an unpleasant mess dat ve did not vant in our nice new ship.

"Ven ve had sent dem to de fishes ve ran quietly along to de vestvard until nightfall, and den ve cracked on all speed and made a rush for de Sound. Ve had von or two narrow shaves of being found out, but ve got drough all right and den ve ran up de Nord Sea and round Scotland. Den, ven ve vere vell out of de vay, ve drilled ourselves and practised mit de guns and torpedoes and made our plans and vent on de varpath.

Digitized by Google

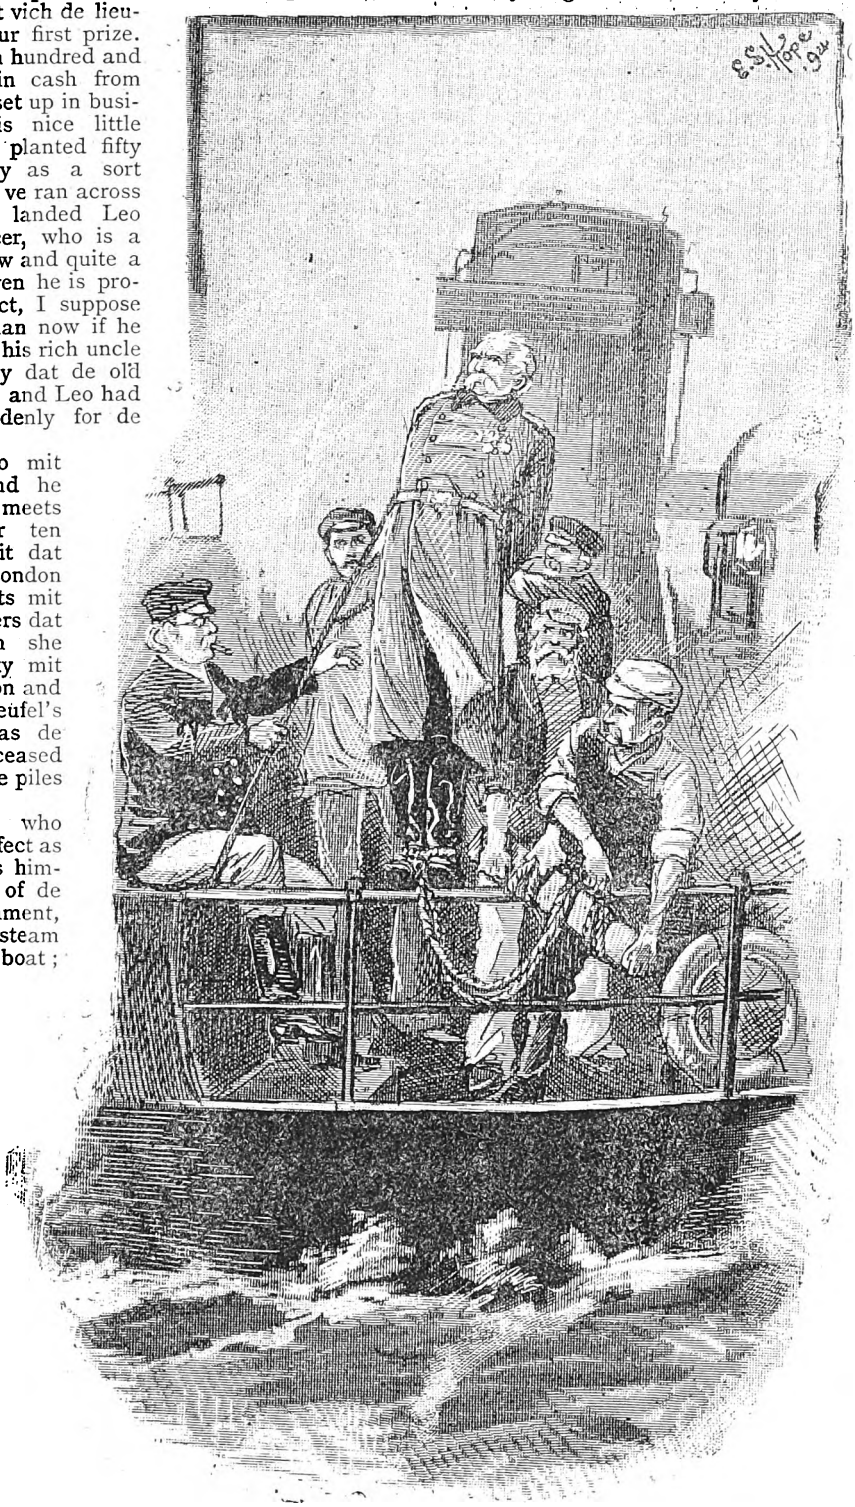
"De Alberta, about vich de lieutenant told you, vas our first prize. Ve got more dan von hundred and fifty tousand pound in cash from her, and mit dat ve set up in business. Ve found dis nice little hiding place, vere ve planted fifty tousand of de money as a sort of reserve fund. Den ve ran across de Atlantic, and I landed Leo Marcel, my first officer, who is a very smart young fellow and quite a gentleman to look at ven he is properly dressed. In fact, I suppose he vould be a gentleman now if he had not quarrelled mit his rich uncle in Lyons in such a vay dat de old man never recovered, and Leo had to leave France suddenly for de goot of his health.

"Vell, I land Leo mit plenty of money, and he goes to New York, meets Lea and gives her ten tousand pounds. Mit dat she goes first to London to make arrangements mit Rolland and some oders dat you know, and den she takes Sophie Vronsky mit her as lady companion and goes and cuts de teufel's own dash in Paris as de youthful vidow of a deceased Yankee vat made large piles in pork.

"Meanvile, Leo, who speaks Spanish so perfect as I speak English, gifs himself out as de agent of de Paraguayan Government, and buys a smart steam yacht as a despatch boat; loads her up mit de best sort of ammunition he can buy, torpedoes and different sorts of stores and explosives vich I have told him about, and puts to sea in her so dat ve can meet by arrangement vere nobody vill see us, and dere I captures his ship, and ve drop his crew overboard and bring de stores and dings over here.

"On de vay ve catches de Norham Castle, von of de Cape boats, and clean her out. She vas coming home mit gold and diamonds, and dot catch vas vorth more as two hundred tousand pound to us. Den off goes Leo again in his yacht dis time to Europe, and after he has given de diamonds to Lea and Rolland to put into circulation he organises agencies of comrades in London, Paris, and Brussels, Liverpool, Southampton and Newcastle—all as most respectable people in de shipping business and export trade.

"Of course dese gentlemen are always ready to supply us mit anything ve vant in de vay of stores or fighting material and tell no tales about it. Dey find dat much better dan de old style of Anarchy. Dey haf plenty of money and are quite respectable and know dat dey are doing efer so much more harm to our enemies dan dey could do in de old-fashioned style."



"Fetched dem out von by von and dropped dem oferboard."

"But if you've got that yacht, what did you want to take possession of the Bremen for? I should have thought a great big lump of a ship like that would be more in the way than anything else."

"Ah, friendt Max! dot vas a little piece of generalship dot I explain to you right away. You see ve shall soon haf to begin operations on a large scale; and first of all ve must haf a place to build dese air-ships in. Vell now, ve can haf de different parts made by different firms in Europe and America, and I vill take care dat de plans are so drawn dat dey shall have no idea of vat the parts vill be like ven dey are all put togeder.

"Now, you see dat dis is a business in vich ve can have no accidents. If ve build dose ships anyvere on shore it is just possible dat de place may be found by some of de good people dat are looking for us so carefully, and if dat vas so ve should not be able to take our vorks away mit us, to say noding of perhaps letting some air-ship, almost finished, fall into de hands of de enemy. Do you see dat?"

"See it?" cried Max rubbing his hands together with delight. "I should think I do! That's another stroke of genius to your credit. Franz. You are going to make the Bremen a floating workshop and put the air-ships together aboard of her. Bravo, that's a capital idea!"

Digitized by Google

"Jah, de idea is goot," replied the engineer complacently, "and I have thought him out very carefully. You see de Bremen is over five hundred feet long, and dat is plenty big enough to build air-ships two hundred feet long on. Ve can take her down South and keep her alvays in fine veather, so dat de vork can be done on deck.

"Dose in charge of her can alvays be on the look out for ships and move her off whenever anything heaves in sight. In dis vay you see ve shall be able to dodge all de ships of all de navies for ever, and no von vill ever be able to guess how de teufel ve get our air-ships built. I tink dat vill be a much better plan dan having dese hiding-places on shore."

"Yes, much better," said Max, "but all the same, I think it would be wise as soon as we have got the Vengeur armed to go to Utopia and make a clean sweep of the colony. We shan't be safe if any of them get away, because you know it is quite certain that Austen and Adams will take Milton into their confidence now about the air-ship, and as Milton has any amount of money it will be just as easy for them to build another Vengeur as for us; in fact, it will be easier, because they'll simply have to give their orders and pay the money."

"Oh, jah, dat is so of course," replied Franz, sending a meditative puff of smoke into the air. "De first ding dat ve must take care of is dat none of dose Utopian idiots get away from the island alife, except perhaps some of dose pretty girls dat you vere telling me about. Dey might do for sweethearts for some of our fellows on de Destroyer. It is a bit lonesome for dem vidout any ladies' society."

"Ah," said Max, involuntarily, frowning as he thought of the miscarriage of his own kidnapping adventure. "That's so. There are plenty of them to choose from, and the boys could take their pick; but, mind you, if we are going to do anything of that sort we shall have to hurry up about it.

"There's no telling how soon Milton may get away in his yacht or the other steamer and be off to England, most likely with Austen on board; and once let them do that and the next thing we shall see will be an aerial privateer out on the Atlantic looking for the Destroyer—and precious warm she'd make it for you, too, I can tell you. Now, how long will it take, do you think, to get the guns made and the Vengeur properly supplied with ammunition?"

Hartog was silent for a few moments, as if he were making a calculation, then he looked up and said:

"You can haf shells and gun-cotton, and mélinite, and blasting gelatine, and a nice business-like explosive of my own, vich I have thought of christening Anarchite, by vay of a little choke, as soon as ever you like; but de guns cannot possibly be made and brought out to be fitted in less dan tree months."

"H'm!" said Max, after a pause. "That would be a lot too late. The secret would be out long before then. Look here!" he went on jumping suddenly out of his chair and beginning to walk up and down the saloon, "How long would it take you to get the Destroyer from here to Utopia?"

"Ah!" said Hartog slowly. "Dat is rather a large order, as the Yankees say. From vat you haf told me Utopia cannot be very much less as ten tousand miles from here by sea, vether ve go round the Horn or round the Cape and by Australia. Ve cannot steam at full speed because ve cannot carry fuel enough. Ve could not make more than tventy or tventy-five knots, say six hundred miles a day mit fine veather, and it vould take us quite sixteen or eighteen days to get dere. Dat vould burn up nearly all our fuel, and den how should ve get back? It vould be a nice thing to be chased by a cruiser just ven our fuel vas giving out, vouldn't it?"

"Then why not take the Bremen with you with a reserve supply of fuel? You could steam her down as far as the Horn, load up from her again, and go ahead to Utopia, leaving her to follow on, couldn't you?"

"Jah, dat might be done if ve had men enough to vork her, vich ve haven't," replied Franz with a shake of his head. "Ve should vant at least fifty more, and I can tell you goot loyal anarchists who are able to vork a steamboat are not very easy to find. It is de teufel's own pity dat dis island is so far away."

"Yes, confound it!" said Max, looking rather blank at this unexpected difficulty. "What the deuce are we to do? Of course, it will never do to run the Destroyer short of fuel, and you can't take the Bremen round the Horn without a lot of men, I can quite see that, and getting men only means more delay—delay which might ruin the whole thing."

"Dere is only von ding to do," said Hartog, leaning back in his chair and crossing his stumpy little legs. "And dat is vot ve must do."

"Well, what is that?" asked Max impatiently.

"It is dis," said Hartog deliberately. "I expect Leo back from Europe in de Pilgrim—a nice innocent name dot for an Anarchist gentleman's yacht, isn't it?—to-morrow, mit odds and ends and some chemicals that I want to prepare my fuel. Now, der Pilgrim should haf mit her four nice little Maxim guns dat vill do dere eight hundred shots a minute, and give people fits at dree tousand yards.

"Dey only veigh two or tree hundredveight each, so you can carry dem easy. Ve vill fit dem on board de Vengeur, den ve vill get plenty of empty bottles from de Bremen to make into hand-bombs for mélinite and anarchite, and a new patent fire-mixture that I have invented, and den ve can put half-a-dozen of our best men from de Destroyer on board here mit us and take a little trip right avay to Utopia and clear de place out. Ve can be ready to start in three days and ve can get dere in five days, and as you have been five or six days avay now you vill be back again inside the fortnight. And dot vill be quick enough, for you told me dat dey could not get de yacht ready in less than tree weeks.

"By de vay, are you quite sure dat you blew up dat Nautilus ship before you came away, because, if you didn't, ve might catch her and she vould be a very nice companion for de Destroyer."

Max shook his head rather regretfully as he replied:

"No, I am afraid she is done for. I connected a battery with a time-clock that would make the circuit between it and one of the fuel magazines about three hours after I got away. I had to do most of the work in the dark it is true, and in a considerable hurry too, the night before I left, but I don't think anything can have gone wrong, and there was enough of the stuff to blow her into old nails if it did go off. Of course, it's a pity, but then you see, it wouldn't have been safe to leave them with a vessel almost completed that would be fast enough to run the Destroyer down and ram her as easily as you could ram a second-class torpedo boat."

"Oh, no, dat vas quite right!" said Franz regretfully. "It vas a pity, but it vas right. Ve don't vant any faster boats dan de Destroyer to come out until ve haf our aerial nafy built, and den it doesn't matter. Now, I think ve had better go down and have a look through de Destroyer and the Bremen and see if ve can find anything useful for de Vengeur."

CHAPTER XVI.

A PIRATE HUNT.

THE examination resulted in the selection of two light Maxim guns from the armament of the Destroyer and a three-barrelled Nordenfeldt carrying twelve-ounce shells from the Bremen, and these were fitted on board the Vengeur provisionally and in case of accident, for, as the engineer said, there was no telling when the air-ship might have to give an account of herself.

"Dere is noding like being reaty or as much reaty as you can," he remarked sententiously. "Dere vill be an awful row ven dey get de story of dat last little flutter of ours. You see ve haf got a big ship and more as a million pounds vorth of bullion and specie and trinkets. Dat vill make all Europe mad, and you bet dey vill hunt us up now for all dey are vorth. I vould give tventy tousand pounds to be five tousand miles from here to-night, but ve can't go till Leo comes back, so ve must give de Vengeur some teeths for de present so dat she can bite if she is vanted to."

The shells of the Nordenfeldt had been charged with Hartog's secret explosive, to which, in his grimly jesting way, he had given the suggestive name of Anarchite. It was this that had accomplished the terrible destruction which the shells from the Destroyer's rifled forty-pounder had wrought amidst the upper works of the cruisers.

Digitized by Google

He reckoned that, given an elevation of two thousand feet, the Nordenfeldt, which was mounted aft, while the Maxims were pointed downwards through the foremost ports in the hull of the air-ship, would have an effective range of quite two miles, while at this distance and elevation the Vengeur would be almost invisible, and absolutely beyond the effective range of any gun mounted on land or sea.

Indeed, the Vengeur was destined very soon to prove that aerial artillery, in spite of its being necessarily very much lighter than that employed either on land or sea, possessed two enormous advantages. The first was in facility of aim and relative steadiness of the object fired at; the second lay in the fact that the aerial gunner had the attraction of gravitation in his favour, while his opponents had it against them.

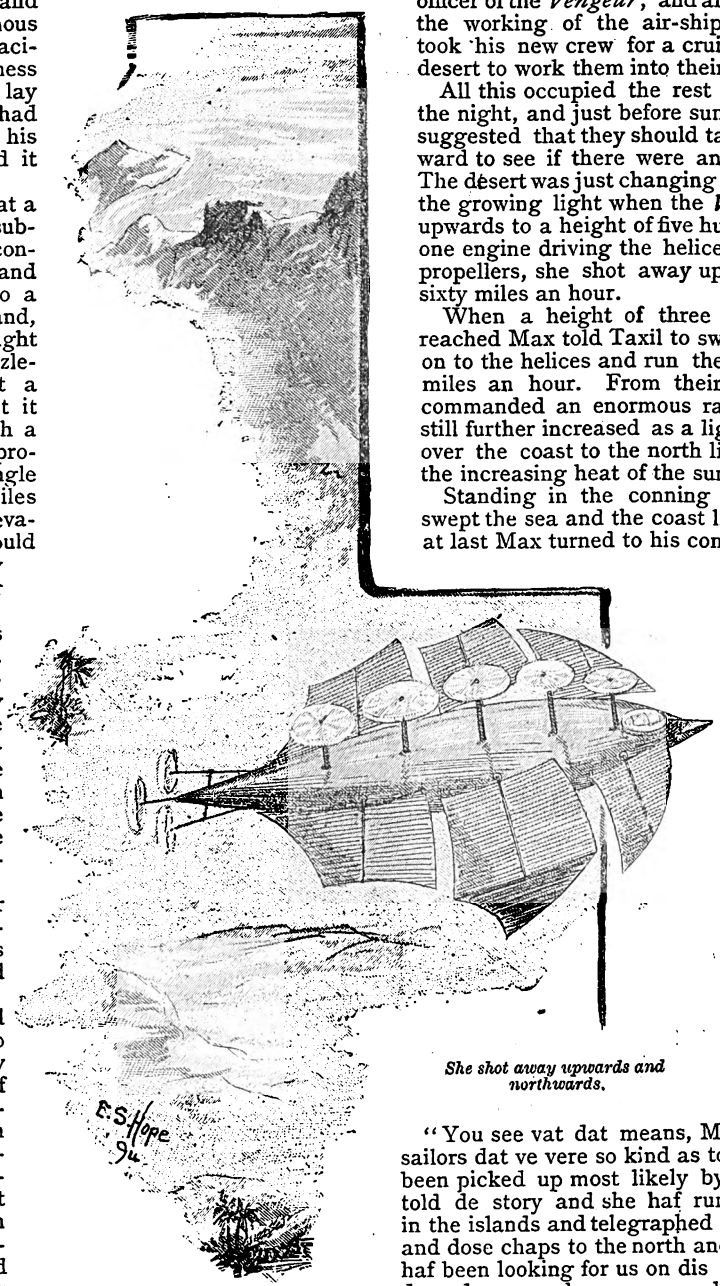
The projectile of a gun fired at a great angle from land or sea is subject to a downward pull which constantly diminishes its velocity and at last converts its path into a downward curve. On the other hand, a projectile fired, say, from a height of two thousand feet with a muzzle-velocity of fifteen hundred feet a second, is accelerated every foot it travels, and strikes its mark with a velocity which is increased in proportion to the acuteness of the angle at which it is fired. At two miles range and two thousand feet elevation the Vengeur's projectiles would strike with the enormous velocity of some five thousand feet per second.

So, too, with the heavier shells that would be dropped vertically. In accordance with the well-known law of moving bodies they would travel sixteen feet in the first second of their fall, thirty-two in the next, sixty-four in the next, and so on, doubling in velocity every second they were in the air, less, of course, the retardation produced by the resistance of the atmosphere.

It will be necessary to bear these few facts in mind, as without them some of the results shortly to be described would appear incredible.

In addition to the guns and their ammunition the air-ship was also furnished with fifty ten-inch conical shells, half of which were charged with mélinite and the other half with blasting gelatine and compressed oxygen in separate compartments, and two hundred quart champagne bottles charged with Anarchite and Hartog's fire-mixture, a horrible compound which, in addition to burning with unquenchable energy on the bursting of the shell, spread dense suffocating and poisonous fumes over a radius of several yards from the focus of the explosion.

As soon as he had got his make-shift armament on board Max picked out eight men from the crew of the Destroyer. They were all Frenchmen, light, wiry, active fellows, each endowed with a full share of the French mechanical aptitude and dexterity, and all utterly devoid of the most elementary sentiments of mercy or generosity.



She shot away upwards and northwards.

As might be expected, there was the keenest competitions among the Destroyer's men for berths aboard the air-ship, and so Max, to whom the engineer had naturally taken his old subordinate position, save where the tactics of the Destroyer were concerned, had them put through a stiff competition in gun drill under his own eye and chose those who acquitted themselves with the greatest smartness. One of them, a young fellow of three-and-twenty, named Raoul Taxil, who had been second engineer of the Destroyer, he made engineer and chief officer of the Vengeur, and after he had fully explained the working of the air-ship's machinery to him he took his new crew for a cruise into the air over the desert to work them into their places.

All this occupied the rest of the day and well into the night, and just before sunrise the next day Hartog suggested that they should take a flight to the northward to see if there were any signs of the Pilgrim. The desert was just changing from brown to grey under the growing light when the Vengeur soared vertically upwards to a height of five hundred feet, and then, with one engine driving the helices and the other two the propellers, she shot away upward and northward at sixty miles an hour.

When a height of three thousand feet had been reached Max told Taxil to switch the two side engines on to the helices and run the midship screw at thirty miles an hour. From their present elevation they commanded an enormous range of vision which was still further increased as a light haze which was lying over the coast to the north lifted and dispersed under the increasing heat of the sun.

Standing in the conning tower, Max and Hartog swept the sea and the coast line with their glasses, and at last Max turned to his companion and said:

"There she is, I think, down yonder, look, that long trail of smoke to the northward close in by the land."

The words were scarcely out of his mouth before he heard something between an oath and a scream from Hartog, followed by:

"Ach, der donnerwetter! Vat for fools have ve been! I alvays said dat de vorst policy in varfare vas having mercy on your enemies. Look down dere — and dere—and dere. See dose shmokes north and vest and south of us! Von, two, three, four, fife, six—yes, there are six of dem, and dey are all heading straight for de coast!

"You see vat dat means, Max? It means dat dose sailors dat ve vere so kind as to set free in de boats haf been picked up most likely by a varship, and dey haf told de story and she haf run into Fayal or somevere in the islands and telegraphed all up and down de coast, and dose chaps to the north and vest are de fellows dat haf been looking for us on dis side of de Atlantic, and dose down yonder are some ships of the African squadron, and by tam, dat yacht mit her infernal smoke vill guide the whole lot of dem right to de inlet! Tousand donnerwetters! vat are ve to do? De whole crowd vill be on us in little more as an hour."

"I don't see there ought to be any difficulty in running down to the yacht and telling her to steam right away down south," said Max, who had been using his glasses eagerly while Hartog had been coughing and spitting his words out as fast as he could. "I suppose Marcel has his papers all right, and if he does get overhauled they'd let him go again?"

Digitized by Google

"No, no, my friend," replied Hartog, shaking his head vigorously. "It is not so simple as dat. Dose fellows have sharp eyes and goot glasses, and dey know now dat ve have de only air-ship in existence, but Leo does not know anything about her. Now, if ve go down dey vill see us and recognise us as anarchists and de yacht too. Den dey vill blow him out of de water, and we lose some goot men and all our new guns and stores. No, dat von't do. Himmelsfluch! vat is to be done?"

"I see," said Max who had been thinking even more rapidly than Hartog had been talking, and saw that the moment had come for him to take the reins of command in a firm hand. "We must fight, or rather fight and run; there is nothing else for it, and if we don't act sharply we shall be in a mortal tight place. I'll do the fighting, you do the running."

As he spoke he gave a turn to the steering wheel, swung the Vengeur's head round towards the coast, and signalled to Taxil:

"Full speed with the three propellers."

The next moment the suspensory fans collapsed and fell down alongside the masts, the propellers whirled round till they looked like solid wheels, and the air-ship, supported only on her planes, leapt forward and upward, crossed the coast-line like a flash, and in five minutes was ten miles inland floating nearly five thousand feet above the desert.

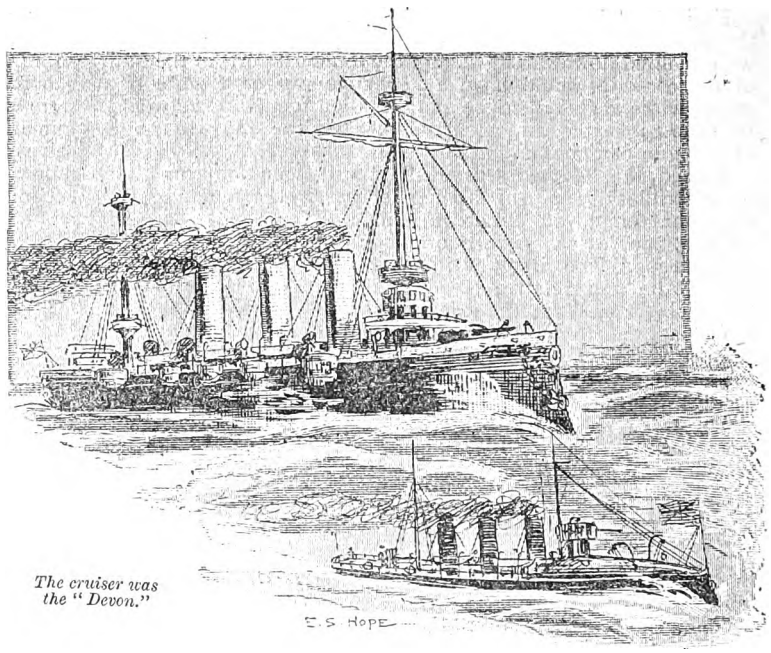
"Du lieber Gott!" exclaimed Hartog, for the moment forgetting all about the danger in his rapture of admiration. "Vat a glorious ship! I should scarcely haf thought dat an angel from heaven could haf done dat."

"That's a trifle to what you are going to see her do soon," said Max shortly as he swung the Vengeur round to the westward again, and sent a couple of signals to the engine-room. Then as the fans went up again and the Vengeur, flying forty miles an hour, sank swiftly down towards the landward side of the inlet he went on: "Now look here, Franz, this is what we've got to do. When we get ashore fill the entrance to the inlet with torpedoes that you can fire by battery——"

"Dey are dere all ready," interrupted Hartog. "You don't suppose I leave de door of mine house open, do you? If a cruiser was to try and get in dere dere vould not be many pieces of her to pick up five minutes after she had put her nose in."

"See dose shmokes north, and vest, and south of us."

"That's good," said Max with a short laugh. "Then you must have all the Bremen's guns trained so as to rake the entrance in case they try it with boats. Then you must take the Destroyer outside, run through and see if you can't take the attention of those fellows to the north and west off the Pilgrim. There's no fear of them catching you, of course, but there's just a chance that they haven't seen the Pilgrim yet, and if you show yourself boldly, send a shot or two at them just for pure cheek, and then run away and draw them off.



The cruiser was the "Devon."

"I'll go aloft again and reconnoitre and go for the first craft that looks dangerous. When we've got the Pilgrim in safely we must go to work and polish this lot off. It won't do to let any of them get away, for if they do we shall have a whole swarm down on us before we can clear out with the Bremen, and then there is no telling what the chapter of accidents might have in store for us."

"Dat is a goot plan, Max. Ve vill do it. Fortunately I haf had de Destroyer's bunkers and magazines filled, and ve haf plenty of torpedoes. I dink ve shall haf some fun dis morning, but for all dat I vould sooner be five tousand miles avay. Fighting dese cruisers is bad business. It is all vork and no pay, but perhaps aftervards ve shall be able to console ourselves mit a nice fat liner. Goot-bye now and take care of yourself. Mind you shoot straight and hit hard. Ve von't let any off dis time. Kindness may be goot morals, but it is tam bad tactics."

As Franz spoke the air-ship touched the water of the inlet, a boat came off and took Hartog to the Destroyer which was lying, as usual, with a full head of steam on. Before he had got on board her the Vengeur soared up again, sped on an oblique upward path over the land and then swung round to the north, and put out over the sea again.

The morning was now brilliantly clear and the surface of the sea was just ruffled by a cool pleasant breeze from the north-west. With the help of his glasses, Max, floating at the height of three thousand feet, could see everything of any size on land or sea, and what he saw to seaward was this. From the north and north-west two cruisers and two smaller craft were converging, apparently from different points in the Canary Islands, towards the coast.

The smaller of the two cruisers, the one coming nearly due south, was about twelve miles from the land, while the large cruiser and the two small craft were nearly twenty miles out. Five miles from the shore and about fifteen ahead of the single cruiser the Pilgrim was running along at about eighteen knots an hour, perhaps a knot faster than the single cruiser, with a considerable volume of smoke coming from her two funnels. Twenty miles to the southward of the inlet and about ten from the shore a large cruiser and a catcher were coming up, apparently under a full head of steam.

Therefore as the yacht was unarmed and had only her heels to trust to the odds against the Destroyer and the Vengeur were, numerically at least, simply overwhelming. The single cruiser was flying the blue and white naval ensign of Portugal with the crowned red shield in the centre. She was the Flores, an unprotected cruiser of three thousand tons, four thousand five hundred horse-power, and a speed of 19 knots under forced draught.

Digitized by Google

The big cruiser and her consorts were flying the tri-colour. She was the Cécile of 5,680 tons, 9,600 horse-power, and 20 knots speed, and the smaller vessels were the torpedo-catchers Aline and Rance.

The two vessels coming up from the south flew the white ensign of the British Navy. The cruiser was the Devon of 4,000 tons, 7,000 horse-power, and a speed of 21 knots, and her consort was no other than the redoubtable Ariel which had been put on the Cape Verde station to watch for her old enemy on the route of the Cape mail steamers.

Naturally the meeting of this formidable force was not a matter of accident. Hartog had been right in his guess. One of the boats of the Bremen had been picked up off Las Palmas in the Canaries by the Cécile, cruising with her consorts across the routes of the African and South American lines. The cables had been set to work immediately between the Canaries, the African coast, and the Cape Verde Islands with the result that the international squadron had started to rendezvous at Cape Bojador, and make a thorough examination of the coast north and south in the hope of finding some inlet used by the pirates as a refuge and hiding place.

Whether the air-ship had been discovered or not Max neither knew nor cared. Flying to and fro at a hundred miles an hour at a height of nearly four thousand feet, as he made his observations, it was very unlikely that he had been. He saw that the first trouble would be with the squadron to the north. By the time he had noted the position of all the hostile ships he saw the Destroyer, a tiny speck of grey on the bright blue water, clear the inlet and head away northward. This meant that the time for action had arrived, so he sent his men to the guns and bomb-tubes, and signalled to Taxil to reduce his speed to fifty miles an hour and descend.

(To be continued.)

DOCTOR DUBASSOF'S LOVE.

I.

DOCTOR DUBASSOF and Count Louis Klapka had passed their childhood together in the country, and though Dubassof's father was only a small peasant proprietor, and Count Louis owned the great estate of Luvin, their boyish friendship continued until both were in St. Petersburg, Dr. Dubassof as a well-known doctor, Count Louis as a young spendthrift officer.

By the time that Dubassof had become richer than he ever expected to be, Count Louis had become poorer than he had ever imagined. That is, although owning a splendid estate, he was often embarrassed for money, and the life he led at St. Petersburg with his young brother officers was calculated to relieve him of all his surplus revenue.

But he was so handsome, so captivating! Dubassof, who had known him from his soul, throughout all their joint lives, felt this as keenly as if Count Louis were a beautiful young girl whose charms had smitten him. He grumbled at Count Louis' extravagance, when, as the case often was, the Count had to borrow money from the doctor. Yet, he always lent it. Dubassof, moreover, hated to lend money.

One evening, Dubassof was waiting for Count Louis to come for him. The two were to go together to a dinner at the banker Neftel's—for Dubassof's associates were now chiefly of Count Louis' set, if not his class, and invitations poured in upon him, as the case usually is with a young man who has personal distinction, wealth, and a good presence; for although Dubassof possessed nothing of Count Louis' striking beauty, there was something in his deep and glowing eyes, his massive well-balanced head, that marked him. The clock had just struck the quarter when Count Louis' step was heard bounding up the stairs, his sword clattering after him.

"Punctual for the first time in your life," remarked Dubassof, as Count Louis dashed into the room as if it had been his own.

"More than punctual, George," answered Count Louis, throwing himself in Dubassof's own chair. "I was to be here at the half hour, and see, it is only the quarter."

"Then," said Dubassof, "you must have lost some money last night, and want an order on my banker. What a shame it is that with your estates you should ever want money!"

Count Louis laughed good humouredly. "Not quite that, my good George. I have not lost any money, but I need some confoundedly. So much so that I would do anything to raise ten thousand roubles. As for raising it at Luvin, my excellent father was only too successful in his efforts to put my estates beyond my reach."

"Ten thousand roubles is a considerable amount. Why do you want it?"

"Because with it I could make three hundred thousand."

Dubassof gazed at him earnestly, and then putting up his fingers blew a long whistle.

Louis repeated, "I must have ten thousand roubles, and you must lend them to me."

A tone in Louis' voice, different from any he had ever heard, struck Dubassof's ear. He did not in the least believe in the three hundred thousand roubles to be made, but he knew that Louis was frankly determined on the ten thousand, and he knew that he, Dubassof, would inevitably lend it him, considerable as the sum was.

"If it were to relieve your embarrassments, to pay a pressing debt, I would get it for you. But to put into some wild baseless speculation, I would not be justified as your friend in so doing. Naturally ten thousand would not satisfy you; if you made or if you lost, you would want more. The usurers take all sorts of risks, and even with the restrictions on your estates, they would supply you."

"I have not been to the usurers yet, but unless I get this sum from you, I shall certainly go to them," coolly remarked Count Louis.

Dubassof got up and moved restlessly about the room.

"George," continued Count Louis, "you have never heard me speak of making any money. I have not pretended to any talents that way, although I may be pardoned for saying that I have a very marked genius for spending it. If this required combination—the balancing chances—I would discredit my own judgment. But it is knowing the value of anything in advance of the rest of the world. Do you think Neftel a good financier?"

"Undoubtedly," promptly responded Dubassof, pausing in his aimless walk and facing Count Louis.

"Then Neftel told me this. Neftel will put a hundred thousand roubles into it, and is trying to raise more. Neftel got it from the Minister of the Interior. Neftel advises me to do anything in order to get ten thousand roubles together. He has none to lend. Every copeck he can raise between now and to-morrow evening goes into it."

Dubassof, whose mind travelled rapidly, saw at once the different aspect this put upon it; such transactions between bankers and Government officials were common enough. But all at once a grim suspicion pierced him. His black brows closed over his deep eyes, and he looked at Count Louis as if he would read his very soul.

"And this strange interest Neftel takes in you? Is it that Nathalie——"

He paused, unable to go on. The prospect that Count Louis should marry Nathalie Neftel staggered him. The brotherhood of so many years made a gallant fight against the overmastering passion.

Digitized by Google

Count Louis blushed like a girl.

"No," he cried, hurriedly. "Mademoiselle Nathalie's name was never mentioned between us. But you know Neftel remembers the day he came to me. I have always intended to return you something in kind," he said.

Dubassof's brow cleared a little, but, with a lowering face he folded his arms and looked fixedly on the floor. Count Louis rose too.

"Had I dreamed that you—would have thought——" he began blunderingly. He did not know what to say; only some small invisible link between the two men seemed to have snapped at that moment.

"It does not matter what I think," responded Dubassof, "I am a fatalist. It may be that both you and I are to love Nathalie. I love her already. But until that moment shall have come, we will be as we always have been. I have at Neftel's exactly fifteen thousand roubles. This sum I meant to buy a country place with. But if ten thousand, Louis, would save you from ruin, and even from temporary embarrassment, I would agree never to have a country place."

Count Louis stared as he listened. It was not like Dubassof to speak thus. There had been no need to utter their affection. Every action of their lives proclaimed it.

"Then it is mine," cried Count Louis, jumping up after a moment with a sudden return of the old unspeakable confidence. "George, have I not always paid you back?"

"Yes," answered Dubassof, good-humouredly.

Arrived at the splendid lighted house of the banker, the two friends entered the drawing-room together. On one side of the door stood Neftel, tall, pale, handsome, and on the other side his daughter, Nathalie Neftel. The daughter of a Polish mother, Nathalie Neftel had all the enticing beauty of these wonderful almond-eyed Polish women. Her face was lighted by eyes so softly splendid that all Poland could not produce a lovelier pair; and when she bowed to Count Louis, opening her fan of long black ostrich feathers, a rosy flush crept into her cheeks.

The two friends left the house together at midnight. Count Louis left Dubassof at his door, and then apparently turned into the direction of the barracks, but as soon as he was out of sight of Dubassof's door, he made another turning, and in a few minutes was again at Neftel's door.

Neftel was expecting him. Count Louis sat down gloomily. This borrowing of money, which had once been so easy, seemed altogether different now. He doubted whether in order to make three hundred thousand roubles he would use Dubassof's money. Neftel, however, standing up before him, cried out:

"All is in danger. Unless I can get fifteen thousand roubles more, it is impossible. Your friend Dubassof has exactly that sum deposited with me. Had I but known this an hour ago!"

He struck his hand against his forehead.

"I have done everything to raise money. Nathalie's dowry is secured, so that I could not, even if I would, get it. It would be no wrong to take that small amount from it. But this moment I have heard from the Minister that it must be a round sum of a hundred and fifty thousand roubles, or else it must be abandoned, and that the money or its equivalent must be in his hands before daylight. If twelve hours more were possible!"

Neftel stopped. His pale face worked. A born money-maker, the idea of losing so much for so little was intolerable to him.

"Dubassof has given me an order for——," Count Louis began in a cold voice.

"For the whole amount—the fifteen thousand?" cried Neftel in a tone more of entreaty than inquiry.

Count Louis remained perfectly silent. He had taken the order out of his pocket, and was looking at it with a strange expression.

Neftel, whose self-control rarely deserted him, rose and went to the other side of the hearth. He read the workings of Count Louis's mind, and he suspected the power of a certain lever.

"It is not all for myself," he continued, "my ambition has always been to make Nathalie the richest heiress in Russia. She is my life, my world."

"Nathalie's happiness can be no dearer to you than to me," said Louis, with a pale fixed face. "This order is only for ten thousand roubles."

"For Nathalie," the banker whispered. "Fifteen thousand,—for Nathalie—it is—my price."

The two men looked at each other. Count Louis took the pen in his fingers. With tightly compressed lips he altered the amount.

It was two o'clock in the morning, and Dubassof, sitting before the fire in his library, was just about to go to bed, when the door opened quietly and Count Louis walked in. Visits from him at all hours were not unknown to Dubassof, but when he saw Count Louis' face, he turned almost as pale as his friend.

Count Louis sat down and folded his arms.

"Dubassof," said he, "can you imagine the feelings of a man who in one moment has put his life, his honour, his fortune, in the power of another man?"

Dubassof gazed at him stupidly. He could not imagine what Count Louis was talking about.

"Because," continued Count Louis, "this is what I've done. I found fifteen thousand roubles was necessary instead of ten. You had written ten—I wrote fifteen."

Dubassof could not repress a cry of horror, of anguish, of rage.

"No one will know it," Count Louis continued in the same voice, "but you, Neftel, and myself. Neftel will conceal it, because I am to marry Nathalie."

Of the two men Dubassof was the more agitated. His dark skin turned a shade darker, he trembled in every limb.

"Oh! Heavens!" he cried, "to lose faith in man and woman is too much."

"Thus you see," said Count Louis with a frightful calmness, "it is quite possible that you should hold my life and soul in your grasp. You can easily prevent me from marrying Nathalie, but I am persuaded that she loves me. That you cannot rob me of."

As he spoke he rose with an air of triumph. He was a criminal before his judge, but there was one thing inexpressibly dear to him that the verdict could not affect.

The self-control of a life-time did not desert Dubassof all at once. He clenched the arms of the chair in which he sat, but he made no motion towards Louis.

"The money shall be returned within a week," said Count Louis rising. "But that does not affect things between us. What is done is done. I am going. Have you anything to say?"

"Nothing," Dubassof managed to gasp. He was stunned, overcome with the events of the last five minutes.

II.

ABOUT ten days after this, Dubassof, who had neither seen nor heard of Count Louis, was sitting in his library, expecting him. No sign had come from him, unless it was the depositing of fifteen thousand roubles to Dubassof's credit in Neftel's bank before noon of the day after their interview.

Yet Dubassof had expected him every hour, every minute since. He understood Count Louis too well not to know that he would brave his fate, and come boldly to face his former friend. It was now evening, about the time the two friends were accustomed to meet. Therefore, when Dubassof heard a step upon the stairs, he knew it was Count Louis.

He entered. Upon his face—once so brilliant and merry—the history of his fault was written. There was no cringing in his attitude. Dubassof, who had calculated everything, rose and extended his hand as if they were still friends. Count Louis responded.

Throwing himself into a chair, he said, "The three hundred thousand roubles are mine. Neftel has made enormously. To-day he is among the richest men in the Empire."

Digitized by Google

This made no impression upon Dubassof, although he loved money. He did not feel even a pang of regret that he too had not been allowed to share in the information from the Minister of the Interior. Avarice is strong, but love and revenge are stronger.

"The fifteen thousand roubles I have drawn from Neftel's bank, and with them I have the slip of paper upon which they were obtained," was his only remark.

As Count Louis revolved this in silence, his face grew paler and paler. He saw it all now. He would not have been surprised at any time, until the money had finally been withdrawn from the bank, to have been arrested at Dubassof's instigation; but the refinement of cruelty implied in Dubassof's words had not occurred to him.

"To keep it always?" Count Louis asked.

"To keep it always, unless——" Dubassof answered.

"Unless what?"

"Unless you promise not to marry Mdlle. Neftel."

Count Louis laughed,—a strange, mirthless laugh.

"You ask what is impossible."

"Wait until you have lived a year, knowing this to be in my possession."

"I know the force of your threat. But what would it profit you should she not marry me? She will marry neither you nor any other man."

The note of triumph in this chord infuriated Dubassof. His rage, however, was of a cold and deliberate kind.

"You esteem women more highly than I do. They talk much of their constancy, but it is chiefly in their imagination."

"I know nothing of the constancy of any except Nathalie Neftel. I have faith in her as I have in Heaven."

"Then you are not willing to buy this of me?" asked Dubassof, touching his breast.

"Not at your price," answered Count Louis. "Nathalie was the bribe offered me in the first instance. She has cost me too dear to part with her. I now go to her that I may tell her all."

It was not long before the announcement was made of the approaching marriage of Count Louis and Nathalie Neftel. Whatever Dubassof felt, no human being heard him express a word. He was as often seen with Count Louis as ever. Nathalie made one or two timid approaches in regard to the paper which she found he carried constantly about his person, but Dubassof was not to be drawn from his reserve.

One week before the day appointed for the wedding, a great dinner was given at Neftel's house. For the first time on that evening a vast dining-room with a ball-room over it was thrown open. A hundred persons sat down to table, some of them the most distinguished people in St. Petersburg.

Others were of the rank of life of Neftel and Dubassof, professional men, bankers, and merchants. Nathalie was radiant. Dubassof, who was among the number, watched closely the brilliant creature to find a trace of fear or nervousness. In Count Louis' face he saw the look of a man whose hold on happiness is insecure. But to the world he was the same gay, captivating Count Louis.

The dinner progressed with all the merry formalities of such affairs.

Towards the close, Neftel, whose face for once lost its saturnine expression, rose and said:

"In my country—in Lithuania—'tis the custom to drink the health of the prospective bride from her own dainty slipper. We will modify this custom, but we will not ignore it."

At this the servants presented to each guest a slipper of Bohemian glass, with the bride's initial on the top in gold These were filled with champagne, and then the long lines of guests stood up, amid gay confusion, to drink Nathalie's health.

But Dubassof, although he stood up, held a glass in his hand. He had no slipper.

"How is this?" asked Neftel, frowning and surprised, of the servant behind his chair.

"It is I—it is my fault," Nathalie cried from the other side of the table, where she sat in the centre of the line facing her father. "I am not entitled to any slipper, for I keep my own; this is our friend's; I made a mistake. Take this to Dr. Dubassof," she said to the servant, handing him a slipper foaming with champagne.

A little murmur at her ready tact went round. Both Neftel and Count Louis flushed with pleasure at the courteous way in which she had extricated herself from what might have seemed a rude and awkward position.

Dubassof, bowing low, received the toy and drank with the others.

This was the concluding ceremony of the dinner, and soon they all repaired to the drawing-room. A ball was to follow immediately.

If Dubassof had admired Nathalie's self-possession before he would have seen it fail somewhat then. For her eyes constantly followed him, and she seemed somewhat absent in her manner. But he could not notice anything. A strange drowsiness seized upon him. He had drunk more wine than usual, and that little glass slipper of champagne had been too much.

He spoke little to anybody, and presently Nathalie saw him disappear in the embrasure of the window. A divan, wheeled out of the way, was there. He dropped upon it, and in two minutes he had fallen into a heavy sleep, the long curtains concealing him.

It was some hours after this that he became imperfectly conscious of the rhythmic beat of dancers' feet over his head. He roused himself with an effort. By degrees his dimmed consciousness came back to him.

He pulled aside the curtain and saw himself alone in the drawing-room, where the lamps burned low and the candles in the sconces flickered.

Things came back to him. He was vexed and mortified beyond expression; but he was puzzled to know how the very moderate quantity of wine he drank should have so overcome him.

He tried to rise, and sank back weak and dizzy.

All at once the glass slipper of champagne he had received from Nathalie's hand came to his recollection. He thrust his hand into his bosom.

Yes, it was gone. He was cheated of his revenge!

He sprang up, neither weak nor dizzy now. The sound of the dancing had ceased, although the throb of the orchestra was still heard in the great suite of upper rooms. People were saying good-night; he heard the tramping of many horses outside, the shouts of the drivers, the opening and shutting of the vestibules, as group after group passed out. He stood erect, torn by the tempest within him.

And yet, in the midst of baffled rage and despair, something like relief crept in. Fate had placed in his hands an instrument by which he felt obliged to avenge himself on those two enemies, Nathalie and Count Louis. Yet these two, whom he would have crushed between the millstones of his wrath, had been dearer to him than anything on earth. He longed to have that little slip of paper back; he hated himself for being the dupe of a woman's slight, yet cunning, trick; but after all —it was not his terrible destiny to ruin Louis Klapka and Nathalie Neftel.

He waited in the drawing-room until he thought nearly all the guests had left. Then he mounted the broad stairs lined by weary footmen, and entered the splendid ball-room.

At the end, Nathalie and her father with Count Louis were receiving the adieux of the last lingering guests.

Dubassof advanced, and Nathalie, with the same wonder she had excited in him, observed his coolness and naturalness. For the triumph, the joy, the keenness of her success shone in her brilliant face.

Count Louis looked pale and agitated. He knew all, and the crisis unnerved him.

"Mademoiselle," said Dubassof, bowing low, "that your happiness is great I can well believe. Fate, which directs our destinies, decrees that you shall be happy."

Nathalie bowed deeply in return.

"I thank you. We thank you," was all she said. The sparkling of her eyes was as a star to Dubassof, and there was that singular feeling as if a burden had been lifted from him.

Digitized by Google

BEHIND the SCENES

"COME, Jeanne, do be reasonable, I have told you not to come here; I have told you several times. You know I am always nervous on first nights."

The handsome tenor took another survey of himself in the glass; then he turned to her, looking so noble in his coat of silver mail—he was to play Lohengrin—that Jeanne's heart bounded with pride and love. But her mad jealousy soon regained the upper hand.

"You shall not play to-night! You hear that? You shall not play with Carola. I won't have it! I won't have it!"

"Another scene! This is getting too bad," said her husband. "I am not in love with Carola. I don't fall in love with every woman I play with. What nonsense this is!"

"I don't care," continued Jeanne angrily. "I know she is in love with you."

"For Heaven's sake, do be calm! You will make me spoil my entrance."

"So much the better. I should laugh if I did." She laughed hysterically; then, suddenly becoming calm, she added coaxingly: "If you love your little wife, pretend you are not well and let us go home."

Victor shrugged his shoulders.

His cue was near. He placed the helmet on his head and walked firmly towards the stage. Jeanne threw herself upon him and clasped her arms round his neck.

"Don't go on to-night!" she cried desperately. "I know evil will come of it!"

Thoroughly exasperated by this mad action just at the decisive moment, he forgot himself and threw her violently from him; she struck her head against a wing as she fell, and remained unconscious on the floor. Victor just had time to notice what had happened as he strode on to the stage.

Jeanne remained unconscious for some time. When she came to herself it was to hear a round of applause—the triumph of her rival. She staggered to her feet and walked forward sufficiently to enable her to see on the stage. She saw her husband and Carola clasped in sweet embrace, the limelight playing upon them. They were such a handsome pair, and played so splendidly together that the audience were quite carried away with enthusiasm. Jeanne heard the occupant of a box call out: "What a handsome couple, they are made for one another!"

Jeanne could bear it no longer; she ran out of the theatre into the frosty air, quite unconscious of all save one thing, her mind filled with one thought only. "No, she shall not tempt him! I will save him."

Behind the curtain Victor and Carola still held each other by the hand. They had been called to the front three times and were doubtful whether to answer the calls again or not. The actress was more than ever in love with the handsome tenor, to whom she in great part owed this new triumph. Placing her arm upon his shoulder she fixed her eyes upon his as though she would fascinate him; then she nestled close to him and lifted her face to his so that her ruby lips were near his cheek. Victor's brain seemed to whirl, and for an instant he forgot himself: his lips touched hers. But it was only for an instant; the vision of Jeanne's pale face rose before him and brought him to his senses. If she had seen it! Her jealousy would be awful! He scorned himself for his momentary unfaithfulness and spurned the lovely, but unprincipled woman by his side.

He hurried away from her and went to the dressing-room. He looked about for his wife, but she was not to be seen.

"She saw us," he muttered bitterly. "Oh, fool that I was not to beware of that woman!"

He dressed quickly, made his way out of the theatre and jumped into a cab. The slowness of the vehicle irritated him; he was worried about Jeanne. Perhaps she had hurt herself badly as she fell. He had made no inquiries in the theatre. But he would certainly have heard of it. No, she had gone home, and he must be prepared for a terrible scene. He would soothe her, throw himself at her feet and ask her forgiveness.

Home at last! He ran upstairs and opened the door. He expected to receive a volley of abuse, but to his surprise all was quiet. The dark shade of the lamp concentrated the light on the table, leaving the rest of the place in comparative darkness; the tea was ready, and on looking round he saw his wife reclining on the couch. She was very pale, very grave, and her eyes had a timid expression, as though she dreaded his coming. The look in her eyes seemed to say, "Forgive me!"

It was very cosy and quiet in this room. His usual cup of tea was steaming in the urn, and the whole surrounding so different to the wearing, exciting life of the theatres with their make-believe, that his heart went out to his wife and he kissed her fondly, and murmured, "My dear little Jeanne."

She smiled sadly, without saying a word. She went to the table and poured out the tea, and he seated himself opposite her in his usual place. He was thirsty; it had been a trying evening in many ways and the aroma of the tea was pleasant. He drank the cupful right off although it was hot, and handed the cup to his wife to be filled again.

She did not speak, and he was rather worried at her silence; he knew that he had not behaved well to her that evening, in spite of her foolish ideas. Still, she would come round directly and all would be well.

His throat felt more dry now than when he came in. He drank off the second cup, and as he set it down he noticed the mad look in his wife's eyes—a look of triumph. He sprang to his feet, but was obliged to sink on to the couch. Everything appeared to be going round; his throat and stomach seemed on fire. He tried to cry out, but no sound came. He looked at Jeanne; he saw her eyes, wide open, fixed upon him with a glassy stare. He understood all now; she had poisoned him! He writhed convulsively; his thoughts went from Jeanne to Carola, then back to a reminiscence of his boyhood; he saw the will-o'-the-wisps which he had often watched in his early years. How they danced! They were coming towards him! Larger and larger they grew; great flames they were now; he felt the heat from them, they were scorching him, burning him! A great cry burst from his lips—then all was still!

Jeanne, who had at first recoiled from him, approached and kissed her husband when she saw that he was still, and knelt by the side of the couch. A great calm seemed to have descended upon her soul. There was no feeling of regret or remorse. She was filled with one thought, which made her happy. The poor overturned brain was capable of one thought only: "I have saved him from the temptress!"

The next day, not being able to get any answer, the people called in the police to break open the door. When they entered they found Jeanne in the same position, kneeling by the couch, and all they could get out of her was, "I have saved him! See how peacefully he sleeps!"

In the lunatic asylum, whither she was sent, she is regarded as a model inmate. She is always gentle and resigned, and performs the duties given to her in a scrupulous manner. It is only when her husband's name is mentioned that her expression changes. A strange smile lights up her usually expressionless countenance, and she says, "Hush! he is asleep. I saved him, and he is happy now. I saved him!"

"Ah!" said her brother, who told me this story, "she believes she saved him, whereas other people say she is mad. I wonder which is correct."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

WHAT AILED THE MAN IN 35.

I HAD just blown out the candle and crawled into bed. It was at the Lamb Inn, at one of the cathedral cities of England. My room was 34, and presently I heard a man bid the waiter good-night and enter 35, the next room. Ten minutes later, having fallen into a doze, I was startled by a tremendous racket in 35. The bell downstairs rang an alarm, peal on peal. Jumping from bed, I pulled on some clothes and rushed into the hallway. The landlady and two or three servants had just arrived. Together we entered 35, where we found a big burly man seemingly half choked to death. He was purple in the face, his eyes were staring and bloodshot, he wheezed and whistled, he went from chair to chair, he ran out into the hallway. I saw what ailed him. I gave him sal volatile and brandy, opened the window, and made the servants carry away the feather bed. In a little time he was better, but he wouldn't lie down; he spent the rest of the night in a big easy chair.

"It was that infernal candle smoke that did it," he gasped. "There was no extinguisher, and I got a whiff that set me going. I have always been subject to it. Sorry to be such a nuisance; I'll do now."

There are lots of people like him. Here is another, namely, Mrs. Eliza Mary Cantle, who lives at 4, Thorngate Buildings, Forton Road, Gosport. She says, "I was taken with shortness of breath, and for over two years I couldn't lie down in bed for fear of being suffocated. Something like a ball used to rise up in my throat and seemed to choke me. For years I sat up in bed propped with pillows, and got what sleep I could that way."

That was bad—very bad; and yet very common. You know what it is called, of course—asthma; substantially the same thing as epilepsy, catalepsy, hysteria, and that kind of spasms which end in making the body as stiff as though it were three days dead.

But what causes it? Can it be cured? you ask. One thing at a time. Let's first finish with Mrs. Cantle's experience. The beginning of that lies behind us—seven years or so—August, 1886. She began by feeling weak, nervous, and generally ailing. She had a bad taste in the mouth, poor appetite, headache, heaviness, and a sense of want of warmth and vigour in the stomach; and the looking-glass showed her that her skin and eyes were getting of a sickly yellow complexion. By and by matters were much worse with her. After taking even simple morsels of food she had pain in the chest amounting to agony. On this, she says, she became afraid to eat We can well believe it.

"Then," she adds, "I had dreadful attacks of giddiness, specks floated before my eyes so I could scarcely see, and I could stand only by taking hold of the furniture."

After this came the terrible time with the asthma—already described.

Her letter, dated September 20th, 1893, concludes with these words: "I was now very thin, and so feeble I had to keep in bed for weeks at a time, I was literally starving for want of food, yet didn't dare to touch anything solid. The doctor who attended me gave me medicines, but they did no good. At last a friend from Fratton told me how she had been benefited by Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. She brought me a bottle, and I began with it. In a few days I felt better than I had for years. My breathing was easy, and I could eat. I kept on with the Syrup, and was soon as well as ever. In my opinion this remedy saved my life. (Signed) Eliza Mary Cantle."

Very good. A noble result. Yet very natural too. Asthma is not a disease of the lungs, as some wrongly think, but is caused by the poisons of indigestion and dyspepsia entering the blood and prostrating the nervous system. And as the lungs, like all the other organs, are operated by the nerves, they fail when the nerves fail. Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup abolishes the cause, and the effect goes away with it. Don't forget it.

If the man in 35 had used the Syrup months before we met at "The Lamb," he wouldn't have scared the whole household half out of their wits.

Digitized by Google

FIFTY FAMOUS BOOKS AND THE LESSONS THEY TEACH.

"ALL SORTS AND CONDITIONS OF MEN" take ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"IN TIMES OF PERIL" fly to ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"PUT TO THE TEST" for fifty years ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THE AMERICANS," "FROM LOG CABIN TO WHITE HOUSE," "calkerlate" by BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET" is a judicious use of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"PETER SIMPLE" will act wisely by taking ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"CALLED BACK" by the use of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"DUTY," "THRIFT," and "SELF-HELP" point clearly to ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THE GIRL HE LEFT BEHIND HIM" but not his box of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"IN THE TRACK OF THE TROOPS" we find ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"A VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD" is risky without a box of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"LANDING A PRIZE" is swallowing one of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"GREAT EXPECTATIONS" realised these "HARD TIMES" by the use of ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"NICHOLAS NICKLEBY" would say "THE ONE THING NEEDFUL" now is BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THE WISE WOMAN," "MAID, WIFE, OR WIDOW" takes ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"BROAD SHADOWS IN LIFE'S PATHWAY" may be dispersed with ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THROUGH PRAIRIE AND FOREST" "FROM POLE TO POLE" take ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THE WORLD WENT VERY WELL THEN," after the introduction of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THE FAIR MAID OF PERTH" was "WILLING TO DIE" till "SHE" tried ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"ONE IN A THOUSAND" as an antidote is ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"PRECAUTION" says "Lay in a stock of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THE MYSTERY OF A HANSOM CAB" was due to ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"MY LIFE AND WHAT I SHALL DO WITH IT?" Enjoy it with the aid of ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"FROM POWDER MONKEY TO ADMIRAL" our seamen will have ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"RODERICK RANDOM," like other Apothecaries, would know the value of ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"NORTH AND SOUTH" "THE COURT AND THE COTTAGE" are supplied with BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"PILGRIM'S PROGRESS" favourably by using ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THINGS TO BE REMEMBERED," the effects of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THE MASTER OF THE CEREMONIES" is undoubtedly ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"WHAT WILL THE WORLD SAY?" "SECOND TO NONE" are ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THE OLD ORDER CHANGETH" since the advent of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN," every "NIGHT AND MORNING" takes ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"WITHIN AN INCH OF HIS LIFE" till he took ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE" and try... ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"AFTER LONG GRIEF AND PAIN" don't lose heart but try ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"MEN OF CHARACTER," "CONFIDENCE," "ABOVE SUSPICION" recommend BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"THE DAY WILL COME" when all the world will take ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 306.] FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 10, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON,

Hyson Green Works,

NOTTINGHAM.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

BORD'S PIANOS

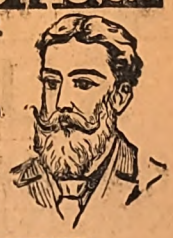
ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES, &c.

(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID

No. 1 Black
No. 2 Dark Brown
No. 3 Light Brown
No. 4 Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 Pure Golden
No. 6 Brodie's Hair Grower and Restorer



Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED).

J. BRODIE, 41 MUSEUM STREET, LONDON

Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

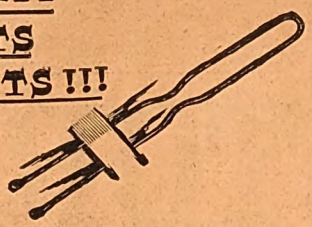
Digitized by Google

A HAIR PIN

WITHOUT POINTS

HAS GOOD POINTS !!!

SEE THE POINT ?



Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc., Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.
For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

For LOVERS and MOTHERS.

The New (No. 2) Design True Lovers' Knot

"MIZPAH" BROOCH.

The most popular piece of Jewellery in the World. Every purchaser delighted. Each Brooch Hall Marked, and in handsome heart-shaped plush case.

Silver, 5s.; Gold, 30s.; Post Free.

Engagement Jewellery a Speciality. Catalogue (618 Illustrations) Post-free.

MASTERS, Jeweller, RYE, SUSSEX.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."

EASY PAYMENTS.

WITH EXPRESSION STOP

ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.

Plays hymns, popular airs, quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, horn-pipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by any one. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30s. Terms 4s. deposit and 4s. monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.

Write for list of music and full particulars.

(Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER,
Organette Works, Blackburn.

TO ADVERTISERS

Wishing to reach families, a Test Advertisement in SHORT STORIES will bring profitable results. Scale of charges as follows :—

Front Page, £12 10s. per insertion
Back or Inside, £10 per insertion
Per Inch, 5s. per insertion ...
} Less 5 per cent. for 13 times.
,, 10 per cent. for 26 times.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. S.," 87, Strand, London. Mention SHORT STORIES.

FOREIGN STAMPS GIVEN AWAY !

We will give to every applicant for our large new Price List, &c., 30 Genuine Foreign Stamps; all different, including Transvaal, British Guiana, Kustend and Czernawoda, 2 Spain (baby king), Victoria Great Britain (I.R. official), 3 Cape Colony, 3 Canada, 4 Indian, 5 United States (including Columbus issue), the lot sent post free for 2d. Send 3½d. at once for our 32 page Illustrated Stamp Album, containing upwards of 1,000 full size engravings of stamps. Special offer—A Collection of 500 stamps, all different, for 5s. 3d.

JNO. GRAVES & CO.,
Stamp Importers, Bury St. Edmunds.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

WHITE'S "QUICKENER"

Will be found a perfect cure for Baldness. Thin Hair, and Weakly Moustachios and Eyebrows. Succeeds where everything else fails. 1s. 3d. per bottle, post free. ARTHUR WHITE, 34, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C. Used by Royalty.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" give relief, and a few more applications effect a cure

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.
Book on the Skin and Diet free.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES

Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 306.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 10, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

IT is Fourth of July in San Francisco, the Anniversary of the Independence of the United States. The clear, blue sky, like a mammoth bowl cut from one great turquoise and turned over the town, is a background for thousands of flags floating from the roofs of public buildings, and the windows of private patriots.

All the flags are big. Everything is on a large scale in California, the fruit that is exposed for sale, the great roses that enamoured youths are buying for their adored ones. The children are playing in the streets with mighty crackers, that make an explosion calculated to deafen one.

Large men, with ample ladies on their arms, may be seen in every direction. Immense baskets are being borne to the doors of their customers by grocers, butchers, and confectioners.

Immense suppers are to be given to-night, and many happy returns of the glorious Fourth will be drunk in rivers of champagne. Everything is on a large scale but the Chinese, whose small figures and alert movements are in marked contrast to the bulk and size of everything else on which the eye falls.

Yet little Washy-Washy balances on his head a clothes-basket that would serve him for a cradle, or in his kitchen—for he is a favourite cook with California housewives—stirs a pot in which he might easily be boiled himself.

In the arms of San Francisco sleeps Chinatown, the curious offspring of old China, of which Americans think that they know all that is to be known because they can visit the shops, and go into all the strange places, and, if they are in the humour, make themselves sick with an opium pipe among opium-smoking Chinamen.

Vain delusion! The secret soul of the Chinaman remains hidden here in China as in the Flowery Kingdom. No one will ever be able to guess what he thinks or how much he knows, how wicked he is, or how virtuous. I fancy that he is at once a great deal better and a great deal worse than we know, and that a learned and wise Chinee—who, by the way, does not usually keep a laundry—knows many things which would curdle the blood of our scientists and make their flesh creep, if he could be prevailed upon to impart them; but that he never will. The outside barbarian will remain in darkness for all his teaching. He will never be the schoolmaster abroad.

Fourth of July in Chinatown, though little the "haythen" would care for it, but that "Melicky-man" is his customer for fireworks about this time, and that thus the day adds good money to the hoard which he will at last spend in his native country amongst the tea-gardens and the pagodas, where, in his old age, he will catch insects to feed pet singing birds or fly curious paper kites, while his grandchildren watch him with reverence and listen to his stories of that queer place, America, as our little ones do to fairy tales.

But as gold is as mighty there in Chinatown as elsewhere, Fourth of July becomes important, and in the shops in which are sold all those packages and sticks and boxes, wrapped in paper of brilliant colours, the proprietors are on the alert.

Fourth of July. In his laboratory Lin Ham is at work, putting the finishing touches to material for the grand display, which is to be an unusually fine one, and to the work for several private exhibitions also.

Lin Ham is not an ordinary dealer. He keeps no shop. He executes orders for the favoured few. In each he puts a surprise—an invention for the day.

His are the curious boats, all made of coloured fire, moving on the water, apparently by means of a stream of fire at the stern, manned by little men in blue and gold and crimson, and all going off in a wonderful flash and whiz and splutter at last.

All Rights Reserved

Digitized by Google

In his laboratory, Lin Ham is at work.

His are those cylinders, which, rising into the air, discharge wonderful sprays and stars, and jewels skywards, while, at the same time, fiery little acrobats let themselves earthward by golden ropes, and only vanish as they touch the ground.

His was the great, green dragon that coiled and darted moonward, and wrote "July" across the sky before it changed into the flag of the American nation, which everyone so admired last Independence day.

Lin Ham has grown rich, it is said, and certainly his costume and his home indicate it. The table at which he is busy is full of his handiwork, his bronze utensils are highly decorated, he uses implements of gold and silver for some purposes. Everything about him is dainty. A screen, covered with curious devices, shields his doorway from the gaze of the curious; and across the middle of the room runs a bronze rod, from which swings what may be either a sign indicating his business or a charm to banish evil spirits, or, as one never knows what a Chinaman means, an invitation to the power of darkness to come to his aid. Below this, an opalescent lantern glitters in the sun.

At present something that smells very curiously is smoking and steaming in a queer fashion, in what looks like a little furnace, and Lin Ham, while still busy with his hands, twists his head about, and blinks up into the face of a tall man in a curious, theatrical costume, who stands with his bare arms folded on his chest, and looks down upon him.

"Such things are costly," he says. "I do not say that I have anything of the sort, but, if I had, you would not buy them, Min Toko."

They are speaking in Chinese, for Min Toko, though not a child of Chinese parents, has been brought up by them. You can believe the story that his father was a Russian and his mother a Tartar, when you look at him.

A little Chinese boatwoman took him from his dying mother's arms, and nursed him with her own, somewhere near those quarters where there are English warehouses, and the barbarian comes to traffic in tea and porcelain, and he starved and played and swam about with her own, and early in his boyhood came to San Francisco.

There he dwelt in Chinatown, and became renowned amongst the showmen of San Francisco for his acrobatic feats. To-night he is engaged to assist in a performance on the lawn before the mansion of Benson Blashfield, Esq.

Mr. Blashfield will have fireworks and a great supper, and the crowning feature will be the feats of Min Toko, who, amongst other things, throws a rope into the air, where it is caught by some unseen power, sends a kitten up its length until it vanishes from sight, sends a monkey to find it, follows himself, and draws up the rope after him, and ten minutes after is heard calling from the inside of a great lacquered box to be let out, and there he is indeed, coiled up like a great serpent.

Oh, there is nothing Min Toko cannot do, and no one ever discovered how he does anything.

Now he laughs.

"I know you have what I want, or can make it in a twinkling, Lin Ham," he answers. "As for money, I am richer than you think. Name your price. I have told you what I want—to kill a man without a knife or a blow or poison—to kill him so that it seems to be done by the hand of Fate; so that no one can suspect me."

"Is he a Chinaman," asks Lin Ham.

"He is an American," said Min Toko. "He has taken the woman I love from me. This rich man, to whose house I go to-night, has a daughter. I love her. You grin! Why not? I am handsome; I am no Chinaman; I am famous; I am a favourite with the ladies, and she smiled on me. You grin again. Of course, the rich man would say, No. I did not mean to ask the rich man. If she loved me, that was enough. I could spirit her away where they would never find us. That is what I meant to do."

"You are mad!" says Lin Ham.

"No," says the acrobat. "She could be won. She can be still, if I can kill this man."

"Do you mean her father?" cries Lin Ham.

"No. To-night they celebrate her marriage," said the acrobat. "To-morrow the bridegroom will take her away. To-night I must kill him. She will be a widow for awhile; afterwards, mine."

"It is the dream of a madman," says Lin Ham.

"Does that matter to you?" asks the acrobat. "I know that it was you who made the toy the rich tea merchant gave to his wife when he found she was false to him. The little bird that perched on her wrist and sang and bit her fingers like a real bird, and of the bite she died. I know it was you who——"

"No more reminiscences!" cries Lin Ham. "I admit that I have another toy that, with a slight addition, which I could make in ten minutes, would wipe your rival out of existence. But of what avail would it be? Rich American ladies do not marry such as you. Her relatives would kill you if you touched her hand."

"I have kissed it thrice when we were alone," says Min Toko. "Yes, I have kissed her hands three times. The next time it should have been her mouth. Let me kill this bridegroom so that she cannot suspect me, and it shall be yet. Look!" He thrusts his hand into the bosom of his tunic and draws forth a pouch. "See!" he whispers, piling bank-notes before Lin Ham. "How much for that toy?"

The eyes of the old man glitter. He gathers up the heap in his claw-like hands, and says slowly:

"This sum makes me have enough with which to return to China, and live there happy for the rest of my life. After all, what does one more dead barbarian matter! But I will tell you this: Unless you can make your rival take the toy in his own hands, it is useless."

"I can manage that," Min Toko replies.

The old Chinaman goes to a little recess in the room, before which hangs a beaded screen, and comes back, holding in his hand a curious kite.

"You fly it like any other kite," he explains. "When at its full length you begin to call: 'Come down, butterfly.' A butterfly descends the cord and flies away. 'Follow rose,' you say. A rose glides down the string and drops to ashes. 'Come down, pretty mouse,' you call next. The mouse descends and runs up your shoulder and is gone.

"Then you call for a blue bird, for a white bird, for a green bird, for a yellow bird. Thus it might end with the applause of the people. But let me work upon this kite ten minutes longer, and add one trifle more, and then there will be something else to see.

Digitized by Google

"Then you may call aloud: 'Come to me out of the sky, bright star.' And far above you may see a star shine, bright as any in the heavens. At this moment, he whom you wish to kill must hold the cord, and that star brings death. As it touches the man's breath life departs from him. Mark me well, the other things that come down the cord are innocent as drops of dew. The star is fatal."

"I understand," replied Min Toko. "Hasten with your work, Lin Ham."

A little later the old Chinaman puts into the hands of the younger man a paper box covered with shining roses, butterflies, and birds, and says to him:—

"Min Toko, the great performer, you have bought of me a pretty kite, which brings down from the heavens the birds of the air, and the flowers the spirits pluck. For all I know you may coax the stars down its cord also. It is well made. If any accident happens, that is the fault of others, not mine, I am not responsible."

"I absolve you from all responsibility, Lin Ham," replied Min Toko.

He throws about him a cloak that covers his theatrical costumes, and carries the box downstairs, where a carriage containing the paraphernalia used in his exhibitions awaits him, and is driven to Mr. Blashfield's residence. There they celebrate, not only the glorious Fourth, but a wedding.

Early in the evening, the rich man's daughter, Rosabel Blashfield, had been married to Mr. Arthur Ware, the son of another Californian magnate. There had been the usual reception, the usual display of gorgeous presents, a fine band has been playing, professional dancers have done their part, now they are ready for Min Toko and his performances.

The whole lawn is flooded with electric light, and, in mighty tents all decorated with roses, they are setting forth a feast. The bride and bridegroom sit upon a sort of throne that seems made of orange blossoms.

Tiers of seats, occupied by people in evening dress, surround the lawn, leaving an archway through which the performers enter. It is opposite the bridal throne; and, as Min Toko passes through, bowing and smiling, his eyes meet those of the bride, and he seems to give her special greeting.

Standing in the midst of the circle he begins to gather, from heaven knows where, white roses of which he makes a mighty ball, how, no one can guess. This he throws towards the throne. As it floats in the air and opens, forth flies a little pink Cupid who flings kisses abroad, and flies skyward and is gone.

Forth flies a little pink Cupid.

Thunders of applause follow this compliment to the bride, and then the little boy-in-waiting on Min Toko brings in the chairs, the tables, the fans, the wands, the boxes, and the show begins.

It is sufficient to say that the man seems to be able to overcome the laws of gravitation, to stand upon nothing, to fold himself up like a foot rule, to put himself in spaces that seem impossible; and to do all this gracefully, with beautiful accessories.

The star is upon Min Toko's breast.

The bride's eyes never leave him. Min Toko did not boast falsely. Though his position and residence in Chinatown seem to her to place him so far beneath her as though she were an empress and he a serf, she has always admired him intensely, and she knows that he is in love with her.

She has often wished that he were of her race and kind. He has been made a sort of pet amongst the Californians before whom he has performed, and he has had opportunities to speak a few words to her, and, as he said, to kiss her hand three times. To-night she feels that she bids him adieu; and to-night he fascinates her strangely.

When at last, as usual, he inquires if any two of the audience will assist him in some closing performances, she whispers to her bridegroom:—

"Come, Arthur, let us go."

And the young man replies:—

"Awfully bad form; but, if you wish it, of course."

It is a look that Min Toko has given her that makes her do this thing, and the bridegroom hands her down into the centre of the lawn, and they three stand together there.

"Will you be pleased to help me fly this kite, sir?" says Min Toko to the bridegroom as he flings into the air the thing we know of. "See, this is how."

The kite darts upward swiftly in a moment. Its brilliant breast is no longer visible. Only a long copper-coloured cord shimmers in the air from Min Toko's hand moonwards.

"Come to me, all ye butterflies"! he cried. "Come, come!" And down the cord sweeps a myriad butterflies and cover the performer's bosom and vanish.

"Little mouse," he cried. "Come, little mouse!" and whistles exquisitely. And the little grey mouse creeps down, sits on his shoulder, and is gone.

"And now, Sir," Min Toko says, with a bow to the groom and a smile to the bride, "if you like you may call a blue bird, and a white bird, a red bird, a yellow bird, a green bird, and after that one of the stars from heaven." And he puts the cord into the bridegroom's hand, who calls loudly:

"Here, you blue bird, come if you can!" And there is a blue bird; and amidst shouts of merriment, and while the bride claps her little palms and showers smiles about her, the birds of all colours come down.

Digitized by Google

The green bird has arrived and disappeared, when suddenly the bride puts forth her hand playfully, and snatches the cord from the bridegroom's hand.

"You shan't have all the fun," she says, with a pretty pout. "I intend to call the star down myself. Ah, how the cord pulls! No, you shan't touch it. I will do it alone. What do you say, Min Toko? 'Brightest star of heaven, come to me!' Is that right?"

She beams on him, and lifts her sweet shrill voice and calls aloud, and far up in the sky appears a great diamond star that shimmers and glows as it comes earthward. And, with one wild spring, Min Toko snatches the cord from the bride's hand, saying something that she only hears as he does so, and at the same time pushing her fiercely from him.

Then the star is upon Min Toko's breast, and he lies upon the ground, and the gaudy kite flutters down and lies beside him; and those who gather about him see that he is dead, with the fearful burn of electricity upon his bosom.

The kite must have attracted it, they say. Plainly, when he snatched it from the bride's hand, he saw that there was danger. Poor fellow! How brave! How noble!

All night the bride weeps bitterly, and when, in the morning, her bridegroom bears her away, she is still broken-hearted.

The words that Min Toko whispered as he snatched the fatal cord from her are still ringing in her ears. She will never repeat them to anyone, but she can never forget them. They were: "Adieu, my love! I die for you!"

THE CRICKET

I.

A PERFECTLY formed little person, with hands and feet a duchess might envy, a miniature woman, with the fresh but freckled complexion given by life in the open air, with two big liquid black eyes which made the hearts beat quicker of those on whom they rested—such was Noeline Farques' the miller of Espitos.

A rickety old house, built over the stream, quite alone in a forest of alders, leaning over on one side, the life of the old stones taken out of them by their veil of ivy, with huge piles underneath, which looked like crutches; resounding continually with a busy hum like a woman's constant clatter—such was Noeline's home, the mill of Espitos.

Although it was old, the mill had faithful customers; and although the miller was small, she had many admirers. Among them, the most devoted were Aristide Lariensec, a big, red-faced fellow, son of a neighbouring miller; and Jonanin Lacaze, a pale blonde, who was serving his apprenticeship in one of the most important shops of the town.

Aristide, the miller's son, hung about the mill, his pockets full of fruit, for the young miller. They sat before the millstone and ate them, while the iron wheel sang its rhythmic song as the water poured over it, and the flour fell white and silent, powdering everything round.

Jonanin, the apprentice, was less fortunate. He could only see Noeline on Sunday after Mass, when she went to the shop in the town to buy needles and thread. Then, indeed, Jonanin was flushed with pleasure.

He spread out before the eyes of the young girl his whole store of thread and needles, and they were a long time in choosing, for sometimes their fingers met as they turned over the merchandise.

Sometimes on Sunday afternoon, Jonanin had two hours to himself, and he went to fish in the stream of Espitos. He did not catch much, for the stream had fewer fish in it than any in the country; but Jonanin placed himself so that he could both watch the window of the mill and his float; he consoled himself for the immobility of the latter by what he saw through the former. At nightfall Noeline came to look for her ducks along the bank of the stream, and the pressure of hands which the lovers exchanged in the Sunday twilight was so sweet that Jonanin dreamed for nights about it.

The miller did not hesitate between her admirers. She preferred Jonanin. She hardly thought of anyone else. When she was with him she was perfectly content.

Therefore, the blonde Jonanin was authorised to pay his court to her. Noeline's mother invited him to come and eat chestnuts at the mill during the long autumn evenings.

But the first time he went a strange thing happened. The cricket which always sang on the kitchen hearth was suddenly silent.

"It is so singular," thought Noeline's mother, and the young girl turned pale.

And when the young man made his second visit the cricket did just the same. As soon as the young man opened the door, the cricket ceased his song.

Then Noeline's mother crossed herself, and the young miller clasped her trembling hands under her apron.

And each time that Jonanin entered the house the hostile cricket was silent, and if they listened carefully they heard a strange noise, an inexplicable scratching at the chimney, like a protest of the little insect.

Noeline wept abundantly; her mother was very unhappy.

Both of them, like most peasants, attached great importance to the song of their cricket They knew that one of these insects singing in the house assures happiness and prosperity to its inmates. If it was silent when Jonanin came, it was because Jonanin brought ill-luck. It was imperative that he should stay away.

Nevertheless, Noeline knew that her suitor was good, honest, and laborious; she seemed to read promises of happiness in his tender grey eyes; but the cricket would not agree. It would, perhaps, be dangerous to despise its warning; and when the tired youth came, with a beating heart and a voice broken by emotion, to ask Noeline's mother for her hand, the mother was grave, and the young miller could hardly be kept from sobbing aloud behind her apron. Jonanin was refused. They did not give him the true reason. It would have pained him too much to learn that he would bring misfortune to any house he entered.

The mother found plausible reasons to give him, and Noeline went out to conceal her sorrow. She sat down near the millstone in the dilapidated mill, listening to the drops of water as they fell on the big iron wheel, and when she heard Jonanin shut the door and pass out among the alders, and along the bank of the stream murmuring to himself, it seemed to her that her heart had stopped beating, and she prayed to God aloud, as if she was afraid she should die.

The following week Jonanin left the country. With his clothes tied up in a little bundle he went away at dusk, when the last leaves were shivering on the trees. He went through the alder woods and along the bank of the little brook of Espitos. The young miller saw him come, and she stood motionless before her mill.

Digitized by Google

"Good-night, Noeline," he said slowly.

"Good-night, Jonanin," she replied, dropping her eyes.

Then, as he went on, she ventured to ask:

"Are you leaving the country?"

He seemed to stagger on the leaf-covered path.

"Yes, I have found a place at Orthez."

She said nothing. Her fingers played with the little silver cross which hung about her neck, and with troubled eyes she watched Jonanin until he disappeared among the deepening shadows of the forest.

II.

A small, thin person, with hands and feet like those of a skeleton, looking as if nature had begun to make a woman and failed, but with two, big, black eyes much younger than her face, such was Noeline Farques, the miller of Espitos, twenty years after the departure of Jonanin Lacaze. Women in the south fade early. The mill, older by twenty years, and showing it, still stood across the stream, keeping erect by the aid of some additional crutches, and its tic-tac was just as joyous as when it was new.

Noeline had never married. After Jonanin went away no other lover could touch her heart. Aristide Lariensec, who who had loved her with a passionate, jealous love, had been refused like the others. The young man, long inconsolable, had married at last. He never came to see Noeline except to sell his grain. They had doubtless both forgotten the fruit they used to eat beside the millstone, where the flour fell white and silent, powdering everything round.

Jonanin had never come back.

Many and many a time Noeline had walked along the border of the stream with the hope of seeing him again. She thought of him every day; and every night when the cricket sang she dreamed melancholy dreams before her sad hearthstone, until her rushlight died out.

Alas! Orthez was so far off. People from Espitos never went there. At the shop in the town they had no news of Jonanin. What had become of the youth with the blonde hair? Sometimes, when her old maid's soul was sadder than usual, Noeline prayed for him, but little by little the beating of her heart grew cold and monotonous.

One night Noeline, who was forty-two years old, was waiting for Lariensec, the former rival of Jonanin. He was coming to discuss the price of the maize he wished to sell her. The miller had offered twelve francs five sous a sack. The farmer asked ten sous more. It was nearly nine o'clock. Noeline, standing on the threshold of the mill, saw someone coming.

"It is not Lariensec," she thought, "he would not come by that path."

The man had a wooden box on his back, he walked slowly, seemed tired, and looked at the stream and the trees and the mill as a stranger might.

"Good evening," he said, stopping. "Would you like to see Notre Dame de Lourdes?"

"He is a Béarnaise or a Bigourdan hawker," thought Noeline.

"My poor friend, it is rather dark to see your Virgin."

But as the merchant had a gentle voice, and as the intercession of the Virgin might induce Lariensec to sell his corn at twelve francs five sous the sack, Noeline said:

"Come in, I will look at the Holy Virgin by the light."

And the merchant entered. When Noeline could see him she felt the blood rush to her thin cheeks, and when the hawker had seen her face he seemed equally astonished. And in a plaintive voice he asked:

"So you are still here, Noeline?"

"Ah! good God!" said the miller, feeling her heart beat as it had not done for years; "is it possible that it is you, Jonanin?"

And for a moment they were silent. Then suddenly, behind the warm hearthstone, they heard the shrill chirp of a cricket.

Noeline felt in her eyes a warm moisture like a gathering tear.

Jonanin told his story. He had been successful at Orthez. He had married, had children, had a shop of his own, and was prosperous and happy. But after all these years the desire to see his old home had seized him, and for the sake of economy he had come, like a Béarnaise hawker, selling needles and thread on his way.

"Oh, I was sure you would succeed, Jonanin," sighed Noeline.

The cricket in the chimney went on singing. The woman seemed almost overpowered by her increasing emotion.

"Then why," stammered Jonanin, "will you tell me, Noeline, why you would not be my wife, twenty years ago?"

At first she could not answer; she pointed to the chimney as if half-ashamed, and would have been glad to hide her head in her apron, as she did when she was young.

"It was the fault of the cricket," she stammered.

"Of the cricket?"

"Yes! I was foolish. I thought you would bring me misfortune. The cricket stopped singing when you came to see me."

"He stopped singing? Why?"

Noeline shrugged her shoulders in sign that she did not know. They both stood silent, dreaming, and they dared not look into each other's eyes by the light of the smoking resin.

Very soon, Lariensec, the farmer, entered.

"Good evening, good evening," he said, after the peasant fashion, saluting as many times as there were persons in the company.

And when he had recognised the former shopkeeper—"What Jonanin! You here. What are you doing here?"

"I come to talk over old times. It does one good at our age."

"Ah, yes, the old times!" said Lariensec. "I remember that you were to have been married, you and Noeline."

"Certainly!" replied the miller.

"And do you know what kept us apart?" asked the merchant, "a cricket."

"Bah!" exclaimed Lariensec. "In fact, I seem to remember——"

He burst into a loud laugh.

"Ah! It was too good!" said he, "too good!"

Then, seriously:

"Bah! you are happy are you not? Both happy? We are all happy here; so we may confess our little peccadilloes of other days! Ah, that one was too good! Do you know, Jonanin, why the cricket did not sing? We are all friends, you know, old fellow. Well, it was because I was watching you; I scratched in the chimney there, on the side next our field, when you came to pay your court. Ah, other people loved Noeline, too, and other people were furiously jealous!"

Then, seeing that his revelation was coldly received, and that Noeline looked at him sadly, he resumed generously.

"That is not all; I come to tell you that I accept your price for your corn; twelve francs five sous the sack. Does that suit you, Noeline?"

And Noeline, in a low voice, replied:

"That suits me, Lariensec."

Then the farmer bought some spools of thread from the merchant from Orthez for his wife, and paid without bargaining.

"Good evening, good evening," he said, going out.

And the two old lovers were left alone.

They did not say much to each other. Jonanin slowly put up his merchandise, Noeline watched him, unconsciously turning over the little silver cross, which she still wore, with her bony fingers. For one despairing moment she was perhaps tempted to press her lips to Jonanin's hair, once blonde, now turning grey; but she restrained herself; her virgin lips were ignorant how to give such a kiss.

"Well, good-night, Noeline," said the hawker, lifting his box to his back.

"Good night, Jonanin!"

They awkwardly pressed each other's hands and parted.

He took the path through the woods on which the moonlight fell; she standing on her threshold watched him go, while in the chimney the cricket sang in the sad night, sang with a calm, clear, untiring voice, as if he wished to tell Noeline of all the happiness that might have been.

Digitized by Google

WE were sitting on the deck of the Konigin Carola, gliding down the Elbe from Dresden to Weissen. Rogers was in a communicative mood, and was entertaining me with some good stories.

Here is one of them.

"When I first entered the Academy of Arts in Dresden I was a boy of nineteen, and a stranger in the land. If it hadn't been for certain good friends of mine who furnished me with introductions, I might have fallen into the hands of the enemy, and fared badly. However, as it was, I soon found myself on my feet, and before I had been six weeks away I had forgotten homesickness and everything else, and was indulging in a rigorous form of hero-worship. It came about in this manner.

"There are lots of young moneyed Englishmen always drifting about the Continent, and I suppose if they are not stranded in Paris at the first overture, they come on to Germany, and thus eventually to Dresden. At any rate, Bruce Holderness was one of these, and it was he to whom I had attached myself, worshipping from afar at first, and gradually admitted, step by step, into the circle of his friends. He was worth my homage then, and I think it was well for me that he accepted it as he did in his kindly, manly way. For the fact that he was extravagantly wealthy, and above the average in good looks and physique, I cared not a pin; it was the gentle manner, the true, noble heart, that brought me to his feet. What was I? A penniless art student, a dull fellow in any man's society. Yet he treated me as an equal—no, more, as a friend. He had a taste for art, it appeared, and he used to come down to the Academy every morning and work away industriously for pure love of the thing. However, one morning I caught him staring out of the window with a wistful expression, and his half-finished study of a classic subject tumbled into a corner. I asked him what it meant.

"'My friend,' he said, 'I have been fighting unsuccessfully with the desire to take up my palette and go and have a shy at landscape. The antique is all very well; but I am but mortal, and these classic beauties cloy the appetite. Give me just one hour down the river.'

"Now, curiously enough, this was just what had been bothering me, for though I am a plodder, I have my flights at fancy at times, so you can imagine how I jumped.

"'Put yourself into my hands,' I said, 'and light the fire with your picture, for I know the very place.' Half-an-hour later we were steaming gaily away down the stream.

"The very place was the Schonegrund, and, of course, Holderness was delighted. We stuck up our easels under the willows—the trout were rising like fun, by the way—and daubed to our hearts' content. There is a big farmhouse on the crest above the valley, and so, after we had painted our very souls out, we went up there to get a drink. Holderness thumped boldly at the door, and the person who opened it was Gisela Lichtenstein.

"You can have no conception of how beautiful she looked as she stood in the doorway. You would have thought that she was a princess. I felt Holderness give a sort of gasp—I say felt, because I was staring like an owl myself. However, he recovered himself at once, and took off his cap to her like a gentleman; and, as a matter of fact, I believe she was every whit as impressed with his looks as he was with hers.

"Well, we quenched our thirst with good Culinbacher beer, while the princess looked on and answered all Holderness's remarks in her Saxon dialect, and I never thought it pretty until then. I think we should both have stopped there for ever if the last boat hadn't been nearly due, and we had to be off. After we had scrambled on board I happened to look at Holderness's face, and I saw him gazing back at the Schonegrund with a look so different to that he had worn in the morning that it startled me. I wonder whether it really was undiluted nature he was pining for. Now I come to think of it, I don't believe it was.

"I suppose, knowing my susceptible nature as you do, you will think it very odd when I tell you that, after all, I didn't fall in love with the girl myself, but it is the sober truth. The annual exams came off a few weeks later, and whether it was want of leisure or not, I can't say, but except for a passing thought that she was worthy the canvas of a Titian, the Venus of the Schonegrund went clean out of my head. But presently I began to notice something.

"Up to that time Bruce Holderness had been as indefatigable in his exertions in the school as anybody; but, lo! little by little he dropped away. Morning after morning he would come, fiddle about with chalk and crayon for ten minutes, and then bolt, before I could get in a question as to the reason. I used to see him go along the terrace, and he always went in the same direction. At last I asked him point blank for an explanation, and to my amazement he blushed like a school-girl, said he had a sketch to finish out of doors, must take it before the weather changed, no time to wait, and hurried off.

"I was foolish enough to be first hurt, then terribly jealous, and at last, one morning, after the usual flight, I could stand it no longer. As soon as he had taken his hat I seized mine and crept after him. He was just buying a steamboat ticket at the kiosk by the pier, and forthwith I followed his example. I didn't, of course, know where he was going, but I saw him march on board the Meissen boat, and took my billet for that place accordingly. He went forward without looking behind him; I sneaked down into the stuffy cabin and hid there with many twinges of conscience, for I knew I was doing a cowardly and a mean thing.

"When the boat stopped at Kemnitz, Holderness stepped ashore, and not until that moment did a suspicion of the real facts of the case come before me. As I watched him turn up the lane to the Schonegrund, my memory travelled back to the vision in the doorway, and everything seemed to flash into distinctness. No! It was no sketching fit that could bring him here secretly time after time, and make him flush when I questioned him. Bruce Holderness was in love.

"This discovery, overwhelming as it was, did not prevent me making my way up the road that he had taken, though I kept a long way behind—so far, indeed, that I lost sight of him altogether. At one side of the valley a footpath runs along the side of the hill, hidden by a dense growth, and winding here, there, and everywhere, until, with a sudden dip, it lands one at the very edge of the stream. I took this path on account of its seclusion, for it was not the nearest, and walked on until an abrupt turn and the murmur of voices brought me to a standstill.

"Barely a dozen feet below me, on the wooden plank that spanned the stream, stood Holderness and the princess. His arm was round her, his face bent to hers—no need to ask further proof of his condition. As I looked their lips met, and I heard my friend murmuring amorous nothings in the vilest of villainous German.

"Well, I know, I was an eavesdropper, but I was afraid to stir. Presently the two seated themselves on the bank below me, hand in hand, and Holderness opened the conversation.

"'But you know, my Gisela,' said he, using the familiar du, 'I will arrange everything. A licence? Surely money can buy that here, as elsewhere. A trousseau? Wait till you are mine!'

Digitized by Google

"'I am so terribly afraid,' said the girl with a sigh. 'Am I not betrothed to Conrad Meyer before all the world? How can you gainsay that? And then think what my father said when you spoke—I tremble at it still. The very next day he told Conrad all, and—well, you know. We are betrothed—there was a notice in the Zeitung, and, oh, heart's beloved, but I hate him!'

"'My darling!' said Holderness, 'when you are my wife we can snap our fingers at Conrad; and, as for the Herr Lichtenstein, he will forgive you even marrying an Englishman if you do but look half as sweetly upon him as you look now at me.'

"From their attitudes after this speech I judged that there was no fear of disturbing them, and turned away sharply, feeling as if I had desecrated a sanctuary. As I turned a hot breath fell on my cheek, a hand gripped my arm, and someone half dragged me up the path, out of earshot. Then he freed me, and I saw a big tow-haired German scowling down at me.

"'Another pig of an Englishman,' he said. 'Do you know that man yonder? You do? Then look here—here,' glaring at me with bloodshot eyes, 'I am Conrad Meyer, and I will kill him.'

"'No, you won't,' said I, 'not if I know Bruce Holderness. More likely he'll kill you.'

"The fellow snarled, but I think he was a bit taken aback by my answer, and I went on my way unmolested. I had little sleep that night, for the vision of the big German menacing my hero danced before my eyes, and my own dishonourable action had tied my tongue. However, the time went on, and Holderness still made his daily appearance at the Academy, though after that I saw little of him. Thus a fortnight passed.

"One evening I was sitting in my little bedroom, under the roof, when I heard someone scrambling up the stairs. It was a pleasing economy of our landlord to burn no gas there, as I knew only too well, and picking up my candle I ran out to help my visitor to the landing in safety. The light fell upon the face of Holderness.

"He was deadly pale, and over one cheek a red streak trickled slowly. I knew before he opened his lips how it came there.

"'Holderness,' I cried, 'what has happened?'

"He came into my room and sank into a chair while he told me the whole pitiful story. I needn't go over the incoherent explanation he gave concerning the facts I knew already; and, indeed, if I hadn't had my own knowledge to draw upon, I could hardly have understood him. But the rest, as far as I could gather, was simple enough.

"On that very morning he had planned that this wedding should take place, had procured his licence, and prepared everything for the event. Gisela was to meet him at daybreak on the plank bridge across the Schone, and together they were to make their way back to Dresden for the ceremony. Just as they greeted one another at the trysting-place in the grey light of what was to be their bridal morn, a figure stepped out from the bushes, knife in hand, and threw himself upon them. I think my friend would have kept his temper and disarmed the man, who, of course, was Conrad Meyer, if he had not let fall the foulest abuse upon Gisela as she stood cowering by. That was sufficient.

"'How it came about,' said Holderness, 'I cannot tell now. I only know that I was mad with fury, and I remember snatching the knife from his hand—he struck me with it here before I took it—and thrusting it into him as we struggled together. His grip relaxed almost immediately; everything seemed to swim before my eyes; and the next moment I saw a set, white face staring up at me from the water, and a look in Gisela's eyes that told me I was a murderer. I threw down the knife and went towards her, and she drew back with a look of horror, such as I pray you may never see in the face you love. Then I knew that I bore the brand of Cain indeed. I tore away from the spot like a madman, and now I am here to say good-bye. They shall not drag the whole story up at my trial, for by to-morrow I shall be across the border.'

"'And she?' I said.

"'I shall never see her again,' he said. 'But, at any rate, she is free from that demon. No, the truth will be proved, for from what I know there were witnesses to the whole. And now, my friend, I must say good-bye, for the arm of the law is long.'

"He wrung my hand without another word, and then the door closed and he went away into the night. From that time to this I have never set eyes on him; but though it is years ago now I think I could still pick him out from among a thousand.

"The story might well end here; but there is a sequel to it, which is, to my mind, as tragic as all the rest. You may imagine how anxiously I scanned all the papers for long after that, expecting every time to see some account of the affair, and how mystified I was as the weeks went by and not a word appeared. At last, more than a year afterwards, I made up my mind to revisit the Schonegrund, though there is no denying that I looked upon the place with horror. However, I took the boat as before, and walked up the by-path to the plank across the stream, and there stood looking down into the water, with the thought of what it had once seen. I suppose I was too deep in my reverie to notice the sound of approaching steps, and it was not until a heavy foot made the little bridge tremble that I became aware of them. As I live, there stood Conrad Meyer.

"He broke the silence with an ugly laugh.

"'Why,' he said, 'it is the little Englander! Has he come to the stream that would have drowned me?'

"I was so dumfounded that I couldn't say a word.

"'Come,' he went on. 'There was much truth in what you said that day, and I bear no malice. The only thing was, the Schweinhund, who has fled, would not hit hard enough. But you meant well, and if you like to come with me the Frau Meyer shall bring us a bottle of wine to drink your very good health.'

"'The Frau Meyer?' I stammered.

"'Born Lichtenstein,' he answered coolly. 'She makes a good wife, the dear Gisela, but somewhat quiet for my taste ——what! You won't come? Well, then, good morning.' He turned slowly on his heel and walked up the valley whistling, as placid as if the wreck of a life were an incident too trivial to be remembered. As for me, I left the Schonegrund more troubled than when I entered it."

Rogers stroked his moustache thoughtfully.

"And do you mean to say that she married that man after all?" I asked.

"I fancy it was not from choice," said my friend. "Who knows what pressure might not have been brought to bear while Meyer lay apparently at the point of death?"

OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS. PRICE SIXPENCE.

PEARSON'S LIBRARY.

A COMPLETE NOVEL FOR SIXPENCE.

No. 2.

"The Adventures of an Ugly Girl,"

By Mrs. GEORGE CORBETT.

Illustrations by Messrs. RAYMOND POTTER and GEORGES MONTBARD.

NOW ON SALE.

A Reprint of No. 1, "A GIRL WITHOUT A NAME," has been prepared and can now be purchased.

THE SUCCESS OF THE SEASON. PUBLISHED MONTHLY

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," etc.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomia Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

Franz Hartog—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

Sir Harry Milton—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

Herbert Wyndham—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

Frederick Austen—the inventor of the Utopian air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Miller, three other Utopians.

Violet Milton—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is terribly injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

Dora Merton—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

Lucy Summers—another fair Utopian.

Max Renault in the air-ship joins Hartog in the Destroyer, after the latter has destroyed a fleet of war-ships convoying Atlantic liners. They are discovered in their hiding-place by a combined fleet of British, French, and Portuguese cruisers, who follow the Pilgrim, a steam yacht bringing war and other materials for the Anarchists.

CHAPTER XVII.

The "Vengeur" in her Element.

Max saw at a glance that the Destroyer was heading out north-west on a course that would bring her into collision with the French Squadron first. A moment's thought showed him that this was bad tactics, and so, as the Vengeur swept along on her downward course, he swung her round to the southward and dropped almost to the surface of the water, within a hundred yards of Hartog's craft. The engineer saw the air-ship coming, and ran his boat close up to her.

"Keep a due north course until you sight a single cruiser that you'll find up there," shouted Max, as the two vessels came within hail of each other. "Go for her first, and stop her, if you can. Out yonder to the north-west there's a big cruiser and two torpedo-boats, or catchers, that may have a high speed. Leave them to me, for the present. Speak the Pilgrim as you pass, and tell her to run in as fast as she can and lie close. Good-bye; I shall depend upon you to stop the cruiser."

"I'll do dat! don't you fear," shouted Hartog in reply, waving his hand as the Destroyer gathered way again and shot off to the northward.

By this time the glasses of the officers on the bridge of the Cécile had picked up the Vengeur on her downward flight, and as Max mounted into the air again he saw the two catchers, both of which had a speed of over thirty knots, shoot out from under her side and steam away at full speed for the coast.

"Ah," he said to himself, "that's the game is it! I suppose you've seen me as well as the smoke from the Pilgrim, and so you think she belongs to us, and you'll try and head her off. Well, we'll see about that."

As only about ten miles now separated the Aline and the Rance from the Pilgrim, twenty minutes would suffice for them to run actually alongside of her, and less than that to get within range. The Cécile, steaming her best, came ploughing along in splendid style after her two scouts, and Max knew from what he had seen a couple of nights before, that she only needed a mark to fire at to vomit forth storms of shot and shell which would crumple the Pilgrim up as though she had been built of paper, and send her to the bottom in a few seconds.

He sent word to his men to stand by the guns and the bomb-tubes, and signalled to the engine-room for forty miles an hour. Then continuing his downward course, he made the Vengeur describe a wide spiral curve and checked her speed a thousand feet above the Aline, which was steering the most southern course, and so would be the first one to cross the track of the Pilgrim.

He observed with a grim sardonic sort of smile the manifest consternation that was visible among the sailors and officers on the deck of the Aline, as they saw her strange foe coming so suddenly to close quarters.

A thousand feet is only a little over three hundred yards. Allowing for the distance that he kept the Vengeur astern of her, five hundred yards would measure the range of fire between the two vessels. The elevation was so great that none of the machine-guns on board the Aline could be brought to bear upon him, but within a few seconds a score of men appeared on her deck armed with rifles which they raised in the direction of the air-ship.

"You idiots!" he laughed. "Do you think you're going to wing a bird like this with pop-guns like those?"

Then putting his mouth to the speaking tube that ran down to the forward gun-room, he said:

"Ready with the Maxims—Fire! and keep it up while there's a man on her deck."

Almost at the same instant the harsh grinding rattle of the machine guns reverberated through the air-ship, and two converging torrents of bullets rained down upon the decks of the devoted Aline. From stem to stern they riddled her as though her deck had been made of cardboard. Some half-dozen of the rifles were fired at once, but that was all.

The gallant fellows who held them hadn't even time to pull the triggers twice before the leaden hail struck them down, and the bullets, after passing through their bodies, tore holes in the decks and penetrated to her inmost recesses. Deck and bridge were alike swept clear by the storm of shot, and before the fire had been kept up a couple of minutes there was no living soul to be seen on board her. Then Max signalled for a little more speed, and as the Vengeur ran up over the catcher he called down another speaking tube:

"Ready with the bombs. Now, let go," and at the same instant he signalled to Taxil, "Full speed."

The Vengeur leapt forward and upward like an arrow, and as he looked back he saw a cloud of steam and smoke on the water, and that was the last that was seen of the devoted Aline.

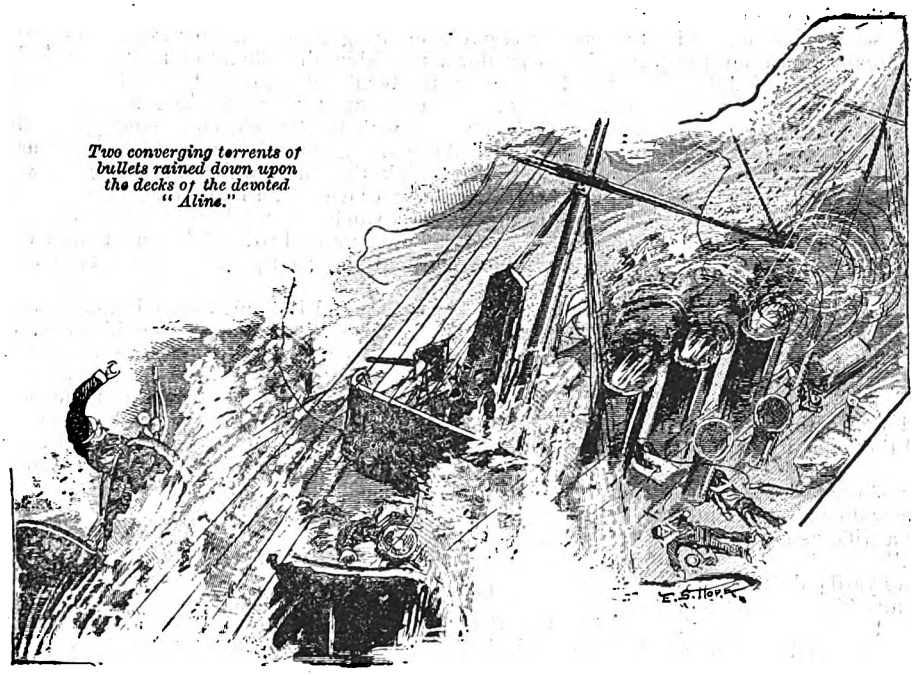
The "Cécile."

Digitized by Google



Two converging torrents of bullets rained down upon the decks of the devoted "Aline."

"One disposed of!" he laughed to himself. "This is the very devil's own style of fighting. I wonder what the poor beggars thought of it."

Then he called down the tubes:

"Bravo boys, that was excellently done! Now we'll go and talk to the other one. Stand by, and be ready."

Then once more the Vengeur swooped round, described a wide three-quarter circle, and placed herself a mile ahead of the rapidly advancing Rance.

"Ready with the Nordenfeldt!" he called down the after-tube. "Stand by to fire on the word. Get the range, and keep it."

A rapid signal went to the engine-room, and the Vengeur slowed down till a second signal told Taxil that she was relatively stationary to the catcher.

"Ready—Fire! and keep it up until I tell you to stop."

Then, with a grinding roar, the Nordenfeldt spoke, and, from an elevation of fifteen hundred feet, at a range of two thousand yards, a hail of shells swept down on to the helpless Rance. The first discharge flew a trifle wide and ploughed up the water a dozen yards from her side, but a moment later the aim was corrected, and then her decks seemed to curl and crumple up, her funnels were smashed into shapeless masses of iron, her bridge collapsed, a brief, sharp roar, and a rush of steam told that her boilers had burst, and, in twenty seconds she sank beneath the smooth, shining water, her plates torn asunder and riddled like sieves under the impact of the exploding shells.

"Well done, Nordenfelt!" called Max down the tube. "But be more careful with your aim at first. That's a good gun," he continued to himself, "and those shells of Hartog's are the very deuce for tearing anything up. I shall keep that pop-gun, I think. Now I wonder what Franz is doing?"

"Half-speed ahead," he signalled to Taxil, and the Vengeur shot forward at sixty miles an hour towards the coast. Then the bell rang "quarter-speed," and Max put his glasses to his eyes. As he did so the boom of a gun came up from the water, and a forty-pound shell from the Destroyer crashed into the bridge of the Flores.

"Bravo, Franz! Tonnerre! the man shoots like a perfect genius, and that was a good two-mile shot, too."

As he spoke a louder roar came up. Volumes of white smoke pierced by jets of flame rolled out from the cruiser's side, and the water was torn up into foam a hundred yards astern of the clouds of spray which now alone marked the position of the Destroyer tearing at her full forty knots an hour through the water.

"There goes another!" he cried again, looking ahead as the Destroyer swung round, stopped, and sent another shell home, which pierced the thin plates of the Flores a few yards aft of the stem and burst inside, blowing a great, ragged hole in her fore-deck. "I think I can leave you to tackle that gentleman. He's only a Portugee, after all, according to his flag. I'd better go and talk to the other one. She's coming up pretty fast, and if I don't stop her there may be trouble."

Quickening up to three-quarter speed, the Vengeur ascended once more, and swept in a long, graceful curve towards where the Cécile, with dense black clouds of French coal-smoke pouring from her funnels, was ploughing majestically through the water towards the scene of action.

Knowing that her armament was far more powerful than anything he had yet encountered, Max deemed it prudent to attain a height of four thousand feet before he commenced operations. But, unhappily for those on board the cruiser, she had been built and armed for sea-fighting, and, pitted against her agile ærial antagonist, she was almost as helpless as the two catchers had been.

If she could only have brought her armament, or even a portion of it, to bear upon the Vengeur she would have scattered her in fragments through the skies. Her fifteen 6½ and 5½ inch big guns would have vomited a storm of shell that would have swept her from the air like a feather, and her light quick-firing and machine-guns could have torn her to fragments even more quickly.

But the big guns in their barbettes could not be trained to a greater elevation than fifteen degrees, and the quick-firing guns, mounted behind their shields, were only capable of an elevation of twenty degrees, while the machine-guns in her military tops could only be fired horizontally or downwards. As a matter of fact, therefore, every one of them was out of action, as Max took care to keep the Vengeur so placed that nothing less than an elevation of sixty degrees would reach her.

This drove the captain of the Cécile to fall back on her small arms. The bugle sounded and the marines and naval riflemen formed up on the decks. The word was given and the rifles came up, but before a trigger could be pulled the Vengeur's Maxims spoke again, and the massacre began anew. Decks and tops and bridge were swept by the incessant hail as each of the two guns poured its seven hundred and fifty bullets a minute in a continuous stream down on the gallant fellows who, with their splendid batteries lying helpless around them, were incapable of making the slightest effective defence. A few bullets, already half spent, rattled against the sides and bottom of the Vengeur's hull, and chipped little pieces out of her air-planes, but that was all.

Max put his glasses to his eyes

Digitized by Google

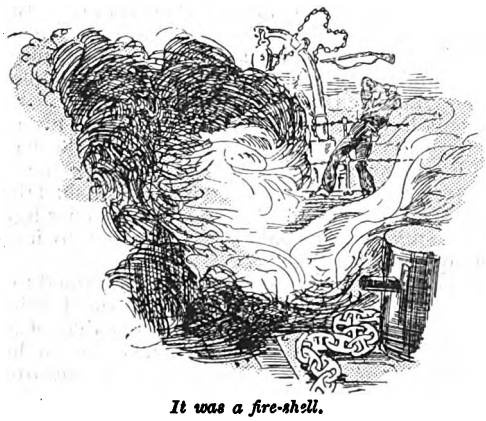
For five minutes the storm of bullets rained on, and when it stopped the decks of the Cécile, splashed with blood and strewn with mangled corpses, presented the appearance of a human slaughter-yard. The guiding intelligence of the big ship was paralysed, for not an officer remained alive on deck. Still she ploughed her way like some blinded monster through the water, and was fast nearing the Flores, which was still firing wildly as the Destroyer dodged and circled about her, when Max quickened up the Vengeur and called to the men at the bomb-tubes to be ready.

"Prepare to let go! One, three, and five with anarchite, two and four with fire-mixture, and send them out lively when I give the word."

"Now!" he cried, as the Vengeur slowed down again to the same speed as the cruiser, which now floated apparently motionless two thousand feet below, and a trifle astern of him. "Let go number one, and try the range."

The shell dropped into the water twenty yards ahead of the Cécile. He checked the speed of the air-ship ever so little, and ordered number two to be dropped. It was a fire-shell, and it struck the cruiser's forecastle a few feet aft of the stem. There was a bright flash, a flame, and a dense cloud of blue-black smoke swept aft, rolling along the decks, poisoning and suffocating the few poor wretches who still lay in their blood gasping for life, and long tongues of fire ran over the forecastle deck and down on to the forward gun-deck.



It was a fire-shell.

"That'll do," said Max down the tube. "Let go the rest, and go ahead."

The remaining shells plunged downward with ever-increasing momentum, pierced the protective deck as though it had been cardboard instead of steel, and burst below it, tearing it up in long strips as though a volcano had been raging beneath it. Volley after volley was sent down until the upper works of the cruiser looked as though her magazines had exploded and burst up through them. Her engineers and stokers and those of her crew whose duty had kept them below came crowding in a panic-stricken swarm up on deck, preferring, apparently, to die in the open air than to be scalded or burnt, or poisoned like rats in a trap. But still the pitiless hail of shells and fire-bombs rained on, and they were struck down and torn to fragments and hurled to the deck to writhe out their lives in agony in the midst of the flames and the suffocating fumes that kept bursting out incessantly among them.

It was horrible work—horrible enough to sicken the soul of any ordinary human nature; but Max, with the cold frenzy of murderous insanity chilling his blood, stood impassive in his conning-tower, and watched the slaughter that he could stay with a word, with no more sign of emotion than the compression of his pale lips and the angry gleam of the blood-lust in his eyes. The murderous dream that he had dreamt while speeding across the Pacific was already beginning to be realised in deadly earnest.

But even he soon had enough of blood and slaughter for the time being, and so, seeing that there was no one left on board the cruiser capable of firing a shot against him, he brought the Vengeur down to within three hundred feet of her deck, and told his men at the bomb-tubes to aim for the funnels with anarchite. In a few moments they got the direction, and half a dozen shells charged with the terrible compound passed in quick succession down the great tubes of iron. Then there came a shock that shook the air in which the Vengeur was floating, and after that a crash and a roar and a vast volume of steam, in the midst of which the stately Cécile split asunder and broke up and sank in rent and twisted fragments into the abyss over which she had so proudly floated but a brief half hour before.

"Bonjour, messieurs!" cried Renault with a harsh savage laugh. "You bit off a trifle more than you could chew, as the Yankees say, when you came out to tackle the Vengeur. I wonder what some of the sapient naval authorities of Europe would have thought if they had seen that little bit of the new warfare. Well, that's three disposed of under the hour, and I suppose Franz has made it pretty hot for the Portuguese by this time. I'll just go and see what he's doing, and then I must have a look at those fellows down south."

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE MAN AND THE MACHINE.

AS soon as the Vengeur got over the scene of the duel between the Destroyer and the Flores he saw that, in spite of superior weight of metal and number of guns, the cruiser was getting decidedly the worst of it. In the first place her shooting was very bad, and, added, to that her speed was less than half that of her antagonist.

Hartog was pursuing his usual tactics. His rifled forty-pounder was thoroughly effective at four thousand yards, or over two miles, and he took very good care never to go within less than his range of the cruiser, and never to fire a shot until his range-finder told him that the aim was secure.

It was here that thee normous advantages of greatly superior speed were so strikingly manifested. The naval engagements between Japan and China in 1894 had demonstrated the fact that armoured ships of twelve to fourteen knots had no chance against unprotected cruisers armed with long range guns and possessing a speed of from nineteen to twenty-two knots. The swift ships had been able to choose their positions, shoot their bolts, and retire to a safe distance, returning when it pleased them.

Their commanders chose the speed at which the battle was to be fought. When they chose they could steam the same speed as the heavy ship, and so, for the moment, fire at a relatively stationary object, while their opponents, steaming their best, were still hopelessly out-distanced, and so were pounded at the leisure of their agile antagonists. But the difference between fourteen and twenty knots is, for fighting purposes, as nothing in comparison with the difference between nineteen and forty, as the commander of the Flores soon learnt to his cost.

He had fired broadside after broadside at the distant cloud of spray which was scudding along the surface of the water over two miles away, but never a shot had gone within a hundred yards of it. Of the Destroyer herself nothing was visible save for the brief moment in which she slowed down to send another shell home. The instant that the missile was despatched the light-heeled craft would spin round and dart away in an ever-changing direction, with the Flores vainly labouring after her and blazing away into the empty air and water. A glance to the southward showed the Pilgrim just disappearing into the inlet with the Ariel about two miles out to sea, and some four miles to the southward. Three miles behind her again the Devon was bowling along at full speed, flinging clouds of spray from her projecting stem.

"I think I've time to give that Portugee chap a dose of the Maxims," muttered Max as he headed the air-ship for the now sorely damaged cruiser. "One of those heavy shells might just touch the Destroyer, and then Franz's cruise would come to a pretty sudden stop, and that would never do."

Digitized by Google

He pursued exactly the same tactics that he had practised with such fearful effect on the Cécile. First the continuous storm of bullets swept every living creature that was not under cover from the decks of the Flores, then came the hail of mélinite, anarchite, and fire-shells pouring from a height of two thousand feet vertically on to the doomed craft. As has been proved in the case of the Frenchman, no human valour or discipline could support the strange and horrible attack.

Engineers and stokers forsook their posts as the shells came crashing through the torn decks and burst in the ship's interior. The gunners left their guns and ran about, vainly seeking an escape from the flames and deadly fumes which penetrated into the barbettes and battery-chambers in defiance of armour plating and protective shields, and dozens of the unhappy wretches, maddened by the horrors that were multiplying about them, flung themselves overboard, preferring death by drowning to the torments of mutilation, burning, and poisoning that was the only fate that awaited them on board the warship.

In ten minutes the guns of the Flores had ceased to speak. Half her crew were killed, and the other half utterly demoralised. Meanwhile the Destroyer had been creeping nearer and nearer, watching for her opportunity. Firing shell after shell at a constantly decreasing range through the thin plates of the cruiser's sides, she at last got within five hundred yards of her, and then two torpedoes, one after the other, slipped into the water and made straight for the now almost motionless Flores.

All the air about him was filled with projectiles.

So utter was the panic on board the cruiser that no one noticed the two long streams of white bubbles which rapidly lengthened out as the deadly messengers sped at thirty miles an hour on their way.

Then in quick succession came two dull muffled roars, and two mountains of foaming water rose up, one under the cruiser's bow, and the other amidships. At the same instant one of her boilers, pierced by a projectile from the Vengeur blew up, and then, as though a hidden volcano had burst forth beneath her keel, her bow rose with a mighty heave out of the water, and she rolled over and went down with a sliding sidelong motion stern first to the bottom of the Atlantic.

These rapidly succeeding tragedies had not, of course, escaped the glasses of the officers of the Devon and the Ariel. Captain Maxwell, as brave and skilful a sailor as ever took a British ship into action, stood on the cruiser's bridge white with fury, watching the swift destruction which overtook the French and Portuguese vessels in succession, and every minute or two he signalled to the engine-room for more steam, although the Devon's boilers were throbbing and straining under the gallant efforts of the stokers, and the steam was hissing angrily from the safety-valves.

The sea was splendid for steaming, and the engines of the Devon, working at their utmost capacity, sent the splendid craft rushing through the water at a good twenty-two knots an hour. The captain and his officers knew full well that they were about to encounter no ordinary antagonist. An hour ago the Cécile, almost as powerful a cruiser as their own, with her two swift consorts had gone into the battle full of all the confidence of conscious strength, and now they and the Flores were lying shattered wrecks at the bottom of the sea, and of all their crews not a man was left alive to tell the story of disaster and defeat.

There was no valid reason why the fate of the Devon and the Ariel should not be similar. They recognised this, but their duty was to go on, and they went on. But apart from the dictates of valour and duty, there was another consideration. Even if they had wished to avoid the fight it would now have been impossible to do so.

The utmost speed that they could steam would leave the Ariel nearly five knots and the cruiser seventeen or eighteen knots an hour behind the Destroyer in a trial of speed, while the Vengeur with her hundred and twenty miles an hour in hand could fly over and round them in the inaccessible heights of the sky at any speed that her commander chose to select. But brave and all as were the hearts on board the Devon and the Ariel there was not one that did not beat faster as the moment of battle drew swiftly nearer.

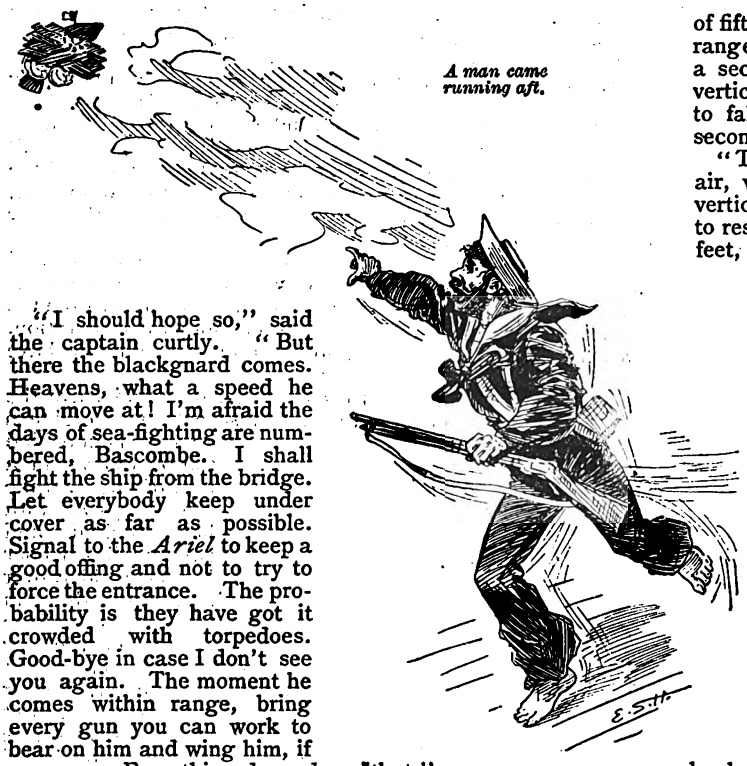
"There's no doubt about it, Bascombe," said Captain Maxwell to his chief officer, who was standing beside him on the bridge. "That's a very wonderful craft, and I'm afraid a terrible antagonist, and it's no use disguising the fact that we haven't a single heavy gun that will touch her. I suppose those Hotchkisses and Nordenfeldts have been altered by this time, haven't they?"

"Oh, yes," replied Mr. Bascombe, "the armourers and smiths were at work on them all night, and those in the tops can fire at an angle of forty-five, and the ones we fixed on the main deck can be fired at sixty. The worst of it is, though, that the men working them won't have the slightest protection, so unless we can manage to wing the scoundrel pretty soon I'm afraid he'll pepper us hotly when he once gets the range."

"Well, we can't help that," said the captain. "I'm going to do my best to bring him down as long as the ship holds together, whatever the result is. I confess I don't like the job. It isn't fair and square fighting; in fact, it isn't like human fighting at all, engaging a brute of a thing that can fly up over your heads and just pepper you as he chooses. But still, that's not the question, and duty's duty, whatever you have to fight. What do the people seem to think of it?"

"Well, sir," replied the lieutenant in a low tone, "to tell you the truth, I'm afraid they're very uneasy. There's nothing that floats in water that they're afraid of, but they don't like the idea of that curious-looking brute flying about overhead. Still, they know what bloodthirsty scoundrels these fellows are, and I don't believe there's a man among them who won't die at his post before he thinks of showing the white feather."

Digitized by Google



A man came running aft.

"I should hope so," said the captain curtly. "But there the blackguard comes. Heavens, what a speed he can move at! I'm afraid the days of sea-fighting are numbered, Bascombe. I shall fight the ship from the bridge. Let everybody keep under cover as far as possible. Signal to the Ariel to keep a good offing and not to try to force the entrance. The probability is they have got it crowded with torpedoes. Good-bye in case I don't see you again. The moment he comes within range, bring every gun you can work to bear on him and wing him, if you can. Everything depends on that."

The captain and his first officer, who were old friends as well as shipmates, shook hands as they left the bridge, the former to go to the conning-tower and the latter to take his place on the main deck to direct the working of the guns. The next instant the signal to the Ariel fluttered from the peak, and she began to move out from the shore, but the Destroyer was before her.

The Ariel's smoke made her position perfectly plain at any moment, but the low-lying blue-grey pirate craft was visible only faintly and at intervals as she rose upon the long Atlantic swell, or by the cloud of spray that she threw up when she put on speed. She ran away out to sea at thirty knots as if inviting the Ariel to follow her, for Hartog felt that he was quite justified in leaving, at any rate, the first part of the fighting to the Vengeur. The Ariel pluckily accepted the challenge at the same time that she obeyed the cruiser's signal, and ran out in the not very well-founded hope of bringing her to a hand-to-hand engagement.

Meanwhile the air-ship, which had dropped out of sight into the inlet to replenish her ammunition, rose again into the air, and, flying at sixty miles an hour, swooped down from the northward on an almost horizontal course at an elevation of about 2,500 feet. When he was within a mile point-blank range of the Devon every available gun was brought to bear on him, and a storm of bullets and twelve-ounce shells projected upwards into the air.

Max in his conning-tower saw the flash and the smoke, and a few seconds later he beheld an extraordinary and unparalleled sight. All the air about him was filled with projectiles, apparently floating slowly in the air as though they were tiny balloons instead of solid shot and steel shells. They rose to within a few yards of him and then, taking a sharp downward curve, dropped out of sight.

He looked sharply at his aneroid and read: 2,400. He locked the steering-wheel for a moment and pulled the lever that inclined the slats of the air-planes. Then, as the Vengeur soared upward, he took a stump of pencil and a piece of paper from his pocket and made a rapid calculation.

"Ah!" he said, glancing at his paper and then down at the cruiser. "That's the game, is it! I'm glad you spoke soon enough. That quite settles the business as far as you're concerned. Let me see. I suppose those guns have an elevation of fifty-five or sixty degrees, say, a two-thirds angle, and the range was about a mile. Initial velocity, probably 2,500 feet a second. My elevation, 2,400 feet. If I drop a projectile vertically from that height it takes a trifle over eight seconds to fall, and drops with a final velocity of, say, 3,000 feet a second.

"That's the pull of gravity, ignoring the resistance of the air, which is the same in both cases, ergo, a bullet fired vertically upwards with an initial velocity of 2,500 feet, comes to rest within eight or nine seconds at somewhere within 3,000 feet, and falls back again. That's how gravitation fights on the side of the Vengeur. Good! And that's why those shells came floating about me like feathers. Very curious, but perfectly satisfactory. Now we'll try the Nordenfeldt."

He gave his orders down the tube, and passing over the Devon at a height of 3,200 feet he swung his ship round and brought her to a standstill a quarter of a mile astern of the cruiser. The moment he stopped the machine-guns of the Devon got to work again, and again the air below the Vengeur was filled with floating projectiles.

"Try one or two shots to get the range François," he said to the man at the gun, "and when you've got it, let her have it hot."

Then came the short sharp bang of the gun and the brief whistle of the projectile. Max followed it with his glasses and saw a tiny splash in the water twenty yards or so from the cruiser's stern. Then the gun spoke again, and the second projectile struck the water only a few yards from her starboard side amidships. A third shot grazed her port forward barbette; the shell burst with a bright flash, and the fragments glanced harmlessly from the heavy armour.

"That's better," muttered Max. "He'll get her next time."

And so he did, for the fourth shell struck her square amidships just aft of the after-funnel. A cloud of steam on her deck showed that the steampipe had been cut through. François had got the range now, and in rapid alternation the three barrels of the Nordenfeldt hurled shell after shell with fatal precision on to the exposed deck of the cruiser. It was in vain that volley after volley of projectiles was launched up into the air. The missiles reached the point at which the down-drag of gravitation equalled the energy exerted by the gun, and then they curved downwards and dropped into the sea.

To the men working the guns on board the Devon it seemed as though they were fighting a supernatural antagonist, floating serene and unarmed amidst a hurricane of bullets. They knew they had got the range and the elevation, but, as far as they could see, not a shot touched him, or, if it did, the air-ship was bullet-proof. Uneasy as they had been before the duel began, they now showed a nervous excitement, which their officers saw would take very little to turn into absolute panic.

Military writers had often prophesied that, hard as it already was to keep men steady under artillery fire on land, it would be practically impossible to do so if it ever became possible to fire upon them from the air. It was not long before this prophecy was fulfilled on board the Devon.

There are no braver men on earth than the sailors who fight under the White Ensign, but they are only made of flesh and blood after all, and when the Vengeur's shells, striking with a velocity of over five thousand feet a second, pierced the steel decks as though they had been paper, and drilled clean holes down through decks and bulk-heads and burst in the lowest recesses of the ship, sometimes even piercing her bottom and blowing great ragged holes in her thin plates underneath the armour line, rumours began to run from lip to lip, men looked at each other and shook their heads, and all their officers could do barely sufficed to maintain discipline and even the semblance of steadiness.

The decks were already riddled in fifty places. The military tops were smashed to fragments, the funnels torn and twisted out of shape; scores of men were lying maimed and mutilated about the deck; and all the machine-guns save one four-barrelled Nordenfeldt were dismounted and out of action, while down below shells had penetrated even into the recesses of the stoke-hole and burst there, blowing the stokers to pieces, and scattering the blazing coals of the furnaces throughout the narrow confined space.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile the speed of the cruiser had dropped from twenty-two knots to sixteen, and then it had gradually slackened down, as furnace after furnace was rendered useless, until she was barely making five knots. Then suddenly the fire from the air-ship ceased.

All this time Max had kept her speed regulated with wonderful dexterity according to that of the cruiser. Now she forged slowly ahead until she floated exactly above the masts of the Devon, and then those who were left on her deck saw their terrible enemy sinking gently down towards her. In this position not a gun could be brought to bear upon her, but, determined to die fighting to the end, the brave fellows ran for their magazine carbines and ammunition and opened a hot but, as far as they could see, perfectly ineffectual fire.

After the first volley the Vengeur stopped in her descent and rose slightly, then there came a spattering sound on the deck and in the water. Something struck the deck close to where Mr. Bascombe, who was now the only deck officer left alive, was standing, and flattened out. He stooped and picked it up. It was one of their own bullets which had been fired perpendicularly into the air and had fallen back on their own heads.

As he was looking at it a sailor standing near him collapsed and dropped in a heap on the deck, struck down by one of his own comrade's bullets.

"Cease firing!" cried the first officer at once. "He's too high to hit, and we shall only get the bullets back on our own heads."

Those were the last words that a gallant gentleman and a thorough sailor ever spoke. They had scarcely left his lips when there came a blinding flash, a deafening report, and he and every man who was standing near him were hurled off their feet and flung lifeless and mutilated in every direction from the focus of the explosion. Then there came a silence, a silence of death and wordless horror, and in the midst of it a man came running aft from the fore-deck pointing to the northward, and shouting wildly:

"Look, boys, look! There's another of these mechanical bird-machines coming up hand-over-fist yonder to the norrard, and by the great Cæsar's ghost, she's flying the good old Union Johnny. Hooray! Oh, my God, what's done this?"

(To be continued.)

THE OLD VIOLIN.

She has moved a little nearer
To the Master of all music.
HIAWATHA.

THE first bell tinkled from the stage, the gas lights flared up brightly, the audience streamed into the theatre, and the members of the orchestra came up from their underground retreat, each with his instrument under his arm. The leader moved here and there, whispering to this one, calling that one's attention to a particular passage, and speaking, half aloud, over the heads of the others, to one who sat behind.

There was more stir than usual among the orchestra, and one would know, without consulting the play bill, that the music of the piece was an important part in the programme.

The second bell sounded. The voices were hushed, and the instruments taken in hand. The conductor appeared—a young, genteel-looking man. Nodding lightly to the leader, he stepped to his place of honour, then, like a field-marshal, reviewed his troupe. A satisfied smile flitted over his face—then suddenly it darkened. There, among the violins, he discerned an empty chair.

"Who is missing there behind?" he asked.

Many heads turned quickly. "Habermann! Habermann!" was the answer.

"Ah, he shall be punished for this!"

Then came the third signal. Its vibrations had not died away when a little insignificant-looking man rushed to the empty place, pulled his violin from its cover, placed his notes in order, all with feverish swiftness.

The conductor rapped, looked to the right, to the left, then straight ahead. His lifted arm sank, and with a thunderous roll of drums the overture began.

The late comer must have been running, for his breath came in quick short gasps, and flakes of melting snow still clung to his coat. He held his violin upright upon his knee, and stretched his head far forward to see his notes.

At the end of the first act part of the audience went out, but the orchestra remained in full numbers.

"Habermann!" said the conducter, "come this way."

The individual addressed looked up uncertain. Had he been called?

The contra-bassist, a large, rough, but good-natured man, shook him by the arm. "Come, old marmot; can't you hear?"

He understood then. "Marmot" could only mean him. Stumbling, for he was very short-sighted, over several things in his way, he stood before his master, who looked down upon him imperiously.

"My man, you have the privilege of the unpunctual. Confess! What have you been about?"

Like a whipped dog the old man looked up at the speaker, but his face remained cold and expressionless.

"Can you not speak?"

"Perhaps he is in some love affair," the mirthful violin-cellist could not refrain from saying.

"You will be kind enough to keep your foolish humour to yourself," said the conductor. "And you—old man—of course you will pay the ordinary penalty. If this happens again, I shall obtain your dismissal through the director. You know very well you are not wanted here—only tolerated. Enough!"

With a grand gesture he turned away, and the old man stumbled back to his place.

A strange figure was this Habermann. Small and thin, his face of an ashy grey hue, surrounded by a bristly grey beard, and bristly grey hair stood up defiantly over his head. His eyes were close drawn together by his near-sightedness. His trousers were too short and his coat too long, both of uncertain age. When out of doors, to this outfit was added an old hat, and an old knitted scarf that was wound many times round his neck, and the long ends either hung down in front, or were blown back, flaglike, by the wind. His form was well known by every boy in the streets through which he passed in going to and from the theatre.

Digitized by Google

The second act began. The stage represented a scene of Oriental splendour that astonished even accustomed theatre-goers. And the musicians, indifferent, from long familiarity with such things, might have been seen stretching up their heads here and there, in the passage, to get better views of the unusual magnificence. Only Habermann showed not the least curiosity.

In the long interval the stalls were soon deserted, save by some aged people. Habermann's companions vanished to the underworld again. They all passed him, and each had some nonsense to drop. He was the scapegoat on whom was turned all their good and bad humour. They were, in the main, good-hearted men, having not the least thought of doing him harm, but they never knew it to be, or thought it could be, different. Habermann himself had never protested. Only by a shadowy drawing of the face that took the place of a smile did he show that their bantering was noticed.

The last one to go by was the contra-bassist. Clapping his hand on the old man's shoulder, he said:

"Come, Papa Habermann, your cup of coffee will be cold."

It had been Habermann's custom to take a cup of coffee in the long interval—the only refreshment he allowed himself in the theatre.

"Thanks," said he, "not to-night. I took one at home."

He certainly spoke falsely then, for he had eaten nothing the whole day but half a roll; the other half was still in his pocket. He wished for nothing then but to be alone. He thought, "Is she asleep—the refreshing slumber that brings the sick to health?" Oh, if it could be so! But the physician that day said he had no hope of her recovery. She might live weeks or months, and she might go to-day or to-morrow. There was nothing certain about these lung diseases. His daughter—his Elfrida—and dying! She who was the essence of his thoughts and feelings, she who was his life—going from him for ever! No, it could not be! It must not be! God would not allow it!

For twenty-four years Nicodemus Habermann had been second violinist to the Y. theatre orchestra. He belonged, in a measure, to the establishment, as did the chandelier that hung from the ceiling. His wife also came from the same theatre. How he had found courage to ask the important question of the quiet, pleasant, by no means young person, was a theme that racked the brains of his colleagues for a long time. But he had done it and succeeded.

It was certainly no fierce passion that they experienced; but they understood each other, and their marriage had been happier than many so-called love matches. Two years they lived together, quiet and contented, then his wife died at the birth of her child.

Nicodemus became still more quiet and dejected. He lived only for his child. What a wonderful girl she was! Her form was dainty and white as a porcelain figure; her hair was fine, soft, and glossy like spun glass; her eyes bright and dancing like the waters of a trout brook; her laugh as silver clear as sweet toned bells. There were hours when Nicodemus was confounded and puzzled that this graceful, charming creature was his child; when he scarcely dared touch her with his big hands, fearing he might do her some harm.

What foolish things they did together! How she danced when he crawled on all fours about the room! How she sprang upon his back and tried to hold him by the hair, but never succeeded, it was so short and bristly!

How many times had she, sitting in his lap, seized his neckband, and pulled upon it until he was purple in the face, he saying no word, because it seemed to give her pleasure to maltreat her father in that childish way! He endeavoured to gratify every wish she expressed, and once, when she wanted the moon, he had considered, with all earnestness, how he could fashion for her something resembling that luminary.

The years slipped by. Elfrida was a wonderfully pretty girl. People often turned to look after them when he walked with her in the street. She wanted to attend a select girls' school, and he denied himself proper food in order to save the tuition fees. She learned readily, and he rejoiced in her progress.

One day she expressed a wish to accompany him to the theatre. That disturbed him very much, and for the first time he denied her request. Should she be a witness to the ignominious rôle he there played? Should her pure child mind be poisoned by the piquant operettas there brought out? Elfrida pouted and wept. She knew, she said, her papa loved her no longer. What had she done? All her schoolmates visited the theatre; only she, who had the best opportunity, could not.

Habermann was conquered. He could not see her weep, so she went with him. Seated in a vacant seat in the front row of the stalls, she followed the performance with glowing eyes. Her presence worked wonders in the orchestra. Through the entire evening Habermann was treated with perfect respect.

On her way home Elfrida could not find words to express her pleasure. Oh, the singers! How charming it must be to sing like that! Then to receive such oceans of flowers! Yes, she would be a singer, and then her dear papa would not have to go to the theatre every night, but stay at home eating cakes and sweetmeats. Habermann listened with shining eyes. Yes, a singer she should be.

Again years went by. Elfrida had blossomed out into a young woman, left school, and, under the instructions of a celebrated professor, was cultivating her voice. The economy of the father had to be still more severe, for this professor was none of the cheapest. But how richly was Nicodemus paid when he saw the progress of his daughter, and heard the professor's enthusiasm over her talent, and his prophecies of a brilliant future!

A charity concert had been planned, into which was to be drawn the highest musical talent of the city, and which promised to be the event of the season. The professor thought this a grand opportunity to bring out his brilliant pupil.

The evening came. A distinguished audience filled the large, richly-decorated hall. Far back against the wall, pressed into a corner, stood Habermann, with a programme in his hand. A glimmering was before his eyes, a roaring in his ears.

He could not have been more stirred had he suddenly been called upon to play upon his violin over there upon the stage. His only fear was that Elfrida would lose self-command; if she kept that, he was sure all would go well.

A storm of applause stirred him anew. The exotic, order-decked piano virtuoso had bowed and left the stage. Now she must come! Habermann felt his heart beating as if it were in his throat and he wiped the perspiration from his forehead. A low whispering ran through the assembly. Elfrida appeared, led by the professor. There she stood, flower decked, before that thousand-headed Moloch, the public.

An indescribable air of innocence aud purity surrounded her. Her golden hair enveloped her fresh young form like a mantle. People nodded approvingly at each other, and a young man near Habermann said, "By Jove, that's a pretty girl!"

The pause seemed longer than usual. He saw with horror that she was confused. The professor turned impatiently. She raised her head and looked towards her father. The visible distress on his face made her forget her own, and drawing herself up decidedly, she mastered her embarrassment.

Her first notes were low and hesitating, but grew louder and firmer, and finally came out in all their strength and purity. One could scarcely believe there could be such power in that childlike form. Her strength increased with the difficulty of her part, and nothing in her execution betrayed the beginner.

For a time Habermann could see nothing. The tears rolled down his cheeks. Only with his ears could he revel in those heavenly strains. Oh, to think it was his child—his own flesh and blood—who held that large audience in such breathless rapture.

The applause came like a hurricane. She stood for a moment with her hands pressed over her beating heart, while the flowers spread out about her like a fragrant garden. Her eyes sought her father, but he has slipped out into an ante-room, and sinking into a chair, with his head in his hands the sounds came into him like the dull roarings of the sea. That hour made good his whole life of sorrow and disappointment. He had not lived in vain.

Digitized by Google

There was a still more stormy burst of enthusiasm. They called for an encore—but Elfrida appeared no more. The professor came instead to say the young singer had been taken suddenly ill—nothing serious—but she could not appear again that night.

Habermann heard himself called. He hurried to the green-room. How strangely the artistes looked at him! One pressed his hand sympathetically, and told him his daughter had been taken to the private room of the manager. Why was there so much emotion over a little indisposition? In spite of himself, a feeling of apprehension seized him. As he entered the manager's room he saw Elfrida, with face pale as death and closed eyes, lying on a couch. The front of her white dress was stained red. He looked with dazed eyes at those who stood about her. What did it mean?

An earnest-faced old man came to him and took his hand.

"Control yourself, my friend," said he. "The tender constitution of your daughter was not equal to the strain of the evening. A blood vessel has been ruptured. She can, perhaps, be well again, but she can sing no more."

With a cry that was hardly human, Habermann sank by her side.

The next day's papers contained long, exaggerated accounts of the affair. A young singer, till then unknown, had appeared and, by her loveliness of person, as well as her unparalleled singing, had won all hearts; but, while the applause still rang through the hall, she had fallen behind the scenes, purchasing success with her heart's blood.

For some days after the concert the unfortunate singer was much talked of; then other matters came up, and she was forgotten.

Troublous days followed for Nicodemus. There were times when Elfrida seemed to be recovering—when she could laugh and joke—but those moments of light made the night that followed all the darker. The lung disease made rapid progress. They had moved far out into one of the suburbs of the city, that she might have the benefit of purer air, for a journey to the south was beyond his means, however much he might economise.

For the last few days she had been worse, and that was the cause of her father's lateness at the theatre. How tiresome the music seemed to him, with its endless repetition! If it would only end, so he could go home!

At length the curtain fell for the last time, and Habermann rushed out as he had rushed in, as if fearful someone would restrain him. Through the wide-opened portal poured a thick, black stream of humanity, laughing and talking about the magnificence of the performance. Coachmen were shouting; pedestrians hurrying, and the snowflakes whirled down without intermission through the misty air, covering the street with smutty, grey pulp.

Pushing through the crowd, every moment in danger of falling under the carriage wheels, hurried Habermann, with his violin under his arm. Turning into a quieter street, where the snow kept more of its whiteness, he pressed his hat more firmly upon his head, drew the skirt of his coat under his arm, and walked as fast as the moist snow would allow. The passers-by looked after the curious figure, and many snow-balls flew about his ears, but it did not trouble him; he only rushed forward—forward.

On, by the great factory, whose tall chimney reared ghost-like into the night; by the churchyard, whose white crosses and monuments seemed signalling to him of the uncertainty of all earthly things; by fair mansions, with their carefully-trimmed gardens. At last, quite exhausted, he stopped before an old house. With trembling hands he opened the heavy gate, then went through the long, dark yard, to the little garden house where he dwelt. A middle-aged woman, with pleasant, though coarse, features and sleepy eyes, met him in the entry.

"Oh, I am glad you have come. Elfrida has asked after you so many times."

"How is she?" he asked, eagerly.

"She has been sleeping for a little while. Try and not wake her. Good-night. I will lie down now."

She had the door latch in her hand, but turned again.

"If——if——anything happens," she said, hesitatingly, "call me."

As she disappeared Habermann looked after her, shaking his head. "She is a queer woman. What does she think can happen?"

He pulled off his wet coat and boots, put on an old dressing-gown, and pushed his feet into a pair of slippers; then opening the door carefully, he stepped to the bedside of the sick girl.

She was still lovely. Her blonde hair surrounded her head like a halo, but her face was white, white as the linen of her bed. With an expression of unutterable tenderness he looked down upon her. Her breath came quick and short. Opening her eyes, she stretched her arms to him.

"I'm so glad you've come," she said, as he kissed her upon the forehead.

"But I shall have to scold you that you do not sleep. Truly, you give your papa a great deal of trouble;" but the tones of his voice gave the lie to his words.

She stroked tenderly his knotted hand, and looking up, said: "Can't I talk a little with my dear papa? Come, sit here and tell me about the new performance."

"Oh, my dear child, what is there to tell? You know I care nothing for that nonsense; my thoughts were with you."

She made no answer, but soon after, looking up suddenly, said:

"Papa, I wish you would play for me upon your violin."

"Oh, child, you must not think of it! It would excite you, and the doctor said you must be perfectly quiet."

"But I feel so well—to-day—so light—better than I have for a long, long time."

"Truly?" His whole face lighted up. "Then sleep now; perhaps to-morrow I will do as you wish."

She put her arms round his neck and snuggled her cheek to his.

"When I say it will be a great, great joy for me, and beg you to gratify me, will you not do it now?"

"Yes, yes, I will," he whispered.

She kissed him tenderly. "My precious papa! Now I shall sleep so much better. Give me a good night kiss."

He pressed her to his heart as he gave it, then laid her back among the pillows.

He took his stand by the window, as far as possible from the bed, and set the bow with a trembling hand. The tones of the old cradle song, "Sleep, my child, sleep on," sounded low through the room.

Then the playing became more lively, and he handled the bow more firmly. The simple, soulful melody awoke soaring phantasies. The longer he played the more the artist within him was aroused. All that had lain in his heart through the long years, under the cares of life as under an ash heap, came up to the light. The tones exulted; they wept and lamented. A divine fire beamed from his eyes; the glow of inspiration was upon the cheeks of the man who had at last found himself. Ever more heaven-inspired and spiritual, they became a sacred prayer to the Lord of life and death. He stood a few moments motionless, with bowed head, when he ended, as if listening to the dying tones; then, breathing fast, laid aside the violin.

Softly he stepped to the bedside. What was that? He hastily seized her hand, then laid his grey head on her young breast, but there was no sound of a heart beat. A blessed, happy peace rested upon her features. He knew then why she had felt so light and happy.

There was a cry and a fall, then all was still in the little room save the rattling of the window sash and the ticking of the clock. Habermann lay there on the floor for a long time, then arose tottering like a drunken man. His features were fixed and bloodless, as if carved from ice. He took his violin and dashed it in pieces against the wall; he broke the bow over his knee; then sat down and leaned his head upon the bed of his dead child. He had played the finale of his life.

Digitized by Google

THE AGENT'S STRATAGEM

AUGUSTINE LAFONT was the confidential agent of a large banking-house in Paris. Early in the spring of 1832 he set out from Paris with bills, notes, drafts, etc., to the amount of over a million francs, for a house in Chaumont. Much secrecy had been observed in the preparations for his journey, as the kingdom was at that time infested by a secret organisation of thieves. Lafont had the notes concealed in various parts of his dress, and taking the heavy diligence as the best mode of conveyance, he set out on his mission.

Nothing worthy of note occurred to arrest Lafont's attention until he had passed nearly through the Department of the Seine-et-Marne, when, just at nightfall, two well-dressed gentlemen hailed the diligence, and claimed passage to Chaumont. It was already too dark for the agent to clearly distinguish the features of the new comers, but yet, from what little he could see, he at once made up his mind that their countenances were not unfamiliar to him, and, having come to this conclusion, he determined to watch their movements, for a vague suspicion that they had by some means become possessed of the secret of his business took possession of his mind.

The diligence crossed the Seine at Nogent, and there remained for the night. As soon as Lafont had opportunity to examine the countenances of the strangers at the supper table, he became satisfied that his first impressions were correct, for one of the travellers, at least, he had seen in Paris on the day before his departure, and he could not but notice that they both eyed him with marked interest.

After supper the agent lighted his cigar and walked out on to the bridge, where he remained nearly half an hour, at the end of which time he started back towards the inn, and just as he arrived at the door he noticed his two travelling companions entering the stable.

Prompted by a feeling of curiosity, he followed them, and as he came round by the stable door he could just see the two men crouching away in an empty stall. With a stealthy, cat-like tread, he approached, and he was fortunate enough to make out the gist of their conversation.

When Lafont left the stable he knew that the two men had left Paris for the purpose of robbing him, and that they intended to put their plan in execution as soon as the diligence should have entered the Department of the Upper Marne.

He returned to the inn, and after considerable reflection he determined to procure a horse and secretly pursue his journey. Having come to this conclusion, he went to the driver of the diligence, and under the plea of having to remain in Nogent on special business for a day or two, he settled his fare thus far; then he went to the stable and ordered a horse to be in readiness for him by three o'clock in the morning, at the same time enjoining upon the garçon the strictest secrecy with regard to his movements.

As soon as these arrangements were made, Lafont retired to his room. He, of course, knew that his secret had leaked out, and even in his proposed course he was not entirely free from danger. A million francs was a large sum, and if the two Parisian robbers had set their hearts upon its possession, he had yet some work to perform ere he would be entirely free from them. Last of all, a new idea struck him, and, obtaining a number of papers, he neatly folded them in an envelope, which he strongly sealed and bound with a blue ribbon.

At three o'clock in the morning, while it was yet very dark, and, before any one else was stirring, Lafont quietly descended from his room and went to the stable. The garçon was easily aroused, and in a few moments the agent was on his way to Chaumont.

For two hours he rode on his way, but, instead of pursuing the high road from Treves, he again crossed the Seine, and kept along by the banks of the Aube. Daylight was just beginning to streak the eastern heavens, when Lafont thought he heard the sound of horses behind him, and it was not long ere he knew that he was being pursued, and in ten minutes he was assured that the two robbers were after him.

In a moment the agent leaped from the saddle, and, seizing a heavy stone, he inflicted a severe bruise upon one of his horse's fore legs. The animal reared and plunged, but Lafont managed to hold him, again mounted, and rode on; but the horse limped and staggered beneath the effects of the blow he had received, and, in a short time, the robbers came up.

"Ah! Good morning, gentlemen," said the agent, as he reined in his lame steed, at the same time raising his hat with affable politeness. "So it seems you, too, are tired of the lumbering diligence."

"Yes," replied the foremost of the two men, "the diligence did not exactly suit our convenience, so we took horses."

"And you are bound to Chaumont?" asked Lafont.

"Yes, on important business."

"That is fortunate," said Lafont, with the utmost earnestness, "for you may, if you see fit, do me a great favour. I, too, have important business at Chaumont, but I fear that without assistance I shall not be able to accomplish it. I have, gentlemen, in my possession a vast amount of valuable papers, and intended to have continued on my way in the diligence, but at Nogent I received the intelligence that there was a plan on foot to rob me.

"Do not start, gentlemen, for what I tell you is true. And for that reason I set off thus alone, but my horse has met with a sad mishap, and I fear the robbers, who, I think, are yet at Nogent, may overtake me. Now if you are going directly to Chaumont, perhaps you would be willing to take my package in your charge and deliver it to M. Augient at his office. Any one there will tell you where it is. Then, if I am overhauled, the robbers will find nothing, and, of course, you will not be suspected. If you will thus accommodate me you shall be suitably rewarded. What say you, gentlemen?"

The two men exchanged significant glances during these remarks; and, after a moment's consultation, one of them said:

"You seem to be ready in trusting strangers, sir."

"Oh, not at all, sir," returned Lafont, with a frank smile, "I would much rather trust honest travellers than run the risk of meeting with robbers. You see just now how I am situated, gentlemen; and, if you will do me the favour I ask, you shall not regret it. I shall stop at Arcio, and change my horse, and then follow you."

"Well," said one of the men, "we will do your wish, and meet you at M. Augient's office."

"Then I thank you most heartily," said Lafont, and as he spoke he took a closely-sealed packet from his bosom and handed it over. "In this," he said, "there are valuable papers, and I trust you will use all discretion in their care. Now the robbers may overhaul me as soon as they like."

After some further directions given in an honest confiding manner, Lafont bade his new messengers Godspeed, and ere long they were out of sight. The agent turned his horse's head back towards Nogent, where he arrived in safety, and on the next morning he procured a guard, and once more took the diligence. The robbers stopped at the first convenient place to examine their prize, but their chagrin can be better imagined than described when they found that they held only a securely bound parcel of waste paper. They knew that they were suspected, and, of course, they dared not push the matter further.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HOW SHOULD STOUT LADIES DRESS?

Some considerable controversy has been going on in one of the American fashion magazines on this subject, started by the threatened inundation of crinolines.

Fancy a fat lady in a crinoline! Or better still, fancy ten fat ladies in ten fat crinolines, with, say, five a side in a none too fat omnibus!

The Yankee humorist says: "A fat lady can beat a fat man; she can stick a stiletto-like pin through her head till it comes out the other side and hold on her bonnet, but the fat man can't." Let's have those ten pins to complete the picture of those ten crinolines. Would we of the sterner sex not like to "lynch" the fiend who invented mountainous hats and feathers for front rows in theatres? Blondin can walk across Niagara on a tight rope, but can he walk a theatre corridor with three ladies' trains in front of him? The fashion miscreant, and the barbed wire inventor, have much to answer for. One fashion paper argues that if the portly lady adds a little slashing of light on a dark backgrouud, artistically and judiciously, it has the effect of apparently reducing her size by half a stone. How ludicrous all this seems! What is the seven pounds imitation reduction? We have known Mr. Russell, the eminent Specialist on Corpulency, reduce a lady eleven pounds in seven days, and not an imitation reduction, but an absolute fact, at a cost of probably less than is paid to the "faking" dressmaker. Those who are acquainted with his methods, or have read his work, "Corpulency and the Cure," can bear us out that he talks with as glib unconcern of fourteen-pound, twenty-eight pound, and even half-hundredweight reductions of unhealthy waste accumulations as a steamboat stoker would talk of coal. The dressmaker simply attempts to hide the disease—creating adipose, carried about by the unfortunate victim to obesity—whereas Mr. Russell (of Woburn House, 27, Store Street, London, W.C.) aims to remove the cause, and thus impart health. Of course, no lady likes the brute of a man who enters into a crusade against tight-lacing in a blunt common-sense way; but he is, however, right when he claims that tight stays with embonpoint is suicidal, especially when a few doses of a most pleasant, agreeable, and exhilarating tonic, made entirely from herbs, will reduce one's weight so easily with a corresponding improvement of health and strength, and with it that bright eye and healthy complexion which we all like to see in a lady. If our roof leaks and lets the rain in, we can shelter ourselves from it by opening an umbrella; but if we get the slater to stop the cause, he is the true benefactor, and not the umbrella maker. So it is with the reducer of fat and the dressmaker. The fair sex begin to see that he is their benefactor; he does not ruthlessly rip up the bodice, like uncouth Dr. Abernethy; he is better informed, for he actually knows that in twenty-four hours that identical inimical appendage will be in a state of subjugation. In other words, a dangerously tight lacing on Monday will be slack by Tuesday, after taking three simple doses of his mixture. "Has one to starve one's self?" asked a lady once. Not at all, for it is a singular fact that one eats more under his treatment.

It is perhaps not singular, if we investigate. A fat man is unhealthy; he is, in fact, diseased; as the disease is being cured the organs become healthy, the patient is more buoyant, and takes more exercise, and requires more food (it is also traceable to other reasons without exercise). Then, again, with stilt-like high heels, fashion—well, I think we had better drop this theme. we shall get into hot water with our fair readers; we are married. We generally get the old bachelor-editor to write on these subjects; he is not a bit afraid of women, as he calls them.

But seriously, if any lady, or gentleman, as far as that goes, wishes to reduce their weight, we commend them to Mr. Russell's work, "Corpulency and the Cure," which is published at Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., and only costs 4d. in stamps, post free. But to revert to the subject of crinolines, honestly we are pleased to see the really sensible and steadfast way in which ladies have made their standpoint, and we suggest that they should have a medium of their own to rule the fashions to their own liking, and not be the victims of the profit-seeking professional modiste.

DO STOUT PEOPLE LIVE LONG?

This is a question which has occupied the attention of medical authorities from time immemorial. Some argue that the lean kind take longer to shuffle off the mortal coil than their stout brethren. The statistics naturally favour this argument, and no doubt are correct to a great extent, because sufferers from obesity are more susceptible to disease in consequence of the debilitated state of the system when clogged with abnormal adipose tissue; but a curious fact has been overlooked, viz., that corpulency generally commences about the age of thirty-five to fifty, after which time it seems to decrease; therefore, before the proverbial "three score and ten" is reached, the whilom fat man is, by a natural process, again reduced to what may only be called moderate plumpness, and thus cheats the statistician. Stout persons can now, thanks to science, reduce their weight in a most extraordinarily rapid manner, without the slightest injury to their constitutions, or without resorting to those drastic remedies which only operate for a time, or by the continuance of the use of toxical drugs extending over such a period that renders it baneful to the long-suffering patient. An eminent Continental therapeutist recommends the victim to obesity to eat fat meat, while an equally eminent American prescribes lean ditto, and the stomach is to risk an accumulation of serious disorder by swallowing a pint of hot water daily, a most nauseous remedy, we should think, and not unattended with danger. The past master in the cure of corpulence is Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., whose book (256 pages), entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," price only 4 stamps, seems to impress us considerably, for he reduces more weight by his system than the Continental and American physicians, without any of the absurd restriction which would make life scarcely worth living. He uses simple herbs, the properties of which he seems to possess a more than usual knowledge of, and he makes but little secret of his method, so refreshing after the mystery made of most chemical and herbal concoctions of various complaints.—Wetherby News.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor :

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ENAMELLED COPPER ✦ LETTERS

FOR

TRADESMEN'S WINDOWS, FASCIAS, SIGNS, OR TABLETS.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

Most Effective Medium

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

ENAMELLED IRON PLATES.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

Call and see our Stock, or send for Price Lists.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

Only Address—

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

BE ADVISED

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities, as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states:—"Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA COMPANY, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 307.] FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 17, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

ARTISTIC ENAMELLED IRON SIGNS

AND

WHITE ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

(Highest Award, Paris Exhibition), for

TRADESMEN'S WINDOWS, FACIAS, SIGNS, OR TABLETS.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the most effective Medium for all kinds of indoor or outdoor Advertisements.

Trade Mark

E

"Effectiveness."

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

Call and see Stock or send for Price Lists.

IRON AND COPPER ENAMELLING CO.,

GENERAL ENAMELLERS ON

STEEL, COPPER, & IRON REFLECTORS, HOLLOW WARE, &c.,

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS.

Agents Wanted.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

IZOD'S

LONG WAISTED. A GREAT SUCCESS.

THE LONG WAISTED.

200 Dozen or 2,400 Pairs of this Celebrated Make alone delivered this season in London per Day. The great question of the day with all Ladies is the Fashion in Corsets, which grows year by year, until our Special Artistes have produced corsets for every type of figure.—IZOD'S CORSETS are cut on scientific principles, with a precision of accuracy formerly unknown.——

IZODS draw Ladies' attention to their Long Waisted Corsets, which have been designed by their British and Foreign Artistes, which are the best the world produces.—

The Ladies' Tailors always recommend these celebrated goods for the elegance with which they set off a tailor-made dress and create a long waist and graceful figure. They are made in a variety of qualities, and are beautiful and inexpensive. Every pair stamped on busk Izod's Long Waisted, and also on lid of the box.——

To be had of all Drapers and Ladies' Outfitters in Europe, India, Canada, United States, Australia, the whole of the British Colonies, and throughout the world.——

Write for our Sheet of Drawings.

E. IZOD & SON, 30, MILK ST., LONDON, E.C.

Manufactory: LANDPORT, HANTS.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor :

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

BAKER'S NOVELTIES.

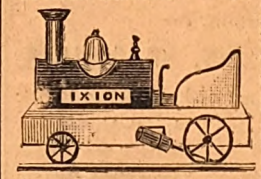
THE NEW "ECLIPSE" MODEL STEAM ENGINE.—The rage of the Season. These wonderful Engines work with a real oscillating cylinder (which if purchased by itself cost 1s.), strong metal boiler, funnel, large fly wheel, with pulley wheel attached for working other models, furnace, and filler complete. Carriage free 1s. 6d. Smaller size 1s.

Don't miss this grand opportunity.

THE MARVELLOUS "CHAMPION" SLIDE VALVE STEAM ENGINE.—As is no doubt well known, a slide valve cylinder is the most expensive kind made, and in fact our lowest for a slide valve cylinder itself is 7s., yet we now offer a large substantial Engine with powerful boiler, stand, furnace, fly wheel, pulley wheel, governors, metal supports, and slide valve cylinder, complete, 5s 6d., with whistle, water tap, steam tap, very superior, 10s. 6d. These engines are sufficiently powerful to work all the models sold by us.

THE EXPRESS STEAM LOCOMOTIVE.—A beautifully japanned locomotive, with all brass fittings, dome, whistle, safety valve, starting lever, 6 wheels (all flanged), and two powerful cylinders. Only 10s. 6d., free 11s.

THE "IXION" LOCOMOTIVE STEAM ENGINE.—A splendid locomotive engine on four wheels with funnel, safety valve, dome hand rails, starting lever, two powerful cylinders with furnace complete. The cheapest locomotive out. 5s., free 5s. 6d., or with whistle 5s. 6d., free 6s. Without name plate 4s. 6d., free 5s.



THE ECLIPSE ELECTRIC COIL.—We are offering the most wonderful value in Electric Coils for this Season, as special leading lines. Each one guaranteed to work, and to administer good strong shocks. No. 1 Coil is finished complete, and mounted on stand with handles and connecting wires. Price 1s., post free 1s. 9d. No. 2 Coil is a larger and more powerful ditto, better finished, and furnished with brass terminals, and is a very superior article, 2s. 6d., post free 2s. 9d. No. 3 Coil is equal to many charged 10s. 6d. for. This Coil has a regulating handle for increasing or decreasing the strength as required, and is fit for any Drawing Room, Bazaar, Lecture Hall, &c. Price 5s. 6d., post free 6s. No. 4, very handsome large Coil, with reversing motion, 10s. 6d. Any ordinary Bichromate Batteries will work these Coils, and as most people have batteries now-a-days, no further expense is incurred, but if needful, we supply a strong Bichromate Battery suitable for working No. 1 and 2 Coils for 1s. 3d., post free; or a larger ditto for the 5s 6d and 10s. 6d. Coil, for 2s, post free 2s. 4½d. We now give a small Battery free with every Coil sold.

THE ELECTRICAL DANCING NIGGER.—A great curiosity and a wonderful working model. The climax of electrical ingenuity and skill. By means of a powerful Electro Motor and Battery the Nigger will dance on the platform for half-an-hour at a time. A capital window attraction. Nigger, Motor, Battery, Platform, Connecting Wires, and everything complete. Price 3s. 6d., carriage free 3s. 10d.

ELECTRIC MOTORS for working Models, Machinery, &c.—All guaranteed to work, and spendid value for money. A beautiful little Motor on stand complete, only 1s., free 1s. 3d. No. 2 size much larger ditto, better finished and more powerful, with fittings, 2s. 6d., free 2s. 9d. No. 3 size, a really superior and very powerful motor, on polished stand, with brass wheel, brass terminals, and fittings, 5s. 6d., free 6s. Any bichromate battery will work these, or we supply battery for Nos. 1 and 2 Motors for 1s., free 1s. 3d.; and a powerful ditto for No. 3 for 2s., free 2s. 4½d.

Grand Illustrated Novelty Catalogue, 64 pp., 1,000 Illustrations. 1*d. stamp.*

BAKER & COMPANY, 34, Beech Street, Barbican, London, E.C.

BE ADVISED

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities, as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states:—"Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA COMPANY, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

PEARSON'S EXTRA CHRISTMAS NUMBER.—Now on Sale.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 307.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 17, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

RAW-BONED HEROISM

"IT isn't until you try to light your pipe with your last match that you realise what is meant by 'the four winds of heaven,'" said John Wray.

He was lying flat on his chest as he said this, and his words were addressed to a very lean-bodied specimen of the genus lizard, that stood on its tail a few feet from him, blinking at him out of its round dull eyes. In Mr. Wray's mouth was a short black pipe, and in his fingers a wax vesta, very dirty and very limp; that he had fished up, a minute since, from the depth of his breeches' pocket.

It was to escape the wind that Mr. Wray lay on his chest, and to gain the shelter of two large sandstone boulders that stood together and formed a little natural cavern.

S-s-s-s-cratch! Whiz-z-z! Bang!

The lean lizard fled away in mad affright. The match ignited, flickered for one brief instant, and then went out. John Wray threw away its scorched stump in mute disgust, put his "cutty" back in his pocket, mounted his horse, and rode on.

"Another defeated project!" he exclaimed, when he had gone a hundred yards. "To think that I have been to the trouble of filling my pipe, dismounting my horse, tying the brute up and scratching my hand on some infernal thorns in the bush I tied him to, and all for nothing! Heigho!"

He shaded his eyes with his hand and looked anxiously ahead.

"No sign of human habitation yet," he muttered.

The path he followed was rugged and uneven, and based its claim to be called a path on the fact that two months previously, in the rainy season, a heavy waggon had passed over its course and left the impression of its broad wheels on the miry ground; which impression had since been indelibly stamped in the hard soil by the heat of the sun. On either side of the path stretched a seemingly limitless plain, diversified at wide intervals by a tiny hillock of ironstones or a clump of milk-bushes.

The horizon was dimmed and blurred by a light mist, having in it shades of green and pink, that betokened the speedy fall of night. The heavens were cloudless, and the red sun, looking like the palm of a blood-dyed hand, was throwing up long streaks of crimson and gold to mingle with the pale blue of the sky.

Soon it would be dark, densely dark, till the sun rose, and in this interval of darkness John Wray reached Sin Point.

Sin Point is a little mining station, consisting of some thirty log houses and the inevitable drinking booth. A mile from its confines John Wray passed a solitary traveller, who rode an exhausted pony. This traveller peered curiously into John Wray's face as that gentleman clattered noisily past him on the hard track, but gave him no salutation, and made no attempt to follow him closely.

Standing on the outskirts of Sin Point, some fifty yards from the other houses, was a single one-storey tenement. At the entrance to this isolated dwelling John Wray reined in his horse, and, dismounting, rapped noisily with the heavy handle of his riding-whip on the wooden panels of the door. A woman, dressed in an ill-fitting gown and wearing on her head a hideous sun-bonnet, answered his summons.

"Who is it?" she cried, shading her eyes with her hand and peering into the darkness. "If it's you, Hank, your trousers ar'n't done yet."

"It's not Hank," said John Wray.

The woman started, and laid her hand on the door-post for support.

"John!" she cried.

"Yes, John," was the reply. "John Wray, your erring husband, come back like the prodigal son to partake of the fatted veal, or anything else that is appetising and forthcoming. Is there any place where I can put up this poor, tired brute?"

"Come with me," the woman said, and took the horse's bridle in her hand and led the way to a little shed in the rear of the building. "You can put him there," she said, pointing to the interior of this shed. "There's corn in the corner, and two buckets of water. He can have those."

John Wray unbridled his steed, washed out its mouth, placed before it the heap of corn, and then turned and faced the woman.

"And now you can get my supper ready," he said.

"Yes, John," said Hannah.

He followed her back to the room from which she had emerged to admit him, and sat down on a chair beside the blazing log-fire.

"Bustle, Hannah!" he said.

"Yes, John," said Hannah.

She stood a little behind him, with one hand resting on her bosom; and though she said "Yes, John," very meekly, made no attempt to obey him.

"Come, bustle!" repeated John impatiently. "I'm hungry, and dog-tired into the bargain. Don't stand there looking at me!"

Still Hannah hesitated.

"You have been away four years," she said simply.

"Is it as long as that?" he remarked as he kicked the fire

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

The woman laid her hand on the doorpost for support.

with his heavy boot and scattered a shower of sparks upon the hearth. "It doesn't seem as many months."

"To me it has been a lifetime," she said. "John, have you no kind word for me? Believe me, I bear no ill-will towards you."

"I never met the woman who could bear ill-will towards me—for longer than five minutes at any rate," said John Wray, passing his white fingers through his long black hair, and half unconsciously arranging a phantom necktie. "Come, Hannah, you're not pretty enough to indulge in heroics. An ugly woman talking sentiment is an abomination. I can't stand raw-boned heroism. That's agreed."

"May I kiss you, John?" his wife said humbly.

"When I've had my dinner you may," he replied. "'Pleasure first, duty afterwards,' has always been my motto."

Hannah sighed, and said no more. Soon a hot repast was on the table, and John began to eat.

"Don't talk to me whilst I'm eating," he said, when Hannah ventured a timid remark. "If I answer you with my mouth full, my words will get mixed up with my food, and I shall have to swallow them. No man likes to eat his words, you know."

At last his appetite was appeased.

"Now you may kiss me," he said, as he drew his pipe from his pocket.

His wife availed herself of this gracious permission, and then sat down on the buffalo rug at his feet and looked at him whilst he smoked.

"Well, and what have you been doing in my absence, sweet wife?" he asked.

"My life has been smooth and uneventful," she said. "The miners have been very good to me. I wash and mend their clothes, and they in return provide me with food and give me money, and do anything for me that I am unable to do for myself. That is all. What have you been doing?"

"Many things that I shall not tell you of; many things that would interest you; some that would not, and some that would merely pain you. I shall only tell you of these last things."

"Thank you, John," said Hannah, with a touch of fine sarcasm that was involuntary.

"Look at me, my dutiful wife!" said John, melodramatically. "Am I not handsome? Am I not clever? Am I not your master and you my slave? There are some men who go to the dickens on horseback. I am one of such men, and I have killed many steeds of the devil's providing in my time.

"First steed, my uncle's fortune, which I ran through in two years. Second steed, my father's fortune—I rode that to death in fifteen months. Then I walked for a bit. I walked past your house. I walked into a coal shaft and broke my arm. You found me lying there—doubtless my immobility was picturesque—and walked into your heart. I was taken to your home and tended. My broken arm became complicated by a malignant fever. You nursed me through my illness into convalescence, and then your father borrowed my fever, and it took him to heaven. He left you his fortune. I married you, and mounted my third steed. It has lasted me three years.

"My fourth steed was a sorry hack—an appointment at three hundred a year, in some Government hole, which a lordly relative of mine placed at my disposal. In a month it was on its knees; but ere it fell I mounted, by its aid, a better horse. Unfortunately this better horse led me into the wilds of the Criminal Code, and I came a nasty cropper over a forgery hurdle.

"I fled from England, taking you with me in my flight because I couldn't get rid of you. We came here, and soon I mounted my sixth steed—a nice little filly which the miners here christened "A Streak of Luck."

"On this filly I rode away, four years ago, and betook myself to Cape Town, where I have been going to the dickens at a rare pace. Two months ago my horse fell badly, and I was thrown. I left Cape Town and journeyed north to see if I could get a 'pony' or two from you—excuse the pun if you see it! On my way hither I mounted my seventh steed. It's only a poor flesh-and-blood horse that I stole from the man I have been travelling with. You have seen it, for it's in your stable now. If its owner catches me, I shall mount my eighth steed—the end of a rope—and that will take me home!"

He rose, knocked the ashes from his pipe, and laughed gaily.

"How much money have the miners given you in these four years?" he asked.

"I don't know. About a hundred pounds, I think."

"Only four ponies! Well, I suppose I must put up with them."

"But you cannot stay here," said Hannah. "The miners have sworn an oath that if you ever return they will lynch you. You stole Hank Davison's best horse when you went away, and—and—besides——"

She hesitated.

"And besides," he concluded, "these men are filled with honest indignation because I deserted you. Don't worry yourself, my sweet wife, I don't want to stay. Where's your money?"

"If you will only take me away with you you shall have it all—every penny," said Hannah. Then she came and laid her face on her husband's knee and clasped his hands in hers, and cried:

"May I kiss you, John?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, John, dear John! do, do take me with you. I will go as your servant, as your slave. I have been so lonely without you all these years. Take me to your heart again. I believe you loved me once. You sneer. I know that I am ugly and stupid, and you are so beautiful and clever. But, oh, John! if only for the sake of that tiny second life you gave me—if only for the sake of our dead child!—take me back to your heart; try to love me! I will be dutiful as I have always been.

"And, John, I know you will be angry with me for saying it, but you don't know—you don't know!—try to think sometimes that there is a God! Let me lead your thoughts upward to Him! Let me——"

"Hush!" cried John, suddenly rising with a blanched face, and shaking off her clinging hands. "What's that?"

Hannah listened in silence. Faintly audible to her ears was the sound of many horses and the confused hum of a babel of angry voices. The sounds drew nearer—nearer—nearer!

"It's the miners!" cried Hannah. "They know you are here! Quick—quick, John! Run—hide! My God! My God! how can I save him?"

. . . . . .

An hour after John Wray passed him on the road, Bob Radd, the traveller who rode an exhausted pony, entered Peter Bittle's bar, and dropped in the midst of the miners congregated there a metaphorical bomb. The explosion was four words dramatically uttered, and the four words were these:

"Jack Wray's come back!"

At first the miners were speechless with astonishment. They then crowded round their informant, and rained on him a perfect deluge of hot inquiries. As it was impossible to answer all of these, Bob Radd answered none, but called for a glass of whiskey, and waited till the storm of questions had in some measure subsided.

"'Ow do I know?" he cried, when comparative silence was restored. "'Ow do I know? Didn't I see 'im wi' my own eyes not a mile from 'ere? Warn't 'e a ridin' as fine a blood stallion as any on yer 'ere ever clapt eyes on? An' didn't I, to make sure on 'im, peep through Tant Wray's winder as I come up 'ere, an' see 'im awolfin' down 'is dinner, while 'is poor desarted wife stood by 'im awatchin' 'im as if he was a gord? Ain't I seen it all wi' my own eyes? 'Ow do I know, indeed! I reckon I ought to know, anyway?"

Hank Davison stood out from his fellows and held up a large, impressive hand.

"Mates," he said, "yer remember what we said four years agone? Yer reckerlect yer oath?"

"We do!" they made answer, waving their hands.

"An' yer still o' the same mind?"

"We air!"

"Is it the end of a rope?"

"It is!"

"Then come along, Git yer 'osses out. The cuss 'as got a good mount from all accounts, an' 'e may try ter give us the slip."

The miners gave a whoop of savage delight, and scattered. Soon they reassembled, mounted everyone, and went their way towards Hannah Wray's cabin at a rapid trot.

The full African moon had risen, and was flooding the countryside with its silver radiance. By its light all stood out clearly and distinctly—the sprawling milk-bushes, the tiny hillocks, the shallow pools that the fierce sun had yet left, and the little log habitations of the miners, with their covering of white plaster.

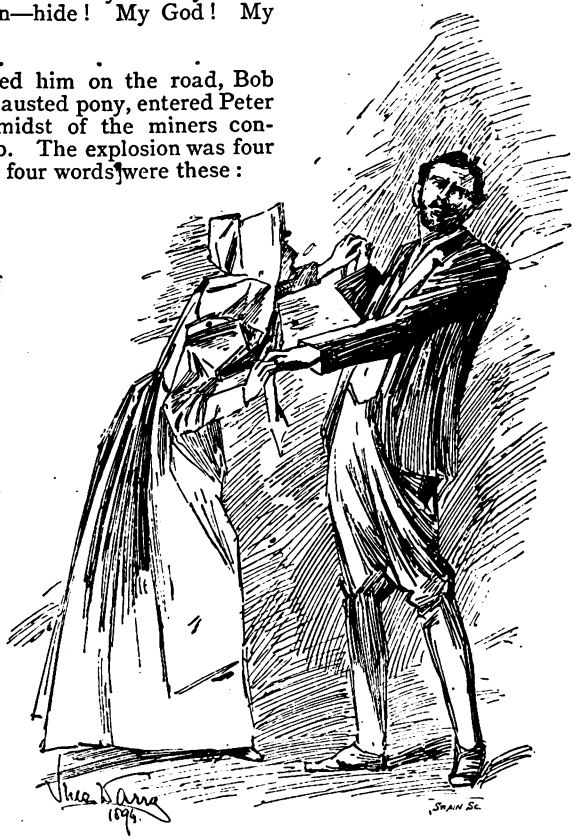
Swiftly the cavalcade moved along towards Hannah Wray's abode; but ere they reached it they saw a huge white horse dash out from the shadow of its farther side, and speed away across the moonlit plain.

"That's 'im!" screamed Bob. "That's 'is dandy black coat! Them's 'is fine ridin' boots! That's 'is long black 'air! That's 'is 'orse'. That's 'im. After 'im, mates; don't let the Gord-forsaken galoot git off this time!"

"We kin all spare the skunk, so don't spare 'im, any on yer," yelled Hank Davison with grim, paradoxical humour.

"Shoot 'im, if yer git near enough, as yer'd shoot a sprawlin' jackle!"

No need had Hank's companions for any such adjuration. Each was thirsting for the blood of the fugitive, and soon Sin Point was left in the darkness behind them—deserted, forsaken. Over the loose, sandy soil that clung to the horses' hoofs and fell in heavy showers about them, over the dried-up beds of erstwhile swollen sloots; through clinging, thorn-clad bushes that tore the skins of the horses and riders till the soil was stained with their dripping blood; slipping, falling, stumbling, jostling, leaping, flying, cursing, hallooing, the band of rude avengers bore down on their hapless quarry. But he was better mounted than they, and had his horse been fresh would soon have left them far behind.



"Hush!" cried John. . . . "What's that?"

As it was, he held his lead easily. A mile was swiftly covered—two, three—till Sin Point was a couple of leagues behind, and still the stern chase continued. But now the rough, heavy horses of the miners began to lose pace. One by one they fell out of the race till only Hank Davison was left of the whole party, and even his steed gave signs of weariness.

"'E shan't escape!" cried Hank savagely, and he drove his heels into the horses ribs, and strove to urge it to greater speed.

But even as the words were uttered his jaded steed stumbled and fell heavily, and Hank was pitched forward on his hands and knees. In an instant, however, he was on his feet again. Swiftly he brought the rifle that hung across his back round to his shoulder and fired at the fugitive.

"Missed! by all that's unlucky—missed!" he cried, for the flying figure on ahead still held its course unmoved.

Then, suddenly, Hank saw it reel heavily and fall to the ground.

"Hooroar!" he shouted, turning and beckoning wildly to his comrades far behind. "I've hit 'm! We've dropped our bird at last!"

An answering cheer came faintly on the night air to his ears. With a run Hank approached that huddled heap upon the ground, which the riderless horse, now lost in the darkness, had left, and sunk on his knees beside it.

It lay face downward in the loose sand. As Hank stooped to turn it over a flying cloud obscured the moon, and all was dark. A horror, that was all the more horrible by reason of its indefiniteness, filled the miner's soul. He buried his face in his hands and prayed for a gleam of light. It came at last, touching reverently the dead form, and Hank discovered that he held in his arms the lifeless form of her who had once been the living, loving woman—Hannah Wray.

. . . . . .

John Wray mounted his eighth horse on the first anniversary of his wife's death; and, as he had predicted, his eighth horse took him home.

The Extra Christmas Number of Pearson's Weekly will be published on Thursday, November 15th, and will consist of 32 pages. Price Threepence.

Digitized by Google

THE ROMANCE OF A RING.

"A LADY, Major."

The constable bowed slightly, as with a gesture he intimated to the caller, who had waited for nearly half an hour in the ante-room, that she was at liberty to enter the inner office.

The District Superintendent of Police, standing upon the threshold where he had dismissed his last visitor, looked attentively at the heavily veiled figure which moved toward him. Placing a chair for her beside his desk, he seated himself at his official post and waited for her to speak.

Without any hesitation she threw aside her veil, glancing round the office, as if particularly curious as to her surroundings. She was a woman of about thirty years of age, whose face, though wearing an expression of the profoundest melancholy, was remarkably lovely and interesting.

"I have come to you for advice," she said, looking questioningly at the Superintendent.

He was a thin, wiry little man, who, with the tips of his forefingers pressed closely together, was regarding her keenly through his half-shut eyes.

"I shall be most happy to give it, madam."

The lady smiled slightly—it was plain to see that she smiled seldom—at a suggestion in his tone.

"Perhaps your advice is oftener asked than taken?" she said. "That is no unusual occurrence anywhere, and may I say frankly that it is quite probable I may not act upon yours."

The Superintendent bowed impressively, a twinkle in his keen, half-shut eyes.

"A diamond ring," she began, "has been stolen from my writing-desk, and under peculiar circumstances. The drawer in which it was placed was intended for a jewel-casket, and even its existence was known only to myself. I put the ring into the drawer last night at about eleven o'clock. This morning it was gone, and I have not the least clue to its disappearance."

"What position did the drawer occupy?" the Superintendent asked, as she paused a moment.

"It was at the back of another drawer, which had to be taken out before the jewel-casket could be reached. It was opened by touching a secret spring."

"And the desk itself?"

"Was made to order for me, some years ago."

"You say no one but yourself knew of the existence of this drawer?"

"No one but the cabinet-maker, and—my husband—who died three years ago."

The tones died away in a whisper. So the confirmed melancholy of the face, the heavy crape shrouding the slender figure—these were accounted for.

"I must know something of your house—your family, madam."

"My house is an ordinary one—33, South Crescent. It is, I believe, the middle house. My bedroom is the second floor back The desk stands near the window, and at right-angles with it. I have no family except my servants—a housekeeper, whose son lives in the house, and a man cook."

"What is your opinion of the honesty of these persons?"

"The cook has never, to my knowledge, entered those rooms. My housekeeper, an old lady and dear friend, is above suspicion. So, also, is her son."

The Superintenent shrugged his shoulders significantly.

"You probably, in your profession, suspect everybody," the lady said, a little sharply.

"Pardon, madam, not everybody. Is her son employed about the house?"

"He—I at one time employed him as a coachman, but he was not trustworthy."

"Yet above suspicion, you say?"

"He is too fond of his glass. I do not believe he is a thief. Last night he did not come home at all."

"Ah!"

"You seem to attach some significance to that fact?"

"That is inevitable."

"I mentioned it simply to prove that he was——"

The Superintendent nodded, in a manner which said that the logic of a lady was often unlike that of a police-officer, and that different conclusions might be drawn from the same premises.

"You are sometimes away from home?" he said, in an interrogative tone.

"Very seldom. My life is a secluded one. This is the first time I have been out of doors for over a month, and I receive no visitors."

"No one has ever seen you open this drawer?"

"No one, I am positive."

"And there is nothing missing but the ring?"

"There was nothing else in the drawer—in the house. My other jewels—I wear no ornaments now of any kind, but I had many at the time this drawer was made for them—have been for months in the care of the Safe Deposit Company."

"Was the ring marked, madam?"

"Yes."

"In what way?"

"A date and initials—mine and ——"

"Your late husband's?"

"Not my husband's."

The Superintendent was studying with great interest the point of a pencil which he had picked up from his desk.

"Are you willing to tell me why this was the only piece of jewellery you kept in the house? Not unless you are willing, you understand," he added as she shrank a little.

"I will tell you, certainly," she said, in so frank a voice that he wondered how he could have supposed her reluctant. "Because it is the only link between me and a past which is precious. It was the only thing worth keeping in all my miserable and disappointed life. So much for the sentiment of the matter, if you care to hear it; though no one who could in any possible way be connected with it is now living."

"Your doors were locked on the night in question?"

"As they always are. I am a light sleeper, too, always. But, above all, sir," she added with great emphasis, "bear in mind what I have told you of the construction of this drawer. I would have risked that desk in the hands of fifty burglars. The jewel casket could not have been discovered unless the desk was broken to pieces. Now, have you any theory about it?"

"One—and it must be the correct one, or my experience goes for nothing. The ring was taken by your housekeeper's son."

"Impossible!"

"I merely give you my opinion."

The lady looked greatly distressed.

"Are you willing that the young man should be watched for a few days? He need never know that he is an object of suspicion, unless we have reason to believe him guilty?"

"I will trust it to your judgment, sir," the lady said reluctantly.

The Superintendent drew toward him a memorandum-book.

"Your name, please?" he asked, as he wrote down the number of the house she had incidentally mentioned.

"Mrs. Westerton."

Digitized by Google

"And the young man?"

"John Cheyne, at present employed in Holley's Parcel Office, Broad Street."

"Do not fear, madam, that we shall disturb him now, or at any future time, without your express permission."

The Superintendent of Police was as practical and prosaic a man as could be found anywhere; but he was completely fascinated by the lady's face and manner. Her voice, too—it was wonderfully musical, but the saddest he had heard in his life.

"Nonsense!" he mentally ejaculated, ten minutes after she had left him. "At my time of life! Sixty-two, and as bald as ——"

He rubbed his hands vigorously over his head, and then set as vigorously to work on a pile of papers lying on his desk.

On his way home that night he called upon Captain Farleigh, the Divisional Superintendent, one of the most valued men in the force—the intimate friend and confidant of his Chief.

"Queer case to-day, Farleigh," the Chief Superintendent began, caressing a little Scotch terrier, which showed extravagant delight at his presence. And he related all the details of his interview with Mrs. Westerton.

The Captain looked interested.

"You're on the right track, no doubt. The idea of your fascinating caller knowing anything of the way in which such rascalities are carried on."

"And her house is only a stone's throw from this station," the Superintendent remarked. "It will be easy for you to keep an eye on it for a while—see who goes out and comes in. I believe every syllable she says; and yet—put Willis on the track of this young Cheyne. He's a lynx, Willis is, and if there's any crooked work going on he'll get at it in no time. I'd give a good deal to recover that ring for her—I admit that much, Farleigh." And with a laugh the Chief Superintendent passed out into the street.

It was several days before the two men met again.

"Anything going on at 33, South Crescent?" the Chief asked, pointing with his thumb over his shoulder in the direction of the house.

Captain Farleigh shook his head.

"The hinges of the front door have a good chance to grow rusty this rainy weather," he remarked. "I doubt if the door has been opened since the lady passed through it to go to you. Lang has grown quite excited over it—had a glimpse of the lady's face once at the window, and has raved over her ever since as wildly as you did. I believe he's watching the house by night as well as by day, though I've no idea what for. Perhaps he has."

"How about the suspicious John Cheyne?"

"I should judge from Willis's report that he's about as harmless an idiot as you could find—knows enough to get drunk occasionally; but even then generally has some one at his elbow to jog it for him. He never took that ring—that I could swear to—unless it was left under his nose."

"Who did it, then?"

"A question easier asked than answered."

The Chief shrugged his shoulders.

"I hate to find myself so far out of my reckoning. I'd counted on making an easy job of this matter. Positively I was fool enough to believe that I could find that ring in the first pawnbroker's shop, and so far I've not discovered it. There's a further development in that diamond-ring case, Farleigh. I had another note from the lady this morning."

"Another note? You don't mean to say that——"

"Yes, I've written to her several times."

"And what in the world——"

"About the ring, of course. I've told her what we were doing, and how little reason young Cheyne had given to confirm my suspicions of him. I knew that would please her, as it's easy to see that she's mighty fond of the boy's mother."

The Captain was laughing, and as the Chief slapped him on the shoulder he laughed in his turn.

"Oh, it's no use. I'm not such a fool as that—don't believe it! But it's been a little excitement—a little recreation. It's done me good, and I warrant it hasn't hurt her. Hurt her! That woman has done one hurt, if I'm not mistaken, that will last her for her life. And every breath she breathes is devoted to the memory of some dear love or other. Happy Ghost. I'd almost be willing to change places with him, whoever or whatever he is. 'Tisn't her husband, that's certain. Look at this!"

As he spoke he took from his pocket and unfolded the note of which he had spoken, pointing to the elaborate monogram at the top of the sheet.

"That's superb," the Captain said, examining it with great interest.

The Superintendent read the note aloud:

"Mrs. Westerton desires to again express her sincere thanks to the Superintendent of Police for the great interest which he has shown in the matter upon which his advice was solicited, but begs that he will make no further investigation, as she has reason to believe that she has herself found the clue to the disappearance of her property."

Captain Farleigh gave a low whistle, and then laughed.

"Your correspondence does not seem to have passed beyond the first formalities."

"I can't flatter myself that it ever would, but I've taken no end of comfort just in those. It's easy enough to see how a man could break his heart over a woman like that. I should pity a fellow who loved her hopelessly—mind you, I don't propose to try that little experiment myself. I wish you could see her for yourself once. But, sentiments aside, I should like to know what clue she has found in this business, and I'm blest if I don't find out!"

He did this in a straightforward way. He called in person the next day at 33, South Crescent, and was ushered in by the housekeeper, through the seldom used front door, into a tiny, but magnificently furnished, reception room. He sent up no card.

"A gentleman on business," was the message delivered by the servant to her mistress.

Mrs. Westerton did not keep her guest waiting. He heard instantly the rustle of her dress on the stairs, and as she sat facing him in the little room, she was lovelier, yet even sadder, if that were possible, than she had seemed at their first interview.

Though her recognition was ready, and her greeting cordial, it seemed to her visitor as if it were the body only of the woman who stood there—as if the spirit was unconscious of his presence. He found more difficulty than he had anticipated in opening the conversation.

"You will not think it strange, perhaps, Mrs. Westerton, that I have not only a great deal of interest, but no little curiosity, in the matter you confided to me, and more than ever since your note of yesterday. You may consider me presumptuous, but my object in calling was to ask you if you are willing to tell me on whom your suspicion rests—what clue you have found to this most mysterious robbery. The more I have thought of this case, the more it has puzzled me."

Mrs. Westerton made an uneasy motion with her hands, which were lying in her lap. She glanced about the room, out of the window, then back to his face again. For the first time since she had entered the room she seemed to be conscious of herself and of him.

"I don't know, after all, why I should not tell you," she began, in a voice that sounded faint and far off. "My husband, whom I thought dead long ago, is still living. I told you, you remember, that he knew the secret of the jewel-casket."

The Superintendent gazed at her in amazement.

"But, even then," he said, after a long pause, "how could——"

The lady made an impatient gesture.

"Don't ask me any questions as to how he could do anything. You might like to know what my life has been for the last ten hideous years— since I was George Westerton's wife! I married him from pique—while angry with the only man whom I really cared for—and he married me for my money. It was a fair bargain—that is, neither of us tried to deceive the other, though he was a much worse man than I ever suspected. I found it out quickly enough—after I had married him. No doubt it was he himself who three years ago sent me notice of his own death. I believe now that it was another of the

With each Number a Splendid Coloured Plate, measuring 19½ inches by 14½ inches, will be given away.

Digitized by Google

countless traps he was continually setting for me—Heaven knows why! We both knew that the man to whom I was engaged before my marriage was killed in Australia. He certainly could trust me with all the rest of the world—after that."

"And you have seen him?"

"No. My housekeeper has, however. Accidentally, at the window of one of the houses at the back of this one—a lodging-house. And he has taken my ring; I am sure of it. There's no use in asking me how; I don't know."

It was a woman's unreasoning conviction. It admitted no argument.

. . . . . .

"A queer affair, altogether," the Chief remarked that night to Captain Farleigh, as they sat confidentially together. "I've no doubt that Mrs. Westerton's theory is the correct one. It's plausible enough. I'd like to get a good hold on that fellow, but she won't listen to it, even though she admits that she'd give five years of her life for that ring. Little she cares now for fifty years of it, I fancy."

"It must have been a rather unsatisfactory interview, almost as unsatisfactory as the correspondence, now that you find that she's not the widow of some saint, but the wife of some scoundrel. I know you hate to give up when you've undertaken to find out anything, so you ought to have some comfort in knowing where the ring has probably gone to, even if you don't quite——"

He stopped abruptly as two officers entered the police-station, having in custody a man—a gentleman, he might be called, judging from his dress alone. But his well-made clothes were bespattered with the mud of the street. His hat was gone, his dishevelled hair and bleeding face made him a pitiable object to look upon.

With the group was a fourth person, an elderly man, who followed them in a state of great excitement.

"This is the man, sir," he said rapidly, addressing Captain Farleigh, "whom the police hunted for two years ago to answer for the forgery in the Barford Bank robbery. The very man, sir!—I know! Call on me for evidence. I'm on my way out of town on business to-night; but I'll be back to-morrow, sir, and early, sir, to help this rascal to his place in gaol, sir!"

With a menacing glance at the man so designated, and a hasty comparison of his watch with the clock of the police-station, he rushed out again into the street.

"The gentleman recognised him," one of the policemen explained, "and there was a street fight before we got to them. If this had been loaded it might have made short work of somebody," and he laid a pistol on the desk; "that is, if he had not been too drunk to use it. I had to call for help before I could capture him, drunk as he is."

"Your name?" the Captain demanded of the prisoner, his pencil suspended in his fingers.

The man made no reply. He had fixed his eyes on the face of the questioner, while a curious change passed over his own.

"Your prisoner is not so drunk as you think, Willis," the Captain remarked, sotto voce. "What's your name?" he repeated.

"Do you ask that question in your social or professional capacity, Bertram Farleigh?" was the man's reply. "You do not seem to have the pleasure of my acquaintance, though I have long had the pleasure and honour of yours."

The Captain eyed him sharply, though with very little curiosity.

"Your name?" he asked impatiently.

"Perhaps you will be more interested in that of—Heloise Sayre!"

The Captain, with a blanched face, stared at him as if paralysed, then rose suddenly and passed his hand over his eyes.

"Search him!" he said, shortly, to one of the officers.

"How's this, Farleigh?" And the Chief Superintendent laid his hand on the younger man's shoulder, while his eyes twinkled. "I'd no idea that you ever had a weakness for any woman under the sun. How is it?"

There was a sharp, metallic click as something taken from the prisoner's pocket fell on the floor and rolled to the feet of the Superintendent.

He picked it up. It was a diamond ring of great beauty, in a peculiar setting.

"I'm getting to be a monomaniac on the diamond ring subject," he said with a laugh. "Here, tell me if it's marked, I'm afraid to look at it myself for fear that it isn't hers."

"About one chance in a—Great Heaven!"

"Recognise it, do you?" the prisoner exclaimed, as he watched the little transaction. "I thought you would. 'Tisn't so very many years ago since you had the best of it, and I hated you accordingly. Not that I cared so much for her, but I wanted my own way, and I got it—with her, and her money, too! You can return the ring with my compliments, so long as I can't help myself; and if she's curious as to how I got it, tell her I've been a neighbour of hers for some time—could watch her back window from mine, and didn't find it very hard this midsummer weather—with windows wide open—to make a visit to her desk."

The Captain turned suddenly toward his Chief.

"Do you hear? Do you understand?" he demanded; but the Superintendent had left the police-station.

"Heloise was never particularly happy with me," the man went on, notwithstanding the attempts of the officers to check his speech. "She might have been if she'd married Captain Farleigh. I told her you had been killed in Australia. Queer business you've drifted into Bertram Farleigh."

The man had been thoroughly searched. A miscellaneous collection taken from his pockets lay on the Captain's desk; but the Captain, with an expression on his face so new and strange as to attract even the attention of the officers, fingered the pistol which lay near the rest of the man's possessions.

"This should do good service for once if it were loaded," he said, with dry white lips. "I know you now; I swore long ago that I would have the life of the man who married Heloise Sayre if I ever found out who he was!"

"Better put it down, though," the man sneered, "and treat me to a better sort of hospitality, as I've come to spend the night with you."

The Captain raised the pistol and held it aimed at the man's head, while his breath came hard and fast.

"Farleigh! What's this?"

He turned quickly to face the Chief Superintendent, who, with a dexterous movement, sent the pistol flying across the room. A lady stood by the Chief, gazing at Captain Farleigh.

"Bert, Bert!" she gasped, in a half whisper and with dilated eyes. Beyond him she saw her husband. She turned to the Superintendent, clinging to him for support.

"Why have you brought me here?" she asked in a husky voice.

"To identify this man—this ring," and he took up the jewel. "You will not refuse now to let the law protect you—to take——"

"This is a most unexpected pleasure, Heloise," George Westerton sneered, looking at his wife; "but since you're here, I'd like to ask where's the rest of the jewellery you used to keep in your writing-desk cabinet? I looked for it a few days ago, and if I'd found it I shouldn't have been in this hole. I kept the ring by me as a sort of small change, you know, in case I should need it. But the game's up. It never was worth the candle. Give my respects to the old gentleman when he calls in the morning. He's right enough about the bank business. You can keep the pistol to remember me by, Bertram Farleigh. Ta-ta."

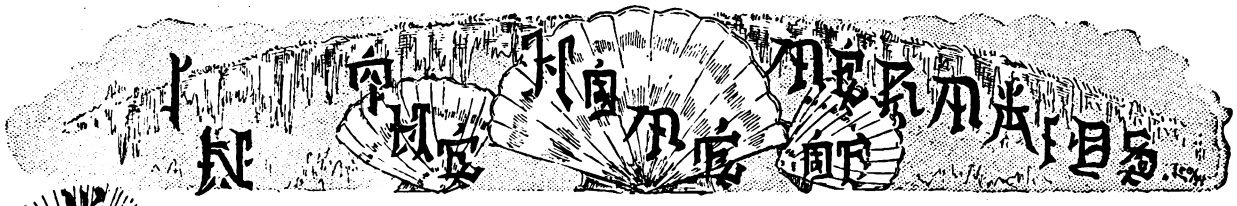
With a quick movement he drew from the lining of his sleeve a small dirk-knife. It flashed in the light for an instant, and then he plunged it into his heart.

With a shriek, she hid her face upon the Chief Superintendent's shoulder, and, with his arm about her, he led her out of the police-station.

It was not more than ten minutes before he returned. Captain Farleigh was alone. Upon a bench, his face covered with a handkerchief, lay the body of the suicide, whose blood stained the floor.

"Mrs. Westerton has her ring once more, Farleigh," the Chief Superintendent said quietly. "I put it back on her finger myself—for you. After awhile you will go and see it there. You have my permission, and my blessing, my boy!"

Digitized by Google



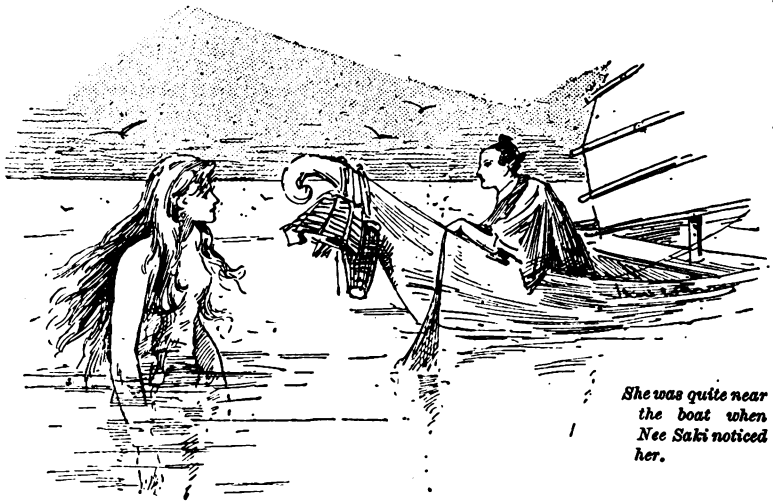
AMONG all the young men of Kishigato none were so handsome as Nee Saki. Kishigato was a village on the coast of Japan, but readers of SHORT STORIES will look in vain to find it on the map, for the name was changed long ago. Nee Saki was only a fisherman, but he was envied by the young men of the higher classes because of his jet-black hair, his bright eyes, his clear skin, his fine figure, his strength and alertness, and the easy grace of his movements.

Pretty girls of his own class looked upon him as one whose smile was worth winning, while the maidens of higher degree often wished that he had been born in their own class, or they in his, so that they might allow him to know how much they admired him, and how gratefully they would esteem his love.

Indeed, some of them could not command themselves so completely as to prevent their eyes lighting up when he happened to look straight at them; but Nee Saki was modest, and regarded the glances bestowed upon him as being the signs of kindly feeling only, rather than evidence of admiration, and of something even deeper.

Nee Saki might often have fallen in love, for many were the devices made by the maidens of Kishigato to draw him into the meshes of mutual admiration and affection. But the lad's heart was too full of love for his old father and mother to allow him to think of courting.

His days were spent in drawing finny prey from the depths of the sea, and in selling what he had caught. He was lucky as a fisherman, and brought to market the finest, largest, and sweetest fish caught in the waters surrounding the beautiful island.



She was quite near the boat when Nee Saki noticed her.

It followed as a matter of course that he prospered in the market, for apart from the excellence of his fish, it was a pleasure to buy from a lad who was as polite and obliging to his customers as he was good to his father and mother. As to his evenings, he spent them at home, telling his parents of his adventures on the seas and of his success in dealings with the people of the village.

Early one morning, Nee Saki went out in his boat as usual to fish, and was as lucky as ever. He was very light-hearted, and sung as he had often sung before. His songs were mostly of his own composition, telling of his fondness for the sea and his love for the pursuit that enabled him to bestow comfort upon his parents in their old age.

Very often when he had sung on other days he had seen mermaids at a distance sometimes drawing near to him and then hurrying away. Were it not that he was so modest he would have perceived that they were listening to his songs, and would have guessed that they wished to get a closer view of his handsome face, but lost courage as they drew nearer to him.

On this day one of the strange sea-maidens bolder than the rest led them all in their approach. One after another the others turned back, but this one came steadily on followed at last by only two or three, and finally deserted even by these. She was quite near the boat when Nee Saki noticed her for the first time. He had never seen among all the maidens on shore one who was half so beautiful. Certainly so strange a being he had never seen or dreamed of. Filled with wonder and admiration he sang no longer.

"Sing on, gentle youth," the mermaid said; "it is your singing that has made us your friends. We have kept the storm from your boat and lured the fish to your lines, for we love to have you near us. Gladly enough would we have you visit us in our beautiful home beneath the waves. There you would know nothing of toil, but would pass all the long day in pleasure."

"But my thoughts are not always of pleasure," Nee Saki replied; "and I enjoy my toil, for through it all I see the contented faces of my old father and mother. Making them happy is happiness to me. However, if it pleases you, I will sing, for singing lightens my toil."

So Nee Saki sang as he cast his lines and drew in many a fine fish. The mermaid listened, with her eyes fixed upon his face so steadily that soon he began to feel more inclined to look upon her lovely features than to watch his lines. Then, as his song grew more earnest in its praise of the sea, she joined him in tones so sweet that he paused to listen to her. Alone she sang, and her words and music filled him with such a longing to visit the wonderful home she described that he sat entranced. As he listened eagerly she began to float away with the tide.

"Come back! Come back, and go to my home with me," cried the young fisherman. But the mermaid sang and beckoned, going further away from him all the time. Father, mother, and the little home in the village, his many friends, and all else were forgotten in a moment, and, leaping into the sea, he swam swiftly to the side of the mermaid, who waited till he reached her, when both sank beneath the waves.

Nee Saki had been under the water often, for he was an expert diver, and from great depths he had looked up through the sea to admire the changing colours as the broken rays of light struggled down, down towards him. But he was not prepared for the sight that met his vision as he went deeper and deeper, his heart growing all the time lighter. Now and then some frightful fish, such as he had thought were known only to the writers of fables, rushed towards him as if to devour him, but turned back and hastened away when the mermaid waved her hand and placed herself between the monster and the youth. At length they reached a beautiful grotto, where flowers of rare beauty were seen on every hand. Sweet music filled Nee Saki's ears as the two entered.

"Here is our home," the mermaid said—"your home and mine."

A night and day were passed in bewildering pleasures.

The Number will consist almost entirely of Stories by Well-known Authors, profusely Illustrated throughout.

Digitized by Google

Another night and a day added to Nee Saki's new-found happiness, for the mermaid and her companions were busy every moment getting up some new surprise But on the third night Nee Saki could not rest. The forgotten home, with the old father and mother mourning for their son and wondering as to his fate came to him in dreams that caused him to waken weeping almost as soon as he would fall asleep. In the morning he was unhappy. Vainly his companion tried to cheer him, and her attendants were tireless in assisting her.

"I am weary of pleasure," Nee Saki said, when she asked him what troubled him. "I am weary of pleasure. I long to see my good old father and mother, from whom I have never been absent more than a day until now; and I long to be once more at the toil that gives them comfort. You must let me depart."

The mermaid pleaded with him to stay, but he would not listen. Go he must, and go he would. When she found him thus determined she sorrowfully prepared to guide him back to his boat. Just before departing she placed about his neck a golden chain to which a golden locket was attached.

"Keep it for my sake always," she said; "but for your own sake do not dare to open the locket."

Back towards the sunshine, with a heart lighter even than it had been as he descended into the waters, Nee Saki was conducted by the mermaid to where his boat lay dancing on the waves. His fish were as fresh as though he had just caught them, and as the mermaid left him with a sad parting song upon her lips, he turned the bow of his boat towards the shore and broke into a glad song about his home and parents.

So glad was he to be near home again that he did not notice the changes that had taken place on the shore during his absence. He paid no attention to the strange faces of the people whom he met as he hurried toward the home where he expected both welcome and reproof, nor did he notice the curious look with which the people regarded him. He had no patience for walking, but ran.

At last the street was reached where he had left his parents only a few days before, but he looked in vain for their cottage. He broke into a bitter cry.

"What ails thee, youth?" he was asked by an old man passing by.

He could not speak for weeping, except only to repeat the names of his father and mother.

"Why, those whom you name died a hundred years ago," the old man exclaimed.

"A hundred years ago! Why, thou sayest an untruth, old man," said the lad. "It is scarce three days since I saw them here, alive and well."

The old man shook his head in pity and passed on, saying, "Alas, poor boy, thou hast been forsaken by thy wits."

Night was near, and Nee Saki began to feel a strange dread. He clutched at the locket on his breast, and gazing upon it exclaimed:

"That sorceress of the sea has placed an evil spell on me. I will break it."

He opened the locket. It was a fatal thing to do. Held captive within had been the demons of a whole century, for Nee Saki had passed a hundred years with the mermaids. The demons fell upon him, and some of them started for the shore where he had left his boat. Those who stayed scratched deep wrinkles in his face and breathed upon his black locks until the hair grew thin and white. He tried to run from them, but tottered and fell. Weaker and weaker he grew through the night. In the morning those who first visited the spot where he fell found the corpse of an old, old man, and those who visited the shore where he landed found an old boat decayed and gone to pieces.

Found the corpse of an old, old man.

To Gain £200.

"I HAVE put up the shutters, sir."

"All right, Thomas; you can go home. And remember that you need not be here till eleven to-morrow. I am going over to Lanchester to spend the night, and shall not be back till then. I don't suppose we shall miss custom if we open a little later."

"I don't suppose we shall, sir," said Thomas with a smile. "There was nobody in till twelve to day—and not many after," he added to himself. "I'll be here at eleven to take the shutters down, sir," he said aloud, as he started for home.

Mr. Tom Gorville looked after him as he went. Then he said under his breath to himself:

"Well, if all goes well, you won't find any shutters to take down, my boy."

Mr. Tom Gorville had been a year in business at Lesterbury, and he had not prospered there. When he married and embarked all his little capital in the shop in the High Street his hopes had been very high. An optician was just what Lesterbury wanted. Although the town itself was a small one he would be able to count upon all the surrounding villages for custom and the gentlefolk of the neighbourhood would swarm to his shop for their magic-lanterns, field-glasses, and microscopes.

After the shop was taken, poor Gorville discovered that the gentlefolk took no interest in magic-lanterns or microscopes, or, if they did, they ran up to London for them, while the people of the place who wanted spectacles gave their patronage to a modest little man in a back alley, who had provided for their wants for twenty years before Gorville's advent.

It had not taken Gorville the whole year to find out that he had made a mistake. It seemed to him that he had ruined his career at the outset by one false step.

If he could but get rid of his debts he might still think of moving his stock into some more promising town, and beginning again there, much more modestly than he had done at Lesterbury. But unless he got money from somewhere his stock would be sold off by his creditors.

Digitized by Google

If he could but raise £200, he had said over and over again to himself, he could start again; but where was the money to come from? They had no rich friends. Edme, his wife, had gone up to London that day to see if she could coax a loan from her only well-to-do relative, a crusty bachelor uncle; but the prospect was not in the least hopeful, because the crusty bachelor uncle had never been known to unloosen his purse-strings to anybody.

Gorville had not the least hope from that direction, the only reason, in fact, why he had allowed his wife to take the journey was to further a last plan which had been building itself gradually in his mind, and which even Edme did not share. He was going to burn down his shop. The premium would be due again in three weeks' time, and with all his ready money spent on the year's living, Gorville saw not the slightest means of paying it.

Nothing is more terrible than the ease with which a man who has determined on wrong-doing can persuade himself that his crime is justifiable. It was only when the thought of his wife finding out what he meditated came into his mind that the plan seemed at all hideous to him.

Whatever happened, he told himself, Edme must never know. She would not see the affair in its right light at all—any more than the police and the insurance company would.

So his wife had left on a wild-goose chase to her uncle, where she was to stay the night, and, by the greatest of good fortunes, her brother at Lanchester, twelve miles away, had invited him to spend the night at his rooms. It seemed as if chance was assisting his designs.

"It must be to-night, if it is done at all," said the optician to himself, when his combined errand-boy and assistant left him alone in the house.

It was half-past eight. At nine he was to leave the house for the station to catch the train for Lanchester. Within half-an-hour, if the thing was to be done, he must take the final step. His plans had been prepared carefully.

Down in the cellar below the shop, which was crowded with packing-cases and straw, was a cheap American clock, with a piece of string attached to the hammer of the alarm. The string was connected with a delicately poised basin of acid, so that the slightest tug would overturn the liquid into another basin of chemicals beneath. The effect would be a sudden burst of flame which could not well fail to ignite the dry straw which Gorville had carefully laid close to it. Then, after the fire had burned a few minutes, and consumed the string tied to the alarm, what suspicion could possibly be aroused by the presence of two basins and a clock among the ruins in the cellar?

None at all. People might possibly shake their heads—they always do—and say with a sneer that it was very fortunate for Gorville and his wife both to be away on the very night that the premises were burned, that it was fortunate for Gorville to have the fire just as the insurance premium was due, and so on—but nobody could ever find out for a certainty that the fire was planned; the insurance company would have to pay him the £200, and his difficulties would be at an end.

Then he groped his way down to the cellar below the shop, struck a light, and wound up the alarm. Five minutes later he was in the street again, hurrying to catch the train.

. . . . . .

Tom Gorville found when he arrived at his brother-in-law's rooms that his host was not yet home. He had been called away on business, the landlady said; but hoped to be back before his guest's arrival. He had not come, however, and poor Tom was left to his own thoughts once more. He tried not to go back to the old question, telling himself that the deed was irretrievable.

There was certainly no train back to Lesterbury that night, but it was only twelve miles away, and, if he started to walk at once, he could get back before one o'clock. He had timed the alarm to go off at one, thinking that there would be less risk then of anybody being about to notice the fire and stop it before it had well begun. If he walked back he would just be in time to undo his work. But he let the opportunity pass, and did not start.

His brother-in-law came in after eleven, full of apologies and grumbling at the train, which had been delayed by an accident for two hours or more.

"You haven't seen Edme, then?" he said, as soon as he had taken off his greatcoat, and Tom looked puzzled.

"Edme? She is in London."

"Oh, no, she isn't," said her brother. "I met her on the platform at Clunted going home. She had changed her mind, she said; she was keeping a secret evidently. I asked her to come here with me, and promised to make myself a bed on the sofa, but Edme preferred going home. She said she would get there before you started, and if not you weren't to bother; she was awfully tired, and would just get herself a cup of tea and go to bed. I was sure to tell you not to hurry back on her account. What is the matter, man?"

For Gorville had sprung to his feet white and wild-eyed.

"Edme is at home?" he repeated hoarsely.

"Yes, sure to be, and asleep in bed by this time."

"Then, great Heaven, what have I done?" gasped Gorville, and groped his way out into the hall for his hat.

"My dear fellow, you can't go back to-night, there is no train," cried the brother, in astonishment; but Tom Gorville did not hear him, he was running as hard as he could in the direction of the railway station.

"There must be some train back," he kept telling himself; but the hope was a vain one. There was no way of getting to Lesterbury that night by rail. His next thought was to run, but there was only an hour and a half left now before the fire he had planned would spring into being to destroy his loved wife, and the distance was twelve miles.

Outside the station, however, he found a cab, the horse in good condition, and by dint of wild promises which he hoped to fulfil somehow, he managed to persuade the man to start at a fairly good rate on the twelve miles' journey.

It was a quarter-past one when they reached the High Street, and all was dark and still. With a great throb of relief Gorville noticed that the shop was still standing untouched. But when he opened the door he found that the house was full of smoke.

With a beating heart he groped his way up to his wife's room on the floor above, fearing to think what he might find there. The smoke was not dense, but the conscience-stricken apprehension made him almost certain Edme would be dead.

He was more frightened still when he found the room empty. There were signs that his wife had been in the place, but she was there no longer, and poor Tom Gorville pursued his search through the smoke-filled house with greater and greater dread. He was making his way down to the cellar where he had planned the fire, when, in passing through the shop, a faint light appeared in the opposite doorway, and Edme herself came towards him with a candle in her hand.

Her face was pale and distraught, and she made no attempt to greet him. She stood in the doorway at the farther end of the shop, and looked at him with sad eyes.

It was a great relief to him to find her uninjured; but, somehow, he could not feel any happiness or sense of relief. The look in his wife's eyes froze every emotion. The silence was painful.

Gorville struggled to break it.

"The place seems to be on fire," he said, feeling weakly foolish as he said it.

Edme answered solemnly:

"Yes, I have just managed to put it out."

"All alone?"

"Yes. I thought it would be best if I could."

Her voice sounded hard and mechanical, but suddenly she burst out crying:

"Oh, Tom—Tom! I am so glad you have come. Say that you did not do it—say that you did not!"

She looked at him imploringly, but her husband, conscience-stricken, only held down his head.

It was a terrible half-hour for the confessed incendiary. The news which his wife had hastened back to tell was that Uncle Jonadab had been generous—he had given her £200.

Digitized by Google

Amongst the Story Writers who are represented may be mentioned Messrs. Headon Hill, G. B. Burgin, W. L. Alden, and George Griffith.

A VISIT FROM MR. CALLAGHAN.

MR. CALLAGHAN was busily engaged in an inspection of silver-ware that seemed to interest him exceedingly. He examined each article carefully, often stopping long enough to test the particular object with his teeth, or even to bend it. At the same time, his actions were quiet and, one might say, reserved. He did not appear to care to be noticed.

He was a rather tall young fellow, "carelessly dressed," as they say in novels, and had a pale face, like a student's. One might, indeed, have thought him a poor student, were it not for his eyes, which, instead of looking tired and dreamy, like a student's, were exceedingly active and restless. On the whole, his face and his general appearance were not prepossessing. Indeed, the policeman on the beat most frequented by Mr. Callaghan in social life reported him at the Bridewell as "a regular tough 'un."

Mr. Callaghan, though very young, had already learned the value of exceeding caution. Hence he was almost noiseless, and he inspected the silver ware in the very mild light of a half-opened dark lantern. A happy smile played around the corners of his face the while, for the silver-ware he was examining proved to be of the finest and newest, and bore the monogram of a famous family. For that matter, the entire surroundings of Mr. Callaghan at the time were of the richest. The very sideboard at which he laboured was worth a small fortune, and the cut glass upon it looked very beautiful in the mellow light. There were rich red tints in some of the glass-ware, occasioned by their contents, but Mr. Callaghan did not stop to examine them. He did not believe in drinking during business hours. The time was something after midnight.

Mr. Callaghan was aroused from his preoccupation by a faint click. It sounded very much like the click of a trigger as a revolver is cocked. It was a trifle startling, but he did not lose his presence of mind. He faced around like a flash, and turned off the rays of his dark lantern. He knew it was almost useless to take the latter precaution, however, for he was well informed, and he knew that in the houses of the rich of to-day it required but the touching of a switch to turn on a full stream of electric lights throughout an entire floor. The sudden burst of light came, just as he expected it would, and as it did so he heard a voice say:

"Don't dare to move."

He was more startled by the voice than he was by the sudden glare of the electric lights, for it was the voice of a young girl. Mr. Callaghan blinked, took a good look, and then his thin face broadened into a smile. At the other end of the room stood a very pale but resolute girl in a pink dressing-gown. She had a little gold-mounted revolver of a calibre so small that Mr. Callaghan, but for his natural politeness, would have laughed at it outright, and she was biting her lip for she was apparently very nervous. The revolver was pointed in Mr. Callaghan's direction, but, alas! the hand that held it was shaking very perceptibly. Callaghan grinned.

"Isn't it rather late for you to be out?" he asked her.

"Don't dare to move," she replied. "I know precisely what to do. Papa told me before he went away. I am going to sound the burglar-alarm, and have you arrested. Then you will be sent to prison."

"Well," almost laughed Mr. Callaghan, "why don't you do it? I'm waiting."

"Because," she answered hesitatingly—"because you're standing in front of it."

"Oh, I am?" answered Callaghan. "Then I'll move away. I always like to be polite to ladies."

He moved away a few steps.

She frowned a little bit. Then she said:

"Excuse me, will you please move a little further away?"

"Certainly," he answered. "Anything to oblige a real lady."

She stepped towards the alarm, which Callaghan had not until then perceived, and stretched forth her hand. She was about to turn the handle, when Callaghan said, hastily:

"Hold on a minute. Do you think that would be a nice thing to do?"

"Of course it would," she murmured.

"Just think about it a moment," Callaghan continued. "If you do that, I'll be arrested, and sent to prison for fifteen or twenty years. Fifteen or twenty years in a little cell all to myself, with no one to talk to and nothing to do—except break stones for my health. Now, I don't care anything about myself. Of course I haven't done you any wrong. I haven't got away with the silver, and therefore there isn't any wrong done—is there? I tried to, but you have got the best of me, and you're an awfully brave little girl to do it, too. But just think of yourself during the next fifteen or twenty years, if you have me taken. Every day you'll be thinking about the poor fellow who's doing time because you made him, and every night you'll be lying awake crying because you made him suffer so much for such a little thing, and every time the minister in your church says anything about forgiving your enemies you'll be thinking he means you, and——"

She broke in:

"I think I'll let you go"—she said it very earnestly.

Callaghan laughed aloud.

"That's right," he said, "I knew you would, for I knew you were a lady the minute I saw you. I didn't mean what I said. Probably in a month you'd forget all about me. No one remembers a fellow who's doing time but the police and the detectives. I was just trying an experiment. Do you think I was afraid you'd call the police? Nonsense! Do you think I was afraid of your little revolver? Nonsense! I've been shot twice by real revolvers. If you had tried to sound the burglar-alarm, do you know what I'd have done? I'd have made a quick jump for you, and I'd have had my hands about your throat before you could have winked. If you had fired the revolver, you would have missed me. Girls can't shoot."

He said this last almost contemptuously; but he was sorry a moment afterwards, for he noticed that she was growing very white and very frightened too.

Nevertheless, he continued:

"And after I'd got my hands about your neck, and you couldn't scream or struggle, what do you suppose I'd have done?"

She did not reply. She could not speak. She was trembling violently.

"I'd have — I'd have"—he was embarrassed, and he actually blushed—Callighan blushed—"I'd have kissed you," he said with an effort, "and then I'd have gone away. But you needn't look frightened any longer. I ain't going to hurt you, and I ain't going to kiss you; for some day you'd be ashamed of it, and you'd be ashamed to tell your sweetheart that Jimmy Callaghan kissed you. And I ain't a-going to take anything that belongs to this house, although I could right before your eyes. I'm just a-going peaceably home."

He moved towards the window by which he had entered. As he did so, however, he looked at her critically, stopped, and said:

"You're going to hold out just about until I'm gone; then you're going to faint. I can't leave you here alone in a faint. I'll fix it."

He walked deliberately to the sideboard and poured out a glass of wine.

"Here," said he, "drink this, and then go upstairs to bed as quick as you can."

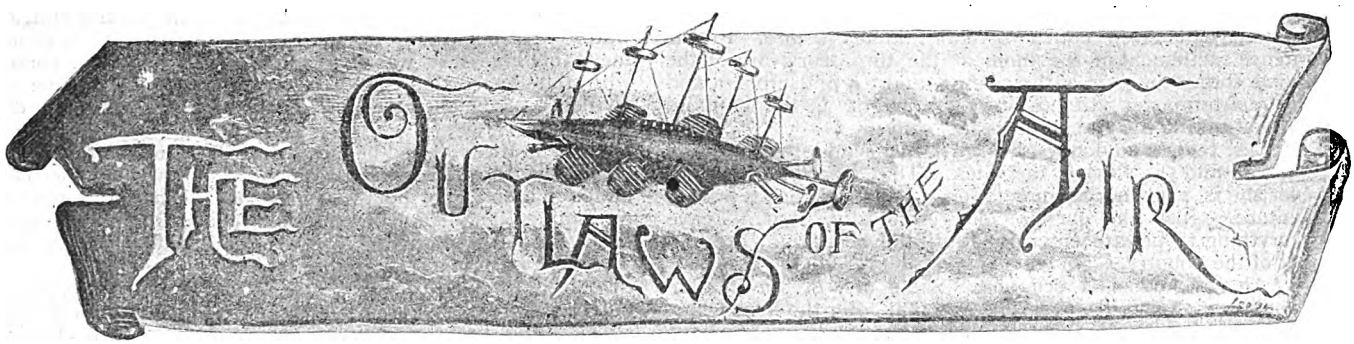
She took the wine with a frightened "Thank you," and drank it.

Mr. Callaghan turned to leave.

"That brings the red back in your cheeks," he said. "It's a good thing when not taken during business hours. Now I'm going, but I want you to remember that I'm not afraid of the burglar-alarm or the little revolver. I'm not going to rob you because—because you are so brave, and because you are so pretty. I sort of hate to make a failure of a job, but you are too pretty."

Saying which, Mr. Callaghan climbed nimbly through the window and disappeared.

Digitized by Google



By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

Franz Hartog—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

Sir Harry Milton—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

Herbert Wyndham—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

Frederick Austen—the inventor of the Utopian air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

Violet Milton—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is fearfully injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

Dora Merton—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

Lucy Summers—another fair Utopian.

Max Renault in the air-ship joins Hartog in the Destroyer, after the latter has destroyed a fleet of war-ships convoying Atlantic liners. They are discovered in their hiding-place by a combined fleet of British, French, and Portuguese cruisers, who follow the Pilgrim, a steam yacht bringing war and other materials for the Anarchists. Renault in the Vengeur, and Hartog in the Destroyer, annihilate the fleet, and, at the last moment, a strange flying machine appears on the scene.

CHAPTER XIX.

A Timely Rescue.

The words had scarcely passed the poor fellow's lips before he sprang convulsively into the air and fell to the deck, rolling and writhing in agony. A fire-shell had burst close to him, a stream of flames had passed over his bare feet, and as he fell back the choking poisonous fumes surged in dark waves about him and in a few moments ended his torments in death.

The armoured citadel on the centre of the bridge in which the captain of the Devon stood, with a senior midshipman to work the now useless signals, and a quarter-master at the wheel, had so far escaped the projectiles of the Vengeur; but though the head remained untouched the body was crippled and paralysed, and all communication between the two parts of the organism was virtually severed. The gallant Devon was in fact in the position of a man paralysed in every limb but still retaining his intellectual faculties. Her captain saw his terrible foe sinking lower and lower towards his now doomed vessel, and he was unable to order a shot to be fired against him.

Soon barely a thousand feet separated the air-ship from her now helpless prey, then, with deliberate aim, three of the ten-inch shells charged with anarchite, were dropped into the ragged gaping holes where the funnels had been. Captain Maxwell saw them fall, helpless to stretch out a hand to avert the disaster which he knew must now follow in a few moments. He felt the shock of the shells as they burst in the inmost recesses of the ship, then, with a shudder that shook her from stem to stern, she stopped as though she had run head-on to a rock; there came a report like a thunder-clap, followed by a long screaming roar, and ship and sea and sky were blotted out in a dense cloud of steam mingled with smoke and ashes.

Captain Maxwell never expected to see the light of day again, but when the now freshening breeze from the northward blew the steam cloud aft he saw that the Devon was still floating. Her splendid hull had withstood for the time being even the explosion of her boilers. She floated, but only as a wreck. The escaping steam had taken the line of least resistance and torn its way up through the decks already perforated in a hundred places by the Vengeur's shells.

"You cowardly hound!"

Of her top-works only the bridge remained anything like intact. The fierce burning breath of the steam had penetrated the air-holes of the citadel and scalded its occupants severely, though not fatally, and the moment the cloud had passed the captain threw open the steel door and went out on to the half-ruined bridge, saying to his companions:

"We may as well die outside as in there. We've about seen the last of the poor old Devon. I'm afraid we're about the only ones left alive. You cowardly hound!" he suddenly burst out, shaking his fist in brave but impotent defiance at the air-ship. "If I only had you in a fair and square fight, ship to ship and gun to gun, I'd—Hullo! Look yonder. As I'm a living man there's another of them! Just give me my glasses out of the citadel Mr. Clinton."

Looking up at the Vengeur had brought within his line of Each story is adorned with numerous illustrations, and considering that amongst the artists are numbered Miss G. Demain Hammond, Miss Inez Warry, Monsieur Georges Montbard, and Messrs. Raymond Potter, E. S. Hope, and Sydney Harvey, I think I may safely assert that no Christmas Number issued this year will have such a splendid array of high-class illustrations.

Digitized by Google

sight the second air-ship, of whose approach the unfortunate seaman had given notice several minutes before. In the intense excitement of the moment the three survivors of the Devon forgot the pain of their burns, and the midshipman and the quartermaster uttered a cry of delight as the captain, without taking his glasses from his, said:

"Yes, there's no doubt about it. She's an air-ship, not a balloon, and she's flying the Jack. That means that, whatever she is, she's not in commission. I suppose she's a private venture. Just like our precious Admiralty, that. Leave everything to private enterprise until the best things are sold out of the country.

"Ah, of course, I see now. She's one of the Maxim æroplanes. I heard some time ago that after the War Office had refused to buy Maxim's rights, a big syndicate had been formed to develop them and keep them in the country. I suppose that's one of them. Well, I only hope—Ah, there he goes! The brute doesn't think us worth notice now, I suppose. Knows we're helpless. I wonder what he's up to."

"I fancy he's gone to bring up that Destroyer, sir," said Clinton, following with his glasses the now rapidly receding Vengeur, which had suddenly swept round in a wide curve to the southward, and was flying out to sea in a course at right angles to that of the new comer.

"Then, if he has, God help the Ariel and us!" said the captain, "for he'll sink her, and then that blackguard will come and torpedo us at his leisure. However, we'll go and see if any of our poor fellows are left alive. We may be able to do something for them. We might find a boat, too. But no, that's no good. I won't leave the Devon while she floats, and if we got away those blackguards would only sink us."

Wherever they were able to go they found a perfectly awful state of affairs throughout the shattered fabric of what only an hour or so ago had been one of the finest cruisers in the British Navy. The aerial bombardment had taken her in all her weakest instead of her strongest portions, and the result had been, not a battle, but the merest massacre, culminating in the final tragedy of the explosion which had literally blown to pieces or otherwise killed every survivor of the unequal duel save themselves.

The flag was run up.

Added to this they found that the ship, in spite of the fact that all her watertight compartments had been closed before she went into action, was settling slowly but surely by the stern. Of the boats there was not one fit for use. Hanging in their exposed positions on the davits they had been riddled through and through by the storms of shot or burnt to uselessness by the fire-shells. The main gaff had been shot away, and this had brought the White Ensign down to the deck just before the explosion of the boilers, so when he had completed his inspection as far as he could make it, the Captain said:

"Well, if we have to go down we'll go with the old flag flying. Mr. Clinton, see if you can find anything in the bridge-house, and you, Mr. Thompson, go and see if the fore signal halyards are all right. I think they are."

The midshipmen found a Union Jack, and the halyards proved to be in working order, so the flag was run up to the fore and then the three went back to the bridge to wait for the end and watch the beginning of the aerial duel which was now inevitable unless, as was very unlikely, the Vengeur, content with the destruction she had wrought, should decline the challenge of the enemy who had come to meet her in her own element.

Captain Maxwell had been right in his conjecture as to the character of the strange craft which had arrived on the scene of action a couple of hours too late to do anything towards preventing Renault and Hartog from accomplishing the terrible destruction and slaughter that they had achieved with such dreadful rapidity and thoroughness.

More than a year before Mr. Hiram Maxim, after many failures and one or two disasters, had succeeded in demonstrating the practicability of human flight by mechanical means. His æroplane was to all intents and purposes a huge kite with auxiliary wings, supporting a car in which an engine, driven by steam and burning vaporised gasoline fuel, operated two huge propellers projecting from the stern.

These forced the inclined æroplane and wings against the air, the upthrust of which lifted the machine from the ground after a short run corresponding to that of a bird taking flight from the earth. As soon as his machine had really flown and had proved itself capable of being steered and manœuvred in the air he had offered the exclusive rights of the invention to the British Government for a million sterling, an offer which it is almost unnecessary to state the British Government had declined, after wasting about six months in negotiations In the midst of these the Tsar of Russia had sent a commission of three officers to examine the flying machine, with power to conclude the bargain there and then if they were satisfied that it would do what its inventor claimed for it.

Even this failed to break the bonds of tradition and red tape which paralysed the British War Office; and the machine was only saved from becoming the property of the Tsar by the spirited and patriotic action of a hastily-formed syndicate composed of a dozen of the wealthiest peers and gentlemen in England, who in their first sitting guaranteed to pay the million down, and raise another half-million within six months for the purpose of building a small fleet of æroplanes on Mr. Maxim giving his undertaking not to sell his invention, or any part of it, to any foreign Power.

This ensured the refusal of the Tsar's offer, and raised such a storm of popular indignation against the authorities, as soon as the story was made public, that within a week the Royal Assent had been given to a Bill authorising the payment of half the money out of the public funds. This had happened a little less than six months before the Vengeur had made her appearance above the Atlantic.

As soon as the money had been guaranteed it had been decided to build six æroplanes under the supervision of the inventor, and of these the first to take the air equipped for fighting purposes was the Britannia, the craft which Captain Maxwell and his companions were now watching from the bridge of the disabled Devon as she came sailing down out of the northern sky to engage the foe whose terrible and swiftly succeeding exploits had already been flashed by telegraph over the whole of Europe and America.

She had, of course, been tested as regards her capabilities of bomb-dropping, and her inventor had mounted in her car three light, specially constructed machine-guns, two of the Maxim type forward, and amidships a gun capable of throwing a two-pound shell to a distance varying from two to five miles, according to the elevation. She had shown that she was capable of tremendous destruction on land or sea, but she had, of course, had no opportunity of proving her powers as a fighting ship when pitted against a craft which could dispute the mastery of her own element with her.

How she would actually acquit herself was now to be seen by the three silent watchers who, anxiously sweeping the sky with their glasses, stood on the half-wrecked bridge of the slowly-sinking Devon waiting for the first aerial duel in the history of the world to begin.

The Britannia, flying like a huge bird on extended and motionless wings, swooped gracefully down from her elevation of two thousand feet until within fifty feet she passed the floating wreck of the Devon at a speed of about fifteen miles an hour. They saw that she carried a crew of six men, and that she was commanded by a man in the uniform of a lieutenant of the British Navy.

Digitized by Google

"Why, good heavens, Pelham, is that you!" exclaimed Captain Maxwell, as the first hails were exchanged, and he recognised in the naval officer a man who three years before had served under him as second lieutenant in the Devon when she was first commissioned.

"Yes, Captain Maxwell, it is," came the reply. "I'm deeply sorry to see what's happened to the poor old Devon, we'll try and send a line on board and take you off. She doesn't look as if she'll float much longer."

"No, she won't, I'm afraid. We've had an awful hammering from that blackguard, but you mustn't think of stopping to take us off. If he catches you down here he'll smash you to bits in no time."

"We must risk that," replied Lieutenant Pelham decisively, as the aeroplane swung round and soared up a little until she hung almost over the foretop of the cruiser. Then a rope with a grappling-iron at the end came rattling down and was hooked under the ironwork of the bridge. The Britannia's propellers now quickened their revolutions, and the great structure remained poised motionless in the air, dragging at the tautened rope like a huge kite, till a noosed rope followed, and one by one the survivors of the Devon were hauled on board.

Captain Maxwell scramb'ed into the car.

The rope was cut as Captain Maxwell, the last to ascend, scrambled into the car, and the Britannia, released from the downpull of the rope, sprang forward and upward and soared away into the upper heights of the air at eighty miles an hour, just as a rapidly-growing patch in the western sky showed that the Vengeur was returning to the fray, after, as was subsequently learnt, having sunk the Ariel and ordered the Destroyer to return and finish the naval battle by sending a torpedo into the crippled Devon.

CHAPTER XX.

THE FIRST AERIAL DUEL.

WHILE the Vengeur was coming up at a cautiously moderated speed of not more than thirty miles an hour, Captain Maxwell gave the commander of the Britannia a rapid but sufficient description of her appearance, armament, and approximate speed.

"H'm," said the lieutenant, looking rather serious, when he had finished his description. "A hundred miles an hour or over, you say. That's bad. Eighty is our best speed, and then you say he can soar vertically; we can only soar spirally. That's point number two against us.

"Now, I wonder how high the fellow can soar. A lot depends on that, for I can see perfectly well that in this warfare of the future for one air-ship to get above another will be something like a frigate, or a line-of-battle ship getting the weather-gauge of an enemy, only a good deal more so. Keep her up, Jackson, keep her up," he continued, turning to the man who was stationed at the levers which controlled the auxiliary side wings or lifting-planes. "Keep her up; we shall want all the elevation we can get."

"And by bringing us three on board, Pelham, you've diminished your rising power by putting between five and six hundred pounds more weight on board."

"My dear Maxwell, please don't talk about that," replied the lieutenant with a grave smile. "Do you suppose we could ever have shown our noses in England again or even have looked each other in the face if we'd left you to go down on board the poor old Devon? No, no, whether we win or not, that was the first thing to do.

"Besides, it only means using a little more fuel. This is not like a balloon, you know. The faster we fly the lighter we get. At present we don't weigh, practically speaking, more than a few pounds apiece, so you needn't trouble about that. Now I wonder what that fellow's going to do."

Even while the lieutenant had been speaking everyone not actually engaged in working the ship had kept his glasses fixed on the distant Vengeur. Her commander had evidently decided to test his new enemy's capacity as far as possible. No such foes as these two had ever faced each other before. All the tactics of attack and defence were unknown, and could only be learnt by actual experiment, in which a single mistake would probably mean destruction and a death horrible beyond description.

He saw that the æroplane could move very fast, but whether she was moving at her utmost speed or not was what he had to learn. So, too, with her soaring power. He saw that she was mounting rapidly upwards in long spiral curves, and this taught him the one thing that he knew certainly about her; she was unable to rise vertically or she would do so, and save both time and fuel. There he had the advantage of her.

He made sure that she was armed, but as he had no idea as to the character or range of her guns he decided to keep at a very respectful distance till he had learnt what it was necessary for him to know before the duel to the death actually commenced. If he had only carried a sufficient amount of ammunition it would have been easier for him to fight a fleet of sea-going ships and destroy them one by one as he had destroyed the British, French, and Portuguese cruisers and torpedo boats than it would be to fight this single opponent that had come to challenge the Vengeur in her own element. He determined, therefore, that the first trial of strength should be one of soaring power. It did not need a second glance to tell him that the æroplane was trying to gain the advantage in elevation and then open fire on him while he floated below.

"So we are going to have a flying match, are we, to begin with," he said to himself as he stood in his conning-tower, watching the Britannia sweeping round and round and climbing higher and higher into the bright blue sky with every curve she made.

Digitized by Google

"I wonder how the deuce the British Government got hold of that thing. Why, of course, what an ass I am! she's one of Maxim's æroplanes. The old boy must have made a success of it after all. Of course, there's only one man in England could build a thing like that, and he's an American. Well, well, M. Maxim, let us see if your pretty mechanical kite can fly as well as the Vengeur.

"Five thousand feet," he continued, glancing at the aneroid; "and that thing is about a thousand feet higher. I suppose he'll make his swoop soon. I think I'd better let him do it and force his hand. He can't ram me, that's quite certain. He'd smash that bit of a car to fragments if he tried; but if he gives me a chance to put the Vengeur's ram through that kite of his, I'll spoil his flying powers for a bit.

"Ah, yes, sapristi! that's a good idea. Why shouldn't I let her down gently and capture her? That would be a triumph and a half—besides, she might be useful. Anyhow, she'd make a pretty plaything for the boys to practise aerial navigation in. Taxil, come into the conning-tower for a moment, will you?"

His lieutenant promptly obeyed the order given through the speaking-tube that communicated with the engine-room, in addition to the electric signals. He pointed the Britannia out to him, and said:

"Look you, mon garc'."

"Look you, mon garc', there is our new enemy. You observe, she's an æroplane. That means she can't soar vertically, but only spirally, as she is doing now. There we have the advantage of her. Also, I think she's flying her fastest, and that is not our fastest."

"Tonnerre, mon capitaine!" replied Taxil, with a shrug of his shoulders. "Not by a good thirty or forty miles an hour at the least. We can sail round her and over her. Bah, what's the good of sending out a kite to fight an air-ship! Will you destroy her, M. Max, or will you just capture her and make a despatch boat of her?"

"Just what I was thinking, mon brave," replied Max, putting his hand on his lieutenant's shoulder; "but first we must have a little flying match, and then we shall see what we shall see. Now, are all your engines and gearing in proper order?"

"They are perfect," said Taxil, with a touch of pride in his tone, for he had already begun to love the marvellous machinery that had been under his control during the eventful morning. "Ask me for a hundred and thirty miles an hour and you shall have it. The engines have never been tried to their fullest capacity yet."

"Good!" said Max. "I don't believe they have, but they will be this morning. Now, look you, that thing, whatever they call her, is seeing if she can out-soar us. When she thinks she has done so she'll make a swoop for us, and either try and drop a bomb on us, or cripple us with bullets. Perhaps, who knows, she may have a shell-gun or two on board, and if she crippled one of our wings, or got a shell into your engine-room, the cruise of the Vengeur would end with a single ignominious plunge down yonder. Do you see?"

As Max spoke he made a downward gesture with his thumb towards the vast expanse of ocean that now lay spread out five thousand feet and more beneath them. Taxil shrugged his shoulders again, and said:

"That would be a poor anti-climax to our morning's victory. It must not happen."

"No," said Max. "And it shall not if the Vengeur does what I expect her to do. Now listen. We have too much weight on. Go and take that Nordenfeldt to pieces and pitch it into the sea. I don't think we shall want to do any shooting, and if we do the Maxims will be enough. Move one of those aft and put it in the Nordenfeldt's place.

"Then you will have two more men to spare. Take one of them with you into the engine-room. I think you'll find Lacroix the smartest, and let him stand by to give you a hand to the engine, because everything will depend upon the rapidity with which my orders are executed. Set the other one to get out the longest piece of that fine wire rope that we have on board. I want fifty or sixty fathoms of it at least, and set him to work to splice one of those four-pronged grapnels on toit

"Then let him make fast the end round the after-part of the ship—right round the hull, mind—he can do it by working through the slides and windows, and have it so that the after-mast will stop it slipping off if a strain comes on it. Then when he's got it all clear, let him have the rope coiled so that he can drop the gapnel clear of the ship in an instant. That's all at present. Now be off, and let's have everything done smartly on the word, and you shall see something before you're an hour or two older."

Taxil promised prompt obedience, and left the conning-tower. Max resumed his watch on the æroplane, keeping the Vengeur still ascending almost vertically at a leisurely speed, and always maintaining his distance of about five miles from the Britannia.

For nearly an hour nothing happened. The two air-ships, like wary opponents testing each other's strength and watching narrowly for the first opportunity of advantage, kept soaring steadily up and up into the higher regions of the atmosphere until the fans of the Britannia were beating the rarefied air at a height of nearly ten thousand feet.

The Vengeur, as nearly as Lieutenant Pelham could guess, was still five miles away and some two thousand feet lower. He found, as he had expected to do, that the higher the Britannia rose the less actual elevation she gained in proportion to the power exerted by her engines. This was of course due to the decreased suspensory power of the rarefied air.

"I don't think we can get higher," he said at length to Captain Maxwell. "And it doesn't look as if he could either, but still we mustn't be too sure. Now I'll go to the helm and try and bear down on him. You stop here and do all the seeing you can, for no one else ever saw a fight like this is going to be. Stand by the guns there! Keep them trained on him as well as you can, and fire sharply when I give the word."

The Britannia now took one last upward curve, the engines were slowed down, and she shot away with ever-increasing momentum towards her enemy on a very slightly inclined plane. Just as he saw her coming Renault received word from Taxil that his orders had been executed and everything was ready.

"All right," he said, "then down fans and full speed ahead! Give her every yard you can!"

Taxil returned to the engine-room, and the next moment the suspensory fans collapsed, the three propellers whirled round with ever-increasing speed, and Max heard the wind whistling and screaming past the masts and stays as he swung the Vengeur out of the path of the rapidly approaching Britannia, and darted away to the southward at a speed that both astounded and disgusted Lieutenant Pelham and his shipmates.

It was absurd to think of using the guns at the terrific speed at which both ships were moving. Firing into space from the top of an express train would have been a work almost of precision in comparison with it. The battle of tactics was not over yet; in fact, it was only just beginning.

Digitized by Google

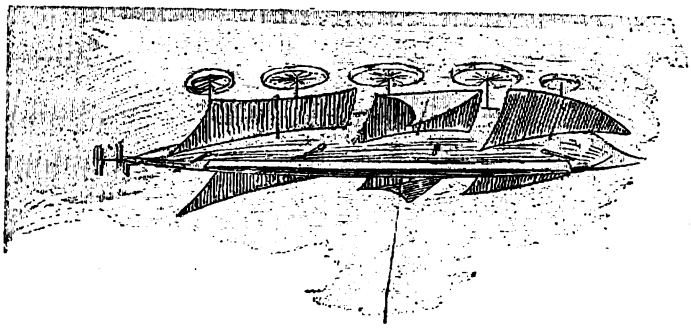
Lieutenant Pelham inclined his guiding-planes to the full again, and the Britannia, under the influence of her own momentum, swept nearly a thousand feet higher. Then the engines began to work at full speed again, and they looked round for their enemy.



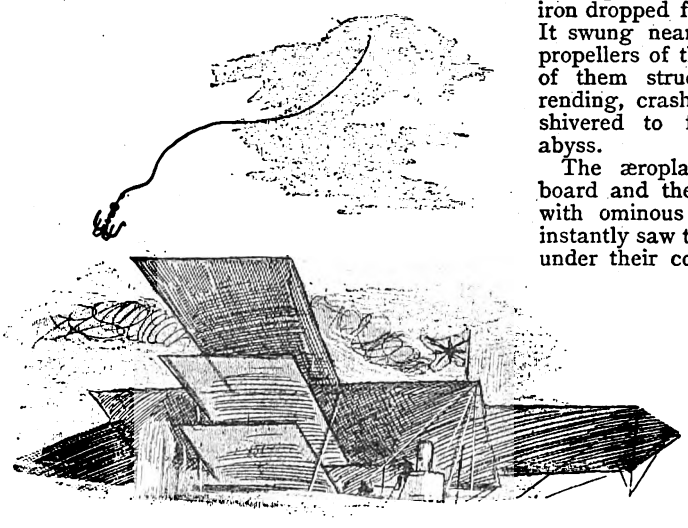
They had not long to wait. Cleaving the air like an arrow in its upward flight, the Vengeur seemed to leap up out of the distance to the south at right angles to their course. She passed them like a flash of light a couple of miles astern and five hundred feet or so above them.

"He's got the elevation of us, after all!" gasped Pelham, half choked by the rush of the wind through which they were flying. "And, as for speed, I believe the brute could fly round us."

"Yes, I'm afraid there's no doubt about that," said Captain Maxwell, biting an excusable imprecation in half between his suddenly clenched teeth. "I wonder how, in the name of all that is unfortunate, it came about that such a magnificent fighting engine as that, ever fell into the hands of such pitiless scoundrels as those infernal Anarchists."

"I suppose we shall learn that sometime—if the said scoundrels let us live to know anything more," replied the Lieutenant gloomily.

The Vengeur sped away to the northward, swerved round again, and, ever mounting up and up, swept round ahead, doubled again, and with a last sudden turn placed herself over the Britannia, whose aneroid now marked an elevation of ten thousand four hundred feet.



Instinctively all on board her felt that the end was coming, and that the battle had been won and lost without a single shot having been fired. For a moment they looked at each other in blank dismay, and then at the awful void below and around them into which a single shell dropped from the Vengeur would now hurl them together with the fragments of the wonderful machine that bore them upon its wings. Their own æroplanes prevented them seeing their antagonist from the car, and, therefore, also made it impossible to fire at him without piercing their own support. It was as complete a case of checkmate as had ever occurred in the game of war.

Then, while they were waiting with bated breath for the blow that would mean destruction, something dropped from the sky and struck the Britannia's forward guiding-plane. They looked up at the sound and saw that it was a four-pronged grappling iron. After striking the wing it swung out and then back again, then two of the prongs hooked themselves firmly in the framework, and then the rope tautened.

There was a ripping, tearing sound, the Britannia gave a lurch to aft, and then the hinge and stays of the wing gave way and it was wrenched bodily off. Like a bird with a wounded wing the Britannia wavered in her course and the barometer showed that she was slowly sinking. The detached wing was hauled up out of sight, then the grappling iron descended again, this time astern, and within a couple of minutes the lifting wing was also wrenched off. Evidently it was the intention of those on board the Vengeur to cripple, and not to destroy, the æroplane.

Her crew waited in helpless rage and agonising anxiety to see what would happen next. Once more the grappling-iron dropped from the sky; this time astern. It swung nearer and nearer to the whirling propellers of the Britannia, and at last one of them struck it. Then there came a rending, crashing sound, and the propeller, shivered to fragments, dropped into the abyss.

The æroplane swerved violently to starboard and then began to oscillate laterally with ominous rapidity. Those in the car instantly saw that the machine was no longer under their control, and that the only thing to do was to lighten its load as much as possible, and then, if their now victorious adversary allowed them, to trust to the æroplanes to save them from the awful fall that now looked as if it could not but be inevitable.

"Quick, for God's sake," cried Pelham. "Overboard with the guns, we can't use them now! Overboard with everything that we can spare. Look lively! She'll go down now like a kite with a broken string!"

(To be continued.)

NUMBER TWO. 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

PEARSON'S LIBRARY.

"The Adventures of an Ugly Girl."

A Complete Novel by Mrs. GEORGE CORBETT.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED BY RAYMOND POTTER.

ISSUED MONTHLY. PRICE SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

The Artist's Love-Dream.

EDWARD LUZERNIER enjoyed what is called a "successful artistic career." He was an artist, and studied at Rome, and on his return to Paris, being convinced that classical subjects are played out, and his genius not inclining to landscapes, patriotic celebrations, or nymphs in sunlight, he had decided to devote himself to portrait painting.

Having but few relations, he victimised his comrades, and for several years exhibited portraits of well-known artists and sculptors in every conceivable attitude. However, one day he was commissioned to paint a picture of an ancient duchess in a wonderful toilet of velvet and pearls, with a hound at her feet and a coat of arms in the background, and this was his starting-point.

Very soon after elegant ladies and famous men felt the necessity of bequeathing to posterity their physiognomy under the signature of Edward Luzernier, and for the artist this meant both success and fortune.

He bought old furniture, rare china, and antique weapons, and refurnished in a sumptuously artistic manner, held receptions in his studio, and, in fact, became quite a lion.

Personally, he was brisk, energetic, and genial, and won the heart of his companions by his kindheartedness and generosity; and yet Edward Luzernier was not happy. No, in the midst of a life of apparently unalloyed success one thing was wanting, and that void cast a gloom over his greatest triumphs—the artist wanted love; without love he felt his work was vain, and his honours but as Dead Sea fruit.

The young man was certainly not prepossessing; he was short, square, and bony, and the most anxious care had been powerless to reduce his hair and beard to order, while his hands were very clumsy; as to his face, it was large and round, with just the tender, courageous expression of a big dog.

All the ladies called him "Mon bon Luzernier," in a tone of sympathetic protection, and in such a way as to invariably dash his hopes to the ground. Often and often had he been on the point of throwing himself at the feet of one of the beauties who frequented his studio, but until now he had restrained himself in time, realising how vain his dreams were.

One summer evening, when he was in his dressing-room (a very elegant apartment, which had cost him a portrait and a half), Luzernier felt even more lonely than usual. He strolled out on the balcony, and gazed idly at the swallows flying backwards and forwards. All day he had been at work on the portrait of a great politician, and in half an hour was due at a dinner-party, where he would be presented to an Italian marchioness, who also desired to sit to him; and she, too, would do as the others did—call him "Mon bon Luzernier." "It will always be so," he sighed. The swallows were still winging their noisy flight, and he was just about to re-enter, when, on the other side of the road, leaning on the balcony exactly facing his, he saw a woman looking intently at him.

She was tall, with jet black hair and small regular features and a daintily-fresh complexion, the tout ensemble being indescribably charming. Luzernier's heart beat fast, and in the regard which he returned to the young lady he tried to put all he knew of emotion and ardour. Was he dreaming? Could he see clearly? She smiled a little, a sweet, reassuring smile. For a few moments they remained thus, then she slowly withdrew. The painter waited for her to return, but she did not appear, and he arrived very late at the dinner-party.

. . . . . .

Next day he heard all about this lady of the balcony. She was English, a widow, and very rich; staying in Paris with her mother.

Twenty times during a sitting Luzernier escaped from his studio to see if she were at the window; but it rained, and he saw her no more. A few days later, however, to his delight, she read the whole morning in the balcony, and Luzernier told himself he had been wrong in always working in his studio, and that fresh air would do him good.

How exquisite that pale pink dress was. What lovely black hair. She had looked again and smiled. The artist adjourned all further sittings for portraits, and his time was passed at the window. Once he bowed to her, and she returned his salutation; she always smiled in that singular way, and Luzernier fell more and more deeply in love with her.

He thought of writing to her; but what should he say? If he offended her his heart would break—he preferred to live on in sweet uncertainty, and hoped for a chance meeting, though he trembled to spoil his dream.

The studio teemed with studies of the fair unknown; he lived among these heads in profile, heads looking up, heads looking down. His sadness was turned to joy—at last he was beloved—and he was in a paradise. At times, however, there was a sort of hesitation in the expression of the beautiful English lady.

Luzernier noticed it, and assured himself that his fervent love had touched her—she had guessed how he worshipped her, and was not displeased.

One September afternoon he saw the windows opposite were all open, and the servants came and went rapidly. "What could have happened? Could she be ill?" he said to himself. But, no; she appears on the balcony dressed as if to go out. She leant her two daintily covered gloved hands on the iron balustrade, and seemed serious and perplexed. As usual, the painter saluted her. Then, as if deciding all at once, she pointed to the street with an imperious gesture, and entered quickly. She wished him to descend. She was going to speak to him.

Luzernier seized his hat and gloves, and only waited to choose his best cane—a present from an Austrian Princess to "Mon bon Luzernier." The lady came out of her house and, the painter advanced shyly. What attitude should he take? Should he advance? No, she comes to him with a slightly embarrassed air. How much lovelier she is seen in the light of day, and so near.

"Monsieur," she began.

He interrupted. "Madame, my emotion is so great—what gratitude—having so kindly—I should so like——" then finding that none of his phrases would finish, he was silent, discouraged; but so happy!

The young lady continued, with a pretty foreign accent, "I know that what I am doing is strange, and I have hesitated about it for a long time. Perhaps you will think it rude of me to meddle."

"Oh——"

"I should never have decided to act thus, but you are a famous artist. I admire your talent. Often have I wished to tell you across the street, when we were in the balcony, but I dared not. Now I must speak, as I am leaving Europe. Mon Dieu! how late I am; there is the carriage! This is what I want to tell you. From the window of my room, which is opposite your dressing-room, nearly every day for the past three months I have seen your valet brushing his boots with your hair-brush! Horrible, isn't it? Good-bye, monsieur!"

Edward Luzernier does not believe in the meaning smiles of young women who dream in balconies on summer evenings now, and he is still a bachelor.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/- Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shop-fitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

For LOVERS and MOTHERS.

The New (No. 2) Design True Lovers' Knot

"MIZPAH" BROOCH.

The most popular piece of Jewellery in the World. Every purchaser delighted. Each Brooch Hall Marked, and in handsome heart-shaped plush case.

Silver, 5s.; Gold, 30s.; Post Free.

Engagement Jewellery a Speciality. Catalogue (618 Illustrations) Post-free.

MASTERS, Jeweller, RYE, SUSSEX.

WE ALL WANT

to have beautiful and luxuriant hair, but it is almost impossible, leading the artificial life we do, unless we use WHITE'S QUICKENER - that will ensure it. Carriage paid 1s. 3d. per bottle. ARTHUR WHITE, 34, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.

For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

FOREIGN STAMPS GIVEN AWAY!

We will give to every applicant for our large new Price List, &c., 30 Genuine Foreign Stamps; all different, including Transvaal, British Guiana, Kustend and Czernawoda, 2 Spain (baby king), Victoria Great Britain (I.R. official), 3 Cape Colony, 3 Canada, 4 Indian, 5 United States (including Columbus issue), the lot sent post free for 2d. Send 3½d. at once for our 32 page Illustrated Stamp Album, containing upwards of 1,000 full size engravings of stamps. Special offer—A Collection of 500 stamps, all different, for 5s. 3d.

JNO. GRAVES & CO.,
Stamp Importers, Bury St. Edmunds.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

MODEL ENGINES.

TORPEDO BOATS AND BOILERS.

Locomotives from 5s. to £25. Horizontal Slide Valve Engines, from 21s. Torpedo Boats, terrific speed, 3 ft. 6 in., 100s.; 4 ft. 6 in., 150s.; 5 ft. 6in., 200s. Boilers to burn charcoal, 12 in. by 5 in., 10s. 6d.; 14 in. by 6 in., 15s. 6d.; 16 in. by 7 in., 21s.—A. STEPHENS, Engineer, 82, Brunswick Street, Sheffield. Model fittings, beautifully finished. Send 9d. for sample cock. Design and workmanship first-class.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."

EASY PAYMENTS.

WITH EXPRESSION STOP

ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.

Plays hymns, popular airs, quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, hornpipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by any one. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30s. Terms 4s. deposit and 4s. monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.

Write for list of music and full particulars.

(Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER,
Organette Works, Blackburn.

BEETHAM'S

WORLD FAMED

CORN & BUNION PLASTER

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., of all Chemists, or post-free, for 14 stamps from the Proprietors,

M. BEETHAM & SON, Chemists
CHELTENHAM.

IS THE BEST REMEDY EVER DISCOVERED.

It acts like magic in relieving all pain and throbbing, and soon cures the most obstinate corns & bunions. It is especially useful for reducing enlarged Great Toe Joints, which so spoil the symmetry of otherwise beautiful feet. Thousands have been cured, some of whom had suffered for fifty years without being able to get relief from any other remedy. (It is a thin plaster, and takes up no room in the boot.) A trial of a Box is earnestly solicited, as immediate relief is sure.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. S.," 87, Strand, London. Mention SHORT STORIES.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" gives relief, and a few more applications effect a cure.

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.
Book on the Skin and Diet free.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and

OBSTINATE CASES,

NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,

GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. P. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

Digitized by Google

Use only
The AMAZON
BIAS VELVET &
THE AMAZON VELVET CORD
for
SKIRT BINDING
THE ORIGINAL,
THE BEST, AND
THE MOST ECONOMICAL.

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 308.] FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 24, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS.

Heraldic Designs and Trade Marks and Tradesmen's Windows, Facias, Signs, or Tablets.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

MOST EFFECTIVE MEDIUM

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

Call and see our Stock or send for Price Lists.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd.,
61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.
(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. • AGENTS WANTED.

FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES, &c.

(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID

No. 1 Black
No. 2 Dark Brown
No. 3 Light Brown
No. 4 Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 Pure Golden
No. 6 Brodie's Hair Grower and Restorer

Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED).

J. BRODIE, 41 MUSEUM STREET, LONDON
Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

BORD'S PIANOS

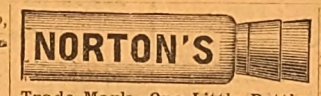
ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY
The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.
Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.
SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

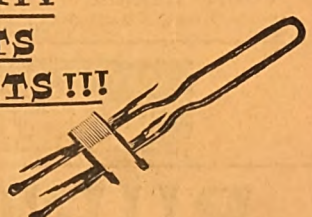
PREPARED BY NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.



Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

A HAIR PIN WITHOUT POINTS HAS GOOD POINTS!!!

SEE THE POINT?



Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

Digitized by Google

£10,000 IN PRESENTS.

ONE MILLION BEST SILK

HANDKERCHIEFS

1/- Only. I must clear my over-stock of about one million pure Silk Handkerchiefs, direct from the looms. To do this quickly I will give to each of the first 100,000 postal customers a valuable present; 1/- Only.

please mention if a lady's or gentleman's prize is required. The Handkerchiefs are of large sizes, and well worth 2s. 6d. each. Suitable for Ladies' or Gentleman's wear. LIGHT, SOFT, WARM, & DURABLE, as only a Silk Handkerchief can be. I have reduced the price for the Special Sale to 1s. each, or 13 stamps 2 lots for 2s.; 6 for 5s.; 12 for 9s. 6d. Prize with each Handkerchief.

A Live Testimonial, worth a Thousand recommendations from me.

"Lincoln, October 29th, 1894.

"Dear Sir,—I am more than satisfied with the handkerchief and lovely present received this morning; seeing that I had it only a few minutes in my hands when I sold it for more than double the price I paid for it. I consider it marvellous how they can be produced at such low prices. Please send me 24 more for myself and friends, for P.O.O. enclosed. Wishing you every success with your sale.—I am, yours faithfully, L. WATTS."

P.O.O.'s payable at Rugby. Letters addressed to

H. BUTCHER, Clifton Mill, Rugby.

PLEASE MENTION THIS PAPER.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000" "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

For LOVERS and MOTHERS.

The New (No. 2) Design True Lovers' Knot

"MIZPAH" BROOCH.

The most popular piece of Jewellery in the World. Every purchaser delighted. Each Brooch Hall Marked, and in handsome heart-shaped plush case.

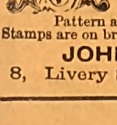
Silver, 5s.; Gold, 30s.; Post Free.

Engagement Jewellery a Speciality.

Catalogue (618 Illustrations) Post-free.

MASTERS, Jeweller, RYE, SUSSEX.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.



For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free.

Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,

8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

LEARN MUSIC

(Not Vamping)

IN ONE HOUR,

By using the "Piano and Organ Note-Teacher."

INVALUABLE TO ALL LEARNERS.

1s. 2d. Post Free from the Inventor:

L. G. HALL,

51, Belgrave Rd., Birmingham.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/- Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

MELVILLE'S

New Upright

GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. It has all the latest improvements. Price 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE,

61, Charing Cross Road, London.

EASY PAYMENTS ORGANETTES Wonderful instruments. Anyone can play them. Over 700 tunes ready. ONLY 4/- MONTHLY

Particulars free. Draper, Organette Works, Blackburn.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Adresse de M. SUEZ, 9, Rue de Prony, PARIS

VINAIGRE LACTÉ de SUEZ POUR LA TOILETTE

EAU de SUEZ

VACCINE for the MOUTH
Strengthens the Gums
Perfumes the Breath
The only Dentifrice securing
BEAUTIFUL TEETH

POUDRE et PATE DENTIFRICES DE SUEZ

London Agents: WILCOX & Co., 239, Oxford Street.

WE ALL WANT

to have beautiful and luxuriant hair, but it is almost impossible, leading the artificial life we do, unless we use WHITE'S QUICKENER - that will ensure it. Carriage paid 1s. 3d. per bottle. ARTHUR WHITE, 34, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" gives relief, and a few more applications effect a cure.

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 3d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,

83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.

Book on the Skin and Diet free.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

FOREIGN STAMPS GIVEN AWAY!

We will give to every applicant for our large new Price List, &c., 30 Genuine Foreign Stamps; all different, including Transvaal, British Guiana, Kustend and Czernawoda, 2 Spain (baby king), Victoria Great Britain (I.R. official), 3 Cape Colony, 3 Canada, 4 Indian, 5 United States (including Columbus issue), the lot sent post free for 2d. Send 3½d. at once for our 12 page Illustrated Stamp Album, containing upwards of 1,000 full size engravings of stamps. Special offer—A Collection of 500 stamps, all different for 5s. 3d.

JNO. GRAVES & CO.,

Stamp Importers, Bury St. Edmunds.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.

For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. S.," 87, Strand, London. Mention SHORT STORIES.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES

Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and

OBSTINATE CASES,

NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,

GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. P. S. S.,

145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS.

GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 308.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 24, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

A PERSONAL AND WHAT CAME OF IT

YOU may smile if you like, but I always read my morning paper from "a" to "z." I begin with the top of the first column on the first page, and finish with the end of the column on the last page. In that way I lose no possible scrap of information, and, besides, the habit often leads to important consequences, as the following narrative will show.

For a whole week I had found in the column of my paper devoted to "Personals" the following touching appeal:—

MY THEODORE,—Why have you not answered my last two letters? Are you angry with me, or are you ill? Oh, my Theodore, have pity on me, and relieve the anxiety of your suffering CLEOPATRA.

The first time I read it it made no particular impression upon me. So with the second and third times—for I remembered that all advertisements are generally inserted three times—but when I opened my paper on the fourth morning, and saw it still there, it set me to thinking seriously. Cleopatra began to interest me. The advertisement had already cost her eight shillings.

The fifth morning came, and with it the same heart-breaking appeal. It began to affect not only my nerves, but to arouse my indignation. Cleopatra had evidently written two letters to this unknown person, who had obstinately refused to answer them. Courtesy alone would have demanded some acknowledgment of them, however formal. He was angry with her, unquestionably, for in the last advertisement was added the line—"Are you still angry with me?"

But even had she done something to make him angry, he might have taken some sort of notice of her appeal. And it was touching, too, the way in which she asked if he were ill.

The next morning I departed from my usual habit; I looked at the "Personal" column first

There it was again.

Unhappy Cleopatra! Had she taken space in the advertisement columns of the paper for a year?

That sort of thing could not go on longer.

My resolution was taken. I sat down to my writing desk at once, hastily scrawled a few lines, inclosed the price of one insertion, and sent it by a boy to the office of the newspaper.

The next morning I tore open the paper. There stood my advertisement in large letters just after that of Cleopatra.

DEAR MR. THEODORE,—Will you not show some pity on Cleopatra, and not leave her to suffer longer? Your conduct is both unbecoming and reprehensible. MICHAEL.

Now we shall see, I thought, if he will keep silence.

There was no sign from him in the next day's paper, but from her there was this line:

MICHAEL,—Thanks, oh thanks, you good soul! CLEOPATRA.

It is very flattering to be considered a good man, but there is something about the expression, "good soul," that I don't exactly like. Its application by Cleopatra rather displeased me. An old woman, who is rheumatic and who reads the Bible a great deal, is a "good soul"; but a man of forty, who dresses well and has ambition—well! However, when I came to read it over, I could see that it was not ill-meant. It was unquestionably a genuine outburst of feeling. In any case, it was thoughtful of her to make an acknowledgment of my interest in her affairs.

I could hardly wait until the next morning to come. The moment the paper arrived, I turned to the advertisement page. It was there! Theodore had been aroused to answer. This was the token of his existence:

MICHAEL,—Do not meddle with what does not concern you. It strikes me, from your note, that you are like your namesake, who killed himself in running after the comet. Will you, in the future, be so good as to mind your own business? THEODORE.

On the instant I sat down and wrote the following, which I despatched for the next day's issue:

THEODORE,—Your rudeness does not at all surprise me. I was perfectly prepared for it after the brutal manner in which you have treated the prayers of a lady. The Chinese have a custom of never answering a letter until a month after it is received. I take the liberty of supposing you to be a Chinaman. MICHAEL.

And then the correspondence dropped.

I looked upon the whole affair as dead and buried, when some days later the name Michael caught my eye in the advertising columns. Was it intended for me, or for some other Michael? A second glance assured me. It ran:

MICHAEL is earnestly entreated to send his address to CLEOPATRA.

Hem! That was something to be thought about. Might not it be a trap which was set for me? To judge of him by his advertisement, this Theodore was a surly, cantankerous fellow, who might want to find my address to make a personal attack upon me, or perhaps send me a challenge for a duel.

I am opposed to duelling on principle. I prefer any time a dozen oysters to a shot in the leg or a thrust with a small sword.

What should I do?

The advertisement was certainly signed "Cleopatra," and courtesy demanded some kind of answer. I would not follow the Chinese method and wait a month, so I answered that my address might be obtained from the editor.

A morning or two later, while sitting at breakfast, my old housekeeper informed me that a lady wished to see me.

"Is she young?" I asked.

"Yes."

"Pretty?"

"Yes." My housekeeper was very sure on that point.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

A ravishingly beautiful young lady.

"Clear the table, then, and let her come in." I hurried into my bedroom to brush the hair over the bald place on the top of my head, slipped on a black coat—in which I am assured I look tolerably well—and hurried back again. When I re-entered the room, a ravishingly beautiful young lady, whom I had never before seen, stood before me.

"Sir," she began in a soft voice, in which there was an anxious sound, "forgive this intrusion on the part of a stranger, but——"

Here she made a slight pause. I pushed forward an arm-chair.

"Please be seated. There is not the slightest need of an apology. I am charmed, I'm sure."

Her eyes until this point had been cast down. Now she raised them and looked me full in the face. What eyes! Black, with blonde hair. Is there any combination more magnificent?

"Mr. Michael," she began, "I am not altogether unknown to you."

"No; certainly not," I stammered, "certainly not. I—I believe I have had the pleasure——"

I looked at her closely. I was lying—I had never seen her before.

"You meant to do me a good turn, even if you failed."

To whom had I attempted to do a good turn? I could think of no one. I only bowed.

"Yes, Mr. Michael, you certainly have shown that you are a man with a heart."

She looked at me with trustful eyes. Such eyes! They burned to the very marrow of my soul.

"Why, my dear young lady," I burst forth, "I should be worse than a barbarian if I did not place my heart and myself at your disposal. Yes, I would even, to please you, set sail for Corea, and set the Chinese——"

"Chinese!" she interrupted. "That brings me to the business I came upon. Calling him that was the very thing that made him so angry. He insists that the whole matter was a conspiracy between you and me. He is so dreadfully jealous!"

Conspiracy! He! What and whom could she be talking about? And a Chinese! Could it be possible that this charming young creature had a Chinese lover? Women have all sorts of tastes, however. But then, what had I to do with it? Why should she confide in me? But I put a bold face upon it.

"Jealous! That is too ridiculous! You must convince him that he is mistaken."

"But I cannot. Mr. Michael, you are the only one that can bring him to his senses. You must call on him and explain. Perhaps he will then listen to reason."

Cold chills ran over me at the thought. To put myself into the hands of this Chinese Othello! To risk my head between the jaws of the lion! To explain a matter of which I was thoroughly ignorant to a heathen foreigner mad with jealousy! No. My willingness to become a martyr did not extend so far as that.

"My dear madam," I stammered, "nothing would give me greater pleasure, but my professional duties occupy every moment of my time from morning until night."

"But you cannot refuse me," she pleaded. "You can take time enough for that, dear, good Mr. Michael!"

And she caught my hand and patted it like a child. I could resist no longer. I declared myself ready.

"Thanks! oh, thanks!"

"Where does he live?" I asked firmly. I felt at that moment like one of the old knights who was about to go out to fight dragons.

"In Powderhouse Street, number 17. You can't mistake it. It is on the right-hand side of the street, and the first door to the left as you enter."

Powderhouse Street! The name sounded ominous.

At ten o'clock the next morning I prepared myself for the fight. After a long walk I reached the street. My heart beat so it could be heard when I stepped into the hall of the house where the monster dwelt.

The first door to the left. This was it. At the further end of the passage was a servant with a dustpan and brush.

"Here!" I called to him in a loud voice, "can you tell me if the Chinaman is at home?"

I was just in front of the door, and, as I spoke, it flew violently open and the dragon stood before me. I raised both hands mechanically to keep him from springing at my throat. It was the instinct of self-preservation. Then I looked him in the eye. My hands dropped.

"What, Damian!"

"Michael!"

For five long years I had neither heard from nor seen my old schoolfellow, and here he had dropped upon me, or rather, I had dropped upon him, from the clouds. We shook each other's hands till they ached.

"But what in all the world are you doing here, and where have you been all these years, Damian?"

We shook each other's hands till they ached.

Digitized by Google

"That is a long story to tell, Michael. I have been in America."

"In America? Truly? You must tell me all about it. Isn't there a café near here where we can have a chat?"

Suddenly I remembered my mission.

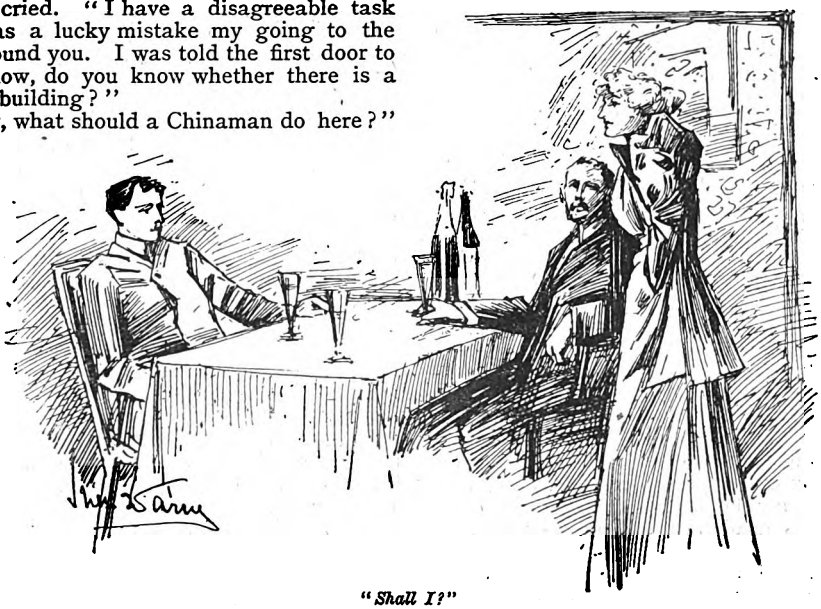
"But not just yet," I cried. "I have a disagreeable task to perform first. It was a lucky mistake my going to the wrong door first, for I found you. I was told the first door to the left. I say, old fellow, do you know whether there is a Chinaman living in the building?"

"A Chinaman? Why, what should a Chinaman do here?"

"Well, that's what I really don't know myself. But I have promised to find him, and I expect to have my throat cut for my good nature. I haven't the slightest idea what I have to say to him. It is to oblige a young woman whose name I don't know, and whom I never saw but once."

Damian shook his head, and looked at me with a curious glance.

"Terrible to die so young, isn't it?" with a weak attempt to encourage myself by a joke.



"Shall I?"

My friend paid no attention to what I was saying. He was looking over my shoulder towards the door.

"Are you convinced now?" said a voice behind me. "Do you believe now I have told the truth, Theodore?"

Theodore! And that voice! It was that of my unknown visitor of the day before. Theodore! Where had I heard that name before?

"I have not the slightest idea what you mean," replied my friend coldly. "All I know is that I have just accidentally met an old school comrade."

"That is splendid!" and she clapped her hands joyously. "But why are you staring at me so strangely, Mr. Michael?"

"Because I really don't know what to say. I haven't yet found your Chinaman."

"The Chinaman!" and my unknown laughed heartily. "Why, the Chinaman stands before you—Theodore!"

"Cleopatra!"

Ah, ha! Theodore! Cleopatra! The light began to break in upon me.

"That impudent Michael in the advertisement was you then?" said my friend.

"And you, Damian, were——"

"For goodness sake, don't call me Damian again. I dropped that name in America years ago. I am Theodore now."

"Well, Theodore. I take back the Chinaman, but you must acknowledge your mistake in saying that it was Michael who ran after the comet."

"If it will be of any comfort to you, certainly. It was very likely Timothy."

"Well, in any case, let us forgive and forget. And now for a couple of Rüdesheimer."

The wine was brought, and we sat down to it round the little table in Theodore's room. The whole matter was, little by little, cleared up.

"I am curious to know one thing, Theodore," said I. "Why did you let the charming Cleopatra beg in vain for an answer for a whole week? That wasn't at all like you."

Theodore hesitated.

"You are forcing my hand, Michael, but I will tell you. All this whole week I have been held by the police on the charge of disturbing the peace. You see, I was going home one night after a late supper where I had drunk too much, and that was because of our little quarrel." He here nodded at Cleopatra. "I wasn't in the best humour, and, for the matter of that, neither was the man whom I met on the way home. He insisted on my going along quietly, and I insisted on singing, and the end of it was that he took me to the police-station. For seven long days I sat there, determined not to pay my fine, growling to myself, and thinking of Cleopatra, who is to blame for the whole of it. I might have been sitting there now if a third party had not thrust his nose into the business and made me jealous."

"Then I really have you to thank for his coming back after all, you dear, good Mr. Michael."

And Cleopatra rose from her chair and came to my side of the table.

"Shall I?" she asked, looking at Theodore.

"Certainly," said he, laughing, and a kiss from her soft lips burned on my cheek.

The wedding came off three weeks later, and to keep up the joke that had brought us together I sent them, for a present, an elegant Chinese pagoda for the mantel.

Since that time I have never mixed myself up in newspaper correspondence.

XTRA MAS Number of "P.W."

NOW ON SALE.

LAST year many thousands of readers were unable to obtain a copy of our Extra Christmas Number, and considering that this year's issue contains even more exceptional attractions, we are anticipating a still larger demand.

The number consists almost entirely of stories by the best authors, profusely illustrated throughout by first-class artists. Stories appear from the pens of Messrs. Headon Hill, George Griffith, W. L. Alden, and G. B. Burgin, and amongst the artists illustrating the Number are Miss G. Demain Hammond, Miss Inez Warry, and Messrs. Georges Montbard, Raymond Potter, E. S. Hope, and Sydney Harvey; an array of literary and artistic talent which I make bold to say will not be equalled in any other Christmas number published this year, at even double the price.

P.W. Extra Christmas Number is twice the size of the ordinary issue of Pearson's Weekly, is bound in a peacock blue wrapper, and with it is given away a beautiful coloured plate measuring 19¼ inches by 14¼ inches. The price, as last year, is threepence, not a very out-of-the-way sum to have paid, you will say, for the coloured plate alone.

This number is now on Sale. Intending purchasers should not fail to buy their copies at once, as owing to the time necessary for the careful printing of the coloured plate there can be no re-issue.

Digitized by Google

THE NOVELIST'S NIECE

A FRENCH STORY.

WAS young, for I was not much more than twenty; and I was inexperienced, for after having frankly published a novel at my own expense, I sent three copies, in all seriousness, to the Secretary of the Académie Française in the hope of winning the Academy prize, and took no further steps in the matter, confident of my own merit. However, an old aunt whom I had informed of my ambitious object, gave me some good advice.

"My dear nephew," she said, "I know an Academician, the well-known writer Z——. Give me a copy of your book with a special dedication. I will speak to him about it, for I meet him every week at some house or other, when I am dining out."

The very next morning my book was despatched to the famous writer Z——, who is dead now, but not, as you shall see, from having read my book.

Summer was coming on, and I went down into Burgundy to get a breath of country air, and to economise a little. The publication of my book had created a stringency in my finances. Times have changed since authors were the ruin of publishers.

In a compartment of the Paris, Lyons, and Marseilles Express there awaited me the sweetest satisfaction that literature has ever afforded me.

There were three of us in the compartment. Myself, of course; then a man of about sixty, short of figure, red of face, bald, and a strange thing at his age, without the ribbon of the Legion of Honour. On the other hand, the young girl who accompanied him—his daughter, doubtless—seemed to me a person of indisputable distinction, for she wore silk stockings. I have learned since, to my sorrow, that it does not do to pin one's faith to silk stockings.

However, the fair unknown might have worn sabots, had only one eye, and been hunchbacked. It was not on her my dazzled eyes rested, it was on the book she was reading; a book in a salmon-coloured binding that I would have recognised miles away. Great heavens, it was my book!

Everyone can set the press working nowadays. Who among us has not given himself the refined delight of seeing his name blazing forth from a bookseller's window! But to see one's self read! Ah, what a voluptuous delight it is.

My neighbour was not agitated. She was yawning. Doubtless she had got up very early that morning to prepare for her journey. Her eyes closed little by little; her rosy chin sank towards a charming cushion which nature had set to its hand; her finely-gloved hands relaxed, and—my book fell on the floor. It is not an inexcusable downfall to drop at the feet of a pretty woman—especially if those feet be clad in silk.

She had not moved. Her slumber was no trifling cat-nap, but sober, serious, and enduring. It was presumably a family trait, for the father had been snoring gently for some time. Happily, she had not been reading "Fatal Love," which fact cut short certain disquieting suppositions. As these thoughts flashed through my brain, I stopped to pick up the book. Alas! My happiness did not last long. No, she had not bought the book, for on the fly-leaf I found these lines, which I recognised, for I had written them myself!

"To Monsieur Z——
(Of the Académie Française).

"Dear master, allow one whom you do not know to offer you the homage of this humble book, as a token of respectful admiration for your sublime genius."

But then—this apoplectic and neglected person, sleeping in the corner was—oh, joy!—he was the famous writer, Z——! And he had noticed my book, for he had taken it with him. He allowed—who knows? perhaps he had advised—his child to read it.

I must profit by this unhoped-for meeting. I had fully six hours to spend with my Academician—more than enough to assure myself of his vote, which, according to my aunt, would carry with it thirty-nine others. There was no reason why I should not begin operations on him through his daughter. It was a roundabout way to reach my end, but what a charming detour! Imagine a brunette, with red and pouting lips, a figure with pure and striking outlines, suggestive of everything but the Academy and its prizes.

But I must think of my book. Poor book; the leaves were not yet cut, and if matters went on this way they might never be. So I drew forth my penknife and began cutting the pages. The rustling of the leaves awoke my neighbour, who looked astonished at my occupation.

"Sir," she began, reaching out her hand to recover her property.

"Allow me to save you a little trouble," I replied. "It will take only a minute."

She thanked me with a smile. I saw that she regarded me with a certain complaisance; evidently I did not displease her. Now was my chance to get to business.

"Besides, I have almost a right to do it," I continued, throwing into my face a word of meaning.

"A right?" she repeated, opening her eyes wide.

"Why, yes; for if you will permit me to introduce myself, I am the author, the humble and obscure author of this book."

"Then, sir, you are an author?" she said, with a somewhat disdainful tone.

"I have that honour, for I do not doubt it is an honour in your eyes. You must know many of the leading litterateurs of the day."

"Quite a number come to our house, but they are mostly old men."

"Papa keeps a sharp eye on his daughter," thought I; then I remembered the business I had on hand.

"Do you think your father will do me the honour to glance over this modest effort? I need not tell you how important such indorsement as his——"

"He is not my father, he is my uncle. Do you know him?"

"By reputation, of course. What talent he has!"

She nodded her head in approval. "Unfortunately," she said, "he is growing old, and one is soon worn out in his vocation. We have had a busy house this season; several large dinners every week, and my poor uncle has been just rushed to death."

"That is one of the consequences of being a great man. But he will be able to rest now. You are going to the country, doubtless."

"Don't imagine that country life will be a rest. In Burgundy the dinners are simply endless."

"Ah!" I exclaimed; "you are going to Burgundy?"

"Yes, to Champrive."

"To the Duchess's? Shall you be there long?"

"All the autumn. Do you know the neighbourhood?"

"I visited that superb residence some years ago. What would you say if I visited you there in a few days?"

She seemed astonished, and stared at me as if to see if I were speaking seriously.

"It would only be," I continued, "to learn what you think of my book, and if you have the goodness, after having read it, to say a good word for it to your uncle."

Digitized by Google

She burst out laughing—a pearly, rippling, delicious laugh.

"You're joking," she said; "you wouldn't come to see me."

"Not to see you? Why not? You shall see. Promise me, though, that in the meantime you will not have forgotten him who will carry for ever in his heart"—the uncle still slept like a dormouse—"the memory of your exquisite grace and beauty?"

She was not foolish enough to be angry, for, bold as were my words, my manner was perfectly respectful. We talked of everything—of Paris and Burgundy, theatres and hunting, the Duchesse de Champrive, whom she evidently knew very intimately, but on whom she expressed herself with a reserve which seemed to me in excellent taste. I even dared to ask her name, which she gave, with adorable ingenuousness:

"Félicie Legerot."

"Your uncle is not your father's brother, then," I remarked, "for you have not the same name."

What more shall I say? The journey was a dream. At Tonnerre, where the train stopped for luncheon, I had the honour to escort her to the buffet, for the Academician, "tortured," he said, "by an atrocious headache," had refused to get out. Worthy man! I served his niece with the same assiduity I would have served a queen.

When I alighted at Dijon I had not made much progress as regards my literary future, but I certainly had no cause to complain of that which I had made in Félicie's affections. In the Blaisy tunnel (5,000 feet long) I had devoured her hands with kisses, and I had whispered, "I shall see you again soon," to her, emphasising the words with a passionate pressure of her supple fingers.

"But it is impossible," she protested, though not angrily. "You must not attempt to see me again, M. Lejeune."

"Come, come," I exclaimed with a happy laugh, "haven't you guessed that Lejeune is a literary pseudonym?" And bringing my lips a little nearer her pink ear than perhaps strict decorum would permit, I confided to my pretty neighbour the honourable name and title my ancestors had bequeathed me.

Under any other circumstances Félicie's reply would have seemed a little hard on my literary pride.

"There," she exclaimed, "I thought all the time you didn't look like a real author."

Her uncle had finally wakened up, and I spoke to him just as the train stopped.

"Dear master," I said, "I have respected the repose needful to a great intellect like yours. Let me assure you, however, of my strong desire to be presented to you soon at the Duchess's. Though you do not suspect it, you see before you a petitioner for your good offices."

He seemed surprised, but made no effort to understand me.

"Sir," said he, cordially, "if it is anything that lies in my province you may count on me." And we shook hands warmly.

The reader need not be told after what manœuvres I found myself a week later at the Duchesse de Champrive's, who invited me to luncheon a few days later.

I was thinking too much of Félicie to pay attention to anything else, and you can imagine my disappointment when, as we entered the dining-room I saw that neither she nor her uncle were among the company. What had happened? They told me they were to be the Duchess's guests until the end of the autumn.

Profiting by a moment of silence, I determined to ask for them.

"Has our distinguished friend Z—— left you, madame?" I asked, raising my voice; "I hoped to meet him here."

"He did not come this year. Do you know him?"

"Only enough to have offered him a book which——"

"I thought as much. So you are an author, sir. Our friend Z—— lent me your book, recommending it as the work of a compatriot. I read it and found it charming."

"What," I insisted, "M. Z—— has not come! Why, I travelled down here with him the other day; he was coming here with his niece."

"His niece?"

"Yes, madame. She has a great admiration for you. She is extremely pretty, and so sensible, too."

"Z——'s niece? Do you know her name?"

"Mademoiselle Félicie Legerot."

Madame de Champrive crushed me with a look. The Duke seemed astonished, and glanced at me in a droll manner out of the corner of his eye. And as I was mechanically staring at the butler, who stood opposite me, I saw the face of that grave man express stupefaction so profound that I intuitively felt I had committed some horrible blunder.

A silence reigned for a minute, and then they began to talk of something else. For the time being I decided not to open my mouth again, even to eat, for my appetite was gone. If it had rested with me, the château would have caught fire immediately, so that I could have escaped under cover of the confusion. But I had to sit there and wait for the end of the dinner, pretending to find the conversation highly diverting.

Finally the suggestion was made that some guests from Paris and I should inspect the château. That over, I hoped to ask for my tilbury and escape to my own roof, hoping that, sooner or later, some chance would reveal to me the fatal error I had committed, of which I vainly sought to imagine the nature and extent.

That chance was not long in coming.

As we descended to the kitchen, the Duchess keeping me at her side, do you know whom I saw in cap, apron, and shirt sleeves, standing before the immense range? Simply Z——, the Academician, or rather the false Z——, fatter, redder than in the railway car, but not asleep this time, for he was in the act of preparing an aspic de volaille for dinner.

And do you know whom I saw enter by another door, in a coquettish white apron, and carrying a kettle that she had doubtless just filled with hot water? Félicie Legerot in person. The young unknown, whose hands I had kissed with impetuous ardour in the Blaisy tunnel, was the Duchess's maid. He whom I had taken for the famous writer Z—— was the cook, and "Fatal Love," the cause of all this confusion, had been filched by Félicie from her mistress.

We—Félicie, her uncle, and I—must have looked unspeakably funny as we recognised each other, for the Duchesse de Champrive could not restrain herself, and, in spite of her dignity, had to lean against one of the pillars that supported the roof to laugh at her ease. As for Félicie, she fled to the next room, where I heard her shriek with laughter.

All this happened ten years ago, and never since then have I been seen at Champrive. I have met the Duchess once or twice in Paris, but I hope she did not recognise me. If she did it certainly was not my fault.

Digitized by Google

OLD SLATER'S LOVE STORY.

THE sloop of war Antelope stood off Gonave.

The sun's gold disc had disappeared and the sweet melancholy of a southern twilight lay upon the Island, whose profile, darkly outlined against the saffron-hued sky, was set in an amethyst frame, the deep and luminous violet of the sea. Briefly, the tropic twilight is short; its silhouette hung there between the two immensities of sky and sea, then the jewel colours of wave, and cloud, and wood-draped island vanished—a velvety blackness covered all.

On the spar-deck of the Antelope, seamen Bill Williams and Sam Woods, apprentice Stubbs, and the Jack of the Dust were matching experiences. The boatswain's mate listened, without commenting. Old Slater commented, without listening. From time to time he left his messmates, to lean over the rail. Fixing his eyes on Gonave with that interest which we give to something which marks an event in our lives, he wagged his head so knowingly that Stubbs and Dusty—men of one poem, so to speak—were visibly envious. At length the old seaman took his place among them. He began at once to speak:

"Hev I ever tol' ye of 'n adventure me an' the Exec'tive had on thet ther' island?"

"Give us the first line, Mr. Slater, and we'll tell you," replied the Jack of the Dust, jauntily.

"Ketch a-hol' o' yerself, Dusty," recommended old Slater. "Et ain't no comic piece. Et's 'bout a gal. A little bit of er gal—yaller's gol'."

The Jack of the Dust's expression changed; he had but just begun the study of the "eternal feminine," and his desire for phenomena was still unsatisfied.

"Fire away," he said cordially. "I guess it's a good one this time."

"Do you mean the Antelope's 'First Luff'?" questioned Stubbs.

"Ther same," old Slater replied.

"That porpoise?" exclaimed the Jack of the Dust.

"He wuzn't no porpoise then, lad," said the storyteller. "They called 'im ther 'Dandy Ensign'—he wuz Ensign Fitz in them days—an' 'Gentleman Jack' an' 'Han'some Jack,' an' 'e wuz purty near all thet, fer 'e wuz clear pink 'n white; 'e hedn't no airs, an' 'e wuz plucky as the nex' one.

"Me an' him hed been on ther Bender two year, an' one cruise in these 'ere waters, ther skipper—no sailor-man 't all he wuzn't—took et inter 'is blame ol' head ter come up 'ere from Port o' Prince, whar we wuz havin' more fun than 'nuff, fer gun practice. No matter 'bout what we done. Though I rec'lec' our Divis'n Cap'n got 'n eye blowed out, an' seed more 'n ever after thet, et havin' quick'ned his 'magination. One mornin' Fitz he come ter me an' sez, 'I've got ter get out er this.'

"'I'm goin' 'shore shootin',' sez he. 'Git leave an' come 'long, Slater; mebbe we'll strike sumthin'.'

"I know'd he wanted me ter pull ther boat, so I got leave an' we went 'shore an' shot wil' roun' thar er while, then 'e got 'nuff an' propos'd er bite of the rations I'd fetched. I set 'em out under a big coco-palm, an' Fitz 'e got conf'dential over mess, and began ter talk 'bout the Creole gal he'd got 'quainted with in Port o' Prince. Fitz 'e sed 'e loved 'er 'madly,' an' a lot more that I knowed by 'eart, fer 'e loved easy an' of'en in them days, an' swore 'e'd make 'er Missis Fitz ef 'e 'ad ter give up 'is fambly—'s mother havin' given 'im warnin' that she wouldn't hev no furrin graft on ter ther Fitz tree. While he wuz a-ravin' we 'earn sumthin' an' looked roun'. Thar she stood!"

"The Creole?" interrupted the Jack of the Dust.

"No; the yaller gal," Old Slater answered, "lookin' like 'er leetle gol' statyure in 'er garden, with all ther green stuff back on 'er. She was jes so slim an' still. I reck'n she wuz 'bout twel' year ol'."

"A kid!" exclaimed the Jack of the Dust.

"Don't ye go a-jumpin', Dusty," said Old Slater; "she wuz out er the nus'ry."

"They ripen early in these 'ere lat'tudes, Dusty. They don't hev nuthing ter keep 'em back, which ever edication will an' too many strings roun' ther wais'," Bill Williams remarked, with the air of a Reformer.

"But the little golden girl?" ventured Stubbs.

Old Slater continued: "Fitz jumped up when he see her, an' motions 'er ter come an' hev a bite, an' 'long she steps, easy 'n' light 's a kitten, an' se' down side o' 'im. She couldn't never hev seed no sech rations, but she wuzn't took back. She eat 's nat'ral 's a bird picks up crumbs. Thet, my lads," with a glance at the apprentice and the Jack of the Dust, "thet wuz 'cause she wuz thurerbred—they shows their grain fust off. Don't fergit thet when ye're lookin' fer somethin' ter 'dorn yer 'omes."

"I ain't looking for savages," returned the Jack of the Dust. "I like a woman with some style; that has seen something of the world, and knows her way about better than to mess with two strange men in the jungle."

"Let me tell ye, Dusty," said Old Slater, gravely, "a gal's got ter be equil ter the occasion, whether ye find 'er in ther jungle or'in ther Whitechapel Road. Ef she hain't got ther knack fer thet she ain't got nothin' ter build on."

"I ain't asking anybody for points!" blazed the Jack of the Dust.

"Hush up!" said Stubbs.

Silence being assured, the old seaman resumed his narrative:

"Fitz 'e begun ter talk ter 'er in Creole. Et 'it ther mark, but she hedn't much ter say: she'd never seed nuthin' like 'im, an' was all carried 'way with 'is pink 'n' white. So thar she sot, 'er great, big black eyes full o' witch-looks, a-listenin' to 'is talk, an' answerin' up sof' 's er leetle bird peeps, when 'e asked 'er sumthin' d'rect. 'Twuz plain 'nuff ter me thet she wuz clean gone on 'im, so I went ter sleep—thar ain't no bigger blunder, Dusty, than fer er man ter keep 'wake when thar ain't gals nuff ter go roun'; 'e ain't goin' ter be pop'lar in any s'ciety ef 'e makes thet slip."

"Much obliged, but I've got ahead of a-b ab," the Jack of the Dust said, with fine irony.

Old Slater continued calmly:

"When I woke up they wuz a kissin' of one another like mad. Mimi—thet wuz 'er name—wuz a-callin' of Fitz 'Doudoux' ev'ry other word, an' 'e wuz bustin' with pride an' vanity."

"Well, I wuz equil to et! I hedn't been ten year on the flagship fer nuthin'. I hed dyplom'cy 'nuff fer 'n adm'ral, an' kep' my eyes a-rovin', and list'n'd to Fitz makin' of himself out ther 'ero o' combats he'd never ben in, without blinkin'. But when ther bats begun ter sweep roun' over'ead in er percession, I know'd 'nuff ter know we b'long'd on ther Bender, an' I calls Fitz down an' gits a move on 'im.

"Mimi, she wa'n't fer sayin' good-bye, an' she trots 'long with us ter ther shore, an' when 'e sed 'e'd love 'er alwus, an' promised ter come ther nex' day an' stay for ever, she let 'im git inter ther gig. She stood thar, a-watching' after 'im. I kin see 'er yit! Leetle slim gal, 'er blue cotton gownd, belayed at ther wais' with er green and yaller string, half coverin' of 'er, a-callin', 'Adieu, Doudoux, adieu!' in a voice sof' 's velvit—jes' ther sperit o' the islan'! 'Slater,' sez Fitz, when we was clear o' moorin's, 'et's a great ol' world!' Then 'e waits er while an' sez—'e wuz smilin' free, like a lad—'Why, that leetle gal 's ther light o' my life.'"

"What about the Creole lady?" questioned the Jack of the Dust. "Your 'Dandy Ensign' didn't need transfer papers for his affections, did he?"

"I entered right inter et," continued Old Slater, slightly raising his voice. "An' I let 'im say the same thing a 'undred diff'rent ways till we wuz 'longside ther Bender, then sez 'e, 'I'll see 'er ter-morrer, Slater!'"

"But we didn't get off so easy. Ther skipper had ther dyspepsy ther nex' day—thar wuzn't no liberty fer ennybody, an' he wuz sorry he couldn't stop the sun from shinin'. He kep' this up for his 'musement 'till ther end o' ther week. Fitz, he was blame near crazy, an' I sez, 'Try 'em on goin' 'shore for butterflies.'

"Et went, fer 'e wuz knowed ter be a great entymol'gist in them days, an' we got off. Then Fitz, 'e took at outen me!

Digitized by Google

'E wuz goin' ter marry thet leetle gal ef 'e 'ad ter quit ther service, an' live under a cabbage-palm ther rest o' 'is life. She was wuth et! 'E named er king thet married whar 'e wanted ter, an' wuzn't never sorry—but 'e didn't mention no ev'ry-day man thet 'ad the same run o' luck. 'E sed she wuz er match for enny Duchess—an' I reck'n 'twaz so, ther only Duchess I ever see bein' yeller 's er saffron bag, an' ol' at thet. Yes, she wuz ther mos' perfect' leetle gal in ther worl'; an' 'e wuz going' ter hav er, an' prej'dice might go to thunder. 'I tell ye what, Slater,' ses 'e, 'I'll give out she's er princess; they'll knuckle ter thet.'

"I wuz so dead set 'ginst thet Creole an' 'er airs thet I 'greed with 'im. 'Thet's so,' sez I. 'Ther gal's got ther royal grain, an' no mistake.'

"Well, Mimi, she wuz on ther shore, an' when 'e see 'er he wuz up on 'is feet. 'Don't git ter sleep, Slater!' sez 'e. 'She's waitin', man, can't ye see?' He was out 'fore ther gig wuz in, an' when I made things fast I follered on. They wuz in ther same place under ther coco-palm, an' Mimi wuz restin' 'ginst Fitz light's er slip o' willer—I ain't ever see anything ter equil ther grace o' them leetle slim niggers; runnin' water ain't smoother nor purtier 'n their ways o' movin', an' jist surroundin' ther man they love——."

"Go 'head," growled Sam Woods.

"Wall, I lef' Fitz an' Mimi an' struck out fer butterflies; after er while I ketched er big black feller, an' thet wuz all I wanted fer er blin', one bein' as misleadin' 's er dozen, an' 'nuff sight easier ter ketch. Then I started back to ther 'rig'nal spot, an' I'd better never hev lef' et.

"Thar sot them two, Mimi makin' no 'bjection ter Fitz's arm snug roun' her wais', an' a-wrigglin' towards 'em, on ther ends o' his foes, wuz as ugly-favoured er knave as I ever see. They wuz sittin' with their backs to 'im an' me, an' in er flash I knowed 'e didn't like what 'e see; thet 'e was Mimi's comp'ny—fathers 'n' brothers ain't interferin' in love 'fairs in these parts—an' thet somebuddy'd got ter pay fer 'is losin' of 'er. I give er jump for'ard an' sung out. Fitz an' Mimi sprung up an' faced roun'.

"Then 'e turned an' see me, an' knowed 'e wusn't goin' ter stand enny show with us two men. I wuz near par'lysed by ther look on 'is face, but 'twuzn't ennythin' ter Mimi's—hate, sech as white wimmen don't feel, wuz ragin' an' blazin' thar. Et told 'im, better 'n words, thet he'd los' grip on 'er, an' ther nigger wuz 'nuff like er white man ter be boun' thet nobuddy else shouldn't hev it. They glared er minnet, mebbe, then what do you think she done?"

"Screeched, of course," said the Jack of the Dust, without hesitation.

"Only white ones screeches an' squeals," said Old Slater.

"What did she do?" questioned Stubbs.

"I ain't sayin' but what ther everlastin' woman wuz in et," Old Slater said. "She kinder straightened up fust, then clasped Fitz, a-callin' of 'im er lot o' sweet Creole names—never did them mongrel lisping's soun' sweeter! Then quicker'n I kin tell et a blade flashed in thet nigger's 'an, an' whiz et went 'issing through the 'ot air.

"I turned sick, fer I 'lowed Fitz wuz er goner, but now I know thet she wuz expectin' of et and wuz willin' ter pay ther price like ther thurerbred she wuz, fer she faced roun' suddent, jes' in front o' Fitz, 'er two arms stretched wide ter shield 'im, and ketched thet knife on 'er bres'-bone!"

"Good enough!" said Jack of the Dust, with hearty, if tardy, appreciation.

"I'd done 'er blame sight too much lookin' on," continued Old Slater, "but I soon put ther 'sassin whar 'e b'longed. Fitz as white 's 'er ghost, wuz a-holding' Mimi. 'Er blood wuz pourin', an' suthin' like er curtin wuz creepin' over 'er eyes, shuttin' out ther light. She tried ter smile—she was er Princess, an' I reck'n, too, she wuz satisfied ter knew she'd hev ter knuckle down ter thet nigger man. 'Doudoux,' sez she, 'adieu.' Them wuz all the words she spoke, an' no young bird never piped 'good-night' enny softer n' sweeter. Then she tried to put up 'er arms. But 'twusn't in 'em—poor little arms, they dropped, an' she wuz gone."

"Dead," gasped Stubbs.

"Thet's er good name for et in enny lat'tude," replied Old Slater, dryly. He continued in a softer tone: "Fitz laid Mimi down like as ef she wuz er babby, an' 'im an' me kinder straightened of 'er out. I couldn't help wonderin' ef she hed 'er mammy to moan over 'er leetle spent life. We lef' thet nigger whar 'e fell, an' went 'way without er word. Thet night ther Bender hauled up 'er anchor, and we went down ter Port o' Prince."

Stubbs sighed.

"Whar thet Creole begun whar she'd lef' off," added Old Slater, savagely.

"How could he? Do you mean that he forgot Mimi?" cried Stubbs.

"Don't ye go ter gittin' sof', Stubby," said Old Slater. "A man thet's goin' ter mount ter shucks in the service kin forgit ennything!"

"But when she died for him!" persisted Stubbs.

"She didn't feel et none to speak on," Old Slater said, with conviction. "Wimmen are made so 's they kin die easy fer ther men they love."

"Don't git 'xcited, lad," advised Bill Williams. "Ye ain't got nuthin' ter do with et; ther Lord he made 'em ter fill their places."

Old Slater was seemingly searching some chamber of his memory. At length he said:

"White ones, mebbe, dies a leetle harder, an' they ain't quite so likely ter do it, but colour don't make no great difference."

"White ones feel—and die!"

It was the boatswain's mate, and he spoke in a voice which forbade contradiction. "She——" but his voice broke; he paused on that word, stayed by thoughts too bitter to express. He walked away, without looking at his companions.

"Well, much obliged, Mr. Slater," said the Jack of the Dust; "she was a dandy, and no mistake."

He, too, walked away, followed by Stubbs. Old Slater looked after the apprentice.

"Humph," said he, with a short laugh. "Thet lad's heart aches an' he dunno why. Thet's youth."

NOW READY.

Part I. of

PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO

OF

FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

NO COUPON NECESSARY.

Give an order to your newsagent for this at once. It is the most delightful Art Album ever published. It would cost you a small fortune to buy separately the photos we shall present in this series. We give you 20 or 30 for sixpence in each part.

CONTENTS OF PART I.

Miss Mabel Love disguised as Pepita in "Little Christopher Columbus."
Miss Lucile Hill as Dorothy Vernon in "Haddon Hall."
Mr. Geo. Alexander as David Remon in "The Masqueraders."
Miss Ellen Terry as Rosamond in "Becket."
Miss Sylvia Gerrish.
Mr. Geo. Grossmith at the piano.
Miss Ada Blanche as "Robinson Crusoe."
Miss Lillian Russell.
Miss May Yohé singing the Plantation Song.
Miss Topsy Sinden in some of her parts.
Miss Cissy Loftus as Haidee in "Don Juan."
Miss Maud Millett: a Reminiscence of "Liberty Hall."
Herr Max Alvary as Siegfried.
The Misses Lily and Hilda Hanbury.
Mr. Wilson Barrett as Pete in "The Manxman."
Miss Lizzie Ruggles.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

MAX RENAULT—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

FRANZ HARTOG—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

SIR HARRY MILTON—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

HERBERT WYNDHAM—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who resigns his commission and couples his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

FREDERICK AUSTEN—the inventor of the Utopian air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

VIOLET MILTON—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is permanently crippled by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

DORA MERTON—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

LUCY SUMMERS—another fair Utopian.

Renault in the air-ship Vengeur, and Hartog in the torpedo-boat Destroyer, levy blackmail on the high seas. Just as they have annihilated a combined British, French, and Portuguese fleet sent to discover them, Mr. Maxim's aeroplane, the Britannia, comes on the scene and is captured by the Vengeur.

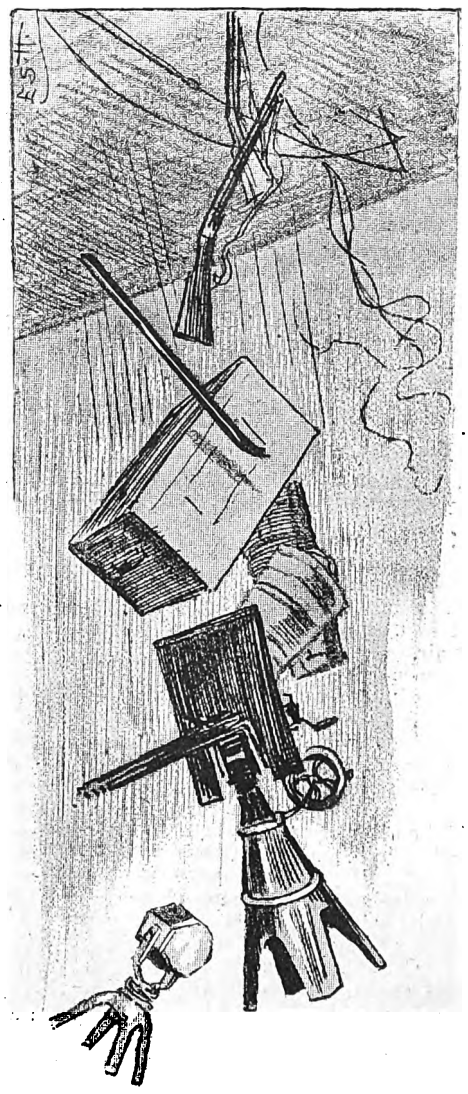
CHAPTER XXI.

A VICTORY OF TACTICS.

IN less time than it would take to describe the operation, the guns, ammunition, and all heavy movable impedimenta were flung overboard from the car of the Britannia, and, after the first to-and-fro rocking movement consequent on the violent wrenching off of the guiding-planes and the throwing overboard of the heavy weights had ceased, the whole machine began to settle gently down with ever-decreasing speed as the denser air was reached, until, at a height of four thousand feet above the sea, the downward motion was so slight as to be almost imperceptible.

In fact the Britannia had become a huge parachute, and was exactly fulfilling the prediction that her inventor had made years before when he said that his aeroplane, if crippled in mid-air, would alight as gently as a bird coming to rest after a flight. But she was not destined to continue her descent uninterrupted. The grapnel descended again, this time in front, and hooked on to the forward midships stay which connected the aeroplane with the car. As soon as it was firmly hitched on there was a gentle forward pull, and the Britannia slowly swung round and headed towards the coast, which was now about twenty miles distant.

"I wonder what the deuce the fellow's up to now," said Lieutenant Pelham, who had already recovered his composure, on finding that, for the present at least, the Britannia was not to be destroyed. "I may as well hail him and find out, if he'll tell me."



All impedimenta were flung overboard.

He went forward to the bow of the car, and looking up, saw, as he expected, that the victor in the so far bloodless duel was towing the Britannia by means of a long wire rope attached to the grapnel. The first thing he saw was the barrel of a Maxim gun protruding from an after port in the air-ship's hull, and trained on the car of the Britannia.

"Air-ship, ahoy! Where are you taking us to, and what are you going to do with us?"

There was no answer for a few moments. Then a window slide was withdrawn close to the port hole, and Max Renault put his arms on the sill of the window, leant out, and said:

"Who are you, may I ask?"

"I am Lieutenant Pelham in command of the air-ship Britannia, and——"

"Late in command, I suppose you mean," interrupted Max with a short laugh. "It doesn't seem to strike you that I've taken you and your mechanical kite prisoners of war, and that I can blow you into little pieces whenever I like. However, Lieutenant Pelham, I don't want to be rude or to take any ungentlemanly advantage of my position. If you admit the logic of circumstances, and are prepared to surrender and haul that flag down——'

"I'll see you—well, civilised first,' and then I won't!" retorted the lieutenant with an energy that was quite justifiable under the circumstances. "Fire away, and be hanged to you!"

"Oh, I don't want to insist upon trifles," replied Max with imperturbable good-humour. "If it pleases you to keep the flag flying, do so by all means. It's only a matter of form, after all. And even if you don't want to surrender, you needn't do so, only, if you finger the handle of that revolver any more, or anybody is foolish enough to shoot, I shall just cast off and let you drop. You'll make very good target practice for my fellows with their Maxims as you are going down. But there, it's no use fooling, do you mean to continue the fight or not?"

"No, we don't," said the Lieutenant biting an oath off short between his teeth. "How the deuce can we? Of course, you can send us into the sea in little pieces if you like. The only question is, on what terms you will refrain from doing so."

"Ah, now we shall begin to understand one another," said Max, still smiling and still speaking in the same even tones that he had used throughout the brief interview. "My terms are these—and you can accept them or reject them as it pleases you. First, will you give me your word of honour, as a gentleman and a British officer, that no one on board that thing of yours will fire a shot or commit any other act of violence as long as no violence is offered to any of you?"

While he was speaking, Captain Maxwell had joined the Lieutenant in the bow of the car. Pelham looked at him inquiringly, and he said:

Digitized by Google

"I don't see why you shouldn't. We are beaten in this fight, and there's an end of it. You've no right to sacrifice the lives of your people, or even yourself, in what would simply be a cold-blooded murder. You'd better say yes."

"Very well," said the Lieutenant to Max. "I consent, on condition that we are treated honourably, as prisoners of war would be treated between honourable and civilised combatants."

Max passed by the plainly implied sneer with a laugh, as he could afford to do, and replied:

"Certainly. I don't propose to harm any of you, if you accept my conditions."

"Very well," said the Lieutenant. "What are they?"

"I am going to tow you to the coast as near as I can to one of the Canary Islands, or to within reach of some town on the coast. There you will land and shift for yourselves, on giving your parole that you will keep to the north and give no information about what has occurred to-day for three full days and nights from now. After that, you may say and do what you please."

Lieutenant Pelham looked inquiringly at Captain Maxwell again. The Captain thought for a moment, and then nodded.

"Yes," said the Lieutenant, in reply to Max. "We can consent to that, and if we do I presume you guarantee all our lives and personal safety. And now, perhaps you won't mind telling us who and what you are, and the name of that really wonderful craft which I suppose you command."

"I am Max Renault, Anarchist and Outlaw, and this is the Anarchist air-ship Vengeur. I suppose you have heard of her before, and I can promise you that you shall hear of her again. In fact, I may say that I am making arrangements to build a fleet like her, and then—well, then I should advise your so-called civilised Governments to resign and get into private life as fast as ever they can, because I propose to make things very hot for people that I disagree with.

"We Anarchists have a lot of grudges to pay off, you know; and when we get the upper hand, as we shall have in a very short time, we propose to pay them in full and take no change."

"My dear sir, if you propose to make a speech on practical anarchy," interrupted the Lieutenant coolly, "I would suggest that the audience is both limited and unsympathetic, and the occasion hardly suitable. In fact, if you go on talking such senseless nonsense, I shall withdraw what I've said, do my best to spoil your plans by putting a bullet into you, and then let your comrades do their worst."

"Pluckily spoken under the circumstances!" said Max with an ironical laugh. "Still, I didn't propose to make a speech—and deeds, after all, are more eloquent than words. Adieu then for the present, make yourselves comfortable, and I will land you safely on the coast as soon as possible: By the way, oblige me by starting that other screw of yours. It will help us on our way."

With that he drew his head in, and the slide shot across the window, but the muzzle of the Maxim gun still remained grinning out of its port hole at the car of the Britannia. The Vengeur now quickened her speed considerably, and the Britannia, supported by her aeroplane and driven by her single screw, was towed at a speed of about forty miles an hour in a north-easterly direction towards the coast.

In less than an hour she had gained the land, and then the Vengeur, taking a more northerly course, towed her along until a small Arab settlement was sighted some ten miles ahead. There she was allowed to settle quietly to the ground, and her crew disembarked, sad and angry, but still thankful to escape with their lives from an encounter in which no credit could possibly have been gained under the circumstances, save the empty glory of defiance to the end, which would simply have resulted in not a man being left alive to tell the tale of the disastrous cruise of the Britannia.

Renault allowed them to depart with their arms, money, and such provisions and personal effects as they could carry; and so they set off to make the best of their mournful way to the Arab settlement.

Pelham looked at him inquiringly.

They had scarcely gone five hundred yards from where the Britannia was lying with the Vengeur beside her on top of the sand cliffs, when Peter Jackson, the late coxwain of the Britannia, who was lagging behind the rest of the party, suddenly and without a word faced about, dropped on his knee, and opened fire with his magazine rifle on three or four of the Vengeur's men who were standing in a group near the broken propeller of the aeroplane. Two of them rolled over, and then the Maxim in the stern of the Vengeur, which had been kept trained on the retreating party, sent a stream of flame and bullets from its muzzle, and Jackson paid the penalty of his rash and, in fact, treacherous deed, and doubled up in a heap and dropped on the sand.

Three other sailors who had run back towards him also dropped in their tracks. Then the fire of the Maxim stopped, and Taxil, followed by three of the Vengeur's men with rifles at the ready, ran forward and called on the survivors of the party to throw down their arms and surrender. The Lieutenant and Captain Maxwell at once dropped their rifles and walked quickly towards them. Taking no apparent notice of the levelled rifles Pelham advanced to Taxil and said in French:

"I hope you don't think that that man fired by my orders. I'd have shot him myself before I'd have allowed him to do it, if I'd have known what his intention was. If you don't believe me, shoot."

Taxil looked at him straight in the eyes for a moment. If he had shown a sign of flinching, his doom and that of his remaining companions would have been sealed, but his eyes never wavered, and not a muscle of his face moved.

"You're a brave man," said Taxil lowering his rifle; "and therefore you don't tell lies. I believe you, so go on your way in peace. Even we outlaws, you know, are not without honour—sometimes. Adieu! Don't look back, or you'll be fired on."

Pelham bowed in silence and turned on his heel and walked back to where Jackson was lying with his two remaining shipmates bending over him. He was still alive when they reached him, though almost riddled with bullets.

"What did you do that for, Jackson?" asked Pelham sternly, as soon as he saw that the man was still conscious. "It was a dirty trick, unworthy an English sailor, and it might have cost the lives of every one of us."

"I couldn't help it, sir," gasped the man with almost his last breath. "So help me, God, I couldn't, and if I've killed that chap that told you to haul the flag down I—oh——"

Digitized by Google

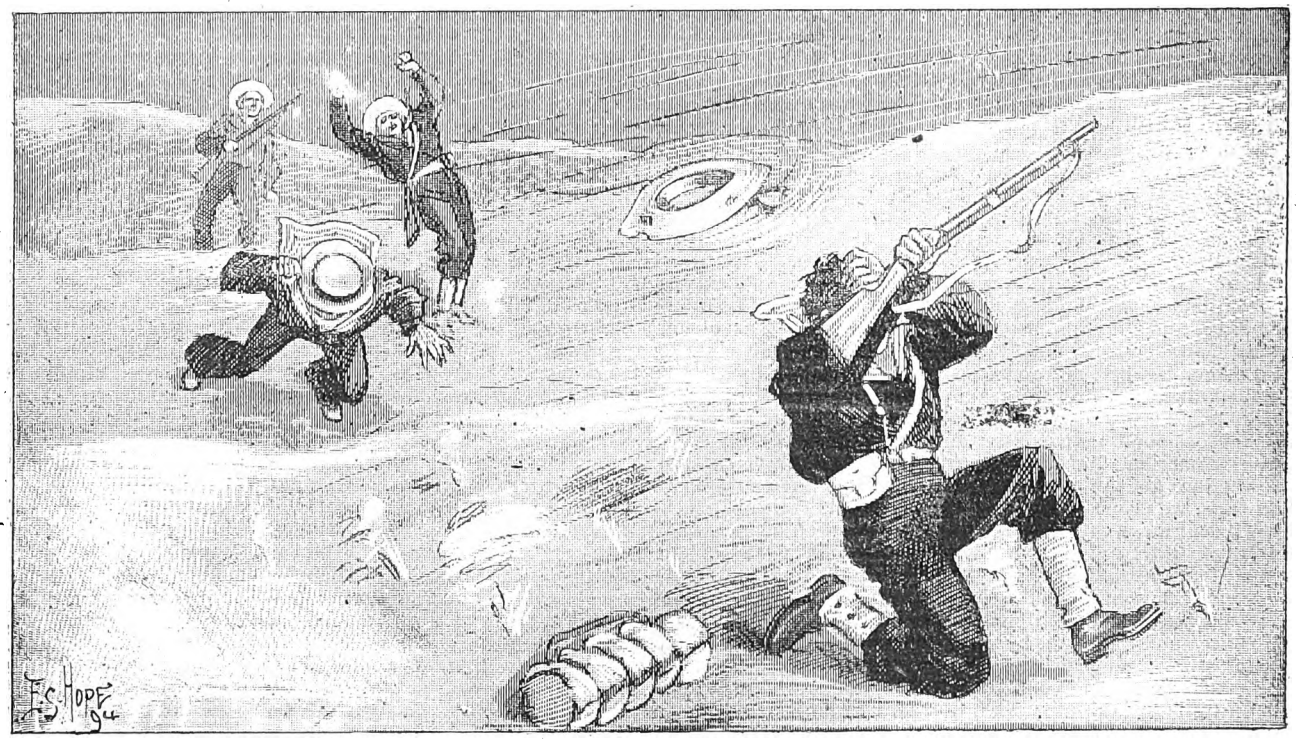
The rest was lost in a gurgling rattle in the man's throat. He made a brief, desperate struggle for breath, and then the rising blood choked him, and he dropped back dead in the arms of the shipmate who was holding him up.

"Poor beggar!" said Captain Maxwell turning away with a shudder. "I suppose he acted according to his lights. Who knows, perhaps he killed that cynical scoundrel who commanded the air-ship, and if he's done that he may have changed the history of the world. Still, they treated us about as fairly as they could. But there, it's no use arguing. He's paid the best price he could for the mistake he made.

"Come along Pelham, it's no use stopping here, and it's no good trying to bury these poor chaps, for the jackals would have eaten them, all the same, before morning. Let us get away before those fellows change their minds and shoot what is left of us down. We may be of some use to the Old Country yet."

The Lieutenant saw the justness of his reasoning, and so with heavy hearts the four survivors of the lost Britannia shouldered their rifles and the few possessions they had brought away with them, and set out on their ten-mile tramp over the desert towards the Settlement.



Jackson paid the penalty of his rash . . . deed.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE RESULT OF PETER JACKSON'S SHOT.

CAPTAIN MAXWELL had come nearer the truth than he thought in his supposition that one of Jackson's bullets might have killed Renault, and so, by quenching the master-spirit of the outlaws of the air, have changed the history of the world.

When Jackson fired Max was standing examining the broken propeller in order to see if the shaft had been strained by the wrench, and so to judge how long it would take to fit one of the spare propellers of the Vengeur in its place. Of the five shots which emptied the magazine of the sailor's rifle, two had struck him. One drilled a clean hole through his right shoulder-blade, glanced upwards, broke the collar-bone and passed out shattering the jaw of a man who stood close beside him. The other one pierced his left arm a couple of inches above the elbow, chipped a clean piece out of the bone, and flew away out to sea without doing further damage.

Stunned by the double shock, he rolled over as though one of the bullets had pierced his brain, and did not recover consciousness until the Vengeur, with the Britannia in tow, had borne him to the inlet and was sinking gently down towards the shore near which the Destroyer and the Pilgrim were already lying.

Fortunately for him among the numerous company of recruits that the yacht had brought out was a highly skilled French surgeon, named Vaillac Fargeau, a man of high scientific and general culture who, like Fénelon, Jean Grave, and Réclus, had become, from really honest if perverted convictions, deeply imbued with the terrible doctrines of the Propaganda by Force, and so had thrown in his lot with the outlaws. He at once went on board the Vengeur and lost no time in examining Max's wounds, setting the broken bone, and allaying the inflammation. Max was now perfectly conscious again, and was all impatience to know how long it would be before he could resume the active command of the Vengeur.

"At least three weeks' perfect rest will be absolutely necessary," said the doctor when he had finished his work. "In that time I hope you will be able to use your left arm a little; your right must not be moved for quite a month from now."

"Mille tonnerres, doctor! but that is impossible," exclaimed Max. "It would ruin all our plans, and perhaps, who knows, the whole course of events would be altered by such a delay. No one can and no one shall command the Vengeur but myself, and we must start at once for the South Pacific."

"And equally, my dear Monsieur Max," said Fargeau with quiet firmness, "it would not only alter but ruin all your plans and the hopes of your comrades if the inflammation spread to the lung, which is already injured, and deprived us, as it well might do, of the leader on whom everything depends. Believe me, it is so. The penalty for not following my instructions would be a long lingering illness which might weaken you for life and perhaps, as I say, cut short your life itself. The plans must go for the present. You are of far more mportance than they, whatever they are."

Digitized by Google

He rolled over.

"And to tink," broke in Hartog who was standing by the couch on which Max lay—"to tink dat all dis has happened just because you let dose fellows go instead of drowing dem into de sea when you might haf done it so comfortably. I vould haf blowed dem and dere miserable kite into fifty tousand pieces before I vould haf let von of dem go.

"You are kind to dem, you treat dem honourably, and set dem loose to go and tell tales about us, and den, by tam, one of dem turns round and shoots you. I haf alvays said dere is only one goot policy in var; you kill your enemy ven you haf de chance and den you haf done mit him. You spare him and he turns up some day and puts some bullets into you. Oh, Max, Max, I did not tink it of you!"

Renault heard the little German's harangue to the end with a smile, then he said, without any appearance of anger at his reproaches:

"Yes, yes, Hartog, that's all right as far as theory goes; but you know when we agreed to destroy everybody, we didn't count on the appearance of the aeroplane, and really those three fellows on the Devon and the lieutenant who commanded the Britannia showed such splendid pluck, and took their licking so well, that I don't believe even you would have had the heart to kill them in cold blood if you'd been in my place."

"Ah, vouldn't I!" ejaculated Hartog with a savage glint through his spectacles. "I vould haf turned de Maxim on dem like a hose on a fire, and by de red beard of Barbarossa I vould haf put dem out too. No, mein friend, mercy is no goot; it is foolishness only fit for vat dey called civilised peoples."

"All the same," replied Max. "I had an object in what I did. I meant those fellows to go back to England and tell what they had seen with their own eyes. I wanted them to prove to the British Government that they might as well send a lot of carrier-pigeons against us as things like that aeroplane. That is why I took it from them without firing a shot; just to show them how helpless they were.

"I can tell you the moral effect of that would be worth the sparing of a good many lives. Of course, I never dreamt that the blackguard of a sailor would disobey orders and do as he did. However, what's done is done. The question is, what are we to do now?"

"You must not talk any more for the present, Monsieur Max," interposed Fargeau, holding his hand up to stop Hartog, who was just beginning to speak. "You have talked too much already. I shall give you a sleeping draught now, and you must sleep for at least six hours in perfect quiet; after that, if no fresh danger appears, you may make your plans. Now, Monsieur Hartog, you must go," he continued, putting his hand on the engineer's arm. "It is really necessary. I would not say so if it were not so."

"Just one more word, Doctor, and I'll obey," said Max, who was too sensible not to see that Fargeau's course was the right one. "Hartog, whatever happens, we must get out of here with all the ships as soon as possible. It would be ruin to be found here with me in this state. Get up steam on all the ships and be ready to work out after nightfall. Clear away the upper deck of the Bremen so that the Vengeur can be laid along it. I'll tell Taxil what to do. Now then, Doctor, let's have your sleeping draught, and I'll behave myself."

It was then a little after mid-day, and Renault slept soundly until nearly seven. When he woke the Doctor found that the inflammation had subsided very favourably, and pronounced him fit to make the necessary arrangements with Hartog.

Meanwhile, the engineer with every man at his command had been working hard making preparations to leave the inlet. All the treasure and stores had been stowed on board the Bremen, a fresh supply of fuel had been prepared for the Destroyer, the liner's four masts had been cut down, and a clear space over two hundred feet long had been made aft for the air-ship to rest upon. Shortly after seven, therefore, Hartog had a tête-à-tête with Renault for the purpose of determining on future plans.

"Well, friend Franz, have you found any way out of this infernal hole while I have been asleep?" said Renault to begin with.

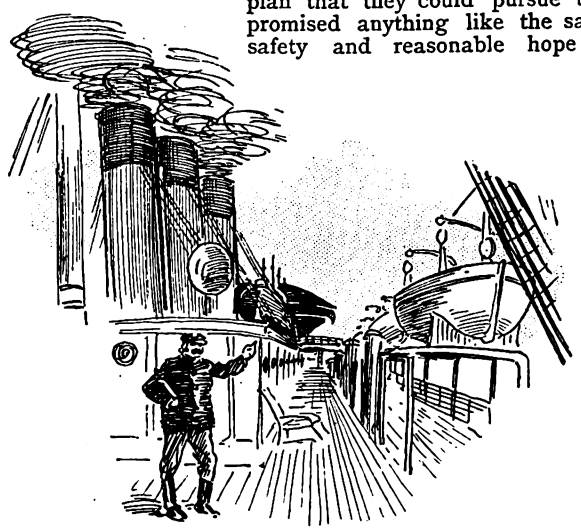
"Vell, mein frient, I haf been doing some tinking, and so far as I can see de best dat ve can do unter de circumstances is dis. In de first place, everyting is ready to leave de inlet insides of an hour; secondly, as de Pilgrim has brought out between fifty and sixty recruits, goot smart fellows all of dem, mechanics and engineers and some sailors, I tink dat, if ve send Marcel home again mit as small a crew as possible to get de machines and tings made for de air-ships vat I haf given him de plans and drawings for, ve can find men enough now to man de Bremen and take her round de Horn. It vill take us quite a month to get to Utopia, but dat ve cannot help. It vill give you time to get vell, and ven ve get dere you can take command of de Vengeur and clear dose peoples out."

"Supposing always that they're there still."

"It is not unlikely dat dey vill be dere. They know dat you had no weapons and no ammunition. Dey vill believe dat you vill go somevere and get dem made, and dey know dat vill take some tree or four monds. Now it vould take dem longer dan dat to build and arm anoder air-ship for demselves, and I don't tink dey vill leave before dey have made one, always supposing dat you have successfully destroyed de Nautilus.

"But, at any rate, I suppose you must haf damaged her very much, and she vill take a long time to repair. You may be sure dat dey vill not go avay mit only de yacht and dere oder steamer, because dey know it vould be perfectly easy for us to lie in vait for dem up near de entrance to de Panama Canal and sink dem both before dey could say dere prayers. Besides, I do not tink dey vould have room to take de whole lot in de two ships, and you can bet dey vould not leave any behind if dey are such civilised merciful sort of people as you say dey are. Now vat do you tink of dat for a scheme?"

Max, who had been thinking hard while Hartog was talking, saw that under the circumstances there was really no other plan that they could pursue that promised anything like the same safety and reasonable hope of



A clear space had been made aft for the air-ship.

Digitized by Google

destroying the colony of Utopia, so after a few moments' silence he said:

"No, I don't see anything else for it. That's the best thing to be done, Franz, and we'll do it. Just send Taxil here and I'll tell him how to lay the Vengeur on board the Bremen. Then you go and see everything ready to get out."

"Goot! I thought you vould find dat de best scheme. Ve shall be outside in less as an hour." So saying he left the saloon, and then Taxil came in to receive Max's instructions.

So perfectly did he carry them out, and so thoroughly had Franz made all the arrangements, that within half an hour the air-ship was lying in her place on the Bremen's deck, properly shored up on dog-leg supports, and yet free to rise at any moment into the air. Her two Maxim's had been replaced at the forward ports and a light quick-firing pneumatic shell-gun which the Pilgrim had brought out was mounted aft, so that she was perfectly ready to co-operate with the Destroyer in case any fighting had to be done.

Twelve men had been left to work the Destroyer, and this with the recruits left nearly eighty free to work the big liner. The Bremen had coals enough in her bunkers to run some ten thousand miles at half speed. This, of course, was not enough to take her to Utopia, especially as she might have to do some hard steaming on the way, but this gave them very little anxiety. There was plenty of coal on the sea to be had for the taking. Nothing would be easier than to run down a liner or a cargo boat or even half a dozen of them on the route, empty them of coal, and turn them adrift, and this as a matter of fact was done no less than four times between the African coast and Cape Horn.

Before eight o'clock everything was ready. The Pilgrim went out first and ran away to the northward, then the Destroyer stole out to see that the coast was quite clear and came back to tow the Bremen through the narrow entrance, By nine o'clock they were well clear of the land and, with no lights showing, they steamed away in company to the south-west.

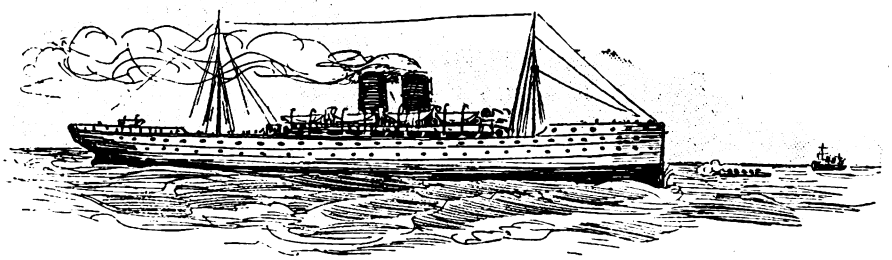
Beyond the holding up and plundering of two South American liners and a couple of big ocean tramps the voyage out was marked by no incident worthy of record, and on the morning of the fifth of February the look-outs reported Mount Plato rising out of the unfrequented sea dead ahead to the north-west. Max who had profited immensely by the healthy quiet of a long sea voyage and the skill of Doctor Fargeau, well seconded by his own vigorous constitution, was almost as well as ever and quite ready to take command of the Vengeur again.

The Bremen was therefore ordered to go dead slow for the land, and the air-ship rose from her deck to make a reconnaissance of the island, while the Destroyer ran ahead to patrol the outside of the reef. The Britannia had, of course, been taken to pieces and stowed away in the liner's 'tween decks, as it was not intended to make use of her for the present, except for experimental purposes.

The Vengeur had not floated for long over the familiar landscape of the island of Utopia before Max felt certain that his main fears had been realised. The most searching scrutiny of his glasses failed to reveal a single sign of life. The Settlement was there with its outlying houses, but no smoke rose from the chimneys of those in which the cooking for the colony was done. He soared over Mount Plato and Mount Orient and found the craters deserted.

Then, still cursing the delay that had made them come too late, and the promptness and skill with which the colonists must have formed and executed their plans after his departure, he ran the air-ship over the dockyard only to find the same silence and the same signs of desertion there. Worse than all, the shed in which the Nautilus had been built lay in ruins, the slips were empty, and, with a savage oath breaking from his lips, he was forced to the conclusion that his attempt to destroy her had failed, that the colonists had finished her and taken her away to some unknown destination, and that, therefore, the hitherto incomparable Destroyer was now no longer the mistress of the seas.

(To be continued.)



Digitized by Google

THE RECORD OF A BASE ACT.

KITTY DELAMARE was uncomfortable. We were constrained. Remembering the proverb about glass houses, we were all disposed to be tolerably charitable to flirtations and flirtees, but this was a little too bad.

Dave Hilton was a general favourite, a fine, manly, deserving fellow; and the only weak thing that he ever had done was his falling in love with Kitty.

She was a handsome girl, with a fair, sweet face bearing no trace of craft or evil in it; but, heartless and utterly incapable of loving anyone but herself, or of appreciating the unselfish devotion that was offered her, she led Dave on through a whole summer, suffered all his attention, went out only with him, might even have married him, if George Maryatt had not presented himself at that time as a suitor.

As his expectations were greater, Kitty threw over Dave without scruple; even assumed a look of astonishment when he referred to the encouragement that she had given him; was very gentle, very sweet, very cold, and utterly inexorable.

I never saw a man so thoroughly beaten down as Dave looked the morning he left us. He had lost, not only her, but his faith for a time in women.

Our indignation was intense; for we were all personal friends of Dave, and Kitty's cold serenity and utter absence of even a tinge of remorse was infinitely provoking. She was so wise, however, so quiet, so patient, and had such childish ways, and, above all, was so marvellously pretty, that the men could not do less than be civil to her; and, as she cared nothing whatever about the girls, they found their indignation thrown away, and comforted themselves with the reflection that at least she had not entrapped George Maryatt, who had gone away without proposing.

Kitty, however, took her defeat philosophically, and, just at this juncture, down came Paul Danforth. His arrival was a surprise to all, and a mystery to me; for, early in the summer, he had sketched his plans for the season, and "The Pines" had by no means entered into his calculations. He was an intimate friend of Dave's; and it was to him Dave had gone on leaving us; and, duly weighing all these considerations, I could not but wonder what evil angel had sent him among us.

From the first Kitty was not a little struck by his appearance, though he was not a man to be highly esteemed. Not handsome, but with a face capable of an infinite variety of expressions, superbly formed, possessed of a tact almost womanlike, a deep, melodious voice, and brilliant eyes; not the man to whom I would willingly have given a sister or a daughter.

Curiously enough, it was their first meeting (I mean Kitty and Paul), and, as he was a warm admirer of female beauty, I looked for the immediate initiation of a flirtation. No such thing occurred, however. He was polite, attentive as any gentleman might be to a pretty young girl, but for all further effect Kitty might as well have been her grandmother, so small a share did she seem to occupy in his thoughts. I confess to being puzzled; the others rejoiced; and Kitty, who had looked calmly into Dave Hilton's blood-shot eyes and haggard face, and met our taunts and slights serenely, could not hide her chagrin. His indifference wounded the only love of which she was capable—her self-love—and roused her from her usual quiet security to active exertions.

She positively sought out Paul, intrigued to attract his notice and admiration, and in vain. The innocent unconsciousness of this man of the world stood in good stead, and all of Kitty's arrows fell harmless to the ground.

So passed the first three weeks. Of what follows I shall tell the tale as it was told me afterwards, not as I saw it at the time.

Kitty—let us hope, accidentally—had sprained her ankle, just seriously enough to prevent her walking out, and to give her an excuse for becoming morning-caps and the display of a handsome foot and slipper; and Paul could not but think, as he looked at her, that if white and rose tints, heavenly blue eyes, superb golden hair, rosy little fingers, a rounded chin, a little arched foot, and all the foolery of lace, and bows, and dainty handkerchiefs, could excuse folly, then was Dave Hilton fully justified in loving Kitty Delamere.

All this time she had been lying smelling at a rose that she was swirling in her fingers, seemingly unconscious of his steady look.

Suddenly he spoke.

"When have you heard from Dave Hilton, Miss Delamere?"

"I have not heard from him at all," she said timidly. "He is much too angry with me to write to me, and you," she added, half-raising her eyes, but dropping them instantly before Paul's burning, inscrutable looks, "you are angry, too."

"I? You mistake. I should not presume to be. What have we in common?"

"Nothing," she answered, wincing under his tone; "but I could wish that we could hold a good opinion of each other, as common property. Mr. Danforth, won't you come here a moment? I have something to say to you?"

Paul came over and sat near her, in the chair that she had indicated by a wave of hand.

"You know," she commenced, "that I have heard so much of you that I could not but feel as if I knew you before we came here even; and all that I have heard and seen has given me no reason to think otherwise than well. Ask yourself, then, if it is not hard that a person whom I respect should condemn me, misjudge me, without a hearing, as I know that you have done. Will you let me tell what that miserable story about Dave Hilton really was?"

"If you like," returned Paul coldly.

"I always liked Dave," went on Kitty plaintively. "I was really fond of him, as a brother. I told him so, and I thought that he understood. He raved, persisted, would not be refused. I pitied him; but what could I do? I must be firm. If I had shown him half the grief I felt he would never have left me. It would have simply prolonged his misery and mine. Could I have done otherwise?"

"You? Certainly not," returned Paul, with a somewhat remarkable accent on the pronoun.

"I confess," went on Kitty, "that I think now I might have been to blame in not checking him quickly enough, in not speaking more decidedly; but I never dreamed that his attentions were more than brotherly, and I was so fond of him."

Here she heaved a little sigh; and then came a silence, broken at last by little sobs and curious, suppressed sounds from Kitty's corner.

Paul put out his hand and touched a face wet with genuine tears.

"You are crying. What is the matter?" he asked, more gently than he had yet spoken.

"Nothing."

"Do ladies cry like that for nothing?"

"Well, then, I am so lonely. They are all against me; and you, whom I thought would be generous and believe me, are against me, too."

"How do you know I am against you?"

"Your silence just now spoke more plainly than words."

"Perhaps you are not the wisest of interpreters. I am not conscious of having given you cause for any such assertion. It is unjust in you to say so."

Kitty sank back with a little sigh.

"I am tired, Mr. Danforth. Will you give me a glass of water?"

He brought it and stood by her after she had finished drinking it.

"Are we friends?" he asked, with a soft look, rare on his face.

"Do you believe me?"

"Believe?"

"About Dave Hilton?"

"I think Dave should have been capable of taking care of himself. I am not sworn to do battle for him. I shall have enough to do to take care of myself."

"You persist in thinking so, then?"

Digitized by Google

"Thinking what? You are obscure."

"That I was unfeminine—a flirt."

"That is your explanation, not mine. How can I but believe you? It is hardly necessary to say that I do. I think you evade me also. You have not answered me yet. Are we friends?"

Kitty put out a little hand silently, and Paul, taking it into his grasp, pressed and kissed it.

From that time they were I hardly know what; it seemed rather a vassalage than a flirtation. Paul's caprices equalled those of the most inveterate coquette. At one time he was devotion itself, and Kitty bloomed out at such times with a loveliness truly surprising, because the expression of an emotion, the least selfish of any feeling that she had ever experienced; at others he was cold, distant, almost uncivil, devoting himself exclusively to others, and these alterations, perplexing to us all, wore visibly on Kitty's health and spirits.

She was thoroughly subdued, this veteran coquette, this cold-hearted girl. Paul chose to prefer the ugliest and most unbecoming dress in her wardrobe, and she wore it till we hated the sight of it. He insisted that she looked best with her hair plainly dressed, and she put all the superb golden mass straight behind her ears, and lost half of her beauty in consequence.

At last he addressed her in words of love, carelessly, as one who was sure of his prize; and she caught at the declaration eagerly, complaining at the same time that he but half loved her.

This was not the burden of her complaints.

She doubted perpetually, required perpetual reassuring, assurances that Paul gave sometimes carelessly, sometimes refused pettishly. On one of these occasions, Paul said to her:

"You distrust me strangely. Do you dread retributive justice? Is it that you remember Hilton?"

She shuddered.

"Why do you speak of him? I never loved him?"

"But you do love me?"

"Yes."

"And if I should deceive you, as you did Hilton?"

"I cannot imagine it. I would not believe it; but if such a thing could be, I should not die—people don't die so easily—but live. Oh, why do you suggest such things? I had rather die than know you were false."

"But suppose I were; suppose I hated you for a cruel wrong done to my dearest friend; suppose I had sworn to wreck your life as you have wrecked his; suppose that——"

"Paul, are you mad, or am I? Why do you talk thus? Why do you look so?"

"I have taken off the mask. At last you see me as I am; at last you hear me say what has so long been in my heart, and know the truth, and Hilton is avenged."

Kitty rose, white as death and trembling in every limb, tried to speak, staggered, stretched forth her hand, and fainted.

Paul rang the bell, consigned her to the servant's care and left the house. She has never seen him since.

MOBBED BY MISTAKE.

A NIGHT ADVENTURE IN BENARES.

HAD I known what was going to befall me when I took steamer passage from Ceylon to India I should have probably continued my journey eastward round the world without stopping at the "Land of the Rajahs." In blissful ignorance, however, I landed at Calcutta.

The time of year was that when the climate most favours up-country travelling, and so, after a brief visit with friends, I started north by rail. I was the richer by half-a-dozen introductory letters to men of more or less prominence in the chief cities of the empire.

I went first to Benares—the sacred city on the mighty Ganges, and sought the house of Sita Ram, to whom one of my letters was addressed. Sita Ram was a wealthy and cultured Hindoo banker, and my friends had pictured in glowing colours the hospitality that I would receive.

Before my ride through the city was over I felt that hospitality of any sort from anyone would be doubly welcome. To my surprise most of the bazaars and business places were closed, though it was early afternoon. Groups of evil-faced natives stood about in the squares and streets, while police and soldiers appeared to be unusually plentiful. I was made a target for sullen glances from all sides, and I could not help recalling the stirring times of the great mutiny, more than thirty years back.

I found Sita Ram's house to be a palatial cream-coloured building, not far from the river. Its owner proved to be absent, but his private secretary received me and opened the letter of introduction.

Baboo Das was a sleek, mahogany-faced gentleman, who spoke English perfectly, and wore European garments of faultless cut.

"My honoured master is in Allahabad on a matter of business," he explained. "He will return in a day or two, and meanwhile the house and servants are at your disposal."

I thanked Baboo Das, and inquired the meaning of the strange sights I had witnessed in the city.

"There has been danger of a riot during the past twenty-four hours," he replied gravely; "but it is believed to be past now. The most ignorant of the Hindoo population are angry because the municipality have acquired the Ramjee temple for the purpose of erecting new waterworks on its site. The Mohammedans have taken part in the disturbances because of the dearness of provisions for which the municipality is also responsible. My honoured master belongs to the board of government and helped to purchase the temple."

I suspected that Sita Ram's departure might be more in the order of flight than a business trip.

"Are you sure that the danger is over?" I asked, for I had some notion of going to a hotel.

"Yes," replied Baboo Das, "the rioters are cowed and submissive. My master's house was under the protection of the police, but they withdrew this morning."

His manner was so calm and decided that I quite forgot my fears. I was shown a luxurious bed-chamber, and a little later I dined in solitude off dishes of gold and silver. The entire house was furnished in a costly and sumptuous style that showed its bachelor owner to possess a sense of European taste as well as of barbaric splendour.

During the evening I was left pretty much to myself, and as I did not care to venture into the streets I passed the time with a cigar and a magazine, and when I signified my wish to retire he preceded me upstairs.

Squatted on a rug in the hall, just outside my room, was a bright-faced Hindoo lad, about twelve years old. A cord dangled by his side, and, passing through the door, communicated with the fans that were attached to the ceiling of the apartment. The lad was evidently the "punky wallah," or fan puller. His name was Gunpat, Baboo Das informed me, and his duty was to keep me cool through the sultry hours of the night.

I chatted with the boy for a few moments, and found him to be intelligent and fairly conversant with English. Then I entered my room and lowered the square of rice matting that was furled above the doorway. There was also a door of heavy teak-wood, but I did not think it necessary to close it. The apartment had two windows, overlooking a small court-yard that contained shrubs and a fountain. After riding most of the day in a stuffy and jolting railway carriage I was weary. It did not take me long to undress and fall asleep. The last thing I remember was the soft whirring of the fans and their refreshing current of air.

Digitized by Google

I was awakened by a hard tugging at the bed-clothes. "Rouse, Sahib, there is danger," was poured into my ears by a shrill, childish voice.

I sprang out of bed in a trice and struck a light. It revealed the half-naked figure of little Gunpat. His expression was one of indignation rather than of terror.

"What is it?" I demanded.

"Those pigs of rioters, Sahib," he replied. "They have broken loose at last."

Then, for the first time I became aware of the tumult in the streets surrounding the house. Brawling voices and the restless patter of feet rose hoarsely on the night air. I could distinguish the shrill "Din! Din!" of the Mohammedans—their rallying cry to battle. From afar I heard the faint pealing of bells and the rattle of musketry. A lively commotion was going on downstairs, banging of doors, and shoving of furniture, interlarded with husky voices.

Gunpat slipped away for a moment and I hurried on my shirt and trousers. I felt decidedly uncomfortable, to say the least. I could not forget the black looks that had greeted me on the previous afternoon. Europeans were in bad odour at Benares just now. I glanced at the clock. The hands pointed to an hour past midnight. I began to consider what I had better do. I was puzzled to account for the non-appearance of Baboo Das.

Meanwhile the tumult had swelled to a frightful din. The street without seemed to be choked with rioters. "Kill Sita Ram," they yelled. "Slay the heretic. Loot his house. Down with the destroyers of the faith!"

I was fully alive to the situation now, and the thought of my peril sickened me. A moment later a succession of heavy thuds, followed by a tremendous crash and a burst of cheers, told that the main entrance of the house had been beaten in. Cries of rage and terror and the sounds of deadly conflict floated up the staircase.

I determined to escape, if such a thing were possible. There was no time to put on shoes or coat. I seized my money and papers and jammed them into the pockets of my trousers.

I ran to the window and looked out. Alas! The courtyard swarmed with dusky figures. The only avenue of escape was cut off.

I turned back into the room, resolved to sell my life dearly. I had no weapons, but on the wall hung a Tibetan shield and spear, trimmed with yaks' tails. I dragged them down and rushed for the door. Before I could close it entirely, a figure slipped through the crack, and I very nearly impaled Gunpat on my spear.

"The Sahib must fight," he exclaimed. "Baboo Das has fled, and the rioters are downstairs and everywhere. They have killed some of the servants, and now they will search for my master, whom they hate. They believe he is in the house. They will kill you, too, Sahib, if they find you."

"What shall we do?" I demanded. "Is there a way to escape?"

"None, Sahib. We must push furniture against the door and fight. The police and the soldiers will be here presently."

"But surely the mob won't hurt a little chap like you," I replied, filled with admiration at the lad's bravery. "Go while you can, Gunpat."

"No," he answered calmly, "my duty is with the Sahib. I will stay here."

There was no time to argue, for already the bloodthirsty miscreants were pattering up the staircase with shouts and yells. The door had only a frail bolt on the inside, but luckily the furniture of the room was massive. Gunpat seemed to know just what was wanted. He helped me to the best of his strength, and hardly was the barricade in place when the mob surged through the hall.

"The heretic is trapped," they cried, at sight of the closed door. "Come out, Sita Ram, and meet your fate."

Crash! crash! crash! The door trembled under the rain of heavy blows. A table that was on the summit of the barricade toppled to the floor and burst asunder. The mob heard the fall and yelled exultantly.

Gunpat twirled his spear between his supple fingers. "The end will be soon, Sahib," he said quite calmly. The next instant he gave an eager cry and pointed overhead. There I saw for the first time a small circular trap-door.

"Where does it lead?" I demanded.

"To the roof," replied Gunpat. "My master sits there on hot evenings. But there is no ladder. We must take from the barricade, Sahib."

No sooner said than done. Hardly as they could be spared we removed a table, a chest of drawers, and two chairs. We piled them one upon another. I plainly saw the door quiver from top to bottom as I mounted the shaky structure. I was directly below the trap now, and a blow from my fist drove it upward. I grasped the edge of the opening and drew myself to the roof. Gunpat passed up the two spears and the shield. Then I caught the lad's hands and drew him to my side.

That instant the mob broke into the room below, where they expected to find Sita Ram. They howled with rage at the empty room. Then we saw their dark faces glaring at the pile in the middle of the room, and up at the opening in the ceiling above. We slammed down the trap door, but there was no way to fasten it on the outside.

We knew the mob would follow us in a moment, so we ran across the flat roof, mounted the parapet, and sprang to the top of an adjoining house. Thus we hurried on from roof to roof till we were some distance from the house of Sita Ram.

"Faster, Sahib! they are coming," panted Gunpat.

Then husky yells rang out behind us and I turned and saw half a score of turbaned figures at our very heels. The space of but a single roof intervened. A spear whizzed between us. A pistol ball shrieked overhead.

Faster and faster we sped, till suddenly a gap of six feet wide yawned before us. "Jump, Sahib," yelled Gunpat. Without hesitation we sprang together, and landed safely on the next roof. One of our pursuers was close behind us—a burly Mohammedan with a sword. Gunpat snatched the brazen shield from my hand; turned, and threw it with all his might. It struck the fellow as he was in the act of jumping. Without a cry he plunged down between the houses. His companions paused only an instant. Then they leaped the gap, and came on with frightful yells.

This advantage, brief as it was, proved our salvation. We ran on as before, climbing headlong over the parapets from roof to roof, neither gaining nor losing. The end house of the block abutted on the Ganges, and all at once, over the last parapet, we saw the deep blue water below us.

"You can swim, Sahib?" asked Gunpat.

"Yes; come on," I replied.

We dropped through twenty feet of air and shot far under water. When we came to the surface we dived again instantly. The next time we rose we were well out in the current. Side by side we swam out, while a shower of spears fell harmlessly in our wake.

Anchored in mid-stream we spied the ark-shaped roof of a trader's boat, and a short swim brought us to it. The friendly natives gave us shelter, and there we remained until morning, listening to the sounds of strife in the opposite-lying city.

When day broke the riot was quelled, but the mob had wrecked the telegraph office and railway station, plundered the treasury, and destroyed the boiler and engine of the new water-works.

Sita Ram returned that afternoon, and I found him a most polished and agreeable gentleman. He was apparently unconcerned over the looting of his house. His first act was to discharge Baboo Das. His next, on hearing my story, was to promote brave little Gunpat to an honoured position among the household servants. Nor did I forget to honour the lad in my own way.

Digitized by Google

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

THE MAN OF TWO LIVES.

BEFORE his death—the result of solitude and old age—Jean Ferney kept a dingy little shop in a certain street near the Rue Charlot, Paris. It was not a respectable neighbourhood—indeed, the police considered it a very questionable one, though no crime was ever committed there. Perhaps its ill-repute was due to the reticence of its inhabitants, and their inclination to attend too strictly to their own affairs, to know or profess to know nothing about their neighbours, and to have forgotten in a large measure even their own previous history.

The street was narrow and dark; so narrow that the sunshine only visited the pavement while the sun was high up in the heavens, and never succeeded in entering Ferney's shop further than the door-sill. To the right of the door was a show-window, in which a few old coins and time-stained manuscripts were displayed, but so covered with dust that it was better to go within if you should wish to examine them. Above the door hung a sign:

"J. MALPLAQUET, EXPERT CHIROGRAPHIST."

Not Jean Ferney, oh, no; he had some years before been seized with an inexplicable antipathy for that name, and changed it at the same time as his business, place of residence, and wearing apparel; at the same time that he shaved of his moustache, let his beard grow, and bleached his hair somewhat. But perhaps we should not speak of this transformation, as he never referred to it himself.

One day as Ferney, or Malplaquet to be more polite, was sitting at his desk deciphering a bit of writing under the light of his smoky lamp, the door opened and a man entered. He, too, seemed a rather mysterious individual, and at the moment you might have found a set of false whiskers in his pocket, together with a pistol and a pair of handcuffs—but that is neither here nor there—for at present he was clean shaved, plain La Rouche, clad in his ordinary suit of ministerial black, with his broad felt hat, as usual, well down over his piercing grey eyes.

"Good morning, La Rouche," said Ferney, glancing up from his work.

"Good morning, Malplaquet," was the answer, as La Rouche seated himself on a chest at the side of the desk.

"How is Constantin, and the detective force in general?"

"Constantin has been missing for the last three days: one of his slow but sure schemes, I suppose. He is interested in the same case as myself now. Will you inform me what sort of person wrote this scrap, Malplaquet?"

Malplaquet took the paper handed to him.

"Where was this unearthed, La Rouche?"

"It was found in the secret drawer of the writing-desk of the late diplomatist, Jules Foreau. The drawer was discovered by a member of the family only five days ago."

"The writing," said Malplaquet, without waiting to comprehend the answer to his question in his eagerness to commence deciphering, "I see it bears no date, but from its state of preservation, the yellow stains here in the right hand corner, and the degree to which the ink has faded, it was written, I should judge, about nine years ago."

"Precisely; that was the date of the decease of the recipient," said La Rouche, taking his note-book from his pocket.

"The characters," the adept continued, "are small, indicating literary tastes. The peculiar formation of the d's is undoubtedly due to much practice in the writing of Greek. The handwriting smacks of the university, a German university it may be, since there appears to be a slight touch of German angularity in the small letters. The writer was certainly a scholarly man, though perhaps a quack in some respects. He was reticent, this is shown by the shortness of the g and the y; in short, you have a man to deal with, La Rouche, a man.

"Another thing which may aid you. This was written by an imperfect hand, a hand mutilated in some way; a finger amputated probably.

"Now that we have determined all that the chirography can explain, may I have the pleasure of reading the document?" asked Malplaquet politely. The detective nodded.

"To M. Jules Foreau,—

"When this is placed on your study table your very dear friend and colleague, Paul Rapin, will have been dead one hour. His body will be found lying face downward in the street near the south end of Pont d'Austerlitz. No sign of violence will be found; he has to all appearance died of disease of the heart. The affair is purely political, I assure you. This letter is to warn you not to attend the Assembly to-morrow or the day following. Of course, you will not dare in the present state of the times to disclose this which I have written, and to which, therefore, that you may know instead of suspect me, I without hesitation affix my name,

"FERNEY."

The reading ended.

"Foreau went to the Assembly the day following," said La Rouche——

"And died of heart disease the same evening," added Malplaquet smiling.

"Ferney, Ferney," muttered Malplaquet, "I have heard the name before. Look in the municipal death records of April, 1852. I think you will there find note of his decease, my friend."

La Rouche, closing his note-book, rose to go, and held out his hand. Dr. Malplaquet grasped it with his left, for his right hand was mutilated, lacking the first joint of the fore-finger, and detectives are sometimes keen observers.

The next day the detective was perusing the municipal death records, when he stopped at an entry which ran:

"Ferney, Jean, was observed drowning in the Seine, April 9th. Help reached the spot too late. For witnesses refer to Testimony of Witnesses, vol. 196—3—90.

"Body unrecovered."

The last two words had evidently been interpolated in the record at a later date.

The record was made in the disguised handwriting of Ferney—but La Rouche was not a chirographist.

RESULT OF PLOT COMPETITION.

THIS competition has been in every way a success. Several hundreds of attempts were received. Most of them were very good; and I think my surmise about brilliant ideas lying dormant in the minds of readers was well founded, although I noticed that one or two found it incumbent upon them to stimulate their imagination by reference to early numbers of SHORT STORIES.

The Two Guineas has been awarded to Mr. H. Flowerdew, 2, Roskell Terrace, Lower Richmond Road, Putney, S.W., whose plot, written up into a story, will appear in an early issue.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A POSITIVE REMEDY FOR CORPULENCE

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is a cheap issue (only 4d.) published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes:—"Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for, in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner, he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more, if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid:—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos.—i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes:—'So far (six weeks from commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes:—'I am just half the size.' A fourth:—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes:—'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes:—"I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again a lady says:—"It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says:—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Should Stout Persons STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever, which was, perhaps, indirectly responsible for the untimely end, in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeed only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic troubles which will be difficult to overcome.

The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite is appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, takes a different course. He says, "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2 lb. to 12 lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning, but on the contrary he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get his book, the price of which is only 4d. It is entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pp., and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It can be had direct, or through any bookseller.—Extract from The Million.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor :

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

PLUMTREE'S HOME-POTTED MEATS

For the BREAKFAST, LUNCHEON, TEA, and SUPPER TABLE.

Of all Grocers, &c.; or send 7½d. or 1/3 for Sample Jar to Maker—

PLUMTREE, SOUTHPORT.

BE ADVISED

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities, as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states:—"Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA COMPANY, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

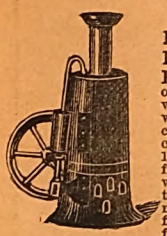
ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 309.] FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 1, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

BAKER'S NOVELTIES.



THE NEW "ECLIPSE" MODEL STEAM ENGINE.—The rage of the Season. These wonderful Engines work with a real oscillating cylinder (which if purchased by itself cost 1s.), strong metal boiler, funnel, large fly wheel, with pulley wheel attached for working other models, furnace, and filler complete. Carriage free 1s. 6d. Smaller size 1s.

Don't miss this grand opportunity.

THE MARVELLOUS "CHAMPION" SLIDE VALVE STEAM ENGINE.—As is no doubt well known, a slide valve cylinder is the most expensive kind made, and in fact our lowest for a slide valve cylinder itself is 7s., yet we now offer a large substantial Engine with powerful boiler, stand, furnace, fly wheel, pulley wheel, governors, metal supports, and slide valve cylinder, complete, 5s. 6d., with whistle, water tap, steam tap, very superior, 10s. 6d. These engines are sufficiently powerful to work all the models sold by us.

THE EXPRESS STEAM LOCOMOTIVE.—A beautifully japanned locomotive, with all brass fittings, dome, whistle, safety valve, starting lever, 6 wheels (all flanged), and two powerful cylinders. Only 10s. 6d., free 11s.

THE "IXION" LOCOMOTIVE STEAM ENGINE.—A splendid locomotive engine on four wheels with funnel, safety valve, dome handrails, starting lever, two powerful cylinders with furnace complete. The cheapest locomotive out. 5s., free 5s. 6d., or with whistle 5s. 6d., free 6s. Without name plate 4s. 6d., free 5s.

THE ECLIPSE ELECTRIC COIL.—We are offering the most wonderful value in Electric Coils for this Season, as special leading lines. Each one guaranteed to work, and to administer good strong shocks. No. 1 Coil is finished complete, and mounted on stand with handles and connecting wires. Price 1s., post free 1s. 3d. No. 2 Coil is a larger and more powerful ditto, better finished, and furnished with brass terminals, and is a very superior article, 2s. 6d., post free 2s. 9d. No. 3 Coil is equal to many charged 10s. 6d. for. This Coil has a regulating handle for increasing or decreasing the strength as required, and is fit for any Drawing Room, Bazaar, Lecture Hall, &c. Price 5s. 6d., post free 6s. No. 4, very handsome large Coil, with reversing motion, 10s. 6d. Any ordinary Bichromate Batteries will work these Coils, and as most people have batteries now-a-days, no further expense is incurred, but if needful, we supply a strong Bichromate Battery suitable for working No. 1 and 2 Coils for 1s. 3d., post free; or a larger ditto for the 5s. 6d and 10s. 6d. Coil, for 2s., post free 2s. 4½d. We now give a small Battery free with every Coil sold.

THE ELECTRICAL DANCING NIGGER.—A great curiosity and a wonderful working model. The climax of electrical ingenuity and skill. By means of a powerful Electro Motor and Battery the Nigger will dance on the platform for half-an-hour at a time. A capital window attraction. Nigger, Motor, Battery, Platform, Connecting Wires, and everything complete. Price 3s. 6d., carriage free 3s. 10d.

ELECTRIC MOTORS for working Models, Machinery, &c.—All guaranteed to work, and spendid value for money. A beautiful little Motor on stand complete, only 1s., free 1s. 3d. No. 2 size much larger ditto, better finished and more powerful, with fittings, 2s. 6d., free 2s. 9d. No. 3 size, a really superior and very powerful motor, on polished stand, with brass wheel, brass terminals, and fittings, 5s. 6d., free 6s. Any bichromate battery will work these, or we supply battery for Nos. 1 and 2 Motors for 1s., free 1s. 3d.; and a powerful ditto for No. 3 for 2s., free 2s. 4½d.

Grand Illustrated Novelty Catalogue, 64 pp., 1,000 Illustrations. 1d. stamp.

BAKER & COMPANY, 34, Beech Street, Barbican, London, E.C.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

For Tradesmen's Windows, Fascias, Signs, or Tablets.

The durability, elegance, and striking brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the Most Effective Medium of all kinds of indoor and outdoor advertisements. Enamelled Iron Plates. Swinging Signs in great variety.

Call and see our stock, or send for price lists. Near the Farringdon Road Station.

Inventors and Manufacturers. Agents wanted.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd.,
61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.
(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)
INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY
The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.
Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.
SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

IZOD'S

LONG WAISTED. A GREAT SUCCESS.

THE LONG WAISTED.

200 Dozen or 2,400 Pairs of this Celebrated Make alone delivered this season in London per Day. The great question of the day with all Ladies is the Fashion in Corsets, which grows year by year, until our Special Artistes have produced corsets for every type of figure.—IZOD'S CORSETS are cut on scientific principles, with a precision of accuracy formerly unknown.——

IZODS draw Ladies' attention to their Long Waisted Corsets, which have been designed by their British and Foreign Artistes, which are the best the world produces.—

The Ladies' Tailors always recommend these celebrated goods for the elegance with which they set off a tailor-made dress and create a long waist and graceful figure. They are made in a variety of qualities, and are beautiful and inexpensive. Every pair stamped on busk Izod's Long Waisted, and also on lid of the box.——

To be had of all Drapers and Ladies' Outfitters in Europe, India, Canada, United States, Australia, the whole of the British Colonies, and throughout the world.——

Write for our Sheet of Drawings.

E. IZOD & SON, 30, MILK ST., LONDON, E.C.
Manufactory: LANDPORT, HANTS.

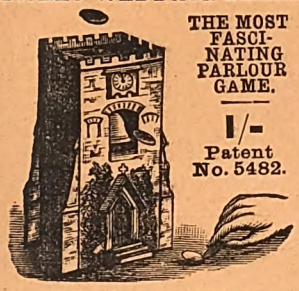
All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Dep[illegible]RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

TO ADVERTISERS

Wishing to reach families, a Test Advertisement in SHORT STORIES will bring profitable results. Scale of charges as follows:—

Front Page, £12 10s. per insertion
Back or Inside, £10 per insertion
Per Inch, 5s. per insertion ...
Less 5 per cent. for 13 times.
,, 10 per cent. for 26 times.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.



THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.
For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

RUBBER STAMPS FREE BY POST. AGENTS WANTED Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

FOREIGN STAMPS GIVEN AWAY!

We will give to every applicant for our large new Price List, &c., 30 Genuine Foreign Stamps; all different, including Transvaal, British Guiana, Kustend and Czernawoda, 2 Spain (baby king), Victoria, Great Britain (I.R. official), 3 Cape Colony, 3 Canada, 4 Indian, 5 United States (including Columbus issue), the lot sent post free for 2d. Send 3½d. at once for our 32 page Illustrated Stamp Album, containing upwards of 1,000 full size engravings of stamps. Special offer—A Collection of 500 stamps, all different for 5s. 3d.

JNO. GRAVES & CO.,
Stamp Importers, Bury St. Edmunds.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each. Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. S.," 87, Strand, London. Mention SHORT STORIES.

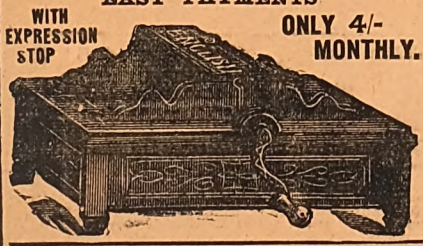
HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."
EASY PAYMENTS

WITH EXPRESSION STOP

ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.



Plays hymns, popular airs, quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, hornpipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by any one. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30s. Terms 4s. deposit and 4s. monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.

Write for list of music and full particulars.

(Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER,
Organette Works, Blackburn.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

WHITE'S "QUICKENER"

Will be found a perfect cure for Baldness, Thin Hair, and Weakly Moustachios and Eyebrows. Succeeds where everything else fails. 1s. 3d. per bottle, post free. ARTHUR WHITE, 34, GRAY'S INN ROAD, LONDON, W.C. Used by Royalty.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES

Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

TO LADIES

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" gives relief, and a few more applications effect a cure.

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.
Book on the Skin and Diet free.

BLUSHING

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 309.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 1, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

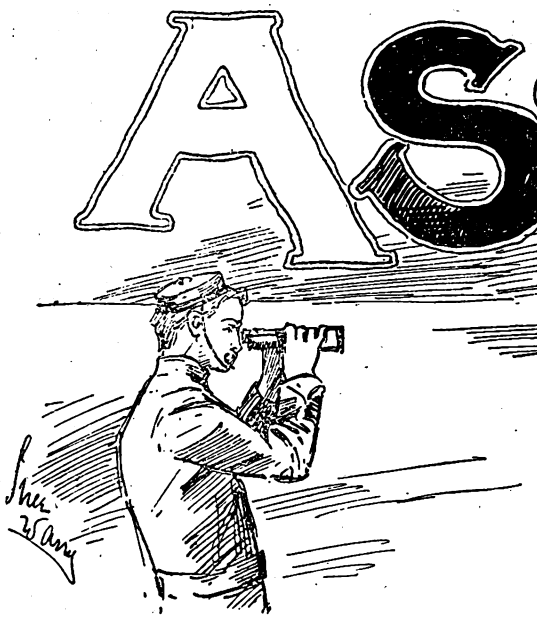
A Soldier's Honour



A COMPANY of soldiers was drilling on the parade-ground, and some officers had gathered on the captain's porch watching them. Fort Harker was far out on the plains, so far that the blue peaks of the Rockies could be discerned, and it was a common halting-place for emigrants, outward or homeward bound.

Hence it caused no surprise when a white-topped "prairie schooner" was seen crawling out of the west. In an hour it was not apparently nearer.

"Pretty well tired out, evidently," said Lieutenant Jayne, watching it through his glass.

Another hour and the travellers had not arrived, but just at twilight the outfit appeared in the barracks yard, a forlorn and dilapidated looking object. A woman sat alone on the front seat guiding the weary horses. Even jolly Corporal Doyle was awed into forgetting his usual joke by her appearance.

"Be you alone, ma'am?" he asked.

"No, he's behind in the waggon," came from the pinched but determined lips of the driver as she stepped to the ground. "My husband was taken ill two days ago. I was alone, but I did the best I could for him. He needs care."

The men who had half expected to lift a corpse from the waggon, were relieved to find it was only an invalid, though his appearance was that of one almost dead.

Thus they came to the fort. For a week the stranger lingered between life and death, and when at last life conquered; it was nearly a month before strength returned sufficiently to allow him to leave his bed. The wife, too, was not well, and the troops saw little of their guests.

Mrs. Culmer, as she gave her name, recovered first; and the husband when he awoke one day in July to a knowledge of his renewed strength, roused also the realisation of a fact which nearly threw him into a relapse.

It came about in this way. There was a wide porch with many hammocks outside the guest's chamber, and his bed being near the window, brought him within hearing of a conversation.

All Rights Reserved.

"So we did our best for three years, Abner, but it could not succeed."

Culmer started. It was his wife's voice, but who was Abner?

"And you left New Mexico when?" He had heard that voice somewhere.

"Three months ago, as soon as spring came. We had raised three crops only to see them baked by the furnace-like south winds, and then at last the baby, too, grew weary of the lonely land of adobe huts and scorching suns. We laid her in a pretty spot near Signal Mountains, and putting all we had into the waggon, started for 'God's country.'

"It seems more like home here, and we will stop now where we can find a way to live. John was taken ill on the journey, and for days I struggled alone, not meeting a soul for forty-eight hours at a time. That is all. It is not much like what we planned when you and I lived by the Maine coast, is it?"

"No, and my own life has been as dissimilar to my ideal. I was to be a minister, you remember?"

"And John an editor."

"Instead I went to West Point, then to a Montana post, and now for two years have been here."

There was a sound as of a woman's sobbing; then the man's voice went on—

"But your fate has been harder than you deserved, Mary. So has John's, and it seems to me I could never have lived under it."

Culmer knew now who was talking. Abner Jayne and he had been rivals for the hand of the brave little woman he had made his wife. He had thought sometimes that Jayne was preferred, but finally himself was chosen—and now they had met so strangely. It was indeed different from what they had planned in the days when all three of them were children in the little fishing-village.

Culmer shut his eyes and stopped his ears with the bed clothing. He lay back upon the pillows and thought. They were talking over the past out there in the hammocks. Was Mary sorry that she had chosen him? Did she wish her lot had been with the handsome (he felt sure that Jayne was good looking) army officer instead of with the broken-down adventurer? It had been a hard life he had led her, but somehow in spite of himself everything had gone wrong.

As he lay there he reviewed it all and cursed himself and his "luck" as he called it, while the low hum of voices from the porch almost maddened him. And then a pity for himself followed, and jealousy came in its wake. He vowed vengeance on the more prosperous rival—and then drifted off to sleep.

Digitized by Google

"I do not understand John," said the lieutenant to Mrs. Culmer a few days later, when the old schoolboy friends had had several reminiscent visits. "He looks at me so strangely, and seems so different from his boyhood days."

"He has been too much troubled and discouraged. I wish he could get something to do here—the Kansas prairies are so beautiful."

The soldiers began to note Culmer's distracted state and to talk of it. He had not talked with his wife about his new trouble, but avoided every mention of the lieutenant.

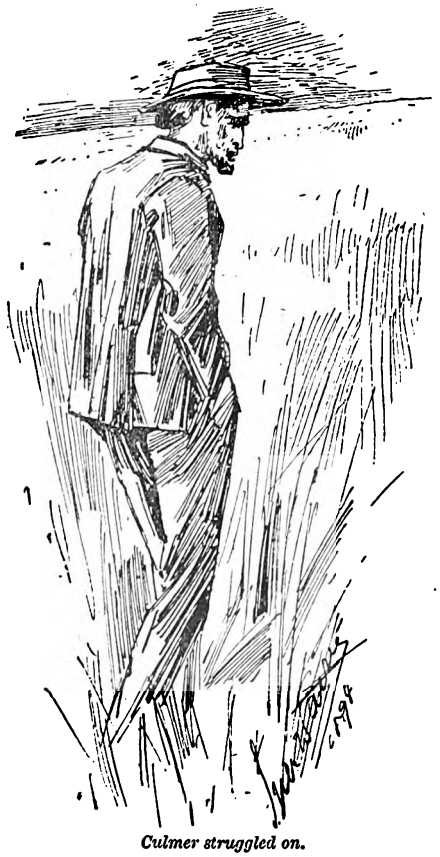
Mrs. Culmer and Jayne were much together, and once, when the officer had been to the prairie city ten miles away, she met him on the parade-ground, and came in with flushed cheeks and a pleased expression. The soldiers had come to call her pretty. Culmer saw the meeting, and that evening his walk over the plain lasted until nearly midnight.

He slept late the next morning, and when he awoke his wife was gone. What was more remarkable, the horses which had been feeding in the stable since the emigrants arrival were gone too, and Lieutenant Jayne had left in the saddle before daylight.

Every man in the garrison pitied Culmer that morning as he went about making inquiries in a dazed kind of way that told more plainly than frantic imprecations how severe was the blow.

Mrs. Culmer had ordered the horses, so said the ostler, just at daybreak, and had driven off alone, though the animals were very restive from their long halt and good feeding. She had gone toward the prairie city where Jayne had been the day before. As for the lieutenant, no one noticed which direction he took.

For an hour Culmer walked up and down the parade-ground. His face had the pallor of death, and his steps were nervous and quick, as one whose brain is throbbing. The summer sun beat down on his wide-brimmed felt hat, but he did not notice it.



Culmer struggled on.

Suddenly he was gone. The few soldiers who were lounging in front of the buildings did not see him depart, and the guard had challenged no one.

It was judged that he had gone towards Fairview, the railway station; but no one was sure of it until noon, when the captain, sweeping the plain with his telescope, made out a figure four miles away.

"Poor fellow!" he murmured, "he will never finish the chase!"

And then he volunteers the information that Jayne had the night before asked for and received his month's vacation furlough.

That settled it, in the soldiers' minds. There was but one explanation of the morning's happenings — an erring wife, a broken-hearted husband, a soldier-lover. Some of the officers who had known Jayne professed to believe him incapable of such a deed, and declared him the soul of honour; but they were in the minority.

The prairie over which Culmer had walked, half staggered, was dry and brown. Though only midsummer, the drought and hot winds had eaten up the sap of the grasses, and they swished against his feet with a hard, crisp sound.

The sky was clear, and the unsoftened Kansas sun had blazed the air into pulsing waves of heat that met his face in burning currents, borne by the racing south wind that came steadily, swiftly, like the blowing of a simoom. Not a house was in sight, for the Government claimed all the land thereabouts as a military reservation, and the fort itself was a distorted figure on the horizon.

Culmer struggled on with bowed head and shambling, weak-kneed steps. He did not see even the meadow larks that struggled fitfully against the wind.

That wind—for three days it had been blowing—rolled up from the south, bearing on its back the débris of hundreds of ill-tended fields and ill-kept door yards. In the towns vast clouds swept through the streets and in the homes of toiler and capitalist alike; little ridges of dark, finely pulverised sand marked every crevice in wall or window casing.

The third day of the wind storm a darker cloud than that of dust came rolling out of the southern horizon.

It was smoke.

The flames swept with peculiar strength and apparent pleasure over the Government reservation, and the soldiers of the Seventh remember yet the fight they had that afternoon to protect the buildings of the post.

Culmer was roused to his danger only when the long dancing flame could be distinguished as it devoured the dry grasses. The line was so long that he knew he could not escape on foot and he stood staring at it dumbly. Then he turned and swept the remainder of the horizon, hoping for a way of escape.

Coming towards him from the east was a white-topped waggon. It must have followed a ravine that he did not see it before. Now it was out on the high prairie, and the horses were approaching at a canter. As it came nearer through the film of smoke already filling the atmosphere, he saw that the driver was a woman—and, yes; it was Mary! Culmer was becoming more and more bewildered, and could not speak until his wife's voice called to him.

"Oh, John; quick. Help me unharness the horses; they can never pull a waggon fast enough! We must ride."

Serious as was the situation, he could not resist the temptation to answer with a sneer, "Where is Abner?"

"He is coming, John, and we've been so fortunate—I'll tell you about it—don't you see the fire there—quick, help me!"

She was tugging at the leather harness frantically. The horses alarmed, reared and fretted.

John with desperate recklessness, drew his knife, and slashed trace after trace, strap after strap, and in a moment the animals were free. He was too desperate, too reckless about it, and the nervous woman at the horses' heads was overpowered by their actions and lost her footing. Away the frightened animals went scurrying over the prairie, while the husband and wife looked each other in the eyes blankly.

"John"—it was the woman who spoke—"what have you done?"

The flames were now not a quarter of a mile way.

"Why should I care what I've done with your doings of to-day to think of?"

"My doings?" The blue eyes were very wide.

"Yes, I know you like him better than me, because he wears a uniform and all that—but it won't matter now."

"Do you mean our old friend Abner? Why, John—oh, there he is now."

Tearing up from the ravine in the track the waggon had followed came the lieutenant on his strong army horse. Almost as soon as they had discovered him he was at their side. A motion from Mary's hand towards the flying horses, now mere specks on the plain, was sufficient to explain the situation.

Digitized by Google

With quivering lips he looked the pair in the face. He could mount his horse and escape. He could take one of them. That was all. Which would he do?

"Here John, hold the horse." The lieutenant's voice had a queer husky inflection that made the listeners stare.

There was not an instant to lose. Already the fire was so close that the air scorched their lungs.

"Mary, I have no one dependent on me. Take these things."

The woman did not realise the sacrifice until she had had forced into her hands the pocket-book and letter-case.

"Give them to the captain," he added. "He understands. Now, no stopping."

"Mary, take these things."

He put both strong hands round the woman's waist, and easily lifted her to the horse's back, sweeping her shoulder with his lips as she was carried upward.

"John, jump into the saddle."

The tone was so commanding that the man obeyed. There was a sharp blow on the horse's flank, and the two were borne almost in the teeth of the tide of fire northward. On and on the strong charger raced until the flames were outstripped. The atmosphere grew clear and broad. Black smoking plains stretched off to the right, with flames away to the northward.

"John," sobbed the woman, "did you think——"

She faltered.

"Yes, Mary, I thought it all. But why did you leave to-day?"

"Leave? Abner had secured you a place on the paper at Fairview, and I went there to arrange things, and was going to surprise you. He was to spend his furlough getting us settled."

They rode into the fort at nightfall, and we who carried the wan woman to the guest chamber wondered what experience she had been through since that morning. It was weeks before we knew it all.

A company of soldiers went out in the morning. They found a blackened heap of ruins in the midst of the blacker plain.

These were the ironwork of a waggon, some timbers, and among them a body wrapped in charred canvas.

It was Lieutenant Jayne. He had met death as calmly as he would have done on the field of battle. A small Testament was found in his clothing. In it were two photographs—one was that of a grey-haired woman, his mother; the other every man in the group recognised as that of the emigrant's wife, Mary Culmer.

THE STORY OF A PICTURE.

I.

THE artist stood before his picture in the dusk of the evening. The great studio was full of shadows, and the heaped up canvases, the easels, the properties of various kinds loomed indistinctly and mysteriously in the gloom, looking many of them like strange personalities waiting until darkness was fully come to perform some action unbefitting the light.

And the artist stood before the picture in the centre of the cedar wood floor, quite alone, quite immersed in peering contemplation. He had been a so-called successful man all through his life, a favourite of the gods.

He was a noble specimen of manhood, an athlete as well as an artist, an actor in the world's drama of action, not merely a dreamer who imagined, or a thinker who looked on and grew sad. He lived in many ways, not merely in one; and if his great ambition, his untiring genius led him ever upon one road, the road which artists traverse, he often went down the by-path, and took excursions which led him from the toilsome way, at the end of which stood the goal towards which he aimed.

Harold Brand was in a peculiar, terribly strung-up frame of mind. He had just come to the end of a great effort, and he was strongly excited, as the actor is excited after a great scene, or the musician after an ardent performance. He had been striving, as even he had never striven before, and he was not yet calm enough to appraise the result, or know whether his idol was clay or gold.

The picture seemed to him transcendently beautiful as he stood bending forward and gazing at it with the closest attention. He fancied that at last he had almost succeeded in satisfying his own ambition. All his matured knowledge, all his acquired skill, all his shining genius seemed to speak plainly from the canvas, convincing him for the moment of his own greatness, as others had long ago been convinced.

Yes, it was a noble work; and yet it was only the presentment of a woman, who stood in a simple attitude, holding a mirror in her hand and gazing into it with a sad, half wondering wholly wistful expression. Only a woman; but how magically painted!

Digitized by Google

Underneath the picture the artist had scrawled roughly on a bit of cardboard its title, "The Mirror."

There came a tap on the door of the studio. The artist started, and for a moment stood uncertain. He had been so wrapped up in his achievement that he could not realise what had roused him and broken his reverie. He knew he had heard something, but could not at first tell what it was.

But the tap was repeated, and a smile stole into his eyes.

"If she has come!" he thought, and he walked towards the door. His footman stood there with a card. "Mrs. Amarinth," he read on it.

"Ask Mrs. Amarinth to come into the studio," he said, "and bring tea and a lamp. I am not at home to anyone else this afternoon."

The man departed, and Harold stood by the open door with the card in his hand expectantly, until he heard steps in the distance. Then a sudden thought seemed to strike him. He hurried to the picture and drew a covering over it, with a hand that trembled slightly.

"She must not see it yet, not till I have told her about it," he said to himself, and then returned as a lady entered.

"I have kept my promise, Mr. Brand," she said, holding out her hand to him in the twilight. "I have come and scattered excuses behind me. I only stayed five mimutes at Lady Endbury's. I don't know what she thought of me, but if we cared what people thought or said about us, in this world of London, we should have a very bad time, shouldn't we? How very dim and religious your light is. Where shall I sit?"

"Will you sit here?" he said, slowly releasing her hand and bringing forward an armchair covered with stamped velvet. "It is not very cold, but I mean to light the fire so that we may have a cosy hour together."

"Do," she said, with a little sigh, leaning back, "I love firelight, and this darkness seems cold. Ah, that is better," as the flames began to flicker and dance, and fly from log to log. "And now tell me why you wanted me so particularly to-day."

He came and stood before her. His handsome face was slightly flushed, and his eyes were glittering with excitement.

"I always want you, I think," he said.

"That is because you haven't got me," she answered. "You have so much—fame, wealth, satisfied ambition—everything a strong man wants, and yet I would not mind wagering that you believe yourself unhappy, that you imagined yourself unsatisfied. Everybody does nowadays. To be restless and dissatisfied is almost as fashionable as to be poor, or to have made one's money in trade."

He sat down on an oak settle near her.

"I think I am happy at this moment, quite happy. Yet, there is one thing would make me happier, and it depends upon you."

She smiled softly.

"And what is that?" she asked, letting her eyes rest upon his.

"I will tell you. But here's tea."

She sipped softly, with her eyes on him.

"You are an adept at piquing a woman's curiosity," she said at last.

"Believe me, Mrs. Amarinth, it is not that. I only wish to put off something that makes me hopeful, yet afraid. I think you understand me a little, very well, I might even say. You are not a worker, but you understand what work can be to the worker, what a mingled delight and terror, what a supreme joy—almost touching love in keenness—or what a sorrow. You know how I have looked on myself as a failure, while the world chooses to think otherwise. You know I have not been happy ever, because I have never succeeded as I wished, done all I have sometimes felt it in me to achieve. I have let you know all this. Have I bored you?"

Her soft lips parted.

"You have paid me the highest compliment a great man can pay a woman who is not great," she breathed.

"No one can pay you compliments," he said. "They can only render you homage. But you have done more than sympathise with my dissatisfaction, you have helped me to kill it, I believe. Your influence has worked a spell in me, and given me, as it were, the management of, the control over, my powers, which sometimes seemed lacking before. I want to show you the result. But first tell me something, will you not?"

"Ask me what it is?"

He bent over her and took her hands, and his were trembling with a keen, nervous emotion that strength of will could no longer entirely control.

"Need I ask you in words?" he said. "There are some things whose bloom is rubbed off so easily, and words are rough things at times. Look up into my face and tell me you understand what I mean."

She lifted her beautiful eyes to his passionate ones slowly. Then musingly she said, "But if I made a mistake it would hurt me. I am only a woman. You must tell me before I can answer you."

"I will tell you then," he answered, and he kissed her.

Her soft lips lingered on his. "That's my answer," she whispered in a sigh. And it was a long while before either of them spoke again.

At last she broke the silence—"I hoped you loved me," she said, with a delicious frankness, "but I never knew it; your mind is a strong box, a safe which it is difficult to prise. I have only tampered with the lock till now,"

"I fear there is not much treasure in it. But it is all yours. And while I cannot tell you how much I love you, I can show you in my work. Do you remember the first time I saw you that you said something about mirrors? You said you looked into life as you would look into your mirror, and you saw in it nothing that interested you more than your own reflection. I have painted you looking into the mirror, and I think—I hope—that at last I have done something that will be more than praised, that will be remembered after the summer is over, and the Academy has shut its doors. I would not exhibit it only I want all the world to know how beautiful you are."

The young widow looked at him eagerly till he had finished speaking, then she sprang from her chair.

"And it is here, in the studio?" she said. "Ah! now I understand why you wanted the light. You want me to tell you it is beautiful, and then your happiness will be complete. Show it to me."

"I will."

He strode to the distant table. His heart was beating violently with excitement, and he himself was already eager to see his work again now that a longer time had elapsed since he had finished it. He might have to slightly readjust first impressions. He pulled the table in front of the easel, and then slowly drew the covering from the picture.

Then he stood in silence waiting, not looking at her because he wanted to so much. She said nothing for a while. Not a word escaped her. The silence was so intense that he could hear her breathing.

At last, suddenly, a little hard sound broke from her. It might have been a sob.

"I wonder you can love me at all," she said in a dry voice. "If I am like that, I wonder you can love me."

She turned towards him and saw the expression on his face.

"Mr. Brand—Harold—" she said, and the dryness vanished in a moment, "I have hurt you; but, indeed, indeed, you have hurt me. I am not like that. I am not." She put up her mouth to his. "Kiss me," she whispered. "I am not angry. I do love you. But, oh, Harold, you must not exhibit it! The world may see me, but it must not see—that."

She had gone and the artist stood once more alone in his studio. The fire leaped and crackled upon the hearth, and cast its ruddy glow over the cedar-panelled walls, over the vaulted roof, over the music gallery at the end of the room, over the easel on which the picture stood. After he had bidden Mrs. Amarinth good-bye and kissed her once more in the deserted hall before he himself let her out into the evening air, Harold had turned to the studio and locked the door. He sat down upon the oak settle by the fire and remained for a long time plunged in meditation.

Many emotions swirled round in the whirlpool of his mind.

Digitized by Google

His strong deep nature had been utterly taken hold of by Mrs. Amarinth and he had never known exactly why. He loved her as an artist, certainly for her great beauty; but her personality was what attracted him really with a strong magnetic force that made him acknowledge himself more than her lover—her slave. He could see her faults, and they were not few, but one he had never allowed to himself could possibly exist, and this was a frivolity and a lack of depth which, in spite of all her culture, prevented her from really understanding, or in any way properly appreciating, the greatest achievements of art or the noblest beauties of nature.

He had almost deliberately bandaged his eyes and refused to recognise this fact. And now he was suffering from painful doubt, from quenched enthusiam, from a sense of being utterly misunderstood by the one being whom he utterly loved.

He suffered because he could not break the shackles of a love he had felt unworthy. The struggle was intense, but it could only end one way. At length he set down the lamp, bent his head a moment till his lips nearly touched the canvas, then dropped the covering down over it, lifted it from the easel, and placed it against the wall behind some heaped-together failures on which no one ever looked. The soul of the man, the human being, dominated the soul of the artist; the love for the woman conquered the love for the picture.

Silently, in that bitter-sweet moment, Harold Brand renounced his art.

II.

THEY had been married for some years, and many springs had fled away since that spring evening, yet in all that time Harold had never once handled brush or palette. He would fain have locked the studio up and left it finally deserted; but this his wife would not allow. It was an ideal ball room, she said, with its vaulted roof, its smooth floor of dark polished wood, its gallery just made for Coote and Tinney's band, whose valse music floated down deliciously through the elaborate carving of the beautiful balustrade.

"And I think, dear," she would say sometimes to her husband, "that you killed what little love I had with that frightful travesty you made of me. Do you remember it? You called it 'The Mirror.' I am so glad you never showed it to anyone. By the way, what has become of it?"

"I hardly know. It is lying about somewhere," he answered. And then he would abruptly leave the room.

The whole nature of the man seemed to have changed during those years. All his brilliancy and brightness, all his impulsive charm, all his energy, vivacity, and determination had gone. He was as one living and yet dead, cold with a coldness that seemed almost as the grave, instead of warm with the warmth of pulsing young life. His love for a woman had killed him then.

So Brand married a woman for her money, so they said, in order to escape from the trammels and the assiduous labours of art. He buried his genius in a grave of gold, and left it to rot while he lived an aimless life of luxury. And they grew to despise him and to hold him in a measureless contempt. His old loved set of intimates, the few men who had once understood and worshipped him, knew him no more.

Sometimes it seemed to him impossible that he could be wrapped up in a being who had no appreciation of the things which meant most to him, who had no real care for anything except the frivolities of life. He loved her, and was her husband, and yet his whole real self was unknown to her.

Sometimes, when he heard her congratulating herself on her influence over him, and telling people that he lived in the world now, instead of burying himself in art, he could not refrain from smiling bitterly. Her influence over him! What was it? She could make him love her. She could reach his heart and touch it. She could never reach his mind and touch that. Hers for him, meanwhile, at length wholly died. She lived more and more in the world, and ceased to desire to take him with her.

Mrs. Brand had among other distractions taken to gambling heavily.

So long as he was not compromised he let things take their course, and the last scene of the strange comedy of his life was, he knew, fast approaching.

. . . . . .

The artist learned two things almost simultaneously—that his health was failing and that his wife's passion for gambling was leading her farther than was wise. Her fortune had been large originally, but she had almost exhausted it, and had begun to draw heavily upon his. Remonstrances were useless. They seemed to avail perhaps for the moment, but Mrs. Brand continued to play in secret, although, to all appearances, she had yielded to her husband's entreaties or commands and given up the practice that was ruining her.

That his health was failing visibly she never noticed, and he never told her that he was suffering from aneurism of the heart, and that his days were numbered.

She, on the other hand, gave out that she was full of ailments, and finally persuaded an accommodating doctor to order her to Monte Carlo for change. Before she left England the artist won a promise from her that she would not once go to the tables while she was there.

Needless to say, the promise was never kept. She had never meant that it should be. Every day was passed at the tables, with varying luck at first. She even won a good deal, and her excitement grew more intense, more feverish than ever. But the luck changed, and the usual thing happened. She went on until she was terribly involved, till she had gambled away every farthing she had in the world. She was at last reduced to telegraphing to her husband for the means of getting home. The money was sent without a word of comment, and she returned.

It was late in the afternoon when she drove up to the big house in Kensington. She noticed that all the blinds were closely drawn. The servant who met her at the door broke the news that her husband had died in the studio, and had been found there some hours afterwards.

Mrs. Brand was honestly shocked, but she was hardly grieved. It could not make very much difference to her now; and it set her free to gamble with the money which had been his, and which now was hers. And so she played on until nearly everything was gone.

At last destitution stared her in the face. She had paid away all her money to satisfy debts of honour, and her other creditors were clamouring to be satisfied, and threatened to sell her up. Most of the beautiful things in the house were already sold. She resolved now to part with the house itself.

One evening a man, who had been an old friend of her husband's, and who had heard of her disasters, and of the dire straits she was in, called upon her. He had loved Harold, and for the sake of his memory resolved to do what he could to help the woman who had ruined the artist's life. He found her standing in the drawing-room before an easel, that was struck up incongruously in the middle of the floor, looking hopelessly out of place among the surroundings of the room.

After the first greetings had been uttered, Mrs. Brand said abruptly: "I know you are a good judge of art, and I want you to tell me something. I have appealed to you in my difficulties, and you know how terribly hard-up I have managed to get. Now, casting round for some means of making money, it occurred to me that although my husband long before his death entirely gave up painting, his name is still famous, and a new work of his might fetch a good price in the market."

"A new work!" exclaimed her visitor. "Has he left one behind him?"

"Well, it can hardly be called new. It was painted before we were married, and it was never exhibited, at my request. I will tell you exactly how it was. Before he proposed to me he painted me. I gave him no sittings. I never knew what he was doing till it was finished. On the evening he proposed to me he showed me the finished picture—I believe he thought it by far his best work—his masterpiece—but it did not do me justice. I told him so frankly. I begged him not to exhibit it. Do you know I often think it was my disapprobation which led him to forsake art? He never took a brush in his hand again. He loved me very much, and he was very proud. Now it occurs to me that I might sell this picture. It was painted years ago. I have altered. Nobody will find out it was intended for me, probably, and even if they do, I cannot help it. I must have money."

Digitized by Google

"May I look at it?" he said, and he stood before it.

She lifted the covering, and he gazed silently, holding his breath.

And as he gazed his eyes filled with tears, and he trembled. He, too, was a fine artist, and the dead man had once been his dearest friend. He had misunderstood him. He had been alienated from him. He had thought him unworthy.

Now he understood all the tragedy of his life, all the wasted genius, all the agony the proud, passionate, loving nature must have endured. And she would sell the picture.

He could not speak. He dared not trust himself to say one word.

At last she said, "Is it any good?"

He walked to the window, and looked out into the gathering dusk Then in a hoarse, low voice, he said abruptly: "Will you take two thousand pounds for it?"

She gave a cry of delight

"Two thousand pounds for that!" she exclaimed.

"I will send a cheque to-night, on condition that I may take it away with me at once."

He could scarcely command his voice.

"Take it by all means," she said. "The servant shall carry it out for you."

"No. I will carry it out myself, with my own hands," he answered. And he lifted it reverently from the easel and bore it away with him to his home.

. . . . . .

And now the world gazes in awe upon that wonderful canvas, which wrecked a life, and worships the memory of the silent, dead artist.

And the woman—she has gambled away the two thousand pounds and forgotten the picture; the picture that did not do her justice!

HOSKIN'S PETS.

"YES," said the journalist, reflectively, "I've been almost everywhere in my time, except in gaol, and I've been in many worse places than a first-class gaol, with all the modern improvements. The fact is, that philanthropic people have gone so far in improving the condition of prisoners, that most of our prisons are rather better than most of our hotels. At any rate, they are less expensive, and the guests are treated with more respect.

"I never could understand the craze that some people have for criminals. For instance, you can read almost any day in the papers of young ladies sending fruit and flowers to murderers. Whenever a man is convicted of murder and sentenced to be hanged, the girls begin to shower tributes of flowers into his cell until he can't turn round without upsetting a vase of roses, or a big basin of pansies, and getting his feet wet.

I had a neighbour when I lived in Lewes who was the president of the Society for Ameliorating the Condition of Prisoners, and he was the craziest man on the subject that I ever met. His name was Hoskins—Major John Hoskins—and he was the author of the Hoskins' Bill that attracted so much attention when it was before the House of Commons, though it never became law.

"The Bill provided that every prisoner should have a sitting room as well as a sleeping room, and that it should be furnished with a piano, a banjo, a library, a typewriter, a wine cooler, and a whist table; that the prisoner should be allowed to hold two weekly receptions, to which everybody should be allowed to come, and that he should be taught any branch of study that he might care to take up, books and masters being, of course, supplied free.

"Major Hoskins used to insist that the only thing that made a man go wrong was the lack of kindness, and that the sure way to reform a criminal was to treat him with so much kindness that he would grow ashamed of being wicked, and would fall on everybody's neck and devote the rest of his life to weeping tears of repentance and singing hymns of joy.

"While Major Hoskins patronised all styles of criminals, burglars were his particular pets. According to him, a burglar was more deserving of kindness than other men. 'How would you like it,' he used to say, 'if you had to earn your living by breaking into houses in the middle of the night, instead of sleeping peacefully in your bed? Do you think you would be full of good thoughts after you had been bitten by the watch-dog and fired at by the man of the house, and earned nothing by your labour except a bad cold and the prospect of hydrophobia?

"'There is nothing more brutal than the way in which society treats the burglar, and as long as society refuses to put him in the way of earning an easier and less dangerous living he cannot be blamed if he continues to practise his midnight profession.'

"I must say this for Major Hoskins. He did not confine himself to talk, like many other philanthropists, but he was always trying to carry out his principles. He really meant what he said about burglars, and there isn't the least doubt that he had more sympathy for them than he had for the honest men of his acquaintance.

"When people asked him what he would do if he woke up in the night and found a burglar in the house, and whether or not he would shoot at him, he said he would as soon think of shooting his own wife, and that he would undertake to reform that burglar then and there by kindness alone. Once somebody said to Hoskins that he ought really to let the burglars know his feelings towards them, and Hoskins said he would do it without delay.

"That same day he drew up a beautiful 'Notice to Burglars,' and had it printed in big letters and framed and hung up in the dining-room of his house. It read this way: 'Burglars are respectfully informed that the silver is all plated, and that the proprietor of this house never keeps ready money on hand. Cake and wine will be found in the dining-room cupboard, and burglars are cordially invited to rest and refresh themselves. Please wipe your feet on the mat, and close the window when leaving the house.'

"Major Hoskins took a good deal of pride in that notice. He showed it to every one that called at the house, and said that if other people would follow his example, and treat burglars like Christians and gentlemen, there would soon be an end to burglary, for the burglars would be so touched by the kindness of their treatment that they would abandon the business and become honoured members of society—insurance managers, or bank cashiers, or churchwardens. He didn't say how the reformed burglars were to find employment in banks and insurance offices; but that was a matter of detail, and he always preferred to devise large and noble schemes, and leave the working details to other men.

Digitized by Google

"One morning, Major Hoskins, who was an early riser, went down to the dining-room before breakfast, and was surprised to find that he had been paid a midnight visit by some burglars. Two empty wine bottles stood on the table, and all the cake was eaten, which showed that the burglars had accepted the invitation to refresh themselves. All Hoskins' spoons and forks lay in a heap in the middle of the floor, and every one was twisted or broken so as to be good for nothing. The window had been left open, and the rain had ruined the curtains, and on a dirty piece of paper the burglars had scrawled with a lead pencil the opinion that 'Old Hoskins is the biggest idiot and the bloominest skinflint in the country. You set out whiskey next time, or we will serve you out.'

"Hoskins was not in the least cast down by the rudeness of the burglars. 'Poor fellows,' he said, 'they have been so used to bad treatment that they don't altogether appreciate kindness at first. But they will learn.' So he laid in some new spoons and forks, and added a bottle of whiskey to the wine that he kept in the cupboard for the burglars, and was as confident as ever that the next gang that might break into the house would be melted into tears and repentance, and would call him their best and dearest friend.

"A week or two later Mrs. Hoskins was awakened by a noise in the dining-room, and, after rousing her husband, told him that there were burglars in the house, and that he must get out of the back window and go for the police. He told her that he was sorry to see her manifest such an un-Christian spirit, and he would show her how burglars ought to be treated.

"There was not the least doubt that there were burglars in the house, and they were making a great deal more noise than was strictly consistent with the prospect of rising in their profession, for no able burglar ever makes any unnecessary noise while engaged in business, unless, of course, he falls over a coalscuttle, and then he naturally uses language. Hoskins was sincerely delighted to have the opportunity of meeting his burglarious friends, and he lost no time in dressing and descending to the dining-room.

"He wore his slippers, and the burglars—there were two of them—did not hear him until he was fairly in the room. They were seated at the table, with their feet on the damask table-cloth, and the bottle of whiskey was nearly empty. The Major was much pleased to see that they had not damaged his silver ware, and he was just about to thank them when they saw him. They started up, and one of them caught him by the throat while the other held a pistol to his head, and promised to blow out his brains if he made the slightest noise. Then they tied him hand and foot, gagged him, and laid him on the floor, and then sat down to finish the whiskey.

"Both burglars were partly drunk, which accounted for the unprofessional noise they had been making. They talked in a rather low tone, but Hoskins could hear everything they said, and it was not particularly encouraging to a gagged and bound philanthropist.

"They agreed that he was a fool, and a stingy fool, or else he would have kept money in the house, and would have set out lemons and sugar as well as plain whiskey. They said that any man who treated poor working men in that way wasn't fit to live, and that Hoskins would have to be killed, even if it was not necessary—as it was plainly in this case—to kill him in order to prevent him appearing at any future time as a witness against them. They admitted that the whiskey was not bad of its kind, but they were of the opinion that Hoskins had left it in their way so that they might get drunk and be caught by the police.

"Major Hoskins listened to all this conversation with horror, and the prospect that the drunken rascals would be as good as their word, and kill him before they left the house, was only a little more painful than the conviction that his method, appealing to the better nature of burglars, had failed for the second time.

"When the whiskey was exhausted the men rose up and looked at Hoskins, and a happy thought struck one of them.

"'Thish yer idiot,' he said, 'may not have any money in the house, but he's bound to have some in the bank, and he's going to write us a cheque for a hundred pounds, providing we let him off, and don't kick his brains out this time.'

"The other burglar, who was in that benevolent frame of mind that Irish whiskey and conscious virtue sometimes produce, agreed to the suggestion, and Hoskins was therefore unbound and seated at the table, and told to draw a cheque at once if he had the least regard for his life. As he was gagged he could not explain to the burglars the kind feelings he still had towards them, and the fact that they could not draw the money on the cheque without being captured by the police. So he simply signed the cheque, and groaned to think that the poor burglars were so slow to be reformed in the way that he had hoped they would take.

"When this business was over, the burglars tied Hoskins' wrists again, and then bound him to a chair, Then they set to work to do all the damage they could without making too much noise. They tore the curtains and hacked the piano with knives, and poured a jug of golden syrup over the carpet. Then they plastered Major Hoskins' face with raspberry jam, and emptied a sack of flour all over his head, and went away, telling him that if he ever ventured again to trifle with the feelings of poor but self-respecting men they would put him to death by slow tortures.

"Hoskins sat in the chair for a couple of hours, till his wife timidly crept downstairs and released him. It took him a good hour to get the jam and the flour out of his hair and whiskers, and as Mrs. Hoskins said that he was in no state to enter a decent bedroom, and made him wash at the tap in the back kitchen, he found it a rather cold operation.

"Perhaps it was the remarks that Mrs. Hoskins addressed to him during the operation that irritated the Major, for she intimated very plainly that he was no better than a professional idiot, and when a man's hair is stuck together with jam remarks of this sort from the wife of his bosom seem to be lacking in tenderness.

"However that may be, Major Hoskins had no sooner got himself into what his wife condescended to call a state of comparative decency, than he took down his 'Notice to Burglars' and tore it into a thousand pieces.

"That day he had an electric burglar alarm put into his house, he bought the fiercest dog that he could find, and he stopped the payment of the cheque, which, however, was never presented.

"He continued to be the President of the Society for Ameliorating the Condition of Prisoners, but he steadily refused to better the lot of a single prisoner convicted of burglary; and while he was always a lunatic in regard to other criminals, he openly maintained that a burglar was the worst of men, and that kindness was utterly thrown away upon him.

"He never had any more burglars in his house, though the dog now and then destroyed masculine clothing, when some stranger to that part of the country ventured into Hoskins' premises at night. Hoskins was very fond of the animal, which was quite right; but his practice of leaving a bottle of whiskey, with an ounce of strychnine in it, on the dining-room table every night, in case a burglar should succeed in getting into the house, was, in my opinion, going a little too far. But there is no man who is more severe than a philanthropist who has been turned sour."

6d. THRO' THE BATTLE-SMOKE. 6d.

A Complete Novel with over 100 Illustrations.

THIS IS THE THIRD ISSUE OF

PEARSON'S LIBRARY.

ON SALE, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 30TH.

A GRAND SUCCESS. SPLENDID VALUE.

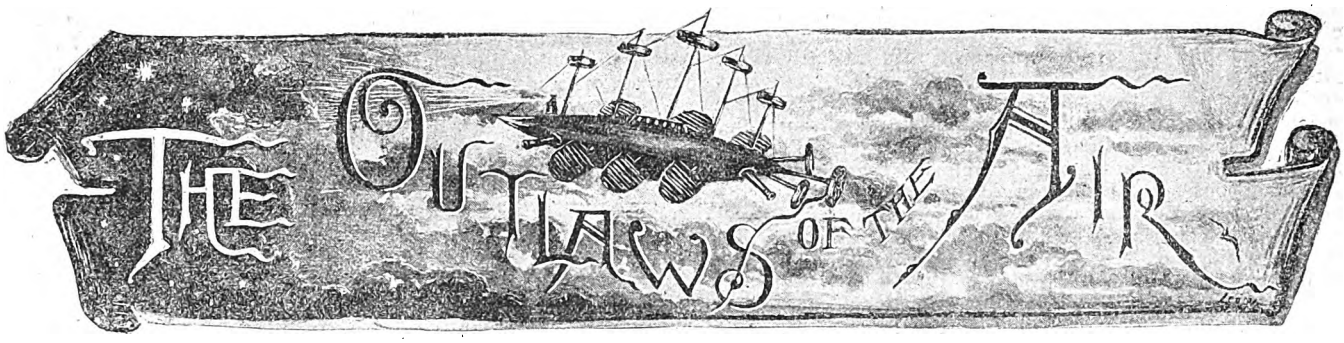
Digitized by Google



By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

Franz Hartog—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

Sir Harry Milton—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, in his yacht, the Calypso, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

Herbert Wyndham—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who resigns his commission and couples his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

Frederick Austen—the inventor of the air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

Frank Markham—the young captain of the Utopian yacht, Mermaid.

Violet Milton—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is permanently crippled by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

Dora Merton—a fair Utopian who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

Lucy Summers—another fair Utopian.

Renault in the air-ship Vengeur, and Hartog in the torpedo-boat Destroyer, levy blackmail on the high seas. Just as they have annihilated a combined British, French, and Portuguese fleet sent to discover them, a Maxim aeroplane, the Britannia, comes on the scene, and is captured by the Vengeur. Those on it are put ashore, and one of the crew shoots at Renault and wounds him. A few weeks later Renault and Hartog set out for the Island of Utopia for the purpose of destroying its inhabitants, but find it deserted.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Back to Life.

It will now be necessary, in order to preserve the continuity of the narrative, to go back to the evening of the disaster which caused such a dark and sudden cloud to fall upon the hitherto unclouded brightness of life in Utopia.

Before daybreak on the morning following the discovery of Lieutenant Wyndham lying wounded on the platform in the crater of Mount Orient, and the rescue of Violet from her perilous position on the top of the palm-tree, young Markham came galloping up to the crater on pony-back and had an interview with Adams and Mr. Austen, who were roused for the purpose from the brief slumber into which they had fallen after the distress and excitement of the previous night. So serious was the news that he brought that they were not long in seeing that he was perfectly justified in taking the step that he had done.

It will be remembered that he was intrusted with the amusement of the Calypso's crew during the holiday, and in the discharge of this duty he had taken several of them for a run round the reef in the Mermaid, after entertaining them for the greater part of the day, in order that those of them who wished might get a good general view of the island that they were so soon to leave. During this trip, and while the Mermaid was at the eastern extremity of the reef, and over twenty miles from the landing stages, he had seen the air-ship rise from the crater of Mount Orient and leave the island.

Bewildered as he had been by an apparition which, as he well knew, meant the disclosure of Utopia's most jealously guarded secret, he had not been long in coming to the conclusion that it could only be explained on the supposition of treason and desertion. Then, instantly, his thoughts had reverted to the Nautilus. If there had been anyone on the island capable of disclosing the secret of the air-ship and stealing her from the colony, was it not also reasonable to suppose that such a traitor would also try to deprive the colonists of the formidable sea-weapon which had so nearly approached completion.

It had taken all his own ingenuity and the authority of Mr. Topline to restrain or in any way satisfy the wondering curiosity of the Calypso's men with regard to the apparition of the air-ship. But this was of insignificant importance in comparison with the undefined, but very certain, fears that he entertained with regard to the safety of the Nautilus. Consequently, he put the Mermaid's head about, and astonished the sailors still further by rushing her back to the entrance to the lagoon in front of the settlement at a good thirty knots an hour.

Had taken several of them for a run round the reef in the "Mermaid.

It was dark by the time he got back to the dockyard, so, after giving the Calypso's men in charge of the sailing-master, he took the crew of the launch ashore, lighted the electric lamps, and set to work to make an examination, first of the hull of the Nautilus, and then of the dockyard itself.

For between three and four hours they searched in vain, and then, just as they were about to give up the search and leave the interior of the vessel, Markham's quick ear had caught a sound like the ticking of a clock, faint but regular, in the inmost recesses of the after part of the craft. He saw at once that this was a sound that boded danger, for there was nothing in connection with the work of building that could explain it, so they set to work again with redoubled energy and not a little anxiety, and at last discovered close hidden under one of the motor-fuel magazines, a battery and a little clockwork mechanism arranged like that of an alarum clock which, as after examination proved, would five minutes later have completed the circuit and sent a spark through the magazine, and produced an explosion which would have blown the after part of the Nautilus to fragments.

Digitized by Google

This was of course proof positive of treachery as ruthless as it had been cunning and secret, and gave ample confirmation of Markham's timely apprehensions. The battery was immediately disconnected, and then, leaving two of his companions to explore every other recess of the ship into which a human being could crawl, Markham took the rest and, after enlisting the assistance of Mr. Topline and the Calypso's men, proceeded to make a thorough and systematic examination of the whole dockyard.

This precaution, very necessary after what had been found in the hull of the Nautilus, occupied the searchers well through the night, but resulted in no further discovery, and from this fact it was rightly concluded that the traitor or traitors had had no time to plan or execute any further damage. As soon as he was satisfied of this, Markham, without waiting for daylight, had ridden up to Mount Orient and told his story to Adams and Mr. Austen, so that they might lose no time in taking any precautions that they might think necessary.

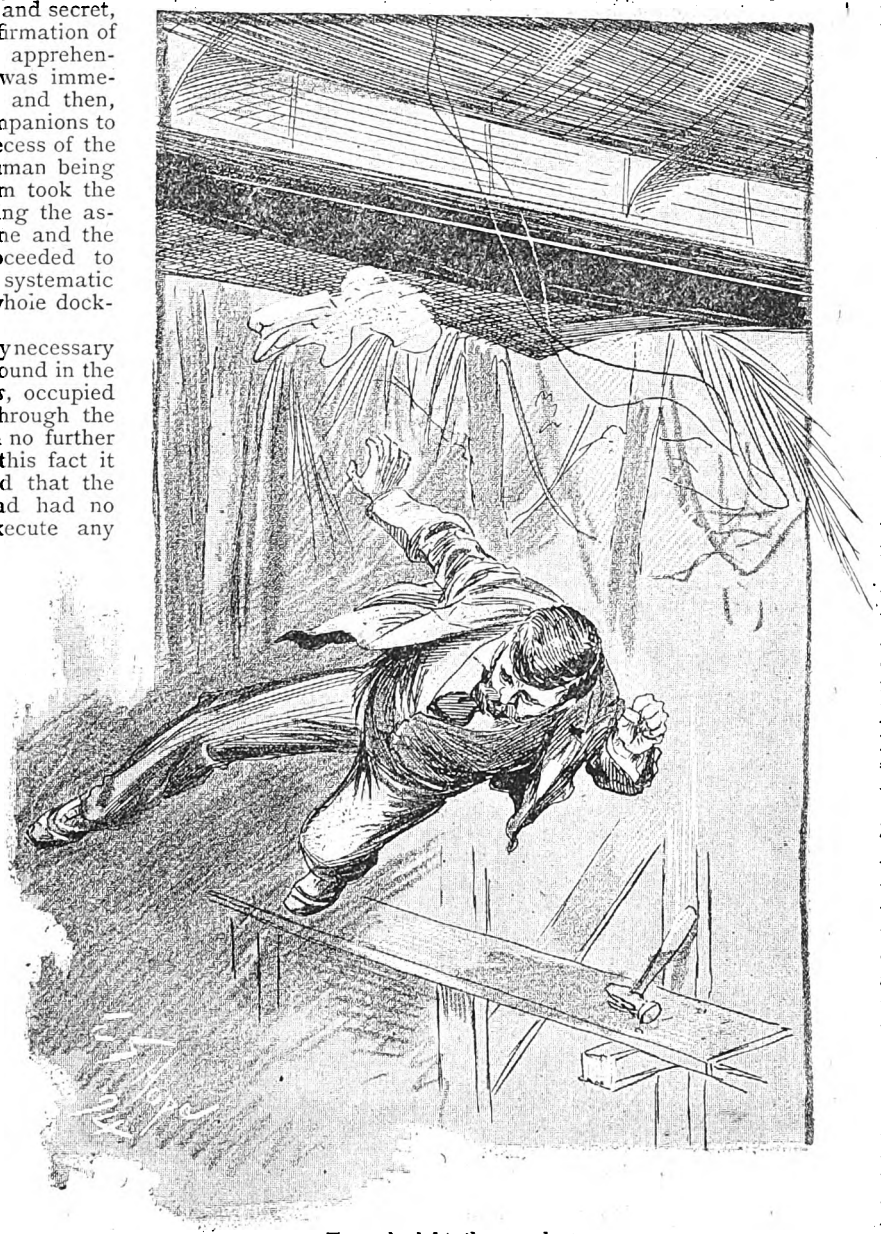
The first thing to be done was to hold a sort of council of war, and to this Sir Harry was invited in consideration of the offer he had made the evening before to devote his life and his fortune to avenging the misery and suffering that Renault had brought upon his sister and himself.

Naturally the first question that arose was whether Renault had acted entirely alone or whether he had had any accomplices on the island. As soon as the Lieutenant woke, which he did soon after sunrise, very weak but in the full possession of his faculties, he was able to answer this question in the negative so far as the carrying off of the air-ship was concerned.

He told them that on the previous afternoon he and Violet, when wandering alone, for reasons best known to themselves, in the valley between the two craters, had been unexpectedly accosted by Renault, who appeared to be in his pleasantest and politest mood, and he had led the conversation round to the Nautilus and the Lieutenant's offer to take her to sea.

Then he had told them that he had had a conversation on the subject with Adams and Mr. Austen, and that they had agreed with him that, as the Lieutenant had virtually decided to throw in his lot with the Utopians in their campaign against the Destroyer, there was no reason why a much greater secret than that of the existence of the Nautilus should be any longer withheld from him.

Wyndham had seen instantly what he was driving at, and when Renault at length, without giving any sign that he knew of their knowledge of the air-ship's existence, told him point blank that there was such a craft on the island, and offered to show it to them, there and then, in the crater of Mount Orient, his anxiety to see the wonderful ship at close quarters had got the better of his prudence, and he had accepted the offer without a thought of any ulterior design on Renault's part.



He was hurled to the ground.

He had proposed to go back and fetch Sir Harry, but Renault had objected to this on the ground that he was not yet authorised by his comrades to communicate the secret to Sir Harry, though he would take the personal responsibility of admitting Violet to the crater if she chose to come. To this he added that, as the afternoon was getting on, they would not have time to go back to the crater of Mount Plato and then go on and see the air-ship in daylight.

He said that he hadn't the slightest doubt but that Sir Harry would be invited to inspect the vessel before long, but there was no reason why the Lieutenant and Violet should not have a glimpse of it that evening—a sort of private view, as Renault had laughingly put it; and so, in their curiosity to see what was certainly the most wonderful thing on earth, they had given no further thought to the matter, but had simply followed Renault to the crater.

They had found the air-ship resting on her platform, and Renault had taken them on board, showed them the machinery, and explained the working. Then they had gone on deck, Renault having promised to run the ship round the inside of the crater, to give them an idea of the ease with which she could be managed. Just as they were waiting for her to rise from the platform, the Lieutenant had felt the stab of Renault's dagger in his back; then came a violent lurch, the air-ship's deck rose beneath his feet, and he was hurled to the ground, and remembered nothing more till he opened his eyes and found Adams and Sir Harry leaning over him.

Digitized by Google

She laid her uninjured hand in his.

Wyndham had scarcely finished his recital before Doctor Roberts came out of the hut in which Violet was lying to tell her brother the anxiously awaited news that she had regained consciousness at last, and was able to see him for a few minutes.

It would be easier to imagine than describe the mingled sorrow and rage that possessed the young Baronet when he went in and saw the awful change that Renault's villainous crime had produced in the girl, who only a few hours before had been full of life and strength and spirits, and had never known what a day's illness meant. Now she lay upon the luxurious couch that had been prepared for her, pallid, maimed, and crippled, barely able to move a limb, and so weak that she could only speak in a whisper.

She could not even hold out her hand to him as he approached her bedside, but her eyes brightened and her lips, now pale and shrunken in comparison with their rosy fulness of a few hours ago, moved in a faint languid smile.

Totally unable to speak for the moment, he stooped over her and kissed her, and as he did so she whispered:

"You see, I didn't kill myself after all; but I had to throw myself out—you know there was no other way. If I hadn't he would have taken me with him, and, of course, I would sooner have died twenty deaths than that. It was right, wasn't it?"

"Right?" said Sir Harry in a husky, half choked voice. "Yes, of course it was right, old girl. We were on the hill and saw you fall, and I knew you had thrown yourself out. It was your only way to escape, and you took it as your mother's daughter was bound to do. As for that scoundrel Renault——"

"Never mind him now, Harry," she whispered with a slight shake of her head. "Tell me, is Bertie—I mean Mr. Wyndham—alive? I've some dim recollection of Renault trying to stab him, or something, and throw him out of the ship. Did he do it?"

"Yes, I'm sorry to say he did—but, there, don't distress yourself about that. The wound was not fatal, though it was meant to be, and Roberts says there isn't the slightest danger if he's kept quiet; in fact, it's only a few minutes since he was asking how you were getting on. He's a lot more distressed about you, I can tell you, than he is about his own wound, though it's a pretty severe one."

Just the faintest perceptible flush rose into Violet's whitely transparent cheeks as he spoke. With an effort she laid her uninjured hand in his and said:

"Tell him I'm so glad—more glad than I can say—and, Harry, you must also tell him that he's not to think any more about what he said to me yesterday afternoon, because, although Doctor Roberts won't tell me, I believe that even if I don't die I shall never be able to walk again. There's something wrong with my back, and though, as you must know, I'm badly injured, I've scarcely any feeling at all in either of my legs, although Mrs. Merton told me that one of them is broken in two places."

"Nonsense, old girl, nonsense; you mustn't talk like that!" replied her brother with an assumed cheerfulness that he was far from feeling. "Of course, I know you've been terribly knocked about; but, you know, you've got the constitution of a young colt, the same as I have, and we shall pull you through all right now that you've once come round.

"Anyhow, I'm not going to tell Wyndham anything of the sort, and if I did he'd only laugh at me and tell me to mind my own business. You must settle that between yourselves when you're better. I don't believe in third persons interfering in these things. They always burn their fingers. Serve them jolly well right, too."

"Time's up, Milton!" said the doctor's voice outside the door before Violet could reply. "I said only five minutes, and you've had nearly ten. Out you come now, please. You can see her again after breakfast, but she's talked quite enough now."

Sir Harry knew his doctor too well to rebel, so, with another kiss and a gentle brotherly caress, he turned away from Violet's bedside, and catching the doctor outside the hut, put his arm through his and drew him away out of earshot.

"Now," he said, "Roberts, I suppose the worst of the danger's over, so you can tell me the worst there is to fear for the future."

"I can't tell you, my dear fellow, simply because I don't know myself. Thanks to young Edward's assistance, and the perfect nursing she has had, she has really made a wonderful improvement in the time. She'll live, there's not a doubt about that, I think; and as for the broken bones, why, she has the Milton constitution, and that means that there will be no trouble with them.

"We've reduced the fractures and got everything into place, and if it wasn't for that unhappy injury to her back I don't believe she'd even be lame, but I shouldn't be doing right if I didn't tell you that I don't at all like the look of the spinal injury. The best I can say is the back is not broken; but there's no doubt that the spinal cord is either crushed or strained.

"The lower part of her body is almost without feeling, though I fancy there is a slight increase of sensitiveness since the bones of the leg were set."

"And therefore," interrupted Sir Harry, "I suppose the worst is that she may be a cripple for life."

"I won't go so far as to say that," replied the doctor, shaking his head. "Of course, there is danger of it, it's no good disguising that, but it will be quite a week before I should feel justified in saying anything positive, you never exactly know where you are with spinal injuries. Sometimes the body literally dies from the place of lesion downwards, and sometimes the nerve-power gradually returns until only a little weakness is left.

"Your sister is young and strong and organically as sound as a bell, and in a year or two she may be running about the same as ever. On the other hand, it is possible that she may never be able to stand again or move without assistance. That's the best and the worst of it, and if there's anything in surgery you may rely upon us to make the best of it if it's physically possible.

"But I'll tell you this," he continued, stopping in his walk and facing round, "as soon as she is otherwise fit to be moved you ought to ship her off to London without losing a day, for the sooner that you get her under the care of some really good specialist the better hope there'll be of her recovery."

"Ah!" said Sir Harry. "Then that will just fit in with something else that I've been thinking about. How soon do you think she might be moved?"

Digitized by Google

"If nothing happens to throw her back she might be moved to her cabin on the Calypso in ten days or so."

"Very well," said Sir Harry. "I hope we shall be nearly ready to start by that time, but she won't go in the Calypso."

CHAPTER XXIV.

HOMEWARD BOUND.

LATER on in the day, when the whole colony had become aware of the loss that Utopia had sustained through Renault's daring and all too successful crime, a regular council of war was held in Lieutenant Wyndham's room.

As the Utopians were too sensible to believe that the more talk there is on a problem the more likelihood there is of arriving at a satisfactory solution the council consisted only of Mr. Austen, Adams, Ambrose Miller, the veteran mariner who had piloted the colonists to Utopia, Sir Harry, and, of course, the wounded Lieutenant, who had sufficiently recovered from the exhaustion consequent on his wound to be able to listen a good deal and talk a little.

As all had thought the question well out beforehand, and as no one had any desire save to find out the best course to pursue, there was very little talking done, and the most of it was done by Adams, who now, as on all important crises in the fortunes of Utopia, acted as the colonists' spokesman.

"I am afraid there is only one thing to be done," he said, in response to Mr. Austen's request that he should state his view of the case first. "I am afraid it will seem a very extreme view of the case, and, of course, if anyone can suggest another way out of the difficulty that offers the same chance of safety I shall be most happy to agree with them.

"So far as I can see, however, this treachery of Renault's has placed everybody in Utopia in a very serious position indeed. Of course, as Mr. Austen said last night, if the air-ship had only been armed and had her ammunition on board, there would be none of us left alive by this time. Renault would simply have hovered over us and killed us, and then he would have wrecked the settlement, so as to make sure that no one was left alive in possession of the secret of the motive power upon which, of course, everything depended.

"The only thing that we can do is to get out of Utopia before he returns."

"The discovery that Markham made in the Nautilus clearly proves that he intended to destroy the only vessel that could compete with the Destroyer. I am afraid there can be no doubt now but that Renault was an Anarchist in disguise, and that he came out with us solely for the purpose of getting hold of the secret that Mr. Austen gave us, and also, as events have proved, of stealing the air-ship when it was completed.

"No doubt he recognised Lieutenant Wyndham, and saw that he might be exposed at any moment, and that, to my mind, is why he took the air-ship for a trial trip that night that the Lieutenant and Sir Harry saw her over the hills, and also why he laid his plans hurriedly and got away with the air-ship instead of waiting, as I daresay he would have done, to try and corrupt enough members of the colony to help him to steal the Nautilus as well.

"With the personal violence and the dastardly crime that he was guilty of against Miss Milton and Lieutenant Wyndham, I do not think we have any concern at present——"

"No," said Sir Harry grimly. "We'll see about that later on when the day of reckoning comes; but we'll have to get on something like equal terms with the scoundrel before that."

"Yes," continued Adams. "So we can put that aside for the present. Now, obviously, Renault, having got possession of the air-ship, must do one of two things. Either he must content himself with the mischief that he can do after he has got her armed, and run the risk of our building another vessel swifter and more powerful than the one he has stolen, or else he will get her armed, come back here, and exterminate the colony in order to prevent our doing so. To my mind there is no choice between the two courses. He will certainly come back, and that as soon as he possibly can, therefore the only thing that we can do is to get out of Utopia before he returns."

When Adams ceased there was silence for two or three minutes. He had suggested the one course that held out any reasonable chance of safety, but it was also a course that meant the abandonment of the colony and all the bright hopes that had grown up round the venture, which had been overwhelmed with such sudden and unexpected disaster.

They knew that the Utopians had got to love their island paradise so dearly that it would be a terrible wrench for them to leave it, perhaps for ever, at a few days' notice; and so it was in a sadly serious tone that Mr. Austen took up the parable, and said:—

"Yes, I'm afraid there's nothing for it but that. The man who could do what Renault did yesterday is capable of any crime, and I feel certain that he would not scruple even to come back and slaughter every man, woman, and child in Utopia in order to make sure that he alone possessed the secret of the air-ship's motive power.

"To solve a problem like that of aerial navigation is to incur enormous responsibilities, and, honestly, I wish now that my poor Fred had died with the secret untold, for I can see nothing but a series of terrible calamities to the world as the outcome of it.

"If, as I'm afraid must be the case, Renault is really in league with the Anarchists who have possession of the Destroyer, it stands to reason that with the immense amount of money that they must have stolen already they will be able to build a large fleet of air-ships like the stolen one, and that will give them the power of working untold evil and destruction both on land and sea.

"Our duty, both to ourselves and the world, is now perfectly plain. Whatever sacrifice to our personal feelings, we must leave Utopia at the earliest possible moment. We must finish the work on the Nautilus and get her home to England to receive her equipment. That done, she must take the water in search of the Destroyer and not rest until she has found her and sent her to the bottom. Meanwhile—we must have at least a dozen air-ships."

"Make it a score at least," put in Sir Harry with a short laugh. "If they cost £40,000 apiece I'll see that the money's found for them."

"Very well," continued Mr. Austen, looking round at him with a smile. "A score let it be, and I can promise you that they shall be both faster and more powerful for destruction than the Volante, as we were going to have called her.

"But by the time we have built these—and with the utmost expedition they will take at least six months to complete, even if we build them simultaneously—we must expect that Renault and his accomplices, with an equal, if not greater, command of money will have been able to build a fleet possibly as strong as this, and therefore, I am afraid, we shall have to prepare ourselves not only to hunt the Anarchists out of the world but to literally fight such battles as have never been fought before.

"In short, I am afraid we must take it that, within the scope of the air-ship's powers, and as soon as she has been properly armed, Renault is virtual master of the world. It seems an extravagant term to use, and yet it must be granted that he is so; and we shall have to fight him for that mastery and take it away from him, or be destroyed in the attempt. There is nothing else for it, so far as I can see."

Digitized by Google

"No, there is nothing else; we must go," said Adams and Ambrose Miller, almost in a breath.

"That's it!" said Wyndham. "I must get well as soon as possible and take the Nautilus on the war-path, and then I'll either sink that Destroyer or get sunk by her; and as soon as you've got an air-ship for me to command, I'll get into the clouds and bring Monsieur Max to book. I wish to Heaven I was only ready to set out to-morrow."

"All in good time, Bertie, old man," said Sir Harry, rising to his feet with the others. "For the present, you pay all your attention to getting well. We'll do the rest, and when the day of battle comes, we'll see which of us shall make it hottest for those blackguards who have stolen a march on us and on the world at large."

The result of this brief conference was that that evening the colonists of Utopia assembled to the number of about a thousand souls on the beach beside the landing-stages, and heard from Adams' lips the gist of what had already been said in private. Everyone, of reasoning years, was compelled to admit that, mournful as such a step undoubtedly was, there was nothing for it but to forsake their beautiful southern home.

As long as Max Renault remained at liberty and in command of the air-ship there was no chance of safety for anyone in Utopia, and, therefore, they must abandon it. Some day, perhaps, when the peace of the world should be restored, they might return and continue the work that had been so rudely interrupted; but for the present they must forsake it.

But when Adams had done speaking, Sir Harry jumped upon the block of coral upon which he had been standing, and, in a few well-chosen hearty words, claimed the opportunity of making a return for the hospitality he and the company of the Calypso had received in Utopia by placing a little seaside town in Yorkshire, which he owned from the foundation to the chimney-pots, at the disposal of all who chose to go and live there as his guests until they found opportunities of settling down again into English homes of their own.

The invitation was accepted in the same spirit in which it was given, and with the next sunrise the Utopians set to work, with heavy hearts, but a settled conviction, that they were doing the best possible for themselves and their children to make all preparations for leaving the island at the earliest possible date.

Of course, the work on the Nautilus was pushed on with the utmost speed. Everyone who could give any assistance was set to work, and relays of workers wrought night and day on her and the Calypso with such hearty good will that on the tenth day of the new year the Calypso was floated out of the dry-dock and, in the presence of all the assembled colonists, Miss Dora put her dainty fingers on the electric button connected with certain mechanism which, set in motion, sent the Nautilus gliding down the well-greased ways of the slips, and despatched her with a graceful plunge into the waters of the basin.

By noon the following day everything was ready for the exodus, and the colonists embarked on the three vessels that were to take them back to England. The Irene, the two thousand-ton transport steamer which had originally brought them out, and the Calypso, which had also been fitted up as a transport, were to go by way of the Panama Canal, the Irene carrying the Mermaid as a tender. Ambrose Miller went in command of this portion of the expedition, and the Nautilus, in charge of Adams and Mr. Austen, and carrying Violet and the Lieutenant, Sir Harry, Doctor Roberts, and Mrs. Merton and Dora, who had undertaken the care of Violet between them, was to go round the Horn in order to avoid the undesirable notice she would be bound to receive in going through the Canal.

Though neither knew it, she actually passed the Destroyer, outward bound for Utopia, within ten miles of her, between the island of Trinidad and the coast of South America.

Travelling at an average speed of forty knots an hour the Nautilus covered the fifteen thousand odd miles between Utopia and the Straits of Dover in the miraculous time of seventeen days. So far the voyage was eventless. The strange low-lying craft, mastless save for a single signal pole, had crossed the world almost unobserved. The Lieutenant's wound had healed, and he was so much stronger that he took a regular watch every day in the conning-tower to familiarise himself with the working of the vessel, while Violet, though, of course, still almost helpless, had improved wonderfully in both health and general spirits.

They were running quietly and swiftly along through comparatively smooth grey sea, almost due east of the Admiralty Pier, at a distance of about eight miles, in the early night of the 27th, when the first interruption occurred. Without warning the long white blinding ray of a war-ship's searchlight flashed out of the gloom towards the land.

It fell for an instant on the platform of the swiftly-moving Nautilus, then came the short flat-toned bang of a blank cartridge, conveying an unmistakeable information to stop. The Lieutenant happened to be in the conning-tower with Adams at the moment. Adams, who was at the wheel, looked at him inquiringly and said:

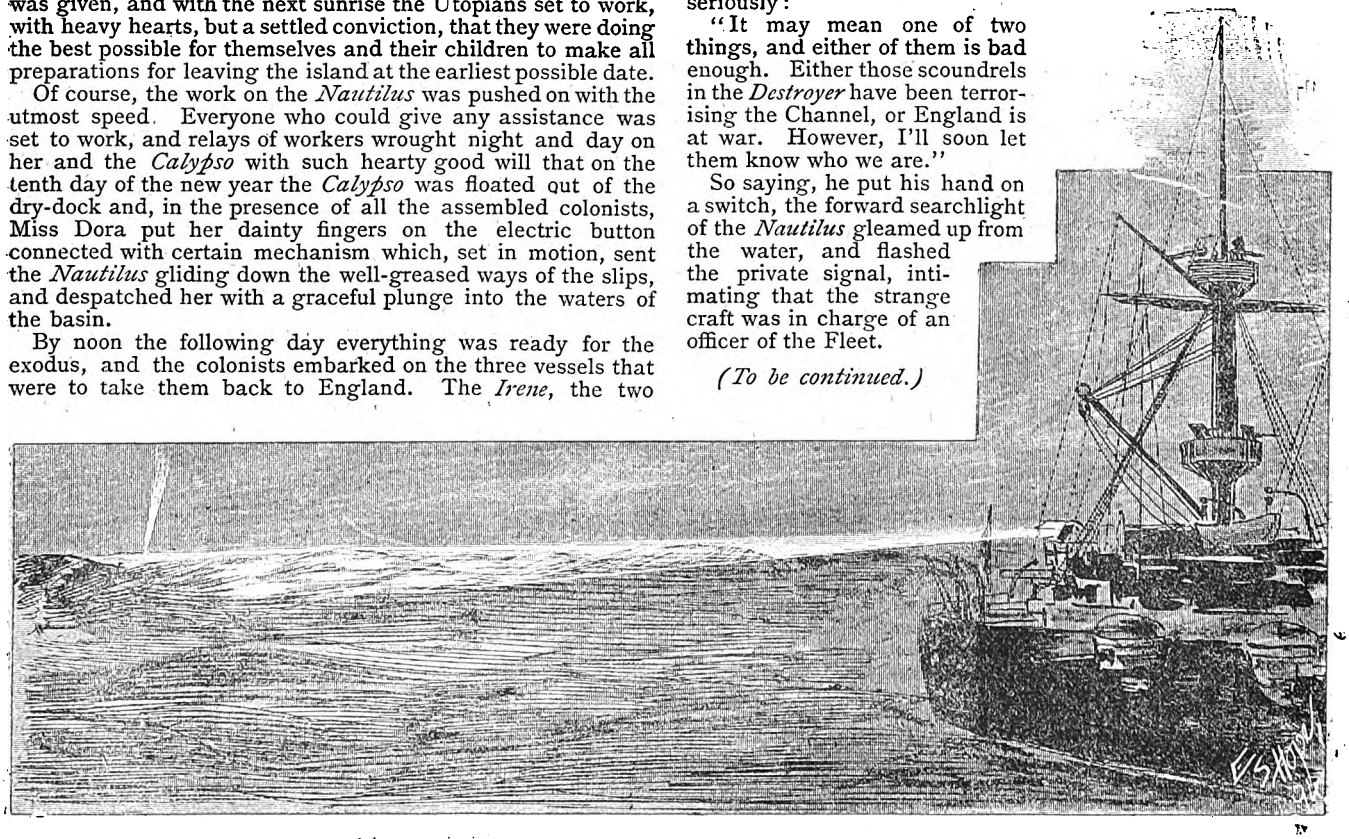
"What does that mean?"

Wyndham was silent for a moment, and then said very seriously:

"It may mean one of two things, and either of them is bad enough. Either those scoundrels in the Destroyer have been terrorising the Channel, or England is at war. However, I'll soon let them know who we are."

So saying, he put his hand on a switch, the forward searchlight of the Nautilus gleamed up from the water, and flashed the private signal, intimating that the strange craft was in charge of an officer of the Fleet.

(To be continued.)



Digitized by Google

Miss Esperanza O'Shea.

It was just on the stroke of nine. The lower balcony of the Casino at Narragansett, the fashionable American watering-place, was crowded, and even on the broad stretch of stone pavement the chairs were so close that the passer-by had to pick his way, politely mindful of women's trains and men's feet. Outside the seawall the ocean lay long and level, part of it paled by moonlight, and here and there on its darker expanse specked with the small, steady lights of anchored yachts. The scene was picturesque—a black arch spanning a moonlit roadway, a gate-tower, dark against the sky, with a round, bright moon shining over its shoulder, a glimmering of white waves seething about broken rocks. From the corner of the balcony, where the musicians sat, floated the strains of Wolfram's "Song to the Evening Star," with its undertone of ineffable, piercing sadness.

It was just at this propitious moment that the crowd at the far end of the balcony became aware that the crowd at the end near the main entrance were enjoying a sensation. There was a rustle of crushed silk as the women moved in their chairs, a universal turning of heads, a raising of girls' lorgnettes, an adjusting of men's glasses, a murmurous intermingling of queries, and then a running fire of comment, not too carefully suppressed—"Well, did you ever! Who are they, for pity's sake? Has she ever been here before? Where are they from? Did you say it was an actress?" And all the heads slowly revolved on the craned necks as all the eyes turned to follow three new arrivals walk down the balcony.

Miss Esperanza O'Shea had often been stared at, but never to this extent. As a Californian, a beauty, and an heiress, she had known what it was to be looked upon with curiosity, admiration, and envy. But she had never before left her native State, hence she had never been subjected to the broad, unwinking stare of the cultured East. Nevertheless she bore it with the impassive aplomb of one born and bred in its fierce, bright glare, and, at the head of the family, walked slowly down the long verandah, the little cortège trotting at her heels, as it had done, figuratively speaking, ever since she had been old enough to walk at all.

Miss O'Shea invariably led her family in all things. She had done so since her tenderest years. Her papa, a big, florid, grizzled man, in a high grey hat and a loosely hanging grey suit, always obeyed Esperanza. As to her mamma, she was a Mexican, and though she had lived for twenty years under the shadow of the American flag, she had never been able to master the intricacies of the English language, and could, therefore, hardly be expected to guide the steps of her extremely self-confident daughter.

Close upon the musicians Miss O'Shea paused, her darkly circled eyes falling upon three vacant chairs. She indicated them with the gesture of one used to command, and her obedient parents silently seated themselves. Mr. O'Shea took off his hat, ran a fat, short-fingered hand through his grizzled hair, and inhaled the sea-air, then turned his eyes inward and made no sound.

Mrs. O'Shea, whom the lights revealed to be a dark, fat, waistless, formless lady, with ink-black hair and a moustache, the possession of which would have made the heart of an undergraduate sing, indulged in soft Spanish mutterings, and went to sleep with the promptitude of one who knows what is expected of a well-trained Spanish mother. Miss O'Shea alone remained alert and watchful, and gave the crowd stare for stare.

It was not surprising that a crowd should stare at this brilliant young lady. She was made up with an open and unblushing frankness that bespoke ignorance of the popular prejudice against this form of decoration. Rice powder was thick on the bridge of her nose. There was pink on her cheeks, and red on her lips.

Her hair, curled down to her eyebrows, was bleached a bright bronze-red; she was tall and well-formed, with square, broad shoulders and a good figure. Her foot, peeping from the hem of her skirt in a white kid slipper worked with gold, was by no means small. Neither were her hands, but they were white as milk, beautifully shaped and covered with superb rings. As for her dress, it was an indescribably gorgeous creation of white and gold, with a bodice of dead white suède braided from neck to waistline in gold arabesques. But neither paint, powder, nor bad dressing could hide that she was handsome and young.

"Where on earth has she come from?" breathed the crowd, with the wide eyes of lively amazement.

Had this query been put directly to Miss O'Shea, she would have answered with unruffled good humour that she had come straight from California for the purpose of "having a good time."

After a serious perusal of the papers, Esperanza O'Shea had come to the conclusion that Narragansett was the best place to go in pursuit of the vaguely specified good time. Moreover, it appeared to be a place where a dazzling wardrobe would meet with an intelligent appreciation. At breakfast one morning Esperanza announced her intention of spending the summer there.

"All right, Espy," said Mr. O'Shea, "I'll telegraph for rooms to-day."

"Si, si," murmured the Señora O'Shea, raising the heavy lids that once shaded the finest eyes in Mexico, and casting a sleepy glance at her daughter; "yez, cettanly, of cos," and then once more she relapsed into smiling somnolence.

The wardrobe did its work at Narragansett, if its work was to make its wearer stared at, talked about, and grudgingly admired. It was certainly a remarkable one. In a place of remarkable wardrobes it made its mark, had its own niche with the other wardrobes, and its share in the day's talk. Miss O'Shea wore it with an impassive front, and greatly enjoyed the sensation it created. As a wardrobe to be stared at it was a brilliant success. On its own ground none of the other wardrobes could compare with it. Arrayed in one of its masterpieces no one was as conspicuous, no one as gorgeous, no one, truth to tell, despite the powder and the paint, was as handsome as Esperanza O'Shea.

But there is admiration and admiration. The unsophisticated Esperanza had not grasped this fact. That the glances and stares of one of the most ill-bred crowds in the country were not all admiring, did not penetrate her simple mind for some time. That people were slow in extending the right hand of fellowship to her, she did feel with a slowly dawning, hurt surprise. It never occurred to her that any one could possibly object to making the acquaintance of a young lady because she had red-gold hair when Nature meant her to have dark brown, or because she plastered her lips with a crimson glue for all the world to see.

But Eastern folks were not very friendly. She announced this with the customary candour of the Californian to a lady who sat next her at table. The lady said: "No, they are not expansive," and then smiled and drifted out of the dining-room, and afterward proved to be one of the least expansive of the people toward whom Esperanza made friendly overtures.

Yes, they were very stiff. She sat in the Casino every evening with her papa and her mamma, and nobody came to talk to her. Up in the tower, with its stone supports black against the horizon, the red electric lights showed friendly, cheerful, merry people sitting in groups, and sometimes sipping cool drinks at the little round tables. Their laughter floated down and mingled with the faint washing of the waves on the rocks. They undoubtedly were having a good time.

Digitized by Google

So were the people on the balcony and the paved terrace, drawn together in little gay, chattering parties, from which the breeze bore scraps of sentences and the light, high laughter of women. Esperanza envied them with the pent-up intensity of her eighteen years. Silent, between her silent parents, she looked at the gay groups round her with her eyes full of a childish and pathetically candid envy.

"Don't seem to me, Espy," said her father suddenly, "as if you were having such a rattling good time."

"Well, not exactly, popper," she said, heaving up a great sigh from the bottom of her pensively covetous heart, "but may be I'll get there later."

The next evening the O'Shea party resolved to try a change, and ascended to the tower. It was even gayer than usual. Groups sat about at the round table, sipping chilled liquids in tall tumblers. A long steam yacht, which had run into port a few hours before, was now only vaguely distinguishable, but its lights pierced the darkness, moving with the moving swells. Its blue-coated, white-trousered yachtmen roamed the Casino, occasionally stopping to greet friends.

At ten o'clock the silent O'Sheas picked up their wraps and departed for their hotel, which was close by the Casino. But as they emerged from that building Esperanza, who had been struggling with her long cloak of white silk, discovered that she had carried away the cape of the lady who had been next her. She remembered having seen it on the chair beside her and recollected throwing her own cloak over it. Calling to her parents to go on, that she had forgotten something and would join them presently, she hurried back to the tower. But the lady and her friends had already gone.

Not finding its owner, Esperanza gave the cape to one of the waiters loitering about, then slowly retraced her steps toward the corridor. There were only a few people now left in the tower and the gallery, and these were mostly couples who had tucked themselves away in corners, and were enjoying murmured conversation. Miss O'Shea, smiling to herself, looked over the road to see if she could catch a glimpse of her parents, then trailed her long skirts of pale blue brocade along the passage to the stair-head.

As she reached this, a quick step on the verandah outside announced the approach of a man. Miss O'Shea dreamily speculated that he must have seen her as she walked down the gallery. With her fingers extended for the balustrade, she turned and saw him enter. He was a tall, handsome man, in the dark blue coat, white duck trousers, and blue-peaked cap of a yachtsman. He wore eyeglasses, and looked somewhere in the vicinity of thirty. His face, as he stood there looking at her, left upon her memory a lasting impression.

Then, as she extended her foot for the first step, he took off his hat and said, smiling:

"How do you do? Isn't it a lovely evening?"

She was startled and made vaguely uncomfortable by this unexpected address. Looking at him in frank astonishment she murmured a hesitating "Yes, lovely," and was about to continue her descent when he drew a step closer and said:

"Don't go back yet. Let's go into the tower and have an absinthe frappé."

Miss O'Shea stopped on the step and made no further attempt to descend. The words themselves made little impression on her. In the manner of the man lay the sting. Even Miss O'Shea, with her limited range of experience and her beautiful belief in mankind's invariably chivalrous intention, felt it.

And then she forgot the little—the very little—training she had ever received, forgot what Dr. Watts tells us of our hands not being made for the purpose of tearing out each other's eyes, forgot that the only weapon society allows a lady is her tongue, forgot what society says a lady is indeed, and what it maintains she should always be, and a great wave of fury swept over her. The fiery blood of Indian and Spaniard rushed into her face, the fierce spirit of her Castilian forefathers, who had conquered a world with Cortez, burst once more into life. With the closed fan in her hand she struck the smiling face a stinging blow. The fan-sticks snapped, the bronzed skin beneath them crimsoned. Smothering a furious ejaculation the man threw a hand up over his cheek and eye, and Miss O'Shea, panting and darkly flushed, swept down the stairs.

Then as she hurriedly descended, he, smarting with pain, his anger surging, hurled himself on the balustrade and looked over at her. All he saw was the top of her red-gold head, the wavering pulse of diamonds that trembled through her hair, the long sweep of her pale-blue dress, the ivory nape of her neck where the pearl necklace fastened with a sapphire clasp. The next moment she had passed out of sight, and he heard her rapid, decisive step on the balcony below.

He turned back, intending to watch her from the upper verandah, but in the doorway met a friend who accosted him with a jocular:

"Hullo, Beverwyk, what have you been running into?"

"Oh! I turned suddenly to look at that woman just go down the stairs and ran into that door; thought both doors were open—hurts like the dickens," returned the other glibly.

And arm-in-arm they passed down the verandah, talking together and laughing.

When Miss O'Shea got back to her hotel her breath had regained its usual evenness; her colour had gone down, but her eyes were brilliant under their lowered lids. Her father sat in the darkened sitting-room in his shirt-sleeves with his high hat on—his habitual costume when at ease in the house. When she came in, tossed her cloak on a chair, and stood silently pulling off her gloves, he regarded her for a moment or two, then said, as if the idea had just struck him:

"Where've you been all this time?"

"Oh, I just went back to return that lady's cape. I gave it to a waiter. It was all right." She tore off her gloves, and stretched and bent her plump fingers, turning round her rings.

"Look here, pop," she said, twisting the "marquise" on her little finger back into place, "I guess we'd better leave this place."

"Well, I think so, too," said the old man mildly. "Guess you don't like it much, Espy?"

"I don't belong here," she said with a sort of rough shyness. "I'm different."

The old man extended his hand and drew her up to him.

"You'll do," he said, fondly patting the velvety hand.

"May be I will for you," she answered with the same air of dogged embarrassment, "but I'm too different. It's not comfortable."

Whether Mr. O'Shea understood or not he queried no further. He patted the smooth hand in silence, then he said:

"Well—what do you want to do?"

"I want to go to Europe for a long time—a year. I want to know things. I don't want to be so different."

"Well, now, Espy," said the old man deprecatingly; then, as two soft arms went round his neck, he added: "But you can go if you want."

Two weeks later the O'Shea family sailed from New York on the Umbria.

Once arrived in the effete monarchies Miss Esperanza O'Shea went seriously, if a little blindly, to work to reconstruct herself. She went to school in Paris and stayed there all the winter, studying hard. Her companions showed no surprise at her presence. They had heard that she was an American from California, which in the effete monarchies explains many things.

Digitized by Google

In their refining society Miss O'Shea was gradually restored to her original self. Her red-gold locks went through as many changes as the dying dolphin, but at length arrived safely on the homeward path to the deep dark-brown of nature. She put away all the little pots of red and white that had made her dressing-table look like that of an old belle who dies hard. A very demure phœnix began to rise from the ashes of the once gorgeous Esperanza O'Shea.

With the native shrewdness of the women of the West who make their own positions and fight their own fortunes she was quick to see and adopt the style and manners of the young girls about her. By the spring the elaborate beauty who had created a sensation at the Narragansett Casino had passed from phase to phase of subduing process, and, compared to her old self, was as a wren to a peacock.

Instead of looking like a woman of thirty she now looked what she was—a girl of twenty—a tall, ivory-pale, velvet-eyed girl, with thick coils of smooth uncurled, dark hair, and a stately carriage, such as romance-writers are fond of ascribing to princesses. The Parisians thought her very foreign and picturesque. She looked like Doña Sol or Elvira. All she wanted was the dusky droop of the mantilla shadowing the warm pallor of her cheeks, a black curl on her temple, a red rose in her hair.

The elaborating process did not finish at Paris. Miss O'Shea took her family and a governess travelling. They "did" Europe, with couriers and libraries of books of travel, and a governess, who in some embarrassment called herself "a companion." They studied art in Italy, and music in Germany. The governess was almost worked to death, but the pupil, insatiable in her desire to be as ornate as the young person of any place or any country, would permit no respite. They met a good many people, too. Miss O'Shea began to be spoken of as the great beauty and heiress of the American colonies of different capitals.

A tall, ivory pale, velvet-eyed girl.

French noblemen whom she had never seen wrote to her offering her their hearts, hands, and coronets. English noblemen followed her about, meditating proposals, but German noblemen generally proposed to her on the first meeting. Before her return to New York, after a three years' absence, her coming was heralded with a flourish of newspaper trumpets that crowded into small type in an obscure corner the arrival of Herr Glumberg, the most eminent of German anthropologists, who crossed in the same steamer.

As the immortal Begum would say, the O'Sheas were "took up" in New York. That metropolis is always glad to know any one who has met with the approval of the effete monarchies. It had heard of the foreign nobleman, and it immediately proceeded to light its taper before the same shrine.

Miss O'Shea was pronounced a very wonderful young woman, perfect in her style, distinguée, singularly simple, sweet and fine and true. Such a dazzling creature had never before come out of the West. She knew everything, spoke half a dozen languages, played on musical instruments—rumour wasn't sure that she didn't play two at the same time Her parents came in for a little of the general approbation.

Society characterised Mrs. O'Shea as a most cultivated woman, and when she fell asleep before its eyes said that "her manner was marked by a truly Southern repose."

But the crown of the O'Sheas' glory was reached when it became evident that Beverwyk Van Duyvil had succumbed to the charms of the beautiful Esperanza. To understand what this really meant one ought to know that Beverwyk Dan Duyvil was the last of the Dan Duyvils—that illustrious family which, tradition says, was one of the few families that before settling in New Amsterdam enjoyed distinction in the mother country. The Van Duyvils had never been butchers or bakers, or even shoemakers. There was, therefore, nothing left for them to be but gentlemen of leisure or governors.

The last representative of this honourable race was very rich, very much of a person, not a cotillon-leader or a ball-organiser, but a man of parts and position. And now he sighed at a pair of Californian feet that had once run brown and bare on the dusty by-roads about Merced.

Even old O'Shea was flattered in his pride. His sturdy democratic heart could not subdue a throb of vanity when he thought that the sole survivor of the house of O'Shea—recently discovered to be descended from the kings of Waterford—should mate with the last representative of the house of Van Duyvil. The only person who remained haughtily indifferent was the young lady herself. She was distant and cold to her suitor, rarely spoke of him, made excuses not to see him, was out when he called. It would not have been strange if Beverwyk Van Duyvil had felt discouraged by the attitude of his lady fair.

But to be a Van Duyvil means more things than to be merely great and illustrious. It means to possess a self-confidence that earthquakes cannot shake. That the young lady was cold and unresponsive proved to Beverwyk Van Duyvil that she was a trifle more original than the scions of the first families whom he had heretofore honoured with his regard. It was meet that a future Van Duyvil should hold herself high.

When he finally asked her to marry him this most difficult task was accomplished with truly graceful tact and admirable manner. Beverwyk Dan Duyvil proposed, as he did everything else, with perfectly finished grace. It must be admitted that, of the two, the descendant of the lordly Dutchman was more self-possessed and agreeable than the descendant of the Milesian kings.

Miss Esperanza O'Shea received the flattering offer in ungracious and frowning silence which may be peculiar to kings but is not accounted charming in beautiful young Californians. Then, as Van Duyvil attempted to take her hand and press it gently between his own, she abruptly withdrew the member, and fixing on him a pair of darkly angry eyes, said: "I will send you your answer to-morrow." And without waiting for him to reply, she rose and walked away, not looking back, leaving him to follow with his eyes her graceful figure as she passed down the long room, and to sit silent, absently drawing his gloves through his hand in pleasing meditations.

The next afternoon, when Beverwyk arrived from down-town in his apartments, he found a package awaiting him. It was long and narrow, wrapped in paper, and directed in the small round hand of Miss O'Shea. He opened it, puzzled. From the unrolled paper dropped a fan of pale blue-painted gauze, with four of its sticks snapped in two. Round the broken sticks was twisted a piece of paper, on which was written:

"For the second time Mr. Van Duyvil has made a mistake.
ESPERANZA O'SHEA."

NOW ON SALE. NOW ON SALE.

Part I. of

PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO

OF

FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES.

Price Sixpence.

NO COUPON NECESSARY.

Give an order to your Newsagent for this at once. It is the most delightful Art Album ever published. It would cost you a small fortune to buy separately the photos we shall present in this series. We give you 20 or 30 for sixpence in each part.

Digitized by Google

THE MAIDEN'S THREE GIFTS

A POOR woman gave birth to a daughter.

On the third day after its birth three fairies came to visit the mother, and seeing how beautiful the infant was, they promised it three good gifts.

The first fairy, touching it with her golden wand, said: "The day that she is twelve years old a rose shall fall from her mouth every time she laughs."

The second fairy then touched it with her golden wand: "The day that she is twelve years old," she said, "every time she weeps pearls shall fall from her eyes."

And lastly the third fairy with her golden wand also touched her, saying: "Before your eighteenth year has passed a prince shall marry you, and you shall become a princess."

The mother listened to all these promises and her heart rejoiced exceedingly. She was very poor, but she brought up her daughter as well as she could until she was twelve years of age. The evening of the day on which she completed her twelfth year the girl laughed right out with joy at something which her mother had said and immediately the first rose fell from her lips, and when the mother saw it she remembered all the fairies had promised, and her motherly heart rejoiced, for she said, "If one promise be fulfilled the others will surely follow in their turn."

It was winter, and the queen was going to give a great ball at the palace. She had a beautiful gown and it was rose colour, so she wanted to have some real roses on her head and at her breast to wear with it. She therefore ordered the royal gardener to bring her some, but he said that so much snow had fallen that all the roses were spoilt, and that he could not find even one. The queen was very angry at this, and told him straightway that she did not believe him, but that he preferred to leave them to perish in the royal garden, adding that she should go and seek for herself another gardener and dismiss him forthwith.

The poor gardener sighed upon hearing this, and went to look at every garden far and near to see if he could possibly find any roses, but he found none. In the course of his wanderings he happened to pass by the cottage in which dwelt the poor woman and her daughter.

The gardener was so bewildered by his anxiety that he did not see where he was going, and never observing a stone that was lying before the cottage, he stumbled over it and fell down. There was something comical in the way in which he fell, for he did not hurt himself, but his fez rolled off his head into the mud.

The girl, who was looking out of the window, could not help laughing when she saw the gardener fall, and down dropped a rose from her mouth and fell into the road right in front of the gardener. When she saw what had occurred she felt a little bit ashamed, and drew back to hide herself, but the gardener, as soon as he saw it, never stayed to pick up his fez but ran quickly to seize the rose. He could not believe his own eyes. How did it come there? Perhaps it was done by magic. Anyhow, it was a real and beautiful rose, and smelt better than those of April; but one rose was of no use to the queen. He must have ten, and where could he find the others?

So without any more ado he knocked at the door, which the mother immediately opened, "Well, my good man, what do you want?" she asked.

And then he told her all about the queen and the ball, and how he had suddenly found a rose outside her house, when he was almost in a state of despair. After the mother heard all this, she said: "Take this one then, and go to the queen, and tell her that there is only one rose tree which is able to produce such roses, and that on the day of the ball I will cut some and take her as many as she desires."

When the day of the ball arrived the queen ordered the gardener to fetch both the woman and the roses, and about noon the mother arrived at the palace, bringing with her a covered basket, and, after she had saluted her Majesty, she uncovered it and presented the roses to her.

"Madam," said the queen, "I have a favour to ask of you. Sell me the rose tree which bears these roses."

But the mother answered, "Much honoured queen, I cannot do this with my rose tree. I cannot sell it. Only one thing I can do if you are willing. You have a prince, and I will bestow it on the prince, to have it for his own, and to keep it honoured and loved as if it were a living princess."

"Your wish shall be granted, madam, so that we may only have the rose tree in the palace; and you may come with it, and live near us also."

"May God grant you a long life, my queen. Come by yourself to-morrow, and take away the rose tree from my house."

The next morning the queen lost no time before going to secure the rose tree. When the prince heard of the agreement which his mother had made with the woman he jumped for joy and got a golden vase ready in the palace in which the rose tree was to be planted. The queen and prince went together in a golden chariot and, stopping before the humble cottage where the mother dwelt, they alighted.

As soon as the mother and daughter went out to receive the royal visitors the daughter, as she bent down to kiss the queen's hand, smiled merely from a grateful feeling, and a rose fell from her mouth.

At one and the same moment the queen and the prince understood it all. The queen became very angry because she remembered directly that she was bound by her oath to receive the girl as a daughter-in-law. She turned, however, to look at her again, when she saw that the girl was really so very beautiful and so very good that without a moment's longer reserve she threw her arms around her, saying aloud as she kissed her, "You are a poor girl no longer, but a princess henceforth. You shall come and live in our palace, you and your mother also."

"Now that it has all turned out exactly as you wished it," she added, addressing the mother, "tell me, lady co-mother-in-law, how your daughter acquired so great a charm as to shower roses from her mouth whenever she laughs."

The mother immediately told her all about the fairies and their three promised gifts to her daughter when she was an infant and how the first and the last promise had both come true.

"The second has not taken place, then," said the queen with some curiosity; "how was it that did not happen? for poor as you were, had pearls fallen from her eyes you could have sold them."

"That did not happen," answered the mother, "because I never made her weep. I sought only to see her happy and smiling, preferring to live poor in my daughter's gladness than to become rich by her grief."

When the queen heard these words she embraced and kissed her, saying, "You have indeed been a good mother, and it is an honour to a queen to become connected with you."

The girl, who had listened to all that her mother had said, was now so overcome by emotion that her eyes filled with tears and two large pearls rolled down. The prince stooped to pick them up.

"These are not tears of sorrow," he said; "they are tears of joy. I will take them and have them made into earrings and you shall wear them on the day on which you become my princess."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

WHAT AILED THE FIRE?

The cool weather of autumn was come. After sunset there was really a frosty feel in the air. "We had better make up a little fire in the grate to-night," said my wife; "it's chilly sitting here without." "Yes," said I, "let us make the fire now." So I went at it, putting on plenty of dry wood and coals enough to light up nicely. But it was no use—the fire wouldn't burn. It would just spit and sputter and make a smudge fit to put your eyes out. We gave it up and went to bed early. Next morning I investigated and found the chimney nearly closed with swallows' nests. The wood was right, the coal was right, but the draught wasn't. I evicted the swallows, and cleared away their habitations. Result: Next night a good fire and pure air. Dear me! such a simple thing is hardly worth telling, is it?

Perhaps not, but here is our friend, Mr. Joseph Smith, who talks like this: "I had no relish for my meals," he says. Now, why not? The meals were good, he had time to eat, he needed the refreshment food would give him; but all the same he hesitated as though meat, potatoes, tarts, &c., were things to look out for and guard against. This was not his habit; not at all. He and his meals had always been on the best of terms until September, 1891. Then they fell out. He speaks of it thus: "I took a chill in harvest time, and seemed to lose all power and energy. I couldn't imagine what had come over me. There was a bad, coppery taste in my mouth, and what little I did eat gave me pain at the chest and side. I was constantly spitting up a sour fluid and belching wind. After a while my breath got short, and I was so weak I could scarcely walk across the floor. In a few weeks I lost nearly two stone in weight. I consulted two doctors, but was none the better for the medicines they gave me. They didn't appear to know what ailed me. One of them said, 'The sooner you get into the infirmary the better.'

"On the strength of this I obtained a recommendation, and in November, 1891, I went to the Lincoln Infirmary. After being there seven weeks I returned home as bad as ever. But I am glad I went to Lincoln, nevertheless, for there I met a friend who advised me to give up taking drugs and doctors' stuff and, instead, to try Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I got a bottle from Mr. Sharp, the chemist, and in a few days I had some appetite, my food agreed with me, and my breathing was easier. After that I went straight ahead, gradually getting stronger and stronger, and all the credit of my recovery is due to Siegel's Syrup. If you think fit you are at liberty to publish the facts in my case. Yours truly, (Signed) Joseph Smith, Rectory Street, Epworth, via Doncaster, December 23rd, 1892."

Mr. Sharp, the chemist named by Mr. Smith, remembers the latter's illness, and can vouch for the accuracy of his statement.

After having read our friend's plain and clearhcaded letter, we need hardly ask again why he had no relish for his meals. The reason is the stomach, afflicted with indigestion and dyspepsia, sore, torpid, and inflamed, was in no condition to handle food. The more it received, the worse off it was. It was like our fire under the choked chimney—the more coals the more smoke and smudge. So the oppressed stomach sent up word to the palate, "Don't give me any more material to work on; I can do nothing with it." On this the palate spoiled its owner's appetite (in his own interest), and waited for help.

The help came, finally, in the form of Mother's Seigel's Curative Syrup, which put the digestive machine in order again. Then the stomach telegraphed to the palate, "Turn on the appetite and send down the food; am now in shape to attend to business."

As to Mr. Smith's chill in the harvest field, that came because his blood was poisoned by the indigestion, not from cold. People often freeze to death without a sign of what we call a "chill." Fires don't go out because the weather is cold.

Digitized by Google

TITULAR EVIDENCE AND ADVICE.

"The Anchor's Weighed" in the "Bay of Biscay" with a supply of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Skipper" and "The Midshipmite" would be "Anchored" but for ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Simon the Cellarer," after "Drinking," takes ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Annie Laurie" felt annoyed "When Other Lips" consumed her ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Village Blacksmith" advised "Daisy Bell" to use ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Old English Gentleman" gave each of "The Hundred Pipers" a box of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"All's Well" when you have a supply of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"I know a Bank" whereon "My Pretty Jane" sat and took two ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Old Folks at Home" have "Golden Days," thanks to ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"In Happy Moments," "After the Ball," do not forget to take ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Maggie Murphy's Home," "On the Banks of Allan Water," always possesses a box of ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Last Rose of Summer" will fade from your cheeks without ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"John Peel" was made "Ruddier than the Cherry" by using ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Vicar of Bray" and "Father O'Flynn" could do, could do with ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"A Boy's best Friend is his Mother" when she doses him with ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"We may be happy yet" by simply taking a few of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Should he upbraid," then give him ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Holy Friar" and "The Monks of Old" all chant the praises of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Children's Home" is not "Home, sweet Home" without ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Life let us cherish," and this can best be done by using ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Minstrel Boy" sang "Come into the Garden, Maud," and take ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"There's nae luck about the hoose" without ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Robin Adair" was completely "Stranded" until he took ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Has Sorrow thy young days shaded?" then have recourse to ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Miner" and "The Four Jolly Smiths" swear by ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Oh! Willie brewed a peck o' Maut," but in the morning he required ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Old Brigade" are made as "Trusty as Steel" by the use of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"She wandered down the mountain side" to buy ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

BEECHAM'S MUSIC PORTFOLIO.

"NO CHRISTMAS MERRY WITHOUT IT."

Just Published, Volume 7, containing—

"After the Ball," "Distant Voices o'er the Sea," "The Cat came Back," "McSorley's Twins," "The Ivy Green," "Bridal March" (from Lohengrin), "As Pants the Hart," "The Lost Chord," "The Hazel Dell," "Oh, Dem Golden Slippers," "Isle of Beauty," "Banks o' Loch Lomond," "Sweet Genevieve," "Washington Post March," "Two Little Girls in Blue," "Jessie, the Flower o' Dunblane," "Starlight," "Weep no More," "Pretty Birdie," "Little Blue Eyes Waltz," "Not Yet," "The Dear Old Home," "Molly Brown," "Marguerite," "The Moon Behind the Hill," "Only a Sweet Little Letter," "Heavenwards," "Heavenward March," "Sweet Marie," March from Tannhauser.

Price (below Cost) 2d. per Volume; per Post, 3d. Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 are also on Sale.

Order through your Local Chemist, Stores, or Newsagent, or send remittance for the Volumes you require to—

THOMAS BEECHAM (Proprietor of BEECHAM'S PILLS), ST. HELEN'S, LANCASHIRE.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 310.] FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 8, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

IF YOU INTEND TO BUY

Buy New Carpets at the Price of Old.

It would be ridiculous to buy old carpets, old designs, shop-worn, out-of-date goods, when you can purchase a stylish GENUINE, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE TRIUMPH CARPET suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., for

4/- Each. 4s. Postal Order or 50 Stamps, 4/- Each.

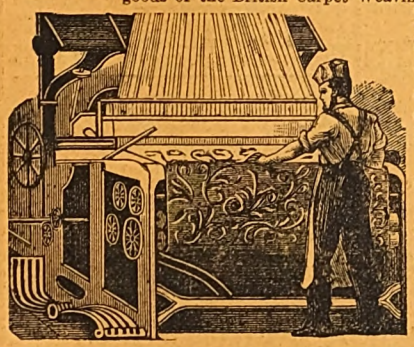
handsomely bordered and woven in fifty different patterns and colourings, to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY-SIZED ROOM. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, below the actual cost of production. Thousands have already been sold at almost double above prices.



With every carpet we shall supply a very handsome Rug to match, for 1s. 3d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER—Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9s. 6d.; Four Carpets and Four Rugs for 18s.; Eight Carpets and Eight Rugs for 35s.

Money willingly returned if not approved.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value."

Hundreds of unsolicited testimonials are being received from delighted purchasers who have had these carpets in use for years.

Stafford Road Post Office, Wolverhampton. M. A. Dudley, writes:—"Having purchased two of your Carpets between three and four years ago, I am thoroughly satisfied, and have recommended them to several people, who I know have tried them, and are equally satisfied."

65, Abbey Street, Nuneaton, Warwickshire. "Mrs. Bostock will thank the British Carpet Weaving Co. to send her one of their Carpets, for which she encloses postal order. She has had one of these Carpets in constant wear for some years now, and finds it the best wearing and cheapest carpet she can get."

Do not miss this opportunity, it may not occur again.

CARPET ORDER FORM.
On receipt of this order form, and Postal Order or stamps, we guarantee to send any goods, as above, to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Money returned if not approved.
(Signed) THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

All orders despatched in rotation same day as received. Cheques and Postal orders to be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Secretary, and crossed "UNION BANK." Address—

The British Carpet Weaving Company,
31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY
The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.
Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.
SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

A HAIR PIN WITHOUT POINTS HAS GOOD POINTS!!!

SEE THE POINT?

Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES, BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

XMAS FOR 1/3

Chest of Tea Included. (See below.)

"A HAPPY THOUGHT HAS STRUCK US," that we should like to make the readers of SHORT STORIES an extra special parcel of Christmas Cards. Simply plainly write nothing else but your name and address on the top of a piece of paper and the words "SHORT STORIES AUTOMATIC OWL PARCEL," and post it with Postal Order 1s. 3d., or 16 Stamps. And we will send per return, post paid on approval, all the following described Xmas Novelties. Notice, we send the parcel on approval. We do not hesitate to do this as we know "AS A MATTER OF FACT" that the first 3 Articles are worth the money. If you like the parcel, keep it. If not, return it, and we will return your money in full, and don't think any fairer offer can be made, do you? We are making up several thousands of parcels, as the demand must and will be great, and we shall not disappoint any one reader, as our stock is enormous, hence this great offer. Write any day before Xmas, but as early as possible. All Cards have choice and seasonable wishes. Sufficient to post to friends and to decorate mantelpieces, to make the home bright for Xmas, will be found in each parcel as follows: A Sweetly Pretty Automatic Double Card, of a country scene—from the centre of a large tree is suspended a swing on which is seated a Pretty Little Girl, and a Little Boy in a Sailor's Suit is standing on the Swing. This really wonderful piece of workmanship, when stood up, works itself, without any winding with a key, the children swing happily to and fro, as if by machinery almost. The retail value of this one card alone we consider 6d. Another good Automatic Card is the "LIFE-LIKE FLYING OWL," marvellous mechanism, when stood up its large brown eyes blink at you, and its wings flutter up and down, without a key, again it works itself, value 6d. A Lovely Double Folding Card, with pretty gilt or silver flowers, fancy edge and open work, 6d. A Lovely Silver-Edged Art-Tinted Card, with natural-like primroses, and ivy leaves, wishes and verses in gilt, 6d. A Pretty Pale Blue Tinted Card, silver-edged, with lovely white flowers and leaves, 6d. A Wonderful Mechanical Standing Card—at one side is a pair of steps, which open to stand up, and then is seen "Father Frog" sitting at the foot smoking a pipe, and two young frogs are running up the steps; at the side is the large bird (a stork) gracefully watching the frogs' antics, 4d. A Pretty Fancy Cut-out Snow Scene Card of trees, bridge, houses, church, &c., with lights in the windows 4d. A Lovely Card, with pretty heliotrope flowers and artistic basket work pattern, 3d. A Pretty Gilt-edged Card, with pretty art-shaded ferns and flowers in gilt, pink, and blue, 3d. A Card Representing a Chest of Tea, the lid opens, showing the tea, and a good Xmas wish, 2d. Dear Old Father Xmas Folding Card. Father Xmas is standing beside a donkey laden with presents for the children; in the background is seen a lovely sky, with numerous bright stars; one, being very brilliant, throws its rays across the whole scene, 3d. A Pretty Cut-out Card, with Pretty Sparkling Jewelled Flowers, tied together with Gilt Cords and Tassels, 2d. Besides all the above are Given Six more Pretty Xmas Cards, value 1d. to 3d each, all Good Designs, and also Two SPECIAL OFFERS, which we Guarantee to Equally Benefit Each and Every Receiver of a Parcel. Our Motto is, "A BIG TRADE, NOT A BIG PROFIT." Established 1889. This is the Cheapest and Best Lot of Genuine Art Novelties Ever Offered in or out of England, we know. Remember, all Parcels are Sent on Approval. Address, MESSRS. PAIN BROTHERS, WHOLESALE "ART TRADERS," HASTINGS.

BLUSHING

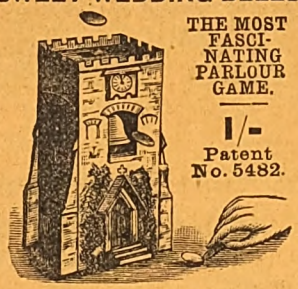
permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc, Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each. Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.



THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. Herbal Institute, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.

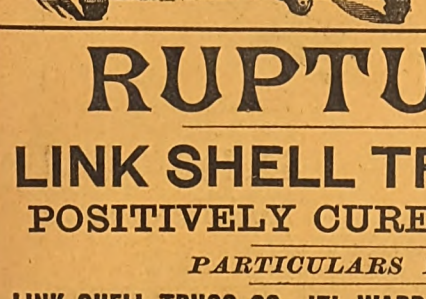
For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."

EASY PAYMENTS

WITH EXPRESSION STOP

ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.



Plays hymns, popular airs, quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, hornpipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by any one. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30s. Terms 4s. deposit and 4s. monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.

Write for list of music and full particulars.

(Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER,
Organette Works, Blackburn.

TO ADVERTISERS

Wishing to reach families, a Test Advertisement in Short Stories will bring profitable results. Scale of charges as follows:—

Front Page, £12 10s. per insertion
Back or Inside, £10 per insertion
Per Inch, 5s. per insertion ...

} Less 5 per cent. for 13 times. „ 10 per cent. for 26 times.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "Tobacconists' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. Estimates Free.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. Horn, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

If you have

ECZEMA

OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" gives relief, and a few more applications effect a cure.

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.
Book on the Skin and Diet free.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. S.," 87, Strand, London. Mention Short Stories.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
OBSTINATE CASES,
NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD
RELIEF,
GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.
No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—
"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.
A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.
Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.
Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS

FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street, Liverpool.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

RUPTURE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)

POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.

PARTICULARS FREE.

LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 310.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 8, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

My Cousin from the Bush

(This Story has been written up from the plot which secured the Prize in the recent Plot Competition.)

"RANDON GRANGE, SEDLEY,
"August 25th, 1892.

"MY DEAR FRANK,—I don't suppose there is any necessity for me or anyone else, to remind you you are due here on the 1st, and so I don't write this with that object, but simply to put the circumstances under which you are about to visit us plainly before you, so that there may be no mistakes or misunderstandings which might lead to unpleasantness and heartburnings hereafter. You know already that my niece and ward, and your cousin, Violet Lennox, has come back from Australia an orphan, and fairly well provided with pin-money, but not by any means rich or even what I daresay you would call well off; by this I mean to say that, matrimonially speaking, she is not a catch in the pecuniary light in which the business is looked at nowadays. As for herself, as I have told you already, she is a very pretty girl, well brought up, and well educated; in fact a girl that would do credit to any man's home. Having said this much I must now tell you of a rather curious provision in my father's will which puts me into an equally curious position with regard to this young lady. He left the Grange property and the bulk of his fortune to me as the elder son subject to two conditions. I was to pay my brother Tom an income of £800 a year out of the estate during his life or mine, and if I died childless, and he had children, the property was to go to his eldest child, who was to be my ward. This is why I have not been able to do as, if I had been a free agent, I should have done—make you my heir. I have left you what I could and that with the income which you are earning by your own talents and industry will, I think, make you pretty comfortable when I am gone.

"Now as I can't leave the property to you, and as the idea of any man not belonging to the old stock some day reigning over it is absolutely hateful to me, there is only one other way of getting out of the difficulty and keeping the property in the family: you must come down here and devote yourself seriously to the task of falling in love with your cousin, and bringing her in the same state of mind with regard to yourself. If you can do that everything will go well and as merrily as the marriage-bells which I hope to hear ringing for you at Randon before I die. I say 'must,' but, of course, my dear boy, you understand what that means, and also what I mean by writing this way to you. If you have already made your choice, or if there are any other reasons that make it impossible for you to fall in with my wishes, you have only to say so, and my little scheme must fall to the ground. I don't want you to make any mere marriage of convenience for my sake, so if you can't come heart-whole and prepared to fall in love on such provocation as Miss Violet may be pleased to give you, say so without hesitation, and either come as if you were paying an ordinary visit or put your visit off just as seems best to you; but, remember, whichever, course you take, I am always,

"Your affectionate uncle,
"PERCIVAL LENNOX.

"P.S.—The partridges are in splendid form and promising abundance, so if you do come you will have plenty of work for your gun."

This was the letter that I found waiting for me at my rooms in town on my return from a month's cruise in a friend's yacht round the Channel Islands and the coast of Brittany. To say the very least of it, it was an interesting communication for a man rising twenty-seven to receive from one of the best old uncle's that ever was blessed with a nephew.

To make one or two points rather more clear, I ought to say that I am the son of old Sir Percival's only sister who was disinherited by her father, whose fine old crusted Toryism had been irrevocably outraged by her marrying a clever and good-looking young civil engineer, instead of a brother baronet old enough to be her father who owned many broad acres in Blankshire adjoining the Lennox estate. It was for this reason that old Sir Ralph had so arranged matters in his will that the bulk of the fortune and the estate, which was unentailed, should be removed as far as possible from my mother and her childen.

I had followed in my father's professional footsteps, and thanks to his excellent training and the connection I inherited from him, I was quite independent of the Lennox estate even without the £500 a year which Sir Percival had allowed me since I came of age and which, as he had told me, he had secured to me by will out of the property that he had inherited from his mother. This was all he could do to repair the injustice which his father had done in his will. But now he evidently considered that the Fates had given him an opportunity of going into partnership with them, and playing the rôle of fairy godfather, by bringing the ill-natured intentions of his crusty old father to naught without doing injustice to anyone.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

A slight, graceful figure seated on the driving-seat.

As for me, heart-whole and fancy free as I was, neither better nor worse than the average man of my class, the prospect, if a trifle out of the common was, I must confess, by no means an unpleasant one, and if any vague ideas about sacrificing myself and my bachelor freedom for the good of the old family, and the satisfaction of the best of uncles, flitted through my mind, the gentle glow of virtue to which they gave rise was made still more pleasant by the brief but satisfactory description that Sir Percival's letter gave of my unknown cousin from Australia.

I admit, also, that the eyes of an exceedingly virtuous person, who had never been subjected to the same temptation, might have seen a mercenary element in the intentions of a man deliberately making up his mind to, if possible, fall in love with a pretty cousin who had it in her power to make him master of a fine old estate which had been in his family for thirteen or fourteen generations. Possibly, too, if I had been the hero of a penny novelette, I should either have been already devoted to a fair and virtuous milliner's assistant, who was the sole support of her widowed mother and crippled sister, or else I should have replied to my good old uncle's letter in a strain of lofty and quite unnatural disinterestedness, and told him that not even broad acres or a pretty cousin, nor yet even both combined, could unbend that stiff-necked rectitude to which the mere suspicion of a marriage of convenience was utterly abhorrent.

As it was, being just an average professional man, whom his associates were wont to call somewhat hard-headed, I found the prospect by no means unpleasant. If my pretty cousin was as heart-whole as I was, then, other things being equal, I hadn't the slightest objection to getting into a suitable frame of mind for meeting the fate which was coming to me in such a pleasant guise. I didn't even wait to write. I just sat down and smoked one pipe over the letter, and then wired to Sir Percival—"Expect me thirty-first. Hope to be able to meet your wishes." And so the die was cast.

I concluded, of course, that Violet herself—I got to call her Violet in my soliloquies within five minutes after sending the telegram—would be in a state of blissful ignorance of the trap that was being so cunningly and so amiably laid for her unwary footsteps. This added a delightful element of uncertainty and almost of romance to the situation. Granted that I went down to Randon ready to melt into that mentally flaccid condition known as being in love at her first smile, would she believe that I had fallen in love at first sight, or only think that I was making a fool of myself?

If I was too precipitate she might think that I was just making use of her for purposes of amusement; if I was too tardy, Sir Percival might think I was playing him false, and then, worse than all, there was the danger that I might go and see and be conquered in all honesty of purpose, while she might enjoy the fun of bringing me to her feet only to tell me in the end that she could never be anything more to me than a cousin. Evidently the situation that I was about to face was one in which it behoved me to walk with wary feet and with open eyes. Although I have only the average allowance of sentiment, I am not ashamed to admit that I dreamt of her every night, and that my dreams invested her with such a pleasant personality that as the train slowed down to run into the little station at Randon, my usually well-regulated heart was actually beating fourteen and fifteen to the dozen. One of my uncle's men was on the platform and came forward to open the door, touching his hat as the train stopped.

"Morning, sir!" he said as I alighted. "Glad to see you again, sir. Sir Percival's compliments, and he hopes you'll excuse him coming down to meet you as his foot's been giving him a bit of trouble lately and he's saving himself up for to-morrow. Miss Violet's drove over for you in the dog-cart and the bay mare. Rare whip she is, too, sir. Drives as if she'd been born to it. Learnt it in *Horse*tralia, I suppose."

"Very probably, Thomson," I said rather jerkily. "How long have you been thinking of that joke?"

"Joke, sir? No, sir—fact I can assure you," replied the worthy Thomson with a stolidly puzzled look on his well-trained features. "Young lady drives uncommon well. Might have been born with ribbons in her hand."

"Might she, really!" I said, looking rather anxiously to where the well-known dog-cart and bay mare stood on the other side of the low, white palings. "Well, then, take my Gladstone and tell them to send the rest of the luggage up and I'll go and introduce myself."

I believe I did introduce myself in something like proper form, but all I remember of the ceremony is a vision of a slight, graceful figure seated on the driving-seat, a pair of soft laughing brown eyes looking down from under a broad-brimmed and pleasantly unfashionable hat, and the firm clasp of a strong little hand gloved to perfection. It was about two miles and a half to the Grange and I remember that we got there in an absurdly short space of time. Dear old Sir Percival met us on the doorstep, and when Violet disappeared to take off her hat he took me into the breakfast-room and, putting his hand on my shoulder, looked inquiringly at me and said:

"Well, my boy, you are looking very well, but a trifle flushed. It isn't very hot out of doors, is it?"

"Oh, no; it's cool enough," I said laughing, perhaps a trifle nervously; "but the fact of it is I'm afraid I'm in for an attack of heart disease, and that affects the circulation you know."

"Eh? What? Heart disease! Hang it all, my boy, you don't mean that, surely? Eh? Oh, you young rascal, that's it, is it? You caught it between here and the station, did you? Well, I can't say I hope you'll get better. In fact, I tell you plainly I shall be disappointed if you don't get worse. But, come now, frankly, what do you think of her?"

"I haven't thought at all yet, uncle. She hasn't given me time to. It really seems quite too good to be true—that is, of course, if she——"

Digitized by Google

"Ah, yes, of course," interrupted the old gentleman. "That's the unknown quantity you've got to find out. As far as I have been able to see, there is no one else in the question, so you've got a clear course before you. You're riding to win, and you must make the running. But now is there anything you want to ask me before the campaign begins?"

"It has begun," I said, in so serious a voice that I laughed at myself the next minute, "and the first shot has gone very much home; but I should like to know whether or not Miss Lennox has any idea, well, that my visit here has any other object than the slaughter of partridges."

"Certainly not," said Sir Percival. "I'm rather too old a hand to scare the game in that way. Violet knew that she had a cousin who comes here to shoot every year, and that you were coming this year. And that's all she knew. I have carefully refrained singing your praises or doing anything that might prejudice her against you, and from her conversation I shouldn't even think that her poor father had told her anything very definite about her actual position here. She knows, of course, that she is my ward, and as such has expectations, but I think that's all, so if the conspiracy isn't a brilliant success I'm afraid you'll have nobody but yourself to thank for it."

"There shall be no failure if I can help it, I can tell you," I replied. "Quite apart from external reasons, for if she hadn't a penny in the world I should consider myself a fool not to try and win her now I've seen her."

"A very satisfactory sentiment," said Sir Percival with a chuckle, "especially as matters stand. Now be off and wash your hands and shake down into your room. Lunch will be ready in half an hour."

There is not the slightest necessity for me to dwell on the various stages by which I reached the point I knew I was destined for, as soon as I had set eyes on the fair face of my cousin Violet; nor yet need I expatiate, as I could very easily do, on the mental and physical charms which so speedily reduced me to a state of helpless, but by no means unpleasant slavery. I went to bed the first night with aggravated symptoms, and I got up worse, and naturally the longer the aggravating cause continued to act the more serious became the symptoms of the malady which was its effect.

What made matters still more serious for me was the fact that for the life of me I couldn't tell whether or not there was any chance of the only possible cure being applied. Violet was as tantalising as she was delightful; two qualities by no means infrequently found in a girl who is at once very pretty and very "nice," and knows it. She was everything that was pleasant and kind and cousinly, but after I had been living under the same roof with her for a fortnight, I was forced to confess to Sir Percival that I had not the slightest reason to believe myself in any degree favoured beyond other men.

Professional matters, meanwhile, made my return to town necessary, and I had to say good-bye to Violet until Christmas. The night before my departure Sir Percival managed to arrange matters so that Violet and I were the sole occupants of the drawing-room just after dinner.

I felt that my time had come. Unless I was to make a complete fool of myself and grievously disappoint my excellent old uncle, I must say something, and that to the point. Not a formal declaration and proposal, for to do that after only a fortnight's acquaintance would be to give my beloved the enemy a loophole of escape which I didn't propose to leave open, and so, taking advantage, with what skill my inward agitation permitted, of a somewhat formal expression of regret at my departure, and a hope that we should meet again at Christmas, I screwed my courage up to the sticking point and told her in so many words that my coming depended entirely upon the kind of welcome I might expect from her. Of course, she saw my meaning at a glance, and you may imagine my feelings when I saw just the faintest perceptible flush creep up into her bonny cheeks and heard her say:—

"Glad to see you again? Yes, of course I shall be! Perhaps even just a tiny bit more glad than I was to see you this time. Now if you don't mind we'll change the subject till——"

"Till Christmas," I said, looking her in the eyes and holding out my hand.

Her eyes dropped suddenly, and I felt her hand tremble ever so little as she put it into mine. I never made so great an effort in my life as I did then to keep from picking her up in my arms and kissing her, and taking all the rest for granted, and if I had known how long the three months or so between then and Christmas were going to be I believe I should have done so, and risked the consequences.

However, Christmas came in due course, and my welcome was so far satisfactory that I felt pretty certain I should go back to town a doomed man; in fact, I determined to let the shortest interval compatible with decency elapse before making finally certain of my fate. Still the course of true love never does run quite smooth, although one would have thought that in our case every possible precaution had been taken to make it do so.

One night two or three days after my arrival I happened to be coming back from a lonely stroll in the park, a stroll which I had, in fact, taken for the sole purpose of arranging with myself the time, place, and terms of the declaration that was to finally settle my fate, when I happened to glance in through the window of the dining-room. The lights were lit and the table was laid, but the blinds had not been drawn down, and so I could see everything in the room distinctly.

I stopped for a moment admiring the contrast between the cosy lighted room and the bleakness of the leafless park sprinkled here and there with patches of the newly fallen snow, and, as I stood looking in, the door opened and Violet came in shutting it behind her. I went nearer to the window to get a better view of her, half intending to open the French window and surprise her, but before I had taken half-a-dozen strides I stopped rooted to the ground with sudden horror at what I saw.

She took up the decanter.

Digitized by Google

Violet, after carefully closing the door behind her and taking, as I thought, a hurried glance round the room, went to my uncle's seat at the head of the table, and taking the stopper out of a little decanter filled with a very special brown sherry that he kept for his exclusive use, emptied into it the contents of a little white paper that she held in her hand; then she took up the decanter, shook it gently, looking to see if what she had put in was dissolved, then set it down again and left the room.

What was I to think, and, still worse, what was I to do after making such a discovery as this? No one is so suspicious as a man in love, unless, perhaps, a woman in the same state. Instantly a crowd of terrible thoughts swarmed into my brain. I remembered being struck with the fact that Sir Percival was by no means as well as he had been in September; he was nervous and irritable and seemed to have lost flesh considerably. This change instantly connected itself with Violet's more than suspicious action.

Could it be possible that this beautiful, light-hearted, and seemingly innocent girl to whom he had given the shelter of his home was slowly poisoning him, murdering him by inches, in order that she might come into the inheritance of which I now felt convinced her father must have told her? Could it be possible that she thought the probable remainder of his life too long a period to wait for what she knew would one day be hers, and that, therefore, she was staining her soul with this hideous crime in order to hasten the end?

I took him in my arms and kissed her.

And if this was so, might she not have another motive, might she not have some penniless lover, nay, even a husband, out yonder in the Australian bush for whose sake she was guiltily anticipating the course of Nature? It seemed too monstrous, too horrible to believe, and yet, what was I to think? Had I not seen her empty the paper into my uncle's wine! She knew that no one but himself drank it. What could her motive be if not the worst, and if it was that, what was I to do?

To let Sir Percival drink the wine was to connive at his murder, to be accessory to it before the fact, and make myself equally guilty with the girl whom I—good heavens!—had just resolved to ask to be my wife before the night was over. More than that, not to tell him of what I had seen would be to leave him unwarned and unprotected at the mercy of a murderess, while to tell him would be to give him such a shock as might complete the work that she had begun.

In a perfect agony of rage and perplexity, I let myself in at the side door with my latch-key, and went straight to the dining-room. Happily I met no one either going or coming, and when I got up to my room I had the decanter of sherry with me. I had just time left to dress for dinner, and I scrambled out of one set of clothes and into the other, hardly knowing what I was doing.

When I got downstairs again, the first thing I heard was Sir Percival rating his butler soundly for forgetting his sherry. The man protested that he had put it on the table as usual, and this made Sir Percival worse. I got into the dining-room just as he was calling him a liar, and telling him to go and fetch it at once.

At this moment Violet also came into the room, looking as pretty and self-possessed and perfectly dressed as ever. But when Sir Percival, after sending the discomforted butler out of the room, explained what was the matter, my suspicion-quickened eyes saw her start slightly, and, as I thought, turn pale. Sir Percival was too angry to notice it, but to me it was only an added proof of the fearful suspicion that was now fast becoming a conviction.

How I got through that evening I hardly know. All I do know is that I watched everything that my uncle ate and drank in fear and trembling, wondering whether the sherry was the only thing that the beautiful wretch who sat at his table had put her secret poison into. As for her, after the first shock she seemed to at once recover her spirits and, if possible, increased my new-born horror of her by rallying me on my own manifest low spirits and absent-mindedness.

By the time I went to bed, I had decided what to do, and as soon as it was light the next morning, I was up and round at the stables with my spirit flask full of the poisoned sherry. As soon as my horse was ready, I rode off post haste to my uncle's doctor, who lived on the other side of the village about four miles away. I caught him just as he was sitting down to breakfast, and as soon as I was alone with him in his surgery I gave him the flask of sherry, and, without any explanations, asked him to analyse it.

"May I ask where you got this sherry, Mr. Burton?" he said, sniffing at it, and looking at me with a curious twinkle in his eye.

"Got it!" I said. "Well, to tell you the truth, doctor, if you'll excuse me, I would rather not say anything about that until you have analysed it. The circumstances are so painful and to me so distressing that——"

"Ah!" said the doctor. "I thought so. Very creditable to you, Mr. Burton, considering that you, no doubt, have suspicions which must be very terrible to you. Well, you may thank your stars you have taken the sensible course you have done in coming to me first, for I presume you have said nothing to anyone else."

"No," I replied. "My suspicions are horrible enough and distressing enough, God knows, but I have kept them to myself."

"Good!" said the doctor, brightening up in a way that almost disgusted me for the moment. "Then I can tell you what this sherry contains without analysing it. It contains strychnia——"

"Ah!" I exclaimed, recoiling a step. "Strychnia!"

"Yes," replied the doctor calmly raising the flask to his lips and taking a pull. "It contains strychnia, nux vomica, and carbonate of iron, in medicinal doses, as prescribed by myself for your worthy uncle who, I regret to say, has not only been in a very low state of health lately, but has also unhappily become a convert to homeopathy, and has sworn that he will never speak to me again if I ever attempt to dose him with the orthodox abominations of the pharmacopœia. This being the case you see——."

"All right, doctor, I see," I interrupted, snatching the flask from his hand and flinging it under the fireplace as though it were something accursed. "I see quite enough to show me that, in addition to being one of the greatest fools on earth, I have entertained the most horrible and the most miserably false suspicions about—good heavens! no, it would be sacrilege even to speak of her in such a connection now. I shall never be able to look her in the face again. I shall be off to town to-day."

Digitized by Google

"No, you won't," interrupted the doctor. "Not unless you really want to make yourself the fool you have just called yourself. I suppose you saw Miss Violet putting this stuff into your uncle's sherry. Of course, it was very unfortunate that you should have seen her doing anything that looked so curiously suspicious, and, grave and all as your suspicions were, you were quite right according to your lights in doing what you have done, but there the matter begins and ends. No one but you and I know anything about it, and all the harm done is that Sir Percival has missed one of his doses.

"If you'll wait five minutes I'll put up half-a-dozen more and you can take them to Miss Violet and ask her from me to put them into your uncle's sherry according to directions, as before. After that you may perform any penance that your remorse may suggest; but if I were you I wouldn't tell her anything about it just yet. Wait till you've been married a few months and then you may have a good laugh over it. By the way, should I be taking too great a liberty if I asked whether the happy day has been fixed yet."

"No," I said; "but unless I have all the bad luck that I deserve, it very soon will be."

I couldn't find courage to follow the doctor's advice until Violet had been Mrs. Burton for nearly six months. When I at last did tell her she heard me to the end in stony silence, and then she raised her eyes and looked at me and said very seriously:

"You great goose! Is that what you've been burdening your mind with all this time? Why, do you suppose I didn't suspect it was you all the time who took the sherry away? I knew you were outside the window, for I saw your shadow on the snow, and I also knew of that mysterious visit of yours to the doctor's the next morning. I felt very miserable and very angry that night I can tell you, but I comforted myself with the reflection that you must be just as bad, and that you must have felt a good deal too small for your clothes as you rode home from the doctor's, so I forgave you."

"Yes," I said, as I took her in my arms and kissed her now laughing lips. "If ever a self-respecting man felt cheap enough to be given away with a pound of tea it was my miserable self riding home to breakfast from the doctor's that morning."

THE GREATEST SACRIFICE OF ALL.

TING-A-LING! Ting-a-ling! the convent bells were ringing. Ting-a-ling! ting-a-ling! came the sweet sounds from the high white cupola. They floated far away out on the warm summer air, fragrant with the smell of Indian hay, or Foin Sauvage, that the "habitants" were cutting in the meadow by the river.

In the distance, the tin roofs of the old French Canadian city glittered in the sunshine, and the great river shone like gold as it glided on majestically to the waters of the Gulf.

The convent lay in its own grounds, carefully guarded by high stone walls, though a good many came in and out of its portals, as it was the "Providence" of the neighbourhood, and welcomed the little orphaned ones and the sick and the aged poor of the district. The sunlight filtered through the whole building. It fell in slanting lines in the long passages, with their rush-bottomed chairs and spotlessly-scrubbed floors.

Sister St. Stéphanie sat at her desk, and she was tired. It had been a long hot day, and the children had not been attentive. The room was empty now, for its little occupants, in their checked blue pinafores and thick shoes, had all been dismissed into the garden for the welcome play before the evening meal. Now she was free to walk in the garden for a little while.

Sister St. Stéphanie was not as young as she was once, and her figure was portly—but, in spite of the lines that come at fifty, it was a face that had been most charming in the spring-time of her life.

She knelt a few minutes at the little oratory on the stairway, and then, quietly crossing herself, went down the wide verandah steps to the garden. Sister St. Mary Clopas was with the children, who were wending their way to the little spruce wood by the big meadows; so, free from her responsibilities, the nun took the path to the kitchen garden.

It was pleasant here on the lovely summer afternoons, and a look of sweet content came into the nun's face as, folding her hands within her wide sleeves, she paced quietly up and down the path. From the river came the breeze, laden with incense of the long swaths of hay.

How familiar was that odour to Sister St. Stéphanie. It carried her back thirty years, long years, when she was only sixteen years old. She was not called Sister St. Stéphanie then, but was Gabrielle St. Pierre, the youngest daughter of the respectable merchant of the little village of Sainte Priscelle.

The St. Pierres lived in an old steep-roofed house on the banks of the Ottawa. Gabrielle's father and mother were old people, and she was the child of his second marriage, and there were long years between her two elder sisters and herself.

Little Gabrielle was a happy, restless child. Her hair was blue black, but it had many little ripples in it. Her eyes were big and brown, with a soft, pathetic light in them like the deer in the fir woods, and the flush on her cheek like the wild rose that blossoms on the dusty highway.

At eleven years of age, she went to a great convent near Montreal, and she was happy and learnt many things—to write a delicate copper-plate hand, to play very sweetly on the piano, and to do endless and gorgeous pieces of wool-work. Her voice, clear and fresh, was an important factor in the convent choir.

The nuns loved her well, and little Gabrielle was content that her lot should be cast with theirs one day. For the St. Pierres had always given, when possible, a son or daughter in each generation to the Church. So she accepted this career with the same sweet docility with which she had accepted the dresses they sent her, or the studies they desired her to pursue.

At seventeen, she came home for a little while, and for a time the life she led was peaceful enough. But one day, as M. St. Pierre sat in his shop reading his small weekly paper, while his mild young apprentice attended to the wants of the few customers, a stranger came in. He was young, perhaps twenty-three or four, tall and straight, with curly yellow hair and big blue eyes that had almost an infantine look of innocence. He came up to the fat merchant and asked him, in very tolerable French, where he could get lodgings in the village, as he wanted to fish in the St. Andre River, where the big pink trout gambolled up and down the foaming brown water.

Digitized by Google

As M. St. Pierre gazed at the wonderful jointed fishing-rods and new leather gun cases that a humble "habitant" brought in just then, he thought of the good dollars they represented and wondered why the stranger should not occupy the large empty room in his house.

. . . . . .

That afternoon Mr. Jack arrived with his trunks, dogs, gun-cases, and fishing-rods, and the dark old house seemed to wake up from that time. He took his meals with the family, and his sunny smiles, his merry laugh, and his broken French even drew smiles from quiet and faded Madame St. Pierre.

But to Gabrielle he did not say much. She was too shy. She came in the evening he arrived; she did not know anyone was there beyond the usual family circle. How pretty she looked in a pink cotton dress and her long braids hanging down her back, and the brown eyes under her curled lashes.

"Where have you been, my daughter?" said her mother, as she poured out the tea in the thick handleless white cups.

"I have been decorating the church for the Feast of St. John," said the young girl in her pretty French. Her tones were low and clear. How delicious, thought Jack to himself, and how mediæval.

The house was full of noise now. Such barking of dogs and chattering of various Canadians, who were good "voyageurs" and knew the woods well, and came to guide the young fellow in his expeditions after trout or bears.

After a time Gabrielle got to look for his coming and to find the day so long when he was away. Unknown to herself, the child-heart that was slumbering woke up to find itself that of a woman glowing with its first deep, entrancing love; so little does it take to make this change. One or two little strolls in the garden in the evening, the discussion of an illustrated paper, the few words spoken at meal times. Naturally it was all very restricted, for a young French girl has not much liberty; but her smile was sweeter for him and he could make her laugh.

So the stranger stayed on till the late August days. He was out fishing all the last morning, but he came into the garden to bid Gabrielle good-bye. Jack knew where she would be, and he went to the end of the garden, where some willows grew beside a spring, and there was a little seat and some beehives. Gabrielle was sitting there, with a little shawl over her head.

"I came to say good-bye, mademoiselle," said Jack; "I knew where I should find you. You hid yourself, but I could not go without seeing you."

He was going then, and the beautiful brown eyes, in spite of herself, filled with hot tears. There was a moment of silence, and Jack suddenly bent forward and took the slender hand, roughened with work, in his. She tried to draw it away, but he held it fast. The autumn sunlight fell on him as he stood there, with the dim old house behind him.

"Oh, Monsieur Jack, you must not," she said trembling, drawing her hand away.

"But Gabrielle," said Jack hurriedly, "are you not sorry I am going away? I hate to go," he said, speaking breathlessly in his emotion, "for I have learned to love you so much."

She was trembling like a leaf now, but she turned her dear eyes to him, and there the answer was written so plainly.

"Darling," said Jack, as the long whistle of the steamer was heard coming round the point, "say one little word, for I must run to catch the boat. You love me, don't you, dear little Gabrielle? Say my name just once."

"Yes, ah, yes, Jack," came the answer, almost in a whisper—how sweetly she said the word "Jack."

Nearer and nearer came the throb of the paddle-wheels of the steamer. Jack bent forward and raised the cold little hand to his lips, and kissed it so tenderly and lovingly. Until he told of his love, he did not know its deep and overwhelming tide.

"I will write," he said, looking back at the girlish figure and beautiful young face, so full of love for him.

He went down the short path to the wharf, holding his hat in his hand and smiling on her, though there was a graver and more earnest look on the merry young face than had ever been there before.

The sound of the paddle-wheels stopped for a few minutes, then went on again, grew fainter, fainter, till all was quiet. The sun had set, and Gabrielle went into the house.

The brilliant autumn passed, and then the long winter came, and for some time Gabrielle lived in a dream—a dream known only to herself. But she never got a letter. Jack had written, but M. St. Pierre had opened his letters without scruple, and, thinking they were only the effusions of a boyish love affair, said nothing about them to Gabrielle. Her thoughts were otherwise employed. When the letters became more frequent, and glowing with a manly love that the old man could in no way misconstrue, he thought it time to interfere, and confided in Madame St. Pierre. She was overwhelmed with the perfidy of Gabrielle, and there was a consultation with M. le Curé.

Poor little Gabrielle was called in, and the storm burst upon her, terrible in all its fierceness. She, promised to the Church, had been deceitful and underhand! She had spent the summer, as no modest girl should, in covert interviews with a heretic! She, whom they thought so pure and good and open as the day, had made all sorts of promises to this light-of-love.

Gabrielle said not a word, only grew whiter and whiter, and looked with terror at them. M. le Curé was kinder than her father and mother, for he said quietly:

"I know Gabrielle of old; leave her to herself for reflection. The good God in His mercy will bring her to a better mind. The saints also have been woefully tempted."

And Gabrielle looked at him gratefully, and when her father and mother asked her if she had anything to say, she murmured with white lips, "No, no;" and crept upstairs to the little cold room, where the frost drew beautiful ferns and palms on its many-paned windows, and sat in dumb agony by her bed. All the light of life seemed gone out.

M. le Curé, who had been her good friend before, spoke to her rarely, and then with a subdued sadness that was more keen than wrath. So Lent passed, and it was nearly Easter.

Tempted by the sunshine, Gabrielle went out into the garden to the little seat by the beehives, where she had seen him last. There was a strange agony of pleasure in doing this. Gabrielle sat with her hands folded, looking at the great wide river rolling on, with now and then a block of ice on its black surface. How well she remembered the stroke of the paddle-wheels which had borne him away.

There was a click at the gate, and M. le Curé came slowly down the path.

"My child," he said gently, "you are in great misery. Let me talk to you, let me help you."

At these words of unexpected kindness, the tears rose to Gabrielle's eyes, and her lips trembled. The wind blew M. le Cure's long grey hair from his forehead and waved the worn black soutane.

"My child," he said, his deep voice full of emotion, "could I but show you a place of peace, a place of rest! What would you say if I told you I too have suffered as you do, and conquered and gained an infinite peace, an infinite glory! The struggle was bitter—yea, even to death. Think, think of the glory and beauty reserved for those who have given up father, mother, child, yea, lover too, for God!

"My child, let me comfort you," he continued, his rugged face lighting up with enthusiasm. "It is near the holy Eastertide; come, cast thyself at the foot of the Cross and bring thy sorrows to Him who suffered all. Oh, come to thy Easter Communion as the Bride of Christ, and oh, the greater the temptation, the greater the triumph! This trial is the furnace of thy life. Come through it in His strength, and what joy will be thine!"

He left her, passing swiftly down the garden path.

The stern priest had struck a different chord. He had not taunted her and upbraided her. The girl's heart was so weary, so weary! Perhaps he spoke truly. She stood in deep thought under the willow, then turned suddenly, went swiftly through the gate and across the grassy open plot into the church.

Gabrielle went quickly over to the altar, all draped in black, where the big plaster groups of the Entombment stood, and knelt there long and still. It grew quite dark, and the sacristan stood clinking his keys to arrest her attention.

Digitized by Google

When Gabrielle entered the house supper was ready. The family ate almost in silence, and then, at the bidding of Madame St. Pierre, sank on their knees before the plain black crucifix on the wall.

When they arose from their knees Gabrielle left the room. Marie, her faithful waiting-maid, followed her into the hall and slipped a note into her hand. No one saw this little incident, but Gabrielle's heart gave a great leap, and she fled up to her room and shut the door tight, bolting it to make it secure. Then she looked at the letter.

It was square and white, with firm black writing on it. So unlike the letters they generally received—cheap yellow envelopes with thin scratchy writing on them in pale ink. She opened it quickly, and the words burnt themselves on her brain:

"My own Darling.—Why have you never written one word to me? I have written again and again, giving the address carefully each time, and have never had a single line. I know there is something underhand going on. But, dear one, I am quite near you. Marie has told me what you have been enduring. I shall be at the landing down by the river at ten. Come, as you love me, my own poor little darling.—Your most loving, "JACK."

"I shall be at the landing down at the river at ten." Had she gone mad, and was she dreaming? She would see his face once more. Gabrielle held the letter in her hand a few minutes. Remember, it was her first love letter. She gently passed her hand over the lifeless thing. Then, holding it over the candle, burnt it deliberately, till it curled in blackened scrolls on the floor, where it seemed to writhe in torture like a living thing.

Presently the old clock struck ten, and getting up she slipped quietly down the stairs. How they creaked! The door by which she must leave the house was not locked, as Marie had purposely seen that it was left unfastened.

Gabrielle sped down the path, light and sure of foot. It was bright moonlight, and the great elm trees cast black shadows on the silver water, and their roots looked like twisted snakes. By the biggest elm, Jack was standing. Yes, Jack, and the moonlight fell on his light hair, making almost an aureole about his head.

"Oh, Heaven! help me to be firm in this time of need. I am so weak, so weak," Gabrielle prayed.

Jack gave a sudden leap.

"Gabrielle! Gabrielle!" he said, coming forward with arms outstretched. How beautiful he was with the love-light in his eyes.

"No, Jack, you may not kiss me," said Gabrielle in such a sad, sad tone. "It is all, all over for ever."

"You are mad, Gabrielle," said Jack, looking at her in amazement; "they have turned your mind with their bigoted cruelty. Oh, I do not believe you!

"Come with me, darling," he said, so tenderly, so gently, "away from this death in life. Dear one, in my love you will find all this false reasoning disappear like a bad dream. My poor little persecuted one! Come, come to-night on the steamer. I know the stewardess on the boat; she is a kind, good woman, and will take care of you till we get to Carrillon, and then we will be married by the rector of the English church, and in your church, too. It will be so simple, darling, dear one. Speak, speak, Gabrielle!" he said, his voice trembling in his great agitation.

"Do not say more, Jack," she said, her voice sunk almost to a whisper; "my temptation is bitter enough. It cannot, cannot be. I will never marry you—you will never understand—never, never!"

Jack was getting very angry now. But, as he looked at the slight little figure, so frail, so scrupulously neat in its old-fashioned grey dress, the anger melted and pity came instead. He drew near her, and sinking his voice to its sweetest, gentlest tones, almost as a mother might speak to a suffering child, in accents to move the coldest heart:

"Darling, have pity on me—I who have hungered and thirsted for you day and night, who have written so patiently and been so deceived. Let me plead with your father, or come now, now with me. Your life will be so bright, my people are kind and good hearted. Oh, Gabrielle, Gabrielle darling; come, come let me shelter you in my love. Have you ceased to love me?" He looked pale now, and so wistful.

Gabrielle seemed to swallow something, and then her voice rang out clear and firm, with a note of exultation:

"Oh, dear one! You will never understand. It is not my father or mother, or the priest who prevents me now. At first they did, but now it is of my own free will. I will give myself to the Church. You will never know the agony I have passed through, but I have been helped. Do you not think my soul yearned for your love? But it may not be. That is the best life had to offer, and that is my sacrifice to God!"

And turning swiftly to Jack, her face almost supernatural in its calm and beauty, she raised her hand:

"May the good God bless and keep you evermore, evermore! Adieu, beloved, adieu." And she fled swiftly up the hill.

Poor benighted little Gabrielle, we say. But we may say that of all those who have suffered for their faith in the course of ages. She had only lived up to her ideal, after all.

Gabrielle crept up to her little room and fell upon the floor unconscious. Nature cannot bear too great a strain. The mice crept fearlessly about, undisturbed by the silent figure. None knew of what had happened that night—only M. le Curé, and he was a man who spoke seldom.

And Jack, you may read his name again among those who belong to the great commercial interests of the world. He is a good man and well known. Yes, he is married and has sons at college and in business. But he, too, may have his memories for all we know. His purse is always open to good causes, he gives abundantly to "those excellent women," as he calls the Sisters of Charity.

But all this is so long ago, thirty-seven years or more, and time is very merciful. Sister St. Stéphanie knows great peace and love in her busy life. The little ones love her, and trot after her, holding withered little bunches of flowers in their hot chubby hands, and the old people pour out their garrulous troubles in her willing ear.

Ting-a-ling! ting-a-ling! the convent bell is ringing for the children's supper; and Sister St. Stéphanie must go in now. The waggons are coming up from the long meadows laden with new cut hay.

Ah, me! what memories the Indian grass that grows by the great river will always bring back to her in the bright Canadian summer-time.

PEARSON'S LIBRARY

Has been so well received on all hands that the editor has felt that a special effort should be made to make it more widely known and ensure an even greater success.

He is therefore adopting a novel method of advertisement, in which the readers of SHORT STORIES will be invited to participate. A special edition of 100,000 copies of the first issue of "A Girl Without a Name" has been printed. These copies are to be given away to the first 100,000 readers of SHORT STORIES, or the other papers issued from this office, who apply. All that you have to do is to forward your application to the editor of Pearson's Library, Henrietta-street, London, W.C., enclosing a fully addressed wrapper stamped with 1½d. in stamps, to defray the cost of postage, and a copy of the first novel will be sent you by return.

Not only this, but commencing with No. 4, which is published on January 1st, and will be entitled "The Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler," the size of the novel will be increased by thirty-two pages, with a proportionate addition to the length of the story and the number of illustrations.

No. 3, entitled "Thro' the Battle Smoke," with over 100 Illustrations by Messrs. A. Kemp Tebby and Raymond Potter. Now on Sale.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," etc.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

Franz Hartog—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

Sir Harry Milton—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, in his yacht, the Calypso, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

Herbert Wyndham—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

Frederick Austen—the inventor of the air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

Frank Markham—the young captain of the Utopian yacht, Mermaid.

Violet Milton—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is terribly injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

Dora Merton—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

Lucy Summers—another fair Utopian.

Renault in the air-ship Vengeur, and Hartog in the torpedo-boat Destroyer, levy blackmail on the high seas. Just as they have annihilated a combined British, French, and Portuguese fleet sent to discover them, a Maxim aeroplane, the Britannia, comes on the scene, and is captured by the Vengeur. Those on it are put ashore, and one of the crew shoots at Renault and wounds him. A few weeks later Renault and Hartog set out for the island of Utopia for the purpose of destroying its inhabitants, but find it deserted. On the discovery of Renault's treachery, the whole colony had gone back to England, Wyndham, together with Adams, Austen, Sir Harry, and his sister Violet, travelling in the Nautilus, a newly-built torpedo-boat of great speed, which, while coming up the English Channel, is challenged by a British cruiser.

CHAPTER XXV.

News of War.

As the answering signal was flashed from the warship's search-light, the Nautilus slowed down to ten knots and swung round to port, describing a three-quarter curve which brought her alongside a large, grey-painted armoured cruiser which, with her attendant brace of torpedo boats, was cruising under easy steam about six miles from the land.

As the Nautilus, with nothing of her showing above the water except her platform and conning-tower, and an expanse of plated turtle-back deck fore and aft of it, and with no funnels, and, consequently, no smoke or steam issuing from any part of her, ran up alongside the cruiser, all who were on the deck of the British vessel crowded to the bulwarks and portholes, and up into the rigging, to get a closer view of the strange craft.

The captain himself was at the gangway as she came alongside, looking with no less curious eyes than anyone else at this strange visitor, which seemed the nearest approach to an actual submarine vessel that he had ever heard of. By the time the gangway steps had been reached Wyndham had come on deck dressed in his uniform as a Lieutenant of the Fleet, and returned the salute with which Her Majesty's cloth was immediately recognised.

"What craft is that, and where do you come from?" asked the commander of the cruiser. "And how long have you been in commission? I never heard of a thing like that in the Navy. Who are you?"

"Well, sir, I'm Herbert Wyndham, late Lieutenant of the Sandfly, gun-boat on the West African coast, invalided on sick-leave, picked up by a friend's yacht, and landed on an unknown island, where I found the craft that I am now temporarily in command of. If you'll allow me to come on board I'll explain myself more fully."

"Certainly. Come on board by all means, Mr. Wyndham," replied the captain. "According to what you say you ought to have some adventures to tell."

"Yes," said Wyndham, who by this time had got on to the gangway ladder and was mounting slowly with the assistance of one of his own crew. "You must excuse my coming rather slowly for I was wounded again less than a month ago, and am rather shaky still."

"Why on earth didn't you say so, man," exclaimed the captain, as a couple of bluejackets ran down the ladder in obedience to a sign from him. "I could have sent a chair down for you if I had known that."

"Oh, I'm not quite bad enough for that, thanks," said Wyndham, as he accepted an arm from one of the bluejackets, and so arrived safely on the cruiser's deck. From the gangway he was at once taken straight down to the captain's cabin, and there told him all that it was necessary for him to know of the origin and mission of the Nautilus.

"And now," he said, in concluding his story. "We are going to run up to Elswick and get our armament on board. It was ordered months ago, and will no doubt be ready for us by the time we get there. When we've got it all on board, and I'm a little stronger we are going out to hunt that blackguard of an Anarchist down. In fact, I'm going to resign my commission in the Navy on purpose to do it."

"I don't think you can do that," said the captain of the cruiser seriously. "At least, from what I have heard of you I feel pretty certain you won't attempt to do so under present circumstances."

"Indeed?" asked Wyndham lifting his eyebrows. "And why not? I hope I wasn't right in guessing, as I almost did when you fired the shot to tell us to heave to, that England's at war."

"Yes, I'm sorry to say we are," replied the captain, "and between you and me I am still more sorry to say we're not prepared for it."

"Oh," said Wyndham, "is that really so? I haven't heard anything about that. Who are we fighting?"

"Russia, at present," replied the captain. "And I'm afraid we shall be at loggerheads with France, too, before very long.

"I suppose you're a good way behindhand with the news now, but you'll remember that, after the compromise that ended the war between China and Japan by giving the Japanese the suzerainty of Corea and the control of the Corean ports, we found it necessary to re-occupy Port Hamilton in order to keep a check on the Russian naval developments in the East.

"Well, for the last year we've been quarrelling about that with Russia, who was very much sold because Lord Salisbury put his foot down and absolutely refused to give her an ice-free port in Corea when the Chino-Japanese quarrel was settled, and matters came to a crisis about a month ago, when the Russians attempted to occupy Port Lazareff by force, and our China Squadron stopped them, also by force.

"They fired on us first, and there was a regular pitched battle, in which the Russians were soundly thrashed. Of course, that could only mean war, and so war it is. France is holding her hand for the present, in spite of the 'arrangement that most people think there is between her and Russia. The moment she draws the sword Germany, Austria, and Italy will join us; and, for my own part, I fancy that she's just waiting, for the present, to see how the cat jumps between us and Russia.

"We've had no actual fighting here yet, but, of course, everyone is on the qui vive. The Russian Baltic Fleet will be shut up in the ice until April, and the moment the Black Sea Fleet attempts to force the Dardanelles, Turkey is to join us, and there'll be a general row.

"Meanwhile, we are keeping one eye on Russia, and the other on France, the Mediterranean Squadron is being strengthened every day as fast as we can get the ships into commission, which is precious slowly, I can assure you, thanks to the normal torpidity of the Admiralty; but still, we are nolding our own very fairly, and if we only have Russia to tackle, I think we shall be able to confine the war to the sea, and give her a good hammering when the ice breaks up and we get properly to work. By the way, I wish we had a dozen or so craft like that Nautilus of yours. Couldn't we get that one into commission and have some more built, don't you think?"

Digitized by Google

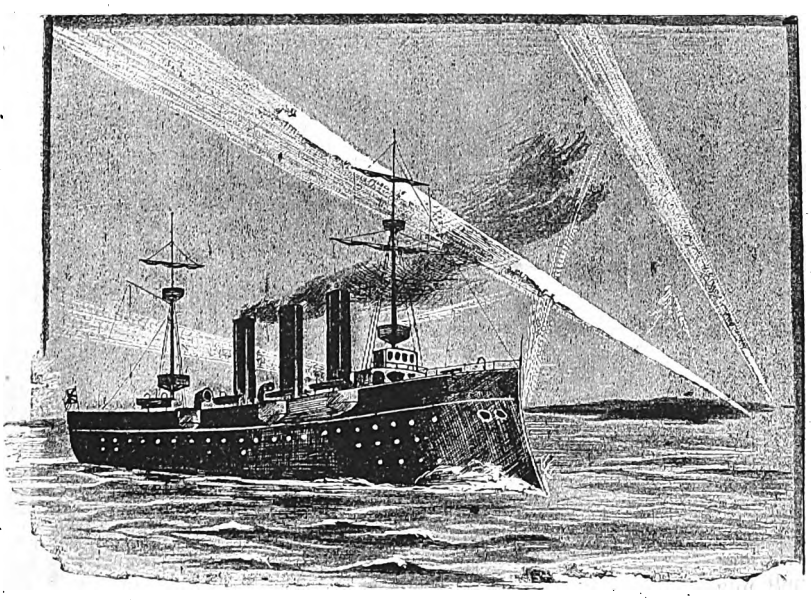
Wyndham was silent for a moment, and then, with a shake of his head, he replied:

"I don't feel altogether sure of that. Of course, as there's war, it will be impossible for me to resign my commission, as I intended to do for private as well as public reasons, and, therefore, if I am ordered on service, when I am fit for it, I shall go; but, you see, the Nautilus is private property.

"She's been built outside British jurisdiction by people who own no allegiance to Britian or any other country, and, more than that, she's driven by a motor-power of the composition of which I haven't the faintest notion. In fact, I've given my word of honour not even to ask what it is, and if you had fifty ships like her they'd be very little use to you if you had to drive them by steam-engines in the ordinary way.

"I suppose you thought we were some new-fashioned sort of Russian torpedo ram trying to sneak through and do what damage we could in the narrow waters. Of course, we're nothing like that; but still, I ought to tell you that I am really only a sort of guest on board her, and those who actually do own her may have plans of their own that I should be sorry to interfere with."

"H'm," said the captain. "That makes it a little awkward, doesn't it? Could I see one of these gentlemen, do you think? Perhaps we might be able to come to some arrangement, though, of course, you understand I have no power to treat on behalf of the Government; still, I have some interest at the Admiralty, and I daresay that a report from me might be favourably considered, especially as their lordships seem to be a little bit alarmed by the row that was kicked up when the declaration of war actually came and they weren't able to put three-quarters of the ships into commission."



Signals were being flashed from the outer waters of the Straits.

"If you'll send down and ask Mr. Austen to come on board," said Wyndham, "I think he'll be the best man for you to talk to. He is, well, practically the designer of the Nautilus, and I have no doubt his word would go a long way if he chose to give it."

The captain at once rang for an orderly and sent him down to the Nautilus with an invitation to Mr. Austen to come on board the cruiser. The invitation was accepted, and within five minutes he was seated at the captain's table. Then a somewhat lengthy conversation ensued; the end of which was that Mr. Austen consented to a report, embodying a description of the Nautilus, being laid before the Admiralty, with a proposal that a dozen such vessels might be built at the expense of the country for the purposes of home defence, on condition that they should be furnished with motor fuel by Mr. Austen and his friends, who were to have sole control of the engine-rooms, and that no attempt was to be made to discover what the motor fuel was.

The ships might be commanded by British officers, and used as they thought best, but only for the duration of the war, after that they were to be given up to the Utopians, to be used according to their discretion. These conditions were taken down by the captain of the cruiser to be embodied in his despatch, and then he was invited on board the Nautilus and shown over her without reserve. To say that he was amazed at what he saw would hardly be doing justice to his feelings by the time he had seen everything that was shown to him.

"For offensive or defensive purposes," he said, when he at length returned to her saloon and had been introduced to the rest of her company. "I would rather command a craft like this properly equipped than the biggest battleship in the British Navy."

"Yes, I should think you would," said Wyndham, with a laugh. "I know more about her capabilities than you have been able to learn in such a short visit, and I can tell you I should be very sorry for you if you were in command of the Royal Sovereign or the Majestic, say, and I had the Nautilus, and it was my business to send you to the bottom. You wouldn't have a chance against me. You might, perhaps, knock the platform into bits; but the next moment the ram would be into you, and you'd go down like a stone."

"Yes," replied the captain, with a perceptible shudder, "I suppose we should. Forty-four knots an hour did you say you could make? Honestly, you know, that seems to me almost impossible. Why, even that scoundrel who has been terrorising the Atlantic wouldn't be in it in a race with you at that rate, and rumour says he can do nearly forty."

"Nevertheless, it's a fact," replied Wyndham. "We've just travelled over fifteen thousand miles in seventeen days and a half, and if you work that out you'll find that it comes to about forty knots an hour on the average, and if it was only daylight you should see for yourself. Hullo, what's that?"

As he spoke there came the dull boom of a gun out to sea, followed by a rattle of sharper reports. The captain of the cruiser jumped up from his seat at once and made towards the door of the saloon, followed by Wyndham, Sir Harry, Mr. Austen, and Adams.

When they reached the platform they saw search-light beams darting out from a score of points at once, and signals were being flashed inland from the outer waters of the Straits. The captain of the cruiser after one glance round ran up on to the deck of his own vessel and had a hurried consultation with his first officer; then he came to the gangway and called out:

"Now, then, Wyndham, there's a chance for your Nautilus. A couple of strange crafts, steaming like the very deuce, are running up under the French land to the north-west. They'll probably run inside the limit so we can't chase them, though our fellows are after them. You can do as you like. Suppose you overhaul them and see what you can make of them. They've got about a twenty-mile start of you now. Do you feel inclined to tackle them?"

"Oh, I'm agreeable, of course," said Wyndham. "What do you say gentlemen?" he continued, turning to Adams and Mr. Austen.

They glanced at each other and nodded.

"Yes," said Adams, "I don't see why you shouldn't, as long as there isn't any unprovoked bloodshed."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, of course not," said Wyndham. "I don't suppose you want me to sink them, do you, Captain Andrews?"

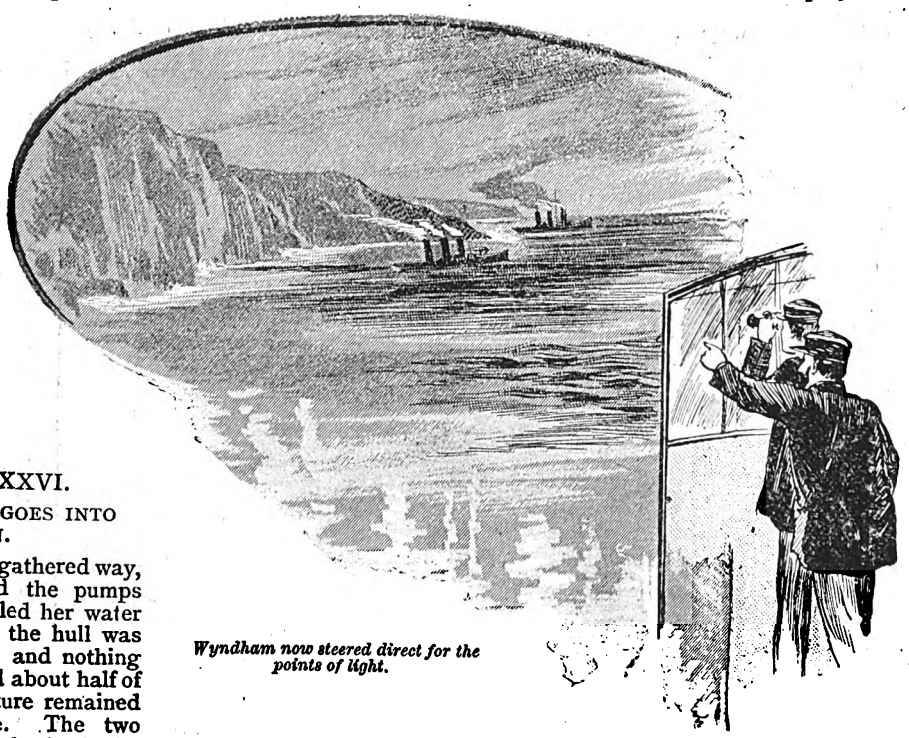
"Well, no, not unless they absolutely refuse to give an account of themselves, and in that case, of course—well, you can just use your own discretion."

"I see," said Wyndham in reply. "We won't hurt them unless we are obliged to. What course shall we steer?"

"You can make it nor'-west by north from where you lie till you make the French land. By that time you'll see the flames from their funnels, I expect, and then, of course, it will only be a question of heels."

"All right. Good-bye. Keep those torpedo boats of yours out of the way," said Wyndham, "because if we hit anything it'll get hurt. Good-bye, I'll bring you news back in an hour or so or else you'll hear something startling in the morning."

The captain waved good-bye from the deck as Wyndham went forward into the conning-tower, accompanied by Adams, who was going to take the wheel for him, while Mr. Austen and Sir Harry disappeared down the after companion-way. Those on board the cruiser heard the companion-slide and the door of the conning-tower shut with a smart snap. Then they heard the muffled tinkling of an electric bell, and the Nautilus moved slowly away from the cruiser's side. As soon as she was clear of her and her consorts there was a sound as of rapidly churned-up water, a mass of boiling foam rose astern of the Nautilus, two clouds of spray leapt up ahead of her, and the next moment she had vanished into the darkness on her errand of investigation.



Wyndham now steered direct for the points of light.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE NAUTILUS GOES INTO ACTION.

As the Nautilus gathered way, the Lieutenant had the pumps set to work and filled her water compartments until the hull was entirely submerged and nothing but the platform and about half of its supporting structure remained above the surface. The two wings of spray which she had thrown up when she started now subsided. The night was calm though cold, and the water rushed away on either side of the swiftly moving platform in long, dark, smooth swirls without a trace of foam either fore or aft.

This was accomplished by means of a device which, in designing the Nautilus, Mr. Austen had made use of for the first time in naval architecture. Far forward in the hull, just behind the ram, the plates were pierced with scores of tiny holes arranged along the top and sides of a cylinder, and through these, fine jets of oil were forced, and these, rising to the surface or spreading themselves along the upper sides of the hull, both diminished the skin-friction and prevented the water breaking into foam forward of the platform.

A double advantage was derived from this arrangement. The reduction of skin-friction meant a considerable increase in speed, and the absence of any "bone in her teeth," to use a nautical term, enabled her, as the present expedition clearly proved, to approach close to another craft at night without giving any warning of her presence. Had she been running thus submerged when coming through the Straits, the probability is that she would have got through without anyone being a whit the wiser; but this manœuvre was only intended to be resorted to when in action.

The apparatus for supplying pure oxygen and keeping the air in her interior perfectly fresh was capable of performing its work continuously for twenty-four hours. There were no furnaces or boilers to heat the air or vitiate it with smoke and noxious fumes, and not even Violet, lying on the couch in her cabin fifteen feet below the surface of the water, suffered the slightest inconvenience as the wonderful vessel bore her at a speed of nearly forty-five knots an hour through the depths. In fact, so absolute was the confidence in the strength and capabilities of the Nautilus with which her voyage had inspired those on board her, that Violet had point-blank refused to be put on shore at Dover for fear her brother should have felt bound to accompany her, and so would have missed the excitement of the chase. As for any harm coming to them, the idea never even suggested itself.

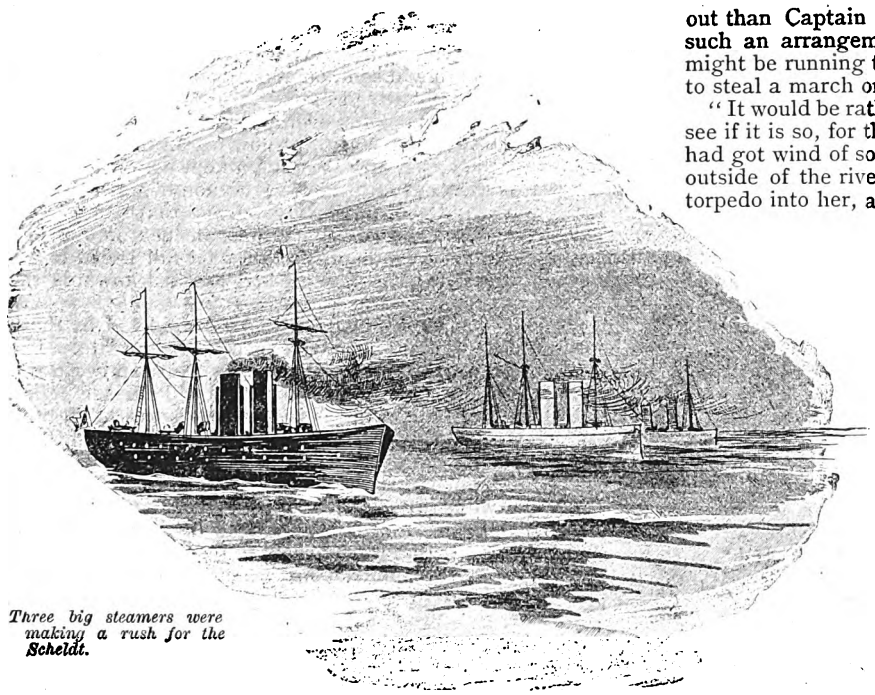
Within half an hour from the start the plumes of flame from the triple funnels of the two strange craft were distinctly seen from the conning-tower to the north-west under the looming shadow of the French land. Slightly altering the course of the Nautilus to the northward, Wyndham now steered direct for the points of light. The hostile torpedo-boats, if such they were, were evidently bound on some important mission, for it was obvious that they were steaming for all they were worth.

Another half hour brought the Nautilus close enough to them for Wyndham to see that they were two large torpedo-boats of the class known in the French navy as torpilleurs de haute mer and that they were travelling at a speed of over thirty knots an hour. This gave him an advantage of from twelve to fourteen knots, and so the distance between them rapidly decreased. When the chase had lasted for a little over an hour and a half he was within five or six hundred yards of them and dead astern. They still kept on under the land and within the three-mile limit of the French shore which no British vessel could pass for any hostile purpose without a breach of neutrality.

"I'll be hanged if I can make out what those fellows are up to," said Wyndham to Adams when he had reduced speed so as to keep his distance from the torpedo-boats. "They're evidently on some special errand or other, or else they wouldn't be going at such a speed. British they are not, or they wouldn't be over here. If they were French and merely running from one port to another in the ordinary way there would be no reason for all this hurry, because we are not at war with France, and they have just as much right to steam through the Straits as our ships have.

"On the other hand, if they are Russians, how did they get here? They can only have come from a French port or from the Mediterranean; and yet, if they have come from the Mediterranean they must have coaled either at sea or at a French port or they wouldn't have enough coal on board at this time to be steaming at that speed. We can't ram them on mere suspicion of being Russians, so I suppose

Digitized by Google



Three big steamers were making a rush for the Scheldt.

there is nothing for it but just to follow them up for the present.

"There are the lights of Dunkirk on the quarter, so in half an hour we shall be outside French waters, then perhaps we shall see what their game really is. Fortunately it is all on our way to the Tyne."

"It looks to me," said Adams, "as though they were either carrying some secret despatches to a fleet in the North Sea or else they're on a raiding expedition somewhere. I don't really see that we can do anything else but watch them."

"No," replied the Lieutenant, "I don't see that we can; but still, I am satisfied that there is some pretty dark game afoot or afloat. They don't seem to turn to the north either. If they mean a rush across to the English coast after sneaking through the Straits in neutral waters they'll make it pretty soon. I'd give something to know what they really are up to."

For two hours more they ran along in the rear of the two boats without seeing anything that gave them any clue to their character or the object of their cruise. This brought them, as nearly as the Lieutenant could calculate, off the mouth of the Scheldt.

A few minutes later they sighted the lightship marking the entrance to the river, and almost at the same instant the two torpedo-boats made a rapid turn and ran out to the eastward in slightly diverging directions. Then the sparks and flames that had been shooting from their funnels disappeared, their speed decreased, and the Lieutenant had to turn the Nautilus inland to keep out of sight as he slowed her down.

"Oh, that's it, is it?" he said as he saw the manœuvre of the two boats. "Whatever they are, they have come to watch the entrance to the Scheldt. Now the question is, what are they watching for? Either for something coming in or something going out. It can't very well be anything coming out, unless it's a passenger steamer, and they wouldn't take all this trouble for that."

"Do you think it likely," said Adams, haphazarding a guess, "that Britain has made any secret arrangement with Belgium to garrison Antwerp, as I've often heard she would try to do in case of a war, and——"

"By Jove, I believe you've hit it!" exclaimed Wyndham. "The trouble with France may really be much nearer breaking out than Captain Andrews knew, and it's just possible that such an arrangement has been made, and that our people might be running two or three transports across by night so as to steal a march on the Frenchmen.

"It would be rather a risky move; but, any how, we shall soon see if it is so, for these fellows certainly look as though they had got wind of something of the sort, and mean to patrol the outside of the river mouth to waylay a troopship and shove a torpedo into her, and then get back again into French waters as if they'd never done anything. If that's so, it's a very good job that we followed them, and I think we shall be able to spoil their little game very effectually.

"We'll just run round behind them and get out to sea in front of them. Yes; they're evidently looking for something coming in, or they wouldn't be running out at quarter-speed like that."

The Nautilus now made a wide curve round the landward side of the boats and then, keeping well out of sight, put on speed and ran away to sea. When she got out ahead of the boats Wyndham noticed that they showed no lights visible from a vessel bow on to them, and from this he rightly concluded that his surmise was correct, and that they were lying in wait for something coming from seaward. Nor was it very long before he and Adams made out a huge black mass looming dimly against the dark background of sea and sky to eastward. It was showing neither masthead nor side-lights, so evidently its mission was also a secret.

"That's the craft they're looking for," said Wyndham after a long stare through his night-glasses. "I shouldn't be surprised if that's one of the big P. and O. boats being used as a trooper. Those fellows haven't sighted her yet, I think, for they're a good dozen miles behind us. We'll run along and tell that chap what there is ahead of him. Hullo, there's another behind him," he continued as a second black mass loomed up astern of the first one.

In a quarter of an hour the Nautilus was alongside of the leading steamer, and Wyndham, throwing open the door of the conning-tower, hailed the deck and rapidly explained the situation to the officer who answered his hail. Adams'

Prisoners of war.

Digitized by Google

conjecture proved perfectly correct. War with France was considered to be imminent and liable to break out at any moment. A secret engagement which had long been in force between the Belgian and British Governments was being taken advantage of to put ten thousand British troops into Antwerp, and three big steamers were making a rush for the Scheldt that night.

Secret intelligence of this must have been conveyed by spies to France, and the two torpedo-boats had been sent out to intercept and sink the troopers, if possible, without any one being aware of their fate. It was a desperate move, and in flat defiance of the law of nations; but in practice there could be no doubt that the troops were being conveyed to a neutral country for hostile purposes, and this would go far towards justifying the action of France, provided always that it was successful.

If unsuccessful, the moral effect would be so bad that the Government would probably repudiate all responsibility for the action of the two boats. Wyndham's trained mind saw all this at a glance, and his course of action was immediately taken. He warned the second and the third troopships of their danger, and, as the three slowed down and went at quarter-speed to the northward, he headed the Nautilus in for the land again, saying to Adams as he did so:

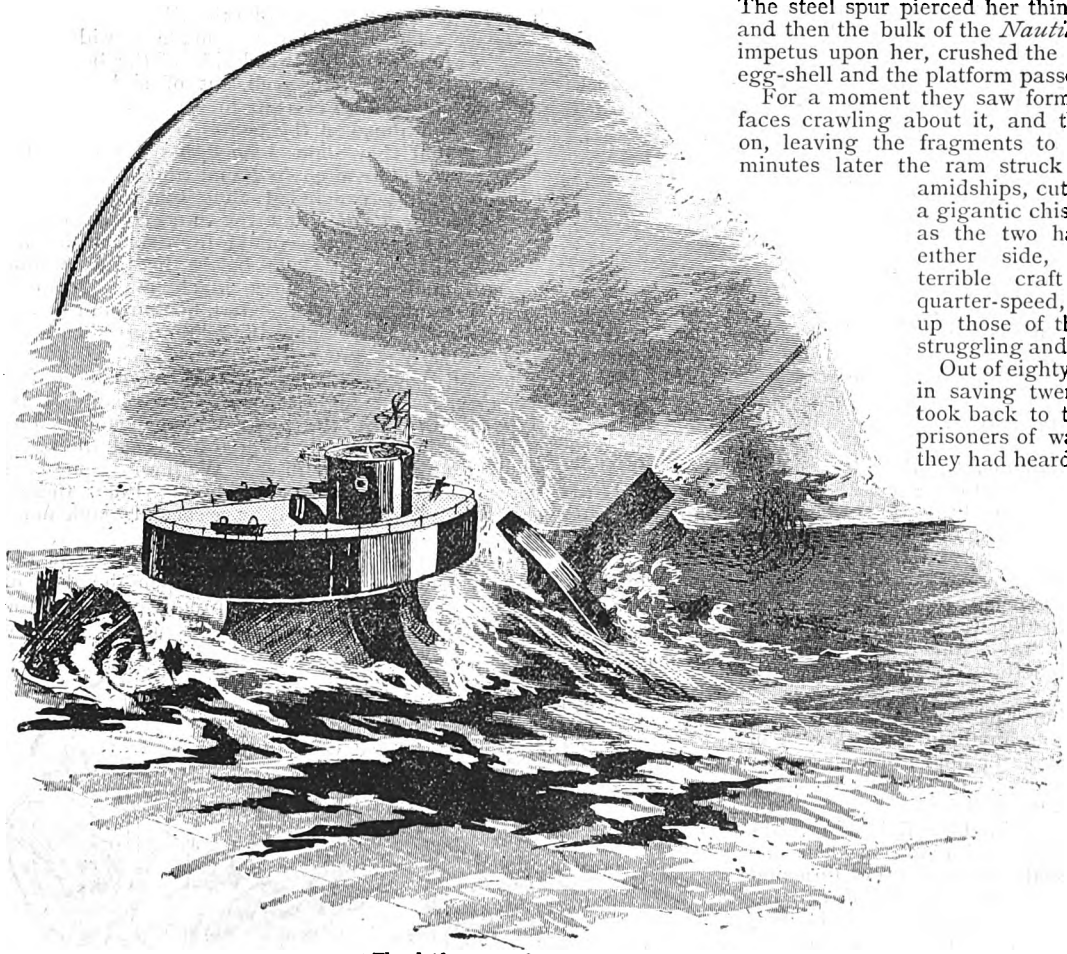
"There's nothing else for it. We must send those two fellows to the bottom without mercy. They are there to commit a breach of the law of nations and to sacrifice thousands of lives without even the sanction of regular warfare. The Destroyer herself has really done nothing worse than that. What do you think?"

"I am afraid I must agree with you," replied Adams gravely. "It seems a terrible thing to do certainly, but it would be infinitely more dreadful to see them sink those steamers with all the thousands on board them."

"Yes," said Wyndham. "And if the Frenchmen once catch sight of them they'll send one, at any rate, of them to the bottom, for we can only attend to one torpedo-boat at a time; so we'd better get the business over as soon as possible."

The low platform of the Nautilus now began to glide faster and faster over the water, and Wyndham kept her on a curving course towards the land until the two French boats—for such they really were, and bent on the very errand that Adams had guessed—were in line broadside on, and the nearer one was about a mile away. Wyndham signalled for full speed to the engine-room and the Nautilus rushed forward towards the unsuspecting enemy.

Not until she was close upon her was she detected by those on board the first torpedo-boat, and then it was too late. The submerged ram went at her with a speed of an express train. The steel spur pierced her thin plates like tissue paper, and then the bulk of the Nautilus, hurled with frightful impetus upon her, crushed the flimsily built hull like an egg-shell and the platform passed over the wreck.



The platform passed over the wreck.

For a moment they saw forms of men with agonised faces crawling about it, and then the Nautilus swept on, leaving the fragments to sink in the sea. Four minutes later the ram struck the second one square amidships, cut her in two as cleanly as a gigantic chisel might have done, and, as the two halves dropped away on either side, Wyndham swung his terrible craft round, signalled for quarter-speed, and ran back to pick up those of the crews who were still struggling and swimming for their lives.

Out of eighty men they only succeeded in saving twenty-four, and these they took back to the leading troopship as prisoners of war. They confessed that they had heard of the movements of the troopships from spies in England, and had come out to sink them. But whether they had done this by the order, or even with the sanction, of the French Government they flatly refused to tell.

The result of this, the first warlike action of the Nautilus, proved to be of immense importance. When France woke up the next morning there were ten thousand British troops in Antwerp. The French press stormed in its usual hysterical fashion, but war was not declared. For the time being, at any rate, the rapid and well-planned move was checkmate in the game that the two Governments were playing.

Of course, all sorts of rumours were soon flying about concerning the exploit of the Nautilus, but officially nothing was said on either side. The ram went on her way to Elswick and shipped her guns, torpedo armament, and ammunition, and underwent a thorough overhauling at the hands of Armstrong's most experienced engineers.

Sir Harry, Adams, and Mr. Austen at once applied themselves to the task of getting the various parts of the twenty air-ships into the hands of the different firms who where to construct them, and orders were given at Elswick for the building of another ram on the lines of the Nautilus, while that redoubtable craft was taken round to Southampton in readiness to sally forth into the Atlantic on receipt of the first news by ship or cable of the appearance of the Destroyer on the high seas, or to act as torpedo-boat destroyer and scout in case of an outbreak of hostilities with France, and any attempt on the southern coast.

Digitized by Google

In this way a month and then two months passed, and still they waited in vain for any sign of the pirate who a few weeks before had been the terror of the Atlantic. She had disappeared as utterly as though a shot from one of the big guns of a battle-ship had blown her out of the water. Liners went to and fro unmolested, and even the air-ship that had given such terrible evidence of its powers had evinced no further sign of its existence.

A series of crushing naval defeats in Eastern waters had shown Russia the folly of measuring her strength afloat with the Power that was still the mistress of the seas. France, isolated by the alliance of Britain, Belgium, Germany, Austria, and Italy, still withheld her hand, chiefly in consequence of the wisdom and strength of President Casimir-Périer, who had set his face like flint against war save in defence of territory, and so the combatants waited until the breaking up of the ice in the Baltic or the forcing of the Dardanelles should enable Russia to make an effort to retrieve in the West the disasters she had sustained in the East.

(To be continued.)

AN ENGINE DRIVER'S STORY

MINE is a railway family. My father was an engine-driver when I first remembered him, and he stuck to the foot-plate till he was shunted by old age and rheumatism, and ended his days in the most comfortable siding we could make for him. By that time both my brother and I had qualified for men's work—been through the shops, and all that—and Jack, he'd blossomed into a full-blown goods driver, while I held a small stoker's berth.

"We were not working together at the time. I was firing on passenger work with a careful old driver, who'd never hardly had a black mark scored against him in all his time. We used to work a lot of mail trains through between London and Seatown. One night, when it was just time to get out of the shed and take the seven o'clock express, one of the cleaners comes running to me to say, 'Jim, old So-and-so's took suddenly bad, and the doctor says he won't do any more driving for days to come. You'd better see the superintendent.'

"Well, I trots off to the office, and when I got there, to my big surprise, I found the boss talking to my brother Jack. He'd just come in off a journey, and the superintendent was telling him he'd have to work the express through that night. 'Here's your brother,' says he, 'will be with you, and you both of you know the road thoroughly well. You're about the only man on the spot that I can trust, and when I tell you that my own wife and little ones are going down by the seven o'clock you'll see how much confidence I have in you.'

"Now, Jack, he'd never drove an express before, but orders were orders, and we were nearly a minute behind as it was. So off we goes to the shed, Jack putting on the pea-jacket he's just taken off, and shouting to one of the lads to get him a tin bottle of tea and a crust. When we started out we were nearly three minutes over the time, and it was one of those journeys where we had to look lively at ordinary times. We had to pull up those minutes somewhere on the line, and we went in to make the engine do her level best over a bit of straight road when we knew everything would be clear for a run of fifteen miles.

"We had got her up to a speed of over sixty miles an hour. We were fairly flying, and the old lady went leaping along like a greyhound. It's thundering hard work, let me tell you, is firing on a job like that. You'd hardly believe how the coals are gobbled up before you've hardly got them into the furnace.

"And a driver wants just two pairs of eyes and three hands, besides a cool brain to look after his work, let me tell you. It looks easy enough to stand there and hang on to a lever, and just keep your eyes open for signals, but an engine wants just as much humouring as a racehorse; and the quicker you go, the more she wants watching

"Well, Jack had just started the whistle in the usual way as we ran into a tunnel two miles long when a dreadful thing happened. The connecting rod on the right side of the engine broke, and I just heard Jack give one terrific yell as he saw it fly up and inwards, when something seemed to come down upon me like forty thousand tons of pain and blackness, and I knew no more about it. I never heard exactly how it happened, but Jack said that everything seemed to go to pieces in front and around him, and he lost his senses too.

"He woke up presently—it could only have been a second or two—in awful agony, burnt and scalded and almost blind, to find himself lying on the tender, with the flesh all peeled off his hands. And then he remembered how the engine was rushing away to certain smash if he couldn't manage to get to the valve and shut off steam.

"He said afterwards that he could see the whole of the people in the carriages like as in a mental photograph, laughing and chatting and carrying on, unconscious of the danger in front of them; and especially he thought of the superintendent's little yellow-haired chickabiddy and his good-natured wife, cuddling up in each other's arms as we had seen them just before we started.

"How he did it he never could tell, for besides the rest of the damage one of his legs was badly broken; but he crawled down from the top of the coals, right into the blinding steam that kept on escaping from the broken gauge, and shut off the steam and wound down the brake. There was no Westinghouse then, and all we'd got was the old-fashioned style of thing.

"When the front guard jumped out to see what was the matter, he found that Jack had fallen insensible in the six-foot way. As for me, they picked me up nearly a mile back of where the train came to a stand, and the pair of us were taken away to the nearest house, while the guard went to the next signal-box and got them to telegraph for help.

"It was many a weary week before I was able to get about; and poor Jack, he lay between life and death for weeks longer. But he pulled through, and I must say that all the time we lay bad nobody could have been kinder than the officials of the company. As soon as we could go they sent us down to Seatown, and there we lived like fighting-cocks till we were on the upward grade again.

"At last, when we were just beginning to go for short walks together and pick up a bit, there came a sudden message that we were wanted at a meeting in the Assembly Rooms, and off we toddled, wondering what it could be about. When we got there, the room was nearly full of gentlefolks, and there was the chairman of the line and the mayor of the town on the platform, and a whole crowd of directors and other swells around them, with our superintendent and his wife and daughter. As soon as we entered there was such a hooray as you never heard before, and we were pushed along to the platform and helped up the steps before we'd time to ask a question. Then they gave us a seat each, and the chairman of the line he got up to speak.

Digitized by Google

"Well, to cut it short, it turned out there'd been a collection made, and there was a gold watch and chain for Jack on the table, and a silver ditto for me, and a nice new silk purse chock full of sovereigns for my brother, and a crisp ten-pound note for yours truly.

"Then Jack, he gets up and rubs the tears away with his sleeve, and he lifts up the child and kisses her. But he wouldn't take the money. Instead of that, he takes hold of one ringlet of her pretty hair, and says, quite quiet like, 'Can I have this instead, ma'am?'

"And the superintendent's wife, she says, 'To be sure you can!'

"And then they cheered again and again, till you'd have thought the roof would split, and Jack and me were driven home to our lodgings in the mayor's carriage, and there was no end of a to-do. And when we were well enough there was a big dinner in Jack's honour amongst the publicans of the town, and another from the Aquarium people, and free tickets for us to everything in the place; and the ladies were sending him presents of books, and a harmonium, and all kinds of nice things, till you couldn't rest until the nine days' wonder was over. And then they forgot us just as punctually as they always do in such cases.

"Did I refuse to take my ten-pound note? What do you think? No. I always admired Jack, both before and since those times; but, if ever there was a soft-hearted fool—well, no matter. We're not all made of the same metal, you see; and p'rhaps it's as well we're not. It's all over and done with now."

BON GARÇON

HERE is a little corner in Southern Italy where Arcady still lingers. Once I was in the habit of spending every spring there, but I shall never go again. Yet it is to me the most beautiful place in the world.

One lands at the Marina and climbs the hill winding up, up, the long, white highroad, which is like a shelf along the edge of the cliff. High above one's head hangs the mountain, leaning forward stark and grim; below the wall of the road the ground falls sheer away to the sea. One sees nothing but the great, shining plain and the threatening mountain.

Round and round curves the road between those two silent, watching enemies, till suddenly, without any warning, one reaches the plateau and comes out in a land of desire. It is only to climb a wall and then to walk onward without let or hindrance through the wheat-fields, under the olives, where the young green wheat-blades are like swords for keenness, and their colour strikes on the soul like a song too sweet for words, and yet brave withal.

And below the wheat on the lower terraces are the bean-fields, sweet and heavy, where a man may lie full length on the short grass of the thread-like paths and feel nothing but the warm odours, the little winds over the blossoms, be conscious of nothing but the glory of the wheat, the flickering shades of the gnarled olives in the afternoon light, and, if he lies still enough, the sound of the nightingale learning its song. And yet he may be sick at heart.

As I lay there the livelong April day, neither reading nor thinking, nor grateful to God for His wind and fields of wheat, but with my fingers in my ears to shut out the sound of the nightingale's song. For, instead of a young springtide, I saw nothing but a woman in white from head to feet, with bare arms and shoulders, a wreath of brown winter ivy round her golden head, and a great garland of it on her gown.

There she stood and looked at me with a straight, grave glance—not the look she gave me as a rule; I found that out soon enough, for if ever there was a coquette it was she—Suzon. I used to watch her often as she talked to men with that quick grace she had, and being used to analysing faces—it is my profession, for that matter, I who am a doctor—I saw that she, whom most women hated for her lovers, whom most men adored and thought a soft, warm plaything, a true woman, was in reality as cold as a stone image.

It was a pretty play that went on around her, with often a change in the jeune premier, but she did not act in it herself. She piped carelessly, and all her court danced, but she neither grew warm nor weary.

I am not sure how I came to be so friendly with her; I think she began it. I am sure I should not have presumed. But we fell into a way of walking over the hills together and sitting on the cliffs in the noondays, looking out over a sea like to the glory of God for light and colour, talking of many things sometimes, sometimes silent, lying in the sun—I with my hat over my eyes, drinking in the scenes of the spring air, just seeing the splendour of a bush of yellow broom standing out against a violent sea; she with her head flung back on the short dry grasses, often with a cigarette in her mouth.

As the days went by we grew quietly nearer one another—insensibly, till one evening I asked her something.

The fact was, all the place was ringing with her doings. The men with whom she had amused herself for a time, not all being gentlemen, handled her name in the cafés without too much courtesy. And the women had always hated her for her beauty, her toilets, her artistic reputation. Young as she was, she had had a mention at the Salon.

So I asked her if it really amused her enough to be worth the price.

She shook her head.

When she was not painting she grew horribly ennui; she must do something. And then it was not all her fault, she said.

"It is to a great extent," I told her. "You lead men on horribly. As soon as they make love to you they disgust you. You fling them over none too gently, and, well—they talk."

She nodded. I fancy she knew quite well what sort of reputation she had. But presently she said with amusement:

"So you do not care about me, do you?"

"I like you so much that I do not care to have them speak of you as they do. You are always bon garçon to me," I cried, turning sharply on her. "Why cannot you translate it literally, and be a 'good boy' always? Drop your coquetry, take life frankly; you would do better."

She did not answer.

The sun was hot, she began to look tired and said she had work to do, and must go home. I thought she did not like what I had said. But I walked to her villa with her, and as I stood in the loggia and bade her good-bye, she put her hand into mine.

Something prompting me, I said very low:

"Be a good boy."

She looked me in the face.

"I will," she said, as though she were making a vow.

And she did, I know, for I never again saw in her that light manner which I had always disliked; I never again heard her talking to men as I had heard her often enough.

And we were rather more together than ever. She would not let me treat her as a woman; she was the only woman I ever knew who knew the meaning of camaraderie.

Digitized by Google

But my relation to her was getting all pose, and I knew it.

"Mon camarade, mon beau garçon, my friend," I said to her; in my soul I called her, "Mon rose blonde, ma cherie."

I made up my mind to go away; it was all I could do. She knew nothing about my wife, and of course I knew I must tell her.

So one very windy, unpleasant day, as we were sitting in a little sheltered cove on the shore, I screwed my courage to the sticking point and told her I must go to Rome.

I had had a very tiresome letter and was out of tune, like the day, and I did not say it nicely.

"Why do you go?" she asked, looking at me where she sat, close against the eternal rock, the glorious strong sea crashing and foaming at her very feet.

I threw a stone into the water and waited to see where it fell. Then I said, quite steadily—

"Because there is no use in my staying."

"Certainly not; since you are well enough to go back," she assented (for I go to my Arcady, because I do not sleep in Rome). Yet I knew she had understood me.

She threw a stone into an incoming wave in her turn, then she spoke slowly and carefully:

"Are you going back to your wife?" she asked.

"Who told you?" said I, not having voice for more.

"The princess, I think. The morning you came into the studio and she was there."

I seldom entered Suzon's house. One morning I had gone to ask her about photographing a picture, I remembered, and Princess Mathilde was there.

"What did she say?" I asked.

"Precisely? She said what a handsome man you were, and what a sad story yours was."

"Ah!" I said stupidly.

"Where is your wife?" Suzon spoke with careful civility. "I suppose you will join her in Rome?"

"My wife, mademoiselle, suffers from incurable homicidal mania."

"I beg your pardon," said my comrade softly, and held out her hand.

I took it as it was offered, and let it go again.

She did not ask me any more, nor did I tell her. Of what use was it to say that three times had that woman tried to murder me when crazed by drink, till her own people had had her shut up? Or why should I say to my bon garçon that I had only that day received a letter from the doctor at the asylum, telling me that my wife had escaped, and he did not know where she was; could I tell him of any haunt in which she was likely to be found?

I saw no sense in telling all this to Suzon. When a man at the age of twenty-three marries a woman thirteen years older, and finds out soon after that, besides being addicted to drinking, she is of unsound mind and makes festive attempts to murder him, she and her doings are not a subject on which he is likely to dwell. So I held my tongue.

I never thought she could find me out in my present land, though she had been there once with me long ago. I never thought that, in her mad hatred, she would remember how I invariably spent the spring months there after my winter's work. But I fancied I should find her in Rome.

"What are you going to do?" I asked Suzon.

"Work," she said quietly.

She never spoke of it, but I knew she painted for her bread, and that she had no idea of saving money, but lived from hand to mouth. So I was anxious about her. I could not trust myself to think about it. I would keep au courant with her doings; that was all I could do for her, though I knew she was horribly poor, and the life of a beautiful woman in Paris is not easy in that case.

"We will have one more walk before I go," I said to Suzon, and she said "Yes."

So the next day we walked up the terraced high road, up and up till we reached the olives and the wheat, and then the bean-fields, and, wandering on at our own sweet wills, were happy and innocent.

We sat down at last on the long grass at the edge of the cliff overhanging the sea, where a little wind came up to us.

We did not speak of this being our last day; we talked as usual, comrade to comrade, while a nightingale somewhere about kept trying his voice in broken ecstasies.

It was like heaven.

I lay on the grass; Suzon, not far off, read Leopardi aloud. Why she chose that philosophy of despair, she who had still some joy in life, I do not know. But presently I ceased to hear her voice. I do not sleep at night, and, like all people who have insomnia, am utterly unable sometimes to keep from falling into a deep sleep, especially in the open air.

And so I did that day. And while I slept that woman must have been creeping up to us. For I started, dazed, from my sleep to see Suzon struggling in the grasp of a mad woman on the very verge of the cliff!

Of course I knew who it was. I was on my feet like a flash, but not in time; for before I could reach her, I saw my comrade flung out over that awful height.

Then two men who had been working in the fields came running and caught my wife. I did not wait to hear them tell how they had seen her creep up to me, not seeing I was not alone; how, just as she held the knife at my back, Suzon had leaped like a cat and caught it from her hand, and how my wife had turned on her. All that I heard afterwards. Now I ran down that zigzag path to the shore and knelt by my little comrade.

I thought she was dead, for nearly every bone in her body was broken and her eyes were closed in stupor. I groped for her heart with my hand (I who had never touched her). She was alive, for I felt it stir, and then she opened her eyes and looked at me.

She knew me, but she did not, I think, remember where she was or what had happened. The poor lips tried to speak and failed.

"Try again, my darling!" I cried. "Tell me, are you in pain?" though I did not think she was, for her back was broken.

"Say it again," she whispered.

"What?" I wondered.

In despair I called her by every name I had for her, and had never used except to my own soul.

"My darling, my love!"

"What you said—I always was—to you," she gasped fretfully.

"My comrade, mon bon garçon," I said, hardly able to get the words out.

"Bon gar——"

The murmur died in her throat and her eyes closed. Presently I could no longer feel her heart. When I knew she was dead I took her in my arms and carried her up to the little plateau, full of wondering peasants, where the gendarmes were taking away my wife. But I did not see them; I went straight to her house, and laid her gently on her bed.

It is two years since then. My wife is shut up once more, safely watched now that it does not matter.

I am at my work. Sometimes I am so tired that I can hardly undress at night—actually too tired to sleep.

But this spring I longed so for my old Arcady that I came in spite of myself. It is all the same, all—yet to-day I lay face downward in the fields, and if I lifted my head I could not see the young wheat for tears.

HOW TO SUCCEED.

Under this title a most interesting and instructive series of articles has just been commenced in the columns of PEARSON'S WEEKLY. The series will embrace the opinions of the editors of the chief trade papers on the all-important subject of "Success in Business and How Best it can be Obtained." Each trade will be taken in turn, and some most valuable advice will be given by men of life-long experience. Articles upon the following trades are already in hand: Grocer, Butcher, Tailor, Saddler, Dairyman, Publican, Newsagent, Tobacconist, Laundryman, Hosier and Glover.

PEARSON'S WEEKLY, ONE PENNY. EVERY SATURDAY.

Digitized by Google

AFTER dinner at the First Avenue Hotel, we retired to a cosy corner of the smoking room, my newly made American acquaintance and I.

"To resume the subject we were discussing at the table," he began, "let me give you an instance that came across my notice some years ago.

"It wasn't the first affair of honour that I had had to do with in one way and another, but not even the first had unnerved me like this did.

"My friend, Paul Graham, was a young lawyer. We had played together in infancy and we were chums at college. We spent our vacations together, shooting and fishing.

"More than once I had heard him declare that in his opinion duelling was morally and socially wrong. Once I asked him:

"'Would you refuse a challenge?'

"'I shall never send one,' he answered, 'and it would be cowardice in me to accept one.'

"'But——'

"'I have not answered the question, you are about to object. I cannot answer it in a word. If I ever accept a challenge it will be for the simple reason that I am afraid of what people would think and say.'

"All this I remembered when the affair with William Cuthbert came up. Graham sent for me. I knew he would. There was little to say, except that Cuthbert's friend, Milam, had called upon him, Graham, that afternoon.

"'There is only one thing for me to do. Will you carry my answer?' he said.

"It did look cold-blooded. This man was—well, he was sacrificing himself. Cuthbert was a crack shot and had killed his man. Graham was a miserably poor shot and a novice.

"'Will you carry my answer?'

"'On condition that you consent to my arrangements as to the distance, and that you promise me, upon your honour as a gentleman, to shoot to kill.'

"'Do as you please.'

"'Good. Well, thank Commodore Decatur for the suggestion, and make the most of it. And promise me that you will kill him if you can.'

"He shook his head.

"'You know what I believe about these matters. I shall not try to hit him in any event. If I killed him it would be murder.'

"'Idiot! And what would it be if he killed you?'

"'Murder.'

"Of course, I refused to have anything to do with the matter. In fact I came near going to Cuthbert and explaining the situation fully in gross violation of confidence. I didn't know what to do, and finally did nothing but lose some sleep over it. I even refused to go as surgeon; but consented reluctantly when Graham insisted.

"His second was an ass named Morrow—a consummate ass! He agreed to ten paces, when he might have known that Cuthbert's being disconcerted—as the British officer was by Decatur's arrangement in behalf of the midshipman, by bringing the principals together—was Graham's only chance.

"For many reasons then, I was low-spirited that morning. Our ride was as solemn as a funeral procession.

"Cuthbert and his friends had just reached the grounds when we arrived.

"No time was lost in making ready. Graham's second lost the toss for position, of course. Even yet the thought of that—but my opinion of Morrow, beyond question the most addle-pated of imbeciles, is not material to the narrative. He lost the toss. That much is relevant. I never lost the toss in my life. Never!

"'One—two——!'

"Then a very irregular and somewhat dramatic thing happened. Graham raised his left hand, meaning that a halt must be made for some reason. Was it, could it be cowardice? Was he afraid to be shot at? In an instant I knew better, because I knew him so well, but the others didn't.

"'Jim,' he said, without moving from his tracks, 'come here a second.'

"Cuthbert and Milam bowed their consent.

"I went to Graham's side. In a perfectly steady voice he asked for a piece of paper. As I tore a page from a small notebook he put his pistol carefully under his left arm and drew a pencil from his pocket. He scribbled a few words and then folded the paper.

"'Keep that,' he said to me.

"I drew aside, thinking less about this singular interruption than about Graham's manner. There was absolutely no trace of faltering. His face was firm. But something in his very deliberation and coolness was wrong—a stiffness, a sort of paralysis that could not be defined. His movements had a mechanical, an automatic appearance.

"'I am very sorry to have been obliged to interrupt,' said Graham quietly. 'I am quite ready now. You had counted two.'

"'Three—fire!'

"My friend drew his hand to his breast at the report of Cuthbert's pistol and came near falling. He steadied himself grandly and fired without aim, at random. Then he fell.

"I cut open his shirt, and saw at once that the wound was very serious—not necessarily fatal, so far as a superficial examination showed, but with the chances against recovery.

"'You'd better get over the line,' I said to Cuthbert. 'He is likely to die.'

"Graham revived a bit, and tried to whisper my name.

"Brusqueness is a characteristic of mine; frankness is another. On this exceptional occasion I was reasonably smooth spoken, and I lied to my patient. I told him that he was in no real danger.

"'Cuthbert?' he questioned in a barely audible tone as I leaned over him.

"'Why,' said I, 'there he is.'

"'Is he hurt?'

"'No. Can't you see him right over my shoulder?'

"'I—I was afraid—I might—might have hit him.'

"Then for the first time I looked closely into Graham's eyes. They were blank, sightless. I remembered the case of his father, remarkable from a professional standpoint, who was suddenly stricken with blindness. This had happened to the wounded man.

"Suddenly, I thought of the note he had given me. It was the single sentence:

"'I am blind.'

"And yet they thought this man had hesitated through fear! They had sneered at his awkwardness!

"'Jim,' he said earnestly, though still in a broken whisper, 'if God spares my life I shall go to preaching, and I'll stop duelling, disgrace or no disgrace.'

"He kept his word, as he always did. His first convert to the Anti-Duelling League was William Cuthbert."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Should Stout Persons STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever, which was, perhaps, indirectly responsible for the untimely end, in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeeds only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic trouble which will be difficult to overcome.

The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite be appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, takes a different course. He says, "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2 lb. to 12 lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning, but on the contrary he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get this book, the price of which is only 4d. It is entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pp., and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It can be had direct, or through any bookseller.—The Million.

A POSITIVE REMEDY FOR CORPULENCE

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is a cheap issue (only 4d.) published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes:—"Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for, in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner, he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more, if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid:—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos—i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes:—'So far (six weeks from commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes:—'I am just half the size.' A fourth:—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes:—'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes:—"I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again a lady says:—"It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says:—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor :

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

BORD'S PIANOS

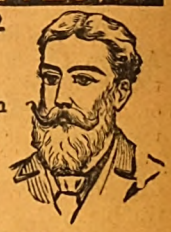
ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES & C.

(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID

No. 1 Black
No. 2 Dark Brown
No. 3 Light Brown
No. 4 Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 Pure Golden
No. 6 Brodie's Hair Grower and Restorer



Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED).

J. BRODIE, 41 MUSEUM STREET, LONDON

Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

Delicate Children.

Parents will not realize the fatal error of neglecting the first symptoms of delicacy in their children. Looking at the matter from a purely selfish point of view, it is a considerable saving to one's purse, for medical authorities all admit that one single dose of medicine given in time will be worth 999 after the mischief is done. Once allow the seeds of ill-health to sprout, and remember you will have a harvest to cope with.

If there is constitutional weakness in yourself, bear in mind that your children are liable to inherit it, and therefore that their ailments warrant a double amount of anxiety and care. If you attack the delicacy tonically before the child is 15 years of age, and it is a complete waste of time to treat it in any other way, the whole system will be built up and the nutrition of the body renewed and strengthened, and the result arrived at will be a thoroughly sound and healthy organisation.

Because your children are delicate and weak, do not imagine for a moment that they need remain so, for youth responds readily to a tonic treatment.

No matter how undermined the constitution may be, it can be permanently reconstructed by putting new blood tonically into the system.

Delicacy, natural feebleness, and languor in children cannot prevail against the curative properties of Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which contains all the necessary ingredients for rebuilding a delicate constitution. It restores to the blood the vital elements eliminated by fragility, gives the brain its necessary stimulus, and the muscular system a new elasticity; in a word, what is lacking in failing health, it supplies. All delicacy, no matter how chronic or obstinate, will yield before it.

It is useless to patch up here and there; go to the root of the mischief and attack that, every organ will then come under its influence and become healthy. It is too well known that a delicate chest leads to consumption only when the child is imperfectly nourished; germs find no soil in a perfectly healthy body.

Infantina's Syrup must not be confounded with any of the old-fashioned out of date oily compounds, for it is quite different. It resembles in appearance and taste a fruit syrup, is pleasant to the taste, and far surpasses such nauseous mixtures.

Infantina Syrup is a perfect tonic for children from 2 to 15 years of age. It is sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly, remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA CO., 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 311.] FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 15, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

BAKER'S NOVELTIES.

THE NEW "ECLIPSE" MODEL STEAM ENGINE.—The rage of the Season. These wonderful Engines work with a real oscillating cylinder (which if purchased by itself cost 1s.), strong metal boiler, funnel, large fly wheel, with pulley wheel attached for working other models, furnace, and filler complete. Carriage free 1s. 6d. Smaller size 1s.

Don't miss this grand opportunity.

THE MARVELLOUS "CHAMPION" SLIDE VALVE STEAM ENGINE.—As is no doubt well known, a slide valve cylinder is the most expensive kind made, and in fact our lowest for a slide valve cylinder itself is 7s., yet we now offer a large substantial Engine with powerful boiler, stand, furnace, fly wheel, pulley wheel, governors, metal supports, and slide valve cylinder, complete, 5s. 6d., with whistle, water tap, steam tap, very superior, 10s. 6d. These engines are sufficiently powerful to work all the models sold by us.

THE EXPRESS STEAM LOCOMOTIVE.—A beautifully japanned locomotive, with all brass fittings, dome, whistle, safety valve, starting lever, 6 wheels (all flanged), and two powerful cylinders. Only 10s. 6d., free 11s.

THE "IXION" LOCOMOTIVE STEAM ENGINE.—A splendid locomotive engine on four wheels with funnel, safety valve, dome handrails, starting lever, two powerful cylinders with furnace complete. The cheapest locomotive out. 5s., free 5s. 6d., or with whistle 5s. 6d., free 6s. Without name plate 4s. 6d., free 5s.

THE ECLIPSE ELECTRIC COIL.—We are offering the most wonderful value in Electric Coils for th s Season, as special leading lines. Each one guaranteed to work, and to administer good strong shocks. No. 1 Coil is finished complete, and mounted on stand with handles and connecting wires. Price 1s., post free 1s. 3d. No. 2 Coil is a larger and more powerful ditto, better finished, and furnished with brass terminals, and is a very superior article, 2s. 6d., post free 2s. 9d. No. 3 Coil is equal to many charged 10s. 6d. for. This Coil has a regulating handle for increasing or decreasing the strength as required, and is fit for any Drawing Room, Bazaar, Lecture Hall, &c. Price 5s. 6d., post free 6s. No. 4, very handsome large Coil, with reversing motion, 10s. 6d. Any ordinary Bichromate Batteries will work these Coils, and as most people have batteries now-a-days, no further expense is incurred, but if needful, we supply a strong Bichromate Battery suitable for working No. 1 and 2 Coils for 1s. 3d., post free; or a larger ditto for the 5s. 6d and 10s. 6d. Coil, for 2s., post free 2s. 4½d. We now give a small Battery free with every Coil sold.

THE ELECTRICAL DANCING NIGGER.—A great curiosity and a wonderful working model. The climax of electrical ingenuity and skill. By means of a powerful Electro Motor and Battery the Nigger will dance on the platform for half-an-hour at a time. A capital window attraction. Nigger, Motor, Battery, Platform, Connecting Wires, and everything complete. Price 3s. 6d., carriage free 3s. 10d.

ELECTRIC MOTORS for working Models, Machinery, &c.—All guaranteed to work, and spendid value for money. A beautiful little Motor on stand complete, only 1s., free 1s. 3d. No. 2 size much larger ditto, better finished and more powerful, with fittings, 2s. 6d., free 2s. 9d. No. 3 size, a really superior and very powerful motor, on polished stand, with brass wheel, brass terminals, and fittings, 5s. 6d., free 6s. Any bichromate battery will work these, or we supply battery for Nos. 1 and 2 Motors for 1s., free 1s. 3d.; and a powerful ditto for No. 3 for 2s., free 2s. 4½d.

Grand Illustrated Novelty Catalogue, 64 pp., 1,000 Illustrations. 1d. stamp.

BAKER & COMPANY, 34, Beech Street, Barbican, London, E.C.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

For Tradesmen's Windows, Fascias, Signs, or Tablets.

The durability, elegance, and striking brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the Most Effective Medium of all kinds of indoor and outdoor advertisements. Enamelled Iron Plates. Swinging Signs in great variety.

Call and see our stock, or send for price lists. Near the Farringdon Road Station.

Inventors and Manufacturers. Agents wanted.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd.,
61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.
(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)
INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY
The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.
Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.
SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

IZOD'S

LONG WAISTED. A GREAT SUCCESS.

THE LONG WAISTED.

200 Dozen or 2,400 Pairs of this Celebrated Make alone delivered this season in London per Day. The great question of the day with all Ladies is the Fashion in Corsets, which grows year by year, until our Special Artistes have produced corsets for every type of figure.—IZOD'S CORSETS are cut on scientific principles, with a precision of accuracy formerly unknown.—IZODS draw Ladies' attention to their Long Waisted Corsets, which have been designed by their British and Foreign Artistes, which are the best the world produces.—The Ladies' Tailors always recommend these celebrated goods for the elegance with which they set off a tailor-made dress and create a long waist and graceful figure. They are made in a variety of qualities, and are beautiful and inexpensive. Every pair stamped on busk Izod's Long Waisted, and also on lid of the box.

To be had of all Drapers and Ladies' Outfitters in Europe, India, Canada, United States, Australia, the whole of the British Colonies, and throughout the world.

Write for our Sheet of Drawings.

E. IZOD & SON, 30, MILK ST., LONDON, E.C.
Manufactory: LANDPORT, HANTS.

Digitized by Google

TO ADVERTISERS

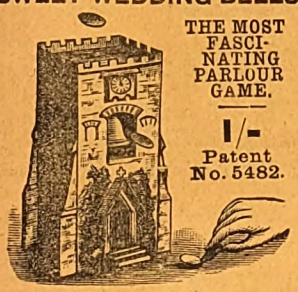
Wishing to reach families, a Test Advertisement in SHORT STORIES will bring profitable results. Scale of charges as follows:—

Front Page, £12 10s. per insertion
Back or Inside, £10 per insertion
Per Inch, 5s. per insertion ...
Less 5 per cent. for 13 times.
,, 10 per cent. for 26 times.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.



THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS
will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.
To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d Postage, 3d.
S. HARVEY, 12, Gaskarth Road, Balham Hill, London, SW., Beware of injurious imitations.

Adresse de M. SUEZ, 9, Rue de Prony, PARIS
VINAIGRE LACTÉ de SUEZ POUR LA TOILETTE
EAU de SUEZ
VACCINE for the MOUTH
Strengthens the Gums
Perfumes the Breath
The only Dentifrice securing
BEAUTIFUL TEETH
POUDRE et PATE DENTIFRICE DE SUEZ
London Agents: WILCOX & Co., 239, Oxford Street.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.
For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL
KNITTER
Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS
FOR FEMALES.
QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker.
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

To Tobacconists Commencing.
£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades.
ESTIMATES FREE.

Eczema
and all Skin Eruptions are cured by a Healing Cream widely known as
"Anteczema."
"Anteczema" is sold by all Chemists and Stores and may be had post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d. and 4s. 9d., of the ANTECZEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.
Little Book Free. NAME THIS PAPER.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
OBSTINATE CASES,
NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,
GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.
No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—
"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.
A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.
Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.
Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.
EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BOILING WATER OR MILK.

HAIR DESTROYED
permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

BLUSHING
permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

HAIR DESTROYED.
A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. S.," 87, Strand, London. Mention SHORT STORIES.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.
Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.
JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

A BOON TO LADIES
Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.
Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.
The most powerful and effective on earth.
For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.
Sold also by all Chemists.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."
EASY PAYMENTS
WITH EXPRESSION STOP
ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.

Plays hymns, popular airs, quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, hornpipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by any one. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.
Price 30s. Terms 4s. deposit and 4s. monthly.
Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.
Write for list of music and full particulars.
(Mention this paper.)
J. M. DRAPER,
Organette Works, Blackburn.

RUPTURE.
LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)
POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.
PARTICULARS FREE.
LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

RUPTURE.
LINK SHELL TRUSS (Patent)
POSITIVELY CURES.—Vide Lancet.
PARTICULARS FREE.
LINK SHELL TRUSS CO., 171, WARDOUR ST., LONDON, W.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 311.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 15, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

WILLOW MINTY

HE who told the story was a beautiful lady, with eyes blacker and softer than those of any antelope, and she began in a low, musical voice, almost as though she were speaking to herself, while all her party, sitting outside the Métropole at Brighton, bent forward eagerly to listen.

"When I was a girl, and lived with Uncle William in America on his plantation in Old Virginia, I used to read in the Northern papers that Southern masters were cruel to their slaves, and laugh. So far as I knew, masters and mistresses were very kind to their people, and for their own sakes never hurt them so as to impair their value. Uncle William never did, nor Aunt Laura.

"They were an idle, good-natured, soft-voiced couple, who never took the trouble to be angry, and who agreed in everything—particularly in averring that 'niggers' were necessary evils, who must be taken care of, and were a great expense and torment.

"Once or twice I knew the overseer had whipped Dick, or Sam, or Ned—refractory field-hands who either shammed illness or were impertinent—but that was no more to be thought of twice than the wise flogging of a dog or horse for its own good. And, when a few were sold, it was natural the rest should not like it. As a general thing, uncle bought, rather than sold. He liked to keep his servants about him, and had a host of old, helpless creatures to support, who certainly never did anything but cut up wood or nurse the black babies.

"He was called a 'kind massa,' for I have heard the slaves so speak of him a hundred times, and, I suppose, never fancied that he did not do more than his duty to those beneath his care.

"The house servants were legion, and the one among them whom I liked best and remembered longest was old Aunt Jennie. She was black as ink, and her kinky wool was snow-white. On her head she always wore a tall, bright-coloured 'kerchief,' and in her ears two great hoops of gold—a present from my aunt. Her province was to cook, and such corn-bread was never made as that of old Aunt Jennie. She was mistress of her art, and proud of it beyond everything in the world, except her daughter.

She was a bright mulatto.

"That daughter was three years older than myself, and waited on my aunt. She was a bright mulatto, and as handsome as anyone with a taint of negro blood could be. She had a singular disposition. We should have called her proud had she been a white lady; as it was, she earned the title 'sulky.' Whatever she felt she kept to herself, and even when ill hid the fact as long as possible. Once she fainted while braiding my aunt's hair, without having let us guess how weak and ill she was.

"I liked Minty. She was handy at my toilet, and could do things daintily and quickly; and with a girl's instinct, I suppose, I found out first that Colonel Garronne's man Ned was her chief favourite. On holidays he used to come and see her, and afterwards she would be all smiles and blushes; and once, when I asked her who gave her a bright blue handkerchief she wore about her neck, she answered:

"'The colonel's Ned, Miss.'

"On plantations in slavery days many a slave had a wife who lived miles away, and whom he only saw now and then, and I made up my mind Ned was going to marry Minty. About that time dreams of weddings and bridegrooms may have been oftener in my head, because I had just met the only gentleman I had ever much admired in my life. My uncle did not favour him, but my aunt admired his fair bright face and tender blue eyes, and told me in a whisper that we would make a pretty couple. And, pretty or not, we were going to like each other very well.

"Every day told me that, and at last I owned to myself that when he asked for my heart I could not say no. So after a long winter passed, for the most part, in each other's company, I found myself one day with my hand in his, and, though I had not said one word, he bent over me and whispered:

"'My own for ever!'

"We were betrothed, and, though my uncle was not pleased, he gave his consent, for nothing could be said against Mr. Lathrope.

"Those were happy days, and it is not to be wondered that I grew selfishly wrapped up in my own hopes, and took little notice of others, especially when those others were slaves.

"I fancy Minty had been 'sulking' a good while, when I suddenly discovered her want of spirits, and asked old Jennie what ailed her.

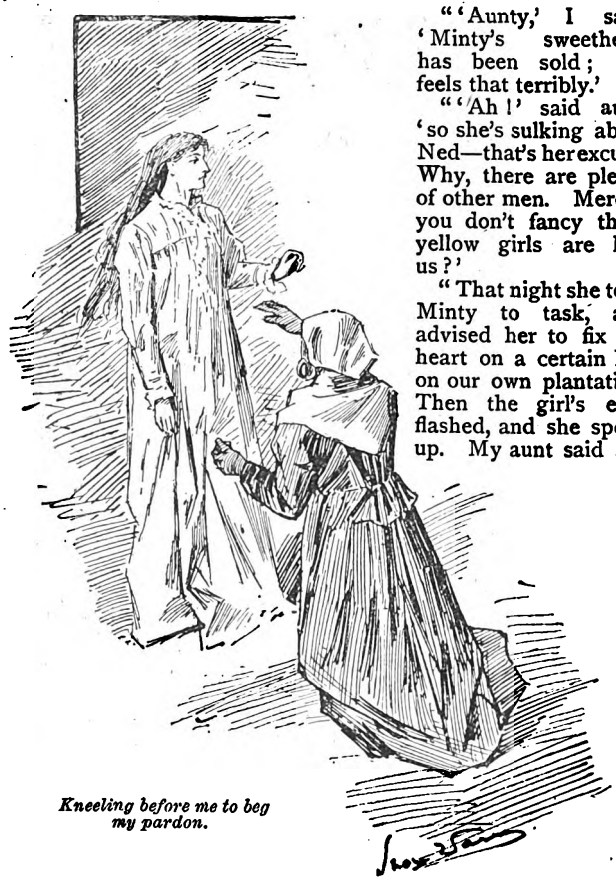
"'Pears like Ned's massa don't let him come no more,' said Jennie. 'Some says he's soldiering. I dunno; we don't see nuffin' ob him.'

"If anything could have touched me just then, it was the picture of two lovers parted from each other. I made inquiries. Ned was sold—miles away. I did not tell Minty. What was the use? But every day Minty grew quieter, and crept about more like a ghost.

"My aunt complained, and declared she was tired of sulks. I interfered.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google



Kneeling before me to beg my pardon.

"'Aunty,' I said, 'Minty's sweetheart has been sold; she feels that terribly.'

"'Ah!' said aunt, 'so she's sulking about Ned—that's her excuse! Why, there are plenty of other men. Mercy! you don't fancy these yellow girls are like us?'

"That night she took Minty to task, and advised her to fix her heart on a certain Bill on our own plantation. Then the girl's eyes flashed, and she spoke up. My aunt said she had never heard such impertinence from a nigger, and seemed quite alarmed.

"Minty was sent back to the kitchen in disgrace, and my aunt had a whispered conference with my uncle. I heard her say:

"'I agree at last; she's done it herself. I am afraid of her in her tantrums.'

"I might have guessed the truth from those words—and from what followed.

. . . . . .

"In the moonlight—the beautiful moonlight of Virginia—I stood upon the porch waiting for Mr. Lathrope, when a coarse laugh from my uncle's study startled me, and in a moment he came out, accompanied by a neighbour of ours—a vulgar brute, whose money was his only recommendation.

"I shrank to one side to avoid him, and, as they passed, heard through the tangled creepers that concealed me a brief conversation.

"'It's a bargain,' said my uncle. 'She's worth double the sum, Mr. Evans.'

"'I don't know about that,' said the other. 'But she's a likely gal; I don't begrudge her price.'

"And then they said good-night and parted.

"I knew a slave had been sold, but never guessed which one, or why.

"My wedding day was fast approaching. A white robe and veil lay ready, and my uncle and aunt were going to the nearest city on business connected with that time.

"I knew this, and knew that Minty was also to go with my aunt—that was usual—and I saw them leave the door without suspicion.

"The carriage did not return until dusk; then, as I sat in the parlour reading, I heard it roll up, and soon my uncle's voice, in unusually cheerful tones, rang through the house. Before I could go to meet them, both he and my aunt came in.

"My uncle held a small parcel in his hand, and sat down opposite me, laughing.

"'Guess what this is, and you shall have it,' he said.

"My aunt laughed.

"'No, she never can.'

"'I'm not good at guessing, uncle,' said I; and he answered:

"'There, don't tease her, wife. Look, Puss,' and before me lay a casket, in which glittered a splendid set of diamond ornaments.

"'Your wedding present,' said he; 'we don't want your lover to take you quite a beggar.'

"'Oh! how good—how kind,' I said. 'They are lovely! Diamonds have always been my ambition; these are fit for a queen!' and I flashed them in the light.

"Our hands were all together over the casket, when, sudden as a flash of lightning a great black hand came down on the table between us, and an almost unearthly voice cried:

"'Massa, whar's Minty?'

"My aunt spoke quickly:

"'All safe, Jennie; what a fidget you are!'

"Jennie did not seem to hear her. She spoke again:

"'Massa, whar's my Minty?'

"'It's no use, wife,' said my uncle, 'she's bound to know sometime. Don't take on, Jennie, and I'll give you a new gown. Minty is sold—close by—to neighbour Evans. I needed money.'

"'Money! For dem?' asked Jennie, pointing to the diamonds.

"'Well, yes, for them,' replied uncle.

"And then quiet, pious old Jennie, from whose lips we had never heard an evil word in all our lives, went down upon her knees and cursed us all in such awful language, she made my blood run cold with horror. My aunt fainted, and my uncle rang for the men. They carried the old woman off, still cursing us, and left her, as they said, to 'sleep it off.'

"My heart was as heavy as lead. I hated the diamonds; they seemed to burn my hand when I touched them. The old woman's words rang in my ears, and it was hours before I slept.

"When I did slumber I dreamed fearful dreams, and from one of them started awake with terror.

"The light was out, but the rays of the moon fell through the window on the floor, and over it, snakelike, crept a figure.

"I thought I was dreaming again. It seemed too frightful to be true. But in a moment I felt, as well as saw, old Jennie standing there with a long knife in her hand. Her hand was on my throat, her eyes glittered on me, the knife descended, but at that juncture I caught her wrist. She struggled, but was too old to match my young strength.

"I took the knife from her, flung it through the window, and stood over her as she grovelled on the floor.

I spread the money before her.

Digitized by Google

"'Jennie,' said I, 'did you intend to murder me? What have I ever done to you?'

"'You sold my chile for dem shiney stones,' said she. 'I hates you; I wishes you was dead. You'd ha' been if you hadn't woke. Sold my gal to dat white brute. Lord! I wisht you was dead!'

"'Jennie,' said I, 'it was not my fault. I knew no more than you. I had rather never have a jewel than have them bought so. Do you know, while I lay awake I was thinking of poor Minty?'

"The old woman lifted her head.

"''Pears like young missus speaks de trufe,' she said.

"'I do, Jennie.'

"'Lord bress you den; but cuss massa all de same! Oh! my purty Minty—she hates dat brute so!'

"'Jennie,' said I, 'you know I could have you punished.'

"'Yes, missee.'

"'But I will not. Be quiet and respectful to my aunt, and I will promise you that Minty shall be bought back.'

"'Oh, missee!—Lord bress missee! only massa won't.'

"'I know it, Jennie; but I will.'

"'Oh! when, missee—when?'

"'To-morrow.'

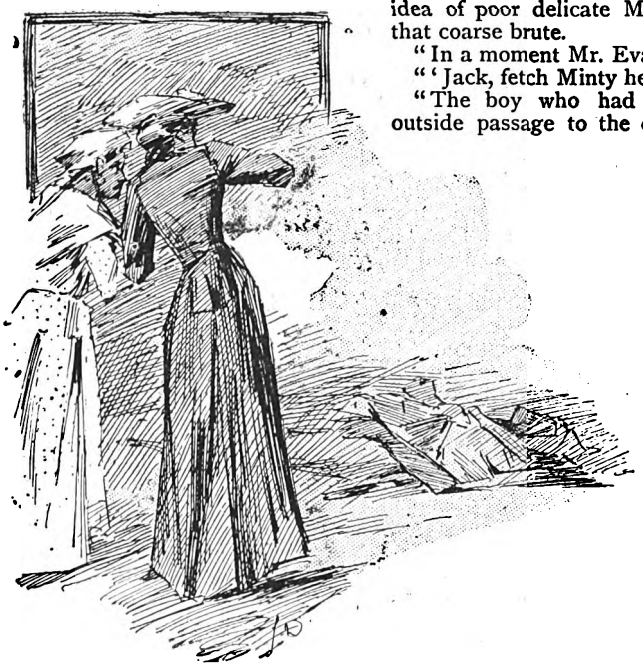
"So, kneeling first before me to beg my pardon, she crept out of the room, and I, locking my door, slept until morning.

"At daylight I rose, and taking my diamonds and a valuable watch, dressed myself for a journey, and started towards the nearest town. I knew a wealthy old jeweller in that place, and to him I went at once, offering my jewels for sale, with the remark that the money could be spent in more useful things.

"Diamonds were his hobby; he bought those without demur, and the watch, as he said, to please me. I returned to our home with a little fortune in my purse, which I grasped all the way with both hands, as though all the world knew its contents.

"I called Jennie into my room, and spread the money before her.

"'Look!' said I; 'I have sold those diamonds, and now I am going to buy Minty back. She will be all my own, and no one will have a right to sell her, for I shall give her her freedom. Are you sorry you tried to kill me, Jennie?'



"Jennie sobbed and prayed for me, and helped me with her trembling hands to attire myself in my riding habit; then she followed me to the door, and watche ' me as I rode away. Half an hour after I saw her creeping along by Mr. Evans' garden-gate, trying to hide from me as I dismounted.

"'Jennie,' I said, 'you ought not to be here. It can do you no good.'

"'I knows it, missee,' said Jennie, 'but please let me stay here until she comes. 'Pears like I'll go crazy.'

"I could not deny her, and without another word rode up to the door.

"'Mr. Evans in?' I asked the boy who opened it, and he answered in the affirmative. After a short absence he returned, and our neighbour followed him.

"His brutal face was flushed, his eyes were bright with rage. He could hardly command himself sufficiently to address me politely. But he made an effort.

"'Good day, Miss Thurston. Happy to see you.'

"'I'm glad of that,' said I, coquettishly, 'for I've come to ask you a favour.

"'Indeed,' said he; 'most happy to oblige you, I'm sure.'

"He waited.

"I smiled on him—the only way with this man was flattery.

"'No lady ever found Mr. Evans anything but gallant,' I said. 'I want to buy Minty back; she's my maid, you know, and no one else can do my hair.'

"The man's face turned almost black with rage. But for the fact that even a brutal South American never uses an oath in a woman's presence, he would have burst into a volley of execrations.

"At last he found voice for decent language, and said:

"'What you want of such a sulky nigger I don't know, but I'll sell her back and welcome. She's had three trouncings for impudence since she came, and I locked her up an hour ago in the cellar. You can have her back at the price I gave.'

"My heart leaped with joy. I asked the sum, and counted out the money. While he gathered it up, I caught sight of old Jennie's face among the bushes, and nodded 'Yes.' I saw her black hands clasped in prayer, and felt very thankful. It was only by an effort, however, that I kept down my wrath at the idea of poor delicate Minty quivering under the lash of that coarse brute.

"In a moment Mr. Evans called:

"'Jack, fetch Minty here.'

"The boy who had opened the door went by an outside passage to the cellar, and called, 'Minty! hello, Minty!' twenty times.

"'Won't answer, massa,' he said, coming back, with a queer sort of expression on his face; 'sulky, I reckon.'

"'Sulky, eh? We'll see,' said Mr. Evans, as he strode towards the cellar, the black following.

"He vanished a momen from my sight; then came an exclamation of horror from the man, and a yell from the boy.

"'Oh, missus!—she's gone done it!' said a slave woman who was at work in the garden. 'Oh, poor soul! she's gone done it!' and she clasped her hands and burst into tears. One moment both stood petrified. Then we rushed toward the spot whence the cries had come, and were within the cellar.

"I heard Mr. Evans cry:

"'Keep the lady back; it's no sight for her.' He then took a step forward, but it was too late. I had had one glimpse of an awful object lying on the floor, with a knife in its dead hand. I heard the woman scream:

"'Poor Minty's cut her throat!'

"Then I saw the face of old Jennie at the door. After that I knew no more for many hours.

"By the time I was well enough to mingle once more with the family circle, I had passed too near the gates of death to be blamed for any act I had committed.

"The diamonds were never mentioned by either my uncle or my aunt. They told me only that poor Minty lay at rest in the churchyard, and that her black mother happily slept beside her.

"But I never forgot the scene; and years afterwards, when I was a happy wife in England, I rejoiced when the glad tidings reached me that the evils of slavery had been for ever abolished."

When she finished, a dead silence reigned over the little circle of listeners. Then they quietly dispersed, leaving the beautiful lady, looking far out over the sea, alone with her thoughts.

Digitized by Google

PIERRE

—o—

THE burning sun of the Canadian summer was beating down upon the rock on which was perched the fortress-city of Quebec. The steep, narrow streets lay white and deserted beneath its heat, and from the river its light was reflected in a silvery glare. Even the lilies over the chateau hung drooping and lifeless. Particularly the sunlight fell through the high, curtainless windows of the Laval Seminary, where, in a large bare room, were gathered the children of the town. Father François was teaching them.

The father was tall and thin. His high, small forehead overhung his worn face, of which every feature marked the ascetic; every line and furrow told of self-conquest. He had come to the Canadas dreaming of Iroquois martyr-fires. He was fulfilling the will of his superiors in teaching the children of Quebec their Aves and Paternosters; yet he did not complain. It was but another thorn in the crown; the cross could not be far beyond, and he was patient.

On this day, however, he found his task terrible. The children were restless, almost umanageable. At last the crisis came; the fierce spirit within him was stirred and he started to his feet, his eyes blazing, his lips trembling with the words which anger would not let him utter. The children gazed on their master in fear, waiting for what would follow. The words came at last, but they were only:

"Ah, well, mes enfants, let us repeat our exercise. Now!"

The brown fingers were clasped, the little heads were bowed, and the shrill quavering treble of the children mingled with the firmer tones of the priest. Then there was a rush and a tumult. Father François waited only for the lame child who went out after the others to disappear before he should throw himself on his knees, when he saw one boy still sitting in his place.

"Come, Pierre, we are free," said the father, but the boy did not move. He sat with his chin resting upon his hands, and did not even look up. The father approached him, and laid his hand kindly upon his head.

"What is it, little Pierre?"

The child roused himself, and turned his face up to the priest's.

"Father François," he said timidly, "what does it all mean, the exercises and the Ave? Why do we say them? Why do we call upon the blood of Christ and the Passion of Christ?"

"Ah! my little one," interrupted the father, "I cannot tell thee now. Some day, perhaps——"

Then as he saw the boy's puzzled face, he pushed back the chestnut locks from the open forehead, and looked long into the boy's eyes turned up to his own. Beautiful eyes they were, brown and clear and deep, shaded by long lashes. The priest saw something there which he had not seen before, something which made him look more attentively and murmur to himself. Then, as the boy trembled beneath his gaze, he started and said:

"Yes, little Pierre, thou shalt know all some day, for thou must be a priest."

"A priest," repeated the boy doubtfully. Then he rose. When he had reached the door he turned and saw the father's eyes still upon him. He made his bow.

"Good-day, Père François," he said gravely.

Pierre shut the door behind him, and was hurrying after the others, when he felt a light touch on his hand.

"Ah!" said he, "you here, Blanchette?" his troubled look changing into a smile. The children took hold of hands and ran down the hill, kicking the pebbles on before them. When they reached Dame Jupont's cottage, they separated, and Pierre went on alone.

"A priest," he thought again, "yes, I should like that, to live in the Seminary with Father François. But then," he added, "Blanchette could not come, and I love Blanchette."

. . . . .

The short, hot Canadian summer was over, and the cool, pleasant autumn was slowly fading into winter. One day, Pierre went out into the forest. There was a tall pine which he knew, head and shoulders above its brethren. Slowly he wormed his way up the smooth, straight trunk, and then swung himself lightly from branch to branch, higher and higher, until even Quebec lay far beneath. All about stretched the woods.

That forest ocean which girt like an island the little world which he knew—what a strange fascination it had for every Canadian boy! Scarcely a season passed but some of them, listening to its call, forgot all, defied the laws of the governor and the curses of the bishop, and went forth to live their wild, roving life beneath its shadow. That fascination which made rovers of his comrades was upon Pierre as he sat in his watch tower. Some day, he, too, would break the feeble bond of Canadian civilisation, and go out into the forest with Jacques Hertel or Nicholas Marsalet, or some other famous outlaw.

He would penetrate to the depths of the great wilderness and behold its mysteries for himself—the lakes, rivers, mountains and cataracts which it concealed. He would fill his canoe with beaver and marten skins, and return, floating down the great river, to purchase pardon of the priests, and deck Blanchette with presents.

Suddenly, he heard a voice calling his name, "Pierre, Pierre." He looked down and saw Father François far below him. He scrambled to the ground in haste, and took the priest's hand, and they went on together. When they were near Pierre's home, his mother came running out with a small bundle.

"There, my little one, are your clothes. Be good, and mind Father François."

She kissed him, and with a curtsey to the priest disappeared in the house. She was a good mother and loved Pierre, but she had eight others to labour for. Food was scarce, and the winters were hard in Canada, and, as the good fathers had offered to take Pierre, he must go. So Pierre went on with Father François to the Seminary.

The years rolled by. Pierre grew to be a tall, handsome youth, who, for his strength, was appointed to bear the sacred image of Christ in the processions. As he passed along amid the crowds of kneeling and praying worshippers, he sometimes saw Blanchette.

"Ah! but she is beautiful," he thought.

Still the years passed. Pierre was a priest now, bound by his three vows, and looking forward to a great mission in the future. Every missionary who returned to the Seminary kindled his zeal. To explore new regions and gaze first upon their wonders, to preach to the Indians and win new empires for Christ; to die, silent and heroic, by cold or hunger, by tomahawk or fire; these were the dreams that coursed through the brain of the young priest.

One day Pierre received a summons from the Father Superior of the Seminary. A band of Algonquins living near Lake Nipissing had come begging that a missionary be sent them, and the choice had fallen upon Pierre. The young priest's cheeks flushed, his eyes glittered, the blood tingled in his veins, but he suppressed his excitement and asked respectfully when he should depart.

Digitized by Google

"Of that we will warn thee," replied the Superior. "Meanwhile do thou diligently prepare thyself for thy mission."

Then, as the venerable father waved a blessing, Pierre withdrew to throw himself on the stone floor of the cell in a transport of joy and enthusiasm.

The Indians at Lake Nipissing spoke a mixture of Huron and Algonquin. To learn this dialect was Pierre's first duty. There was an old Huron who came often to the Seminary to bring game and poultry. To him Pierre turned, eagerly availing himself of his visits to pick up a few words and phrases.

The Huron gave him what help he could, but at best it was hard work translating the lofty hymns and prayers of the breviary into the perversities of an Indian tongue. Perhaps Pierre would have become weary but for the encouragement of Father François. The father was feeble now, but he seemed to renew his youth in sharing the hopes of Pierre.

"Ah! my son," he would say, "thou shalt go forth to the heathen, perhaps to martyrdom. And in that last glorious hour bethink thee of François, who longed for it himself likewise, many, many weary years, but was not found worthy."

Despite his increasing infirmity, Father François continued to perform his regular duties. Among them he was accustomed each week to go for an afternoon into the cathedral of Nôtre Dame to hear the confessions of the faithful and absolve the penitent.

At last one day he found himself unable to leave his cell, and reluctantly sent Pierre in his place. The cathedral was a bare, rude structure, but it seemed noble and glorious in the eyes of the simple Canadian priest. He walked about softly through the chancel into which the light fell in coloured squares from the great painted window.

He paused a moment before the sad-eyed Virgin, and, falling upon his knees between the lighted candles, murmured:

"Holy Mary, Mother of Mercies, pray for us poor sinners, now, and in the hour of death."

Then he went on to the narrow confessional box, above which was written the name of Father François. There was a bench within, on which he might sit, and a shelf to lean upon, which brought his ear near to a small opening, through which came sounds of confession and penitence, and through which he uttered words of rebuke or pardon.

The light from above fell upon his head with a soft radiance. Never had Pierre so felt the height and holiness of his priestly office. He sat long after his last penitent had departed, pondering and praying. At last the dim light warned him that the short winter afternoon was far gone.

He rose, but just then he heard soft, hurrying footsteps. Although the prescribed time was long past he could not endure that one soul should bear for another day the load of unshriven sin. He sank again on his seat. A gentle, musical voice pronounced the words:

"I, a poor, sinful creature, acknowledge before God and you, a priest, standing in the place of God——"

The gentle voice faltered. Instead of the hackneyed formula, came a despairing cry:

"Holy father, thou knowest my sin. I have fasted and prayed——oh! I have tried to pray, but I cannot. When I kneel before the Blessed Mother and gaze into her face, I see only him. I went yesterday to the shrine of St. Anne and knelt there, but, when I looked up at the great white Christ, they were his eyes that were upon me. Holy father, what must I do? I cannot wed another, I cannot give him up. I love him so——"

The words ceased, as if choked in utterance, and there was only the sound of a woman sobbing and gasping.

At the first tones Pierre had become pale and cold. He recognised the voice. It was Blanchette's. Then, as the words came faster, he felt himself turned to stone. He knew as if by instinct that it was of him she spoke. After she had ceased, he stood long in silence leaning against the wall for support, his hands clenched so that the nails cut red arcs in his palms. He repeated to himself again and again mechanically:

"Holy Mary, Mother of Mercies, pray for us poor sinners."

But he must rouse himself. Already Blanchette was alarmed at his silence and was crying:

"Father François, Father François, speak to me. For the love of Mary, speak."

Then he spoke with deep hollow chest tones.

"Blanchette Jupont, thou hast sinned mortally in setting thy carnal affections upon a priest of God. Yet repentance is still permitted thee. The saints shall plead for thee. The Crucified is still an atonement for thee. Verily, the sin killeth, but atonement maketh alive."

The sternness with which he begun failed him, and his last words were pleading and tender.

He ceased. The last sound came back to his ears in a hollow, echoing murmur. Then there was silence. Perhaps Blanchette had fled. He pushed open the door. The cathedral was dark, except where two feeble candles burned before the picture of the Virgin. He stood for a moment, reaching out his arms hesitatingly, as a blind man. The other side of the confessional box was open. In his groping he felt the door swung back. He breathed freely once more and took a quick step forward. Then he drew back with a cry of horror. Blanchette lay at his feet. He had almost trodden upon her.

One instant he turned his face upward in the darkness.

"Holy Saint Anthony, pray for me, pray for me," he murmured.

The next he threw himself on the ground, crying, "Blanchette, Blanchette," chafing her hands, one of which he had crushed. There was some holy water in the chancel, and raising her prostrate form in his arms, he staggered to the little circle of light and sprinkled her face with the sacred drops. At last she stirred and opened her eyes on his face, bending close to hers.

"Pierre, my Pierre," she whispered, still but half-conscious.

Pierre drew back into the shadow and watched her slowly returning to life. The dim candle-light fell on her face, pale with grief, her eyes large with weeping, her hands thin and worn with the tale of the beads. And as he watched, he felt a great pity and love surge up in his heart. The years of priestly training were swept away in a moment. Forgotten were the saints and martyrs whom he had reverenced. Forgotten the Virgin before whose shrine he had lain prostrate so many hours. In his soul there was another adoration.

The candles burned low; one of them expired. Then the doors of the cathedral opened wide, and the upper end shone brightly in the light of the torches borne by the priests marching slowly to the music of their processional hymn. At their head the Bishop of Quebec, tall and stately. After him came the Fathers of the Jesuit establishment; curés from the outlying parishes; missionaries from distant stations, bronzed with exposure; perhaps mutilated by the tomahawk or fires of their adversaries.

Pierre turned his head. In that advancing procession of emaciated, black forms, and cold, stern, set faces he saw the symbol of all he had been taught to consider worthy or heroic. Before him, with the feeble gleam of the candle upon her, was lying the embodiment of all that he should think impure and shameful. Was her face really the home of the frail, the false, the vicious? The fathers, even Father François, had said so. Was she a devil to tempt him, or an angel sent to guide and bless him?

"Audi preces cum fletibus," sang the fathers.

The words came to Pierre as from a great distance. He did not realise that in a moment the glare of those torches would be upon him. Already half the Cathedral glowed and flickered in their light. Then Blanchette spoke in a low whisper, "Pierre." He was at her side. She was frightened, and had called for help. He lifted her in his arms once more, and fled lightly and swiftly across the chancel and out into the night.

. . . . . .

The winter died at last, even in Canada. The snow mantle grew thin and ragged, letting the earth appear in great brown patches. Then a little verdure showed itself creeping along the black branches of the forest. The leaves grew larger and coloured the woods with the vivid green of early summer.

Digitized by Google

The green turned to crimson and gold. Then the leaves fell and lay in heaps beneath the trees. The breeze came from the north, and it became higher and sharper, one could almost hear the great winter coming down with stealthy footsteps through the forest in the sound of that north wind blowing over the rustling leaves.

On the bank of one of the streams which flow southward into the valley of the great lakes stood a small wigwam, a wretched affair made of a few saplings bent together and covered with bark. It was quite alone; for leagues in every direction there was no human habitation. Near the wigwam was a mound of fresh earth, beside which stood a man in the black cowl of the Jesuit Order, chanting the office of the dead:

"Miserere mei, Deus, secundum magnam misericordiam tuam."

The voice was hoarse and rough at first; but, as it grew clearer and mellower, it thrilled and vibrated with grief, rising and falling in solemn mournful cadence:

"Requiem æternam ei dona, Domine."

The priest stood still beside the grave. He was bareheaded; his sunken, lack-lustre eyes looked out from under his long, matted hair; his face was gaunt with famine; his cassock was confined about his emaciated body by a girdle of wild vine. At last he started, and with a look backward at the deserted wigwam and unmarked grave, he strode quickly toward the river.

A birch canoe was drawn upon the bank. He pushed it before him into the mid-current of the stream and threw himself prostrate into its bottom.

The canoe floated on, shooting through narrow gorges where the river foamed and boiled, or gliding over wide spaces where the current scarcely made itself felt. The priest remained immovable. The noon sun and the cold dew of evening alike fell on his upturned brow, but he did not raise his head. The river bent itself between two jutting capes and was lost in the larger body of water beyond: the canoe rocked uneasily upon the surface of Lake Ontario.

A wave struck its side. It tipped, and the water ran in over the edge. It partly sank for an instant. Then, turning itself over, it rose again. The black-garbed form had disappeared beneath the water, but the canoe continued to float bottom upward on the surface of the lake.

"I LOVE YOU"

A GOOD many people have heard or read of Beermouth. Not quite so many, seduced by the prospect of "a clear bracing atmosphere, charming surroundings, refined associations, seaside and country combined, etc," have visited the place, and fully ninety-five per cent of the last named have vowed they will never on any consideration set their foot in Beermouth again.

How or why I came to Beermouth, it is needless to explain. But there I was, and there I was likely to remain; for at half-past four, on a dun-coloured autumn afternoon, I learnt to my disgust that I should have to wait something like a couple of hours before I could get a train which would land me anywhere within twenty miles of my destination.

And so there was nothing left for me but to throw myself on the mercies of that fully-licensed house, the Bull and Pup, which stands close to the railway station.

I established myself in solitary dignity in the bar-parlour, and there, while I smoked an excessively rank pipe to the accompaniment of some remarkably bad beer, I did make all manner of blessing upon Beermouth and its inhabitants, and particularly its railway service.

It was a positive relief to see the swing door pushed open. Anybody would have been welcome then. I could have found it in my heart to be hail fellow well met even to the oldest inhabitant.

Three men came into the parlour. The first, a slim, fashionably-dressed man of forty or so, favoured me with a slight bow and a cheerful "Good afternoon," as he advanced to the fire. There was nothing remarkable about the other two, who were squarely-built, middle-aged men, and from their attire might have been anything from commercial travellers downwards. They took their places on a settee near the door, and one of them ordered a couple of pints of ale from the barmaid.

"And a large brandy and soda for me, miss," struck in the slim gentleman, "and you need not trouble to put in all the soda. It is a trifle cold for ærated waters this kind of day. Miserable weather," he went on, addressing me, "When I think of what it is in Nice I positively shudder."

And very realistically he did shudder as he rubbed his hands over the cheerful blaze.

"Ever been to Nice?" he asked, as he seated himself opposite me and took a sip from the glass the barmaid had placed at his side.

I told him I had.

"Then there is no need to tell you of its beauties, its fascinations. No need to discourse to you upon the glory of the vine and olive-clad shores of the Mediterranean, along which the 'player's train' speeds daily on its way to Monte Carlo. A man can never be said to have lived until he has been to Monte Carlo, sir. It is there alone that you can love, that you can hate, that you can rejoice, that you can suffer; aye, until a man with the most powerful of wills, the most cast-iron of determinations, can say, and say truly: 'I have not lived in vain.'"

"It was last year at Monte Carlo that I met my fate," he went on, after a short pause, and a renewed application to his glass. "And, as we are likely to be here for the next twenty minutes or so, I will, if you will permit me, tell you the tale." I bowed assent.

"When a man plays at Monte Carlo," he continued, "he comes away either a winner or a loser, for the simple reason that, whatever his position may be at any period of the game, he must either win more or lose less, and so he goes on until either he has broken the bank or the bank has broken him. So it was with me.

"The first night I sat down and wagered a five franc piece simply for the excitement of the thing. It went, I put down another to get the first back. It went. To cut the matter short, I lost forty five-franc pieces, and then I judged it expedient to retire to my hotel and dream on it. The next night—the next, and the next, I returned to the field of battle with precisely the same result.

"Each evening I took with me to the table forty pieces of five francs, neither more nor less. Each evening I as regularly rose from my seat without a sou. And, mind you, there was not in my case any alternations of hope and despair—not even the faintest gleam of that shallow luck which at rare intervals serves to gild the career of even the most ordinary of gamblers. I lost unvaryingly and unceasingly, until I had compassed the (for Monte Carlo) phenomenal record of having backed the wrong colour two hundred times in succession.

Digitized by Google

"The loss of a thousand francs is nothing to cry about. Moreover, I had plenty more behind it. Still it annoyed me, particularly as on that fifth evening the well-dressed mob fairly crowded one another solely to have a peep at the 'unluckiest man who had ever been seen at Monte Carlo.'

"On the sixth morning I was in a most unenviable frame of mind, and after breakfast I strode up and down the terrace of the hotel trying to soothe my irritation with a pipe; the while I strove in vain to solve the problem offered by my extraordinary ill-luck. All at once she came, passing through one of the doors on to the terrace—my love, my life. My destiny, though little I knew it then.

"She was not a girl, but a woman of thirty, or perhaps a year or two more. She was not what the world at large would call beautiful. But it was the glory of her wondrous Spanish eyes which took my heart captive then and there. In an instant I knew that I loved her better than ever woman was loved in this world. I was not long in finding out who she was—the wife of a wealthy English manufacturer—a man much older than herself. She and her husband had arrived at the hotel the night before, and were likely, so the manager said, to remain there for some time.

"The same night I again went to the tables, this time with a single note for a thousand francs in my pocket. I found a seat, and after watching the course of the game for a few minutes, I ventured my stake on the red. Red it was, I left the money down—stake and winnings—and again red came up. As I drew my four thousand francs I glanced over my shoulder, and there was the lady just behind me.

"I rose and offered her my seat. She took it and began to play. Less than ten minutes settled her. By the distressed look she cast around the table I could see that she had lost all her money. For me to pass her one of my notes was the work of an instant. She took it with a smile and a bow, and put it on the black. Up popped zero. In quick succession I handed her the remaining three notes. They all went in on the black, just as they had come to me on the red.

"As the croupier was raking in the last of my crisp pieces of paper, the lady's husband stepped behind her, and laid his hand heavily on her shoulder. She rose and faced him. What he said to her, I know not, for he spoke in Spanish—a language I do not understand. But her face grew deathly pale, and her blue-black eyes blazed with anger. Then he turned to me.

"'Sir,' he said, 'you have lent my wife money. It was a chivalrous action, but from my point of view, considering the purpose for which the money has been applied, your generosity has been misplaced. However, I have only to beg you to tell me the amount in which my wife is indebted to you so that I may reimburse you.'

"'Vingt mille francs,' came the answer, sharp and clear, in the purest Parisian from the lady.

"I opened my mouth to protest, but the lady laid her finger on her lip and, like a fool, I was silent.

"'A cheque shall be sent you this evening,' he replied, with which he took his wife's arm and led her from the hall. When I reached the hotel that night a letter was handed me by the clerk. I opened the cover. It contained an open cheque for eight hundred pounds, signed by the manufacturer.

"Next morning I was once more on the terrace. I felt like a knave, and, no doubt, I looked like one; for was not that accursed cheque burning its way from my waistcoat pocket literally to my heart-strings? Again the lady appeared. This time she came straight to me.

"'Sir,' she said, speaking rapidly in French, 'last night you did me a great favour; to-day you can do me an even greater one. I told my husband I owed you twenty thousand francs, because I had urgent need of sixteen thousand, and it was the only means by which I could get the money. Here are your four thousand francs, and now please give me my husband's cheque.'

"I hesitated.

"'I know you will,' she pleaded.

"'Why?' I stammered, as I handed her the slip of pink paper.

"'Because—I love you!' and turning swiftly on her heel she sped into the hotel.

"That afternoon she and her husband took their departure from the hotel—whither, I knew not—nor did I take any particular trouble to find out. I am a fatalist, sir, and I believe that everything comes to the man who waits. I waited patiently weeks and months, till last June. One night I was in the stalls at the Queen's Theatre. She was in a private box. She beckoned me up with her fan, and I sat by her during the whole of the performance. Can you doubt that I ventured to tell her of the deep love that was in my heart for her? She listened, and when I had finished, she said:

"'My friend, what I told you at Monte Carlo is true. I love you. But one obstacle bars our path to happiness. My husband. You must kill him!'

"'In a duel?' I asked.

"'Duel! No!' and she laughed merrily. 'He is one of your solid, respectable Englishmen, and if you spoke to him of a duel he would hand you over to the care of the police in less than no time. You must murder him!'

"'Never,' I gasped.

"'Why not?' she asked. 'You have robbed for me. Why should you not murder? Is it not written somewhere or other that the man who will steal needs but little to induce him to murder? Listen, my husband has gone to-night to one of those solemn commercial dinners which I abhor and detest. He will return on foot, and will reach home at a little before one. Here is the address,' and she thrust an envelope into my hand. 'Choose your time—kill him!'

"That night I killed him; placed a stiletto in so neat and workmanlike a manner between his shoulders that he fell without a groan. There is the making of a fine art in murder," and my companion chuckled merrily.

"You killed him!" I gasped, as I moved my chair back a few feet.

"Certainly," was the matter-of-fact reply; "what is a husband more or less when he is in the way? But, listen, that is not the worst; the murder remained a nine days' wonder—one of those hidden mysteries which go towards making up London's sum of happiness. After a reasonable delay, I called upon the widow—my widow. She was not alone. Another man was seated in the drawing-room. Do you know what she told me before him? That the love which had been mine was his, that she was to marry him the next day, and that I was to be left."

Then, bending forward, my companion whispered hoarsely:

"I killed them both with the poker. I will show you how!" And, springing to his feet, he grasped the poker from the fender and swung it above his head; but only for a second, for the two men were on him, and in a trice he was handcuffed, and a broad strap bound around his legs. Oh, how he howled and shrieked, and blasphemed and prayed by turns!

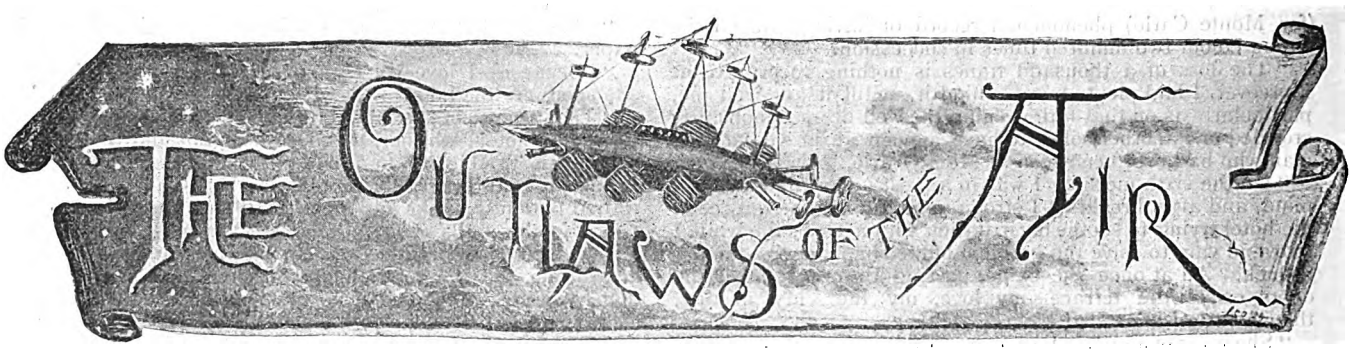
"Stark that, will yer?" growled one of the men. "Oh, yer won't! Then we'll try how this suits yer," and a hastily-improvised gag was thrust into his mouth. "Sorry to disturb you, sir," the man added, addressing me; "but he'd have brained yer with that poker in a couple of shakes if we hadn't stepped in. His friends kep' him at home till to-day; but now he's turned dangerous, and we're taking him to the asylum. There's the trap, Bill. Come along," and, one taking the head and the other the feet, the men carried their writhing burden out of the room.

Calmly and methodically the barman came in to remove the glasses, and then informed me, in the most matter-of-fact fashion, that such scenes were of frequent occurrence in the bar parlour of the Bull and Pup, while keepers and patients, who had arrived by train, were waiting for a conveyance to take them to the asylum, some eight miles distant.

"But," I asked, "do you think it wise to serve a raging lunatic with a large brandy and soda?"

"Brandy and soda, indeed!" and he sniffed contemptuously. "Not much! That was toast and water. We knows them 'ere loonatics, we does."

Digitized by Google



By George Griffith,
Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.
Franz Hartog—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.
Sir Harry Milton—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia in his yacht, the Calypso, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.
Herbert Wyndham—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.
Frederick Austen—the inventor of the air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.
Frank Markham—the young captain of the Utopian yacht, Mermaid.
Violet Milton—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is fearfully injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.
Dora Merton—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.
Lucy Summers—another fair Utopian.

Renault in the air-ship Vengeur, and Hartog in the torpedo-boat Destroyer, levy blackmail on the high seas. Just as they have annihilated a combined British, French, and Portuguese fleet sent to discover them, a Maxim aeroplane, the Britannia, comes on the scene, and is captured by the Vengeur. Those on it are put ashore, and one of the crew shoots at Renault and wounds him. A few weeks later Renault and Hartog set out for the Island of Utopia for the purpose of destroying its inhabitants, but find it deserted. On the discovery of Renault's treachery, the whole colony had gone back to England, Wyndham, together with Adams, Austen, Sir Harry, and his sister Violet, travelling in the Nautilus, a newly-built torpedo-boat, which, while coming up the English Channel, is challenged by a British cruiser. It appears that England is at war with Russia, and war with France is imminent. The Nautilus is sent in pursuit of two French torpedo-boats, and destroys them both.

CHAPTER XXVII.

A Visit to Paris.

While these events were taking place in England, the crews of the Destroyer and the Bremen were enjoying what they no doubt considered a well-earned holiday amidst the tropical beauties of Utopia. Renault and Hartog had decided for the present at any rate to take possession of the island and the dock-yard, keeping a sharp look out for unwelcome visitors, and to take advantage of their leisure to fit out the Bremen as a floating workshop for the construction of the air ships, as soon as the necessary materials could be obtained from their agents in America, England, and Europe.

They knew that they would be free from interruption at any rate for a period of some weeks, it might even be months, since it would be absurd for an expedition to be sent out to attack them in the island, unless it could be supported by at least two or three air-ships, and these Max knew from experience could not possibly be built and made ready for flight in less than four months from the time that work was commenced on them. He knew that Sir Harry and his friends would push on the construction of their vessels with the utmost possible speed; and he also saw clearly that, if there was going to be a fight for the empire of the air, the side that got its fleet on the wing first would have an immense advantage over the other.

So convinced was he of the paramount necessity of expedition that, after he had been a fortnight in Utopia, and had seen Hartog get everything into working order, he determined to run the risk of a journey to America and Europe, in order to personally visit his agents and push on the construction of the various parts of the air-ships to the utmost possible speed.

It was not, however, only reasons of policy which impelled him to this decision, for Max Renault was a man who possessed all the strong passions usually associated with his masterful type of character, and of these, next to the ruling passion which had made him the implacable enemy of all organised society, the strongest was his love for the beautiful girl in whom he had recognised a soul kindred to his own, which, while admitting his superior strength as a leader and an organiser of the forces of Anarchy, had tacitly asserted an authority of its own over him, an authority which she knew he was willing to bow to the moment that she gave him the permission she had hitherto coldly and consistently withheld, because in the nature of the case it must involve the surrender of herself to him.

His attempt to carry off Violet in the air-ship from Utopia had really only been the result of a passing fancy, strengthened by a savage desire to inflict an irreparable injury upon her and her brother, and the friend who was perhaps her lover, simply because they were members of the class that he hated with the whole strength and bitterness of his perverted nature. Had the attempt been successful—if Violet had been cast in a less heroic mould, and had not chosen the peril of almost certain death to the slavery which he would have imposed upon her—he would, probably, have amused himself with her as long as the fancy lasted and then killed her in cold blood to remove an obstacle to the execution of his plans.

But with regard to Lea Cassilis, his feelings were very different. He really loved her with the love that such a man as he only gives once and to one woman, no matter how many others might claim or win the admiration of the passing moment. And now his thoughts had gone back to the challenge that she had given and he had accepted in the little upstairs room in the back street off the Caledonian Road more than four years before.

She had tacitly admitted that if the projects of that memorable night were realised it would be for him to take and keep that which he chose should be his—and did she not well know what that would be? Now the power to carry out those projects was finally his. He was no longer the nameless Anarchist lurking in the obscurity of city slums and planning murders and outrages in the dark. He was the acknowledged and unquestioned leader of a band of desperate men who had declared open war upon the world and had so far proved themselves invincible.

Then they were poor; now they were wealthy, and their wealth skilfully used would enable them to turn the resources of civilisation against itself. They could spend money like water, and every pound would buy as much for them as it would for everyone else. There was no fear of their spending too much. The wealth of the world's commerce was theirs to draw upon as they needed. There was no answer but submission to the demands which came from the unassailable vantage ground of the air.

Digitized by Google

Would Lea still hold to her part of the implied bargain between them? Would she think that he had accomplished enough of his part to claim the performance of hers, or would she tell him to wait until the now inevitable struggle for the empire of the air had been fought and won, and society lay helpless before the most formidable and implacable enemies that it had ever had?

It was to receive an answer to these questions and others that were shaping themselves in his heart and setting his cool, evenly-flowing blood aflame that, after a two months' voyage, during which he had visited every agent in America and England, and with his own eyes seen and inspected the progress of the work on the materials of the air-ships, that he set the Vengeur's head towards Paris and dropped her to the earth one dark night in the forest of Fontainebleau.

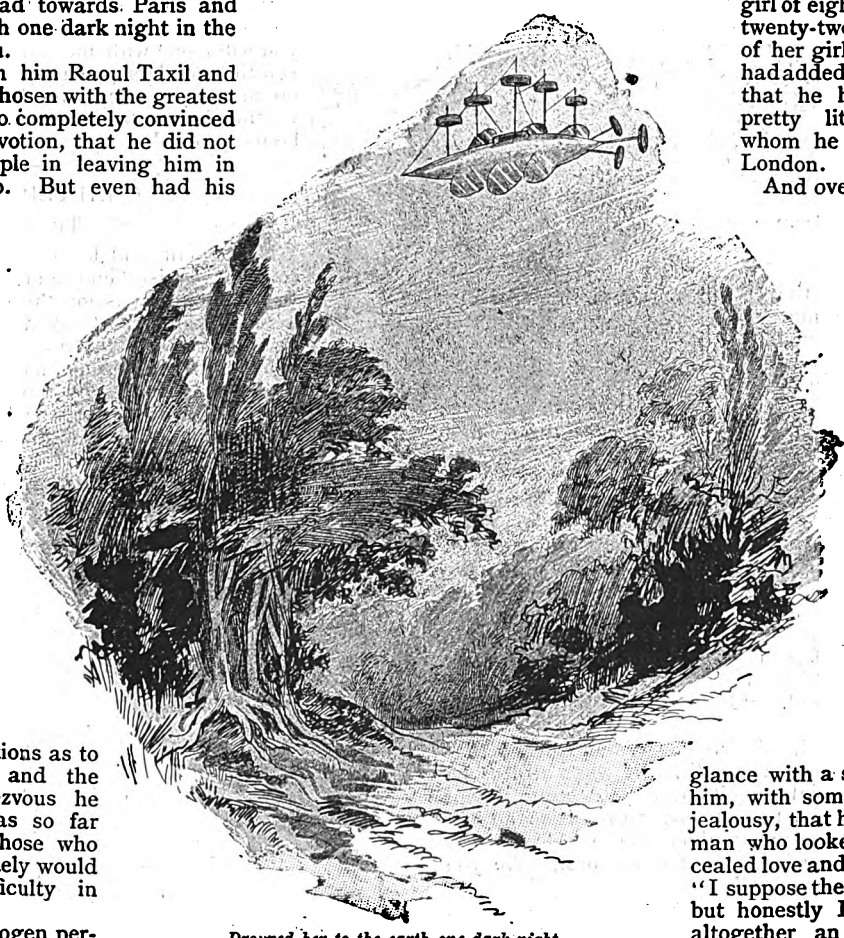
He had brought with him Raoul Taxil and six men whom he had chosen with the greatest care. Taxil had now so completely convinced him of his personal devotion, that he did not feel the slightest scruple in leaving him in charge of the air-ship. But even had his estimate been wrong he knew that treachery was impossible, if only because everyone on board the Vengeur was convinced it would not pay. He was the only one who was able to prepare the motor fuel which worked the Vengeur's engines. Not even Franz had been admitted to the secret. It fact Max had told him point blank that he would put a bullet through the head of him or any one else that he even suspected of trying to share the secret with him.

When he left the air-ship, after having given Taxil full instructions as to evading observation, and the keeping of the rendezvous he had appointed, he was so far disguised that even those who knew him most intimately would have had some difficulty in recognising him.

A liberal use of hydrogen peroxide had bleached his hair from glossy black to the bright bronze tint which had been so popular among beauties, professional and otherwise, a few years before. His dark eyebrows had been lightened by the same means, and a neatly trimmed moustache and imperial to match had been skilfully affixed to his clean-shaven lip and chin.

With a light valise in his hand he made his way into the town of Fontainebleau, and caught a train there which landed him in Paris shortly before midnight. He slept in a small hotel near the Lyons station, and occupied the following forenoon in fitting himself out with clothes which would be less conspicuous in Paris than the quaint ill-fitting odds and ends that he had been obliged to borrow from his men.

Before doing this, however, he had despatched a telegram addressed to Madame Cora Dail, 5, Rue Vernet, Champs Elysées, and the consequence of this was that when at four o'clock that afternoon he sent up a card inscribed; "François Laroche," and having an almost imperceptible pencil-mark in the top left-hand corner, to the first floor, the concierge informed him that he was expected, and touched a bell which brought a smart English footman to conduct him to Madame's presence.



Dropped her to the earth one dark night.

As the portière of the luxuriously-furnished boudoir fell behind him, a slight and still almost girlish figure rose with a nearly inaudible rustle of soft draperies from a low couch in a delightful little curtained alcove formed by a deep window looking out on to the broad tree-lined avenue.

"Welcome, Monsieur Max," said a well-remembered voice, and as he took the little, cool, soft hand that was placed in his, he looked up and their eyes met. It was Lea, but Lea glorified; and the sight of her beauty dazzled him for the moment and seemed to deprive his usually ready and deliberate tongue. The four years which had transformed the girl of eighteen into the woman of twenty-two had touched nothing of her girlish freshness, but they had added to it a reposeful dignity that he had never seen in the pretty little dressmaker, with whom he had fallen in love in London.

And over and above this there was the glamour that wealth, which only emphasises the coarseness of the common human material, enables innate refinement to glorify itself with. Madame Cora Dail, the alleged widow of the millionaire slayer of hogs in Chicago, was a very different person from Lea Cassilis, the clever and precocious girl-member of the Autonomie Group No. 7, and this Renault saw at a glance before she had uttered her second sentence in greeting to him.

"You are somewhat changed I see," she went on, meeting his glance with a steadiness that warned him, with something like a pang of jealousy, that he was not now the only man who looked at her with unconcealed love and admiration in his eyes. "I suppose the change was necessary, but honestly I can't say that it is altogether an improvement. That moustache and imperial—may I ask whether they are a natural growth or only assumed for the occasion?"

There was a slight suspicion of mockery both in her tone and her words that irritated him not a little, and seemed to tell him that he was likely to find the distance between them as great as ever, but he kept himself well in hand and replied in similar tones.

"Unfortunately, the change which has the misfortune to fail to please your ladyship was necessary, but, happily for me, it is not permanent. The moustache and imperial were purchased with the hair-dye, and have only been in position since last night. A pretty fair growth for the time, aren't they? But, to turn to a more interesting subject, permit me to offer my compliments in exchange for your welcome. To use the old simile of the butterfly and the chrysalis ——"

"Thanks, Monsieur Max, we will take it as spoken," she interrupted with a half curtsey and a smile that dazzled him afresh. "I was in hopes that you had brought some more interesting conversation with you than that. Let me assure you that since I have been the widow of an American millionaire, with half Paris at my feet, my ears have been so sated with pretty sayings that I could almost thank anyone who would be absolutely rude to me.

Digitized by Google

A slight and almost girlish figure rose.

"But come," she went on, with a sudden and, to Max, very pleasant change in her manner. "I suppose we have something better to talk about than this. Ah, there is the coffee. I have given instructions that I am not at home to the President himself, if he should do me the honour to make an afternoon call, and so for the next two hours at least we can entertain each other with all the news that we have to exchange. For instance, I am literally dying to hear all about your life on that wonderful island of Utopia where ——"

"Utopia!" he interrupted. "How did you know that was its name?"

"Why from Leo Marcel, of course. When I heard that he had got back from Africa, as he did just when all Europe was ringing with your aerial exploits over the Atlantic, I sent him a telegram asking him to come over to Paris and tell me all he could about you—I mean about your adventures and the air-ship. Ah, that reminds me, tell me first, have you brought her with you to France?"

"I am more than delighted by the knowledge that you thought me worthy of so much interest," replied Max, obeying the gesture which invited him to seat himself on the dainty silk-covered sociable on which she was reclining. "Yes, I have brought her. Last night she landed me in the forest of Fontainebleau, and by this time she should be safely hidden in some snug little ravine in the Pyrenees."

"In the Pyrenees!" exclaimed Lea; "that is a very long way off, isn't it? Are you not afraid of your lieutenant or your crew running off with your priceless craft, and going into the general destruction business on their own account?"

"Not in the slightest," laughed Max, with a shake of his head. "I can trust them because they know that they can do nothing without me. I am the only one who knows how the Vengeur is driven, and, when they had used up the motive power that there is on board, they would have to get out and walk, for they couldn't make her fly another yard to save them from the guillotine. As for the distance, you forget that aerial travelling is not exactly like going by train or steamboat. The Pyrenees are only a three hours' flight from Paris, and if I had her here now you should dine in London this evening if you wished to do so."

"Marvellous!" she replied, looking at him this time with a real interest in her eyes. "But, of course, I had forgotten for the moment what Marcel told me about your speed. And now tell me, when may I expect a trip to the clouds in this wonderful cruiser that owns you as her master?"

"She will be back in the same spot at Fontainebleau at ten o'clock to-morrow night," said Max; "and then, if you think you can safely trust yourself with me, she shall take you, not only to the clouds, but beyond them, to the heights where the sun shines all day and the stars all night, and then she shall carry you to any spot of the world you may choose to see. If you would like to be the first woman who has ever set eyes upon the North Pole or the South, you shall see it, for the earth has no obstacles that the Vengeur cannot laugh at.

"I tell you, Lea, that the conquest of the air means more than you have ever dreamed of; and if you will come with me to-morrow night, I will show you the wonders and glories of a kingdom such as no man ever ruled over before, and which is only waiting for the fairest woman on earth to come and be its queen."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

TRAPPED.

No woman, and least of all women, Lea Cassilis, could have mistaken the meaning either of the words or of the low, passion-thrilled tone in which they were spoken. She looked at him as he sat there, leaning slightly towards her and possessing an unlikeness to himself that was almost grotesque. And as she looked she thought of the scene in the little clubroom, when she had snatched her hand away from under his and told him that it would be time enough to ask when he had the power to take.

Since then many things had happened. She had reigned for a season as the belle of Paris, spending money as she

A snug little ravine in the Pyrenees.

Digitized by Google

pleased with both hands, worming her way into intrigues which laid bare before her eyes the inner workings of the vast machine that is called Society. Before her radiant beauty and lavishly-spent wealth, all doors had flown open. She had mingled with the great ones of the earth; she had learned their secrets and won their homage; and she had seen that the management of nations was carried on by means of just the same petty trickery and sordid selfishness as she had witnessed in the conduct of the business of the fashionable dressmaker who had once been her mistress.

The further she had seen into Society, the less she liked anything save that gay, brilliant, idle aspect of it which was already beginning to bore her. Since she had come to Paris, fortunes, titles, and vast estates had been laid one after another at her feet, only to be rejected with a smiling tolerant disdain that had made some of the wits of Paris remark that "la belle Americaine" would be contented with nothing less than a crown.

Perhaps, after all, it was a crown that she was waiting for; and, if so, the hour and the man had come, and the crown would be hers for the taking, if she would but put out her hand for it. True it would be no tiara of gold and jewels, such as the queens of the earth wore, yet it would be such that the proudest of them might well envy her its possession. It would be the diadem of an empire without frontiers, of a realm that included the whole earth, and from whose throne she could hurl her lightnings alike upon palace and prison, striking down the mightiest and the meanest with a more than royal impartiality, and all this would be hers if only——

He picked Lea up in his arms.

"Monsieur Max," she said, with a new light in her eyes, and a brighter flush on her cheeks, when her thoughts had run thus far, "I know what you mean. You are thinking of what we said at the club that night. Well, I have been thinking of it too. I remember what I said and what you said, as distinctly, perhaps, as you do. Tell me now truly, for the sake of our common hatred of society, have you literally and actually the power to do what you said you would do then, and, therefore, to take what you—well, what you led me then to believe that you wanted?"

"I have," said Max, laying his hand on hers just as he had done that night: "I have the power and I have the will, and yet——"

"And yet what?" she asked, dropping her eyes for a moment before the steady gaze of his passion-lit eyes.

"Yet, though I have the will, there is something else that prevents me permitting it to put the power into action—something that makes me, virtual master of the world though I shall be in a few weeks from now, yet not master of myself."

"And that is?"

His grip tightened upon her hand as he answered:

"There is no need for me to tell you what you know already, Lea. A man does not love a woman like you and remain his own master long, and it is just because I love you that I cannot use the power which would force you to choose between surrender and destruction. If I loved you less than I do, it would be easy for me to wait my opportunity and carry you off in the Vengeur——"

"As you tried to carry off Violet Milton, eh?" interrupted Lea, looking into his eyes with a cold, searching glance, and speaking in the even tones of the merest common-place.

Such an unexpected facer would have disconcerted ninety-nine men out of a hundred, but Max Renault was the hundredth.

Inwardly, the shock of Lea's words seemed to him to drive every drop of blood out of his heart; but, outwardly, his iron nerves gave no sign of discomfiture. Like a flash, he saw that Lea's keen subtle wit had, with the single question, purposely created what might be the crisis of his life.

On his answer to it would depend her answer to the supreme question that he had put to her by implication in his last speech. His splendid nerves responded instantly to the call. Without the quiver of an eyelid, or a quaver in his voice, he replied:

"Ah; so you have heard of that little romance, have you? and that means that you have made the acquaintance of some of the Utopians or their visitors. May I ask who?"

If she had obeyed her first impulse, she would have struck him across the face, and ordered him out of the room, at whatever risk to herself. But the mood passed as quickly as it came. A glance at the strong, stern face and the steady eyes before her told her that in this stronger nature than her own she had met her master, and, as she was a woman, she liked him none the less for it.

As the sudden anger passed out of her heart, it was replaced by something that had never been there before, and her voice had just the least perceptible tremor in it as she answered his question.

"Sir Harry Milton brought his sister over to Paris nearly two months ago to put her under the care of Roulier, the great nerve specialist, and I met him while he was here. You didn't kill her, you know, when you threw her out of the air-ship—or, I forget, did she throw herself out?"

"Oh, she threw herself out," replied Max, with a note of astonishment in his voice. "But you amaze me by telling me she didn't die. Why she pitched herself out headlong when the air-ship was over a hundred feet from the ground—nearly two hundred, in fact. The girl must have as many lives as a cat."

"And suppose she hadn't thrown herself out, what then?" asked Lea, with a quite indescribable inflection of her voice.

"What then? May I smoke?" said Max, taking out his cigarette case.

Lea nodded, not having a word ready to reply with. He struck a match, lit his cigarette, and went on, in a voice that could not have been more imperturbable if he had been discussing the day's prices on the Bourse:

"Well, then I suppose I should have acted as any other man who was also a good Anarchist would have done under the circumstances. You see, under those same circumstances Miss Milton would have had the disadvantage of being at the same time a really decent-looking girl and the daughter of a race which every good Anarchist is, by the very principles of his being, impelled to reduce to the last extremity of degradation, and so——"

"And so," said Lea, leaning forward, her lovely face all aglow with what was now genuine, uncontrollable admiration for the masterful spirit of the man who, without a perceptible effort, had thus put her desperately meant home-thrust aside—"and so there isn't the slightest need for you to say any more about it.

"Max, I've met my master, and, like any other woman who is a woman, I'm glad of it. There's my hand. Take it or leave it, as seems good to you. When the Vengeur comes back to Fontainebleau, you will only have to renew your invitation, and I will take that trip to the clouds and beyond them—as your guest, remember—and you shall show me all these kingdoms of the air and the world and the glories thereof, and after that—well, we shall see. Now, does that content you?"

Max made no reply in words, simply because no words occurred to him which to his mind were capable of doing justice to the situation. He rose to his feet, picked Lea up bodily in his arms, pressed one long lingering kiss on her willingly surrendered lips, and then put her down again. Then seating himself beside her, he put his arm round her waist, drew her head down on to his breast, and said quietly:

Digitized by Google

"It is so! If ever mortal man had reason to be content, then I am content. I have offered you what no man was ever yet able to offer to woman, and you have accepted it. May the Fates cover all my plans with confusion if ever, for a moment even, you have reason to regret the choice that you have taken!"

And then he bent his head down and kissed her again, and after that she raised her head and looked him in the eyes, and said in a low, steady tone:

"Even so. You have given to me what never was given to woman before, and I have given you in return all that a woman can give, and if either of us fails in justice to the other, may that other be able and willing to exact the last penalty of vengeance that human hate could wish for! And now let us talk."

The hint was obvious, and Renault took it, and so for nearly an hour this strangely-betrothed man and woman sat and talked just as any other man and woman in all Paris might have talked, saving only for the subject of their conversation. Each told the other in quiet, matter-of-fact narrative what his or her experiences had been since the last time they had met, and then they went on to discuss the prospect that now lay before the ruthless apostles of the propaganda by force.

They discussed the fate of nations as though they had been the joint arbiters of Destiny, and they decided whether monarchs and statesmen should live or die as best suited their purposes; whether the war that had been declared between Britain and Russia should be allowed to go on, or whether either State should be paralysed by blows which they alone could strike at its head; and whether those who now held the guiding reins of the world should be allowed to hold them a little longer, or whether, by striking them down, one after the other, in swift succession, the States of Europe should be thrown headlong into the demoralisation of leaderless anarchy. As the little clock in the boudoir chimed six, Lea rose and said:

"Now, for the present, or till to-morrow morning, au revoir. As I told you I have a card for the President's reception to-night at eight, and you may be sure that I shall not fail to do what is necessary. By to-morrow I shall have made the necessary arrangements for our journey, and you will find me at the Lyons station at eight o'clock, by which time those whom it may concern will understand that I am somewhere else. Happily rich American widows in Paris are expected now and then to be guilty of some eccentricity and this will do for one of them. And so, mon maitre bien aimé, à demain, au revoir!"

When the train left Paris for the south at a quarter past eight the following evening, Max and Lea were seated in a first class coupé, and by ten o'clock they had reached the little open space in the forest in which Lea for the first time saw the, to her, strange shape of the Vengeur, as the air-ship, prompt to the minute of the rendezvous, dropped slowly through the darkness on to the soft brown turf.

Five minutes later they were on board, and Lea saw the tree-tops swiftly sinking down beneath her as the Vengeur soared up again into her element. The night was dark and cloudy, but through the clouds the pale glimmer of half a moon could every now and then be seen. As soon as the Vengeur was well clear of the trees, Max took Lea with him into the conning-tower and, inclining the slats of the air-planes, he sent a signal for full speed to the engine room. Then slipping his arm round Lea's waist, partly perhaps with the object of keeping her steady during the air-ship's upward flight, he said:

A huge shadow of the "Vengeur."

"Now watch with all your eyes!"

The next moment the Vengeur leapt forward and upward; the cloven air sang and whistled past her, and the black curtain of cloud seemed to fall bodily towards the earth. For a moment the grey billows rolled noiselessly about them, and then, in wondering admiration too intense for words, Lea saw a vast, limitless sea of snowy cloud-fleeces spread out beneath her, and above she saw the unclouded vault of heaven gemmed by myriads of stars, amidst which the golden crescent of the moon floated stainless and serene, her white light casting a huge shadow of the swiftly flying Vengeur on the snowy cloud-sea beneath them.

Digitized by Google

There was no sleep for Lea that night. In vain Max tried to persuade her to go to her cabin as the larger hours of the morning approached. Intoxicated with the strange beauties of the scene and the bewildering novelty of her first aerial voyage, she insisted on remaining with him in the conning-tower until the beauties of the moon-lit night were eclipsed by the glories of the sun-rise over the sea of clouds, which still lay outspread beneath them as far as their eyes could reach.

Then, when weariness at last overcame her, she went to her cabin to sleep and dream of all the marvels she had seen, and Max, after sending for Taxil to take command, went to his to dream other dreams no less entrancing. About two o'clock in the afternoon, Lea met Max again in the saloon, and after their greeting, said:

"Well, where has this wonderful voyage brought us to by this time?"

He pulled back the slide from one of the side windows and pointed through a great rift in the clouds that lay a thousand feet below them. Her eyes followed the direction of his finger as he pointed downwards, and she saw beneath the clouds another cloud of grey blue smoke, through which a thousand roofs and spires were dimly showing.

"There's London," he said. "To-night we will dine at the Métropole and then run up to the Criterion and see a comedy, of course adapted from the French, which I think will amuse you. There's a burlesque Anarchist in it, not at all a bad character from the capitalist point of view. The interesting part about it is that in the last act it almost becomes a tragedy."

Not many hours later Lea remembered these lightly-spoken words, in the midst of the first real agony of terror which she had ever passed through. The Vengeur was brought to ground in the midst of a dense bank of fog which lay along the Essex shore of the estuary of the Thames, a little to the north of Southend-on-Sea, and Max and Lea landed with one of the crew to carry their two valises and to act as messenger between them and the air-ship if necessary.

Taxil had, of course, received minute instructions as to keeping in touch with them; and, as they took their way towards the station, the Vengeur rose in the air again and vanished in the fog.

He was completely trapped.

That evening, as Max had promised, they dined at the Métropole, and afterwards went to the Criterion Theatre to see the comedy and the burlesque Anarchist.

Of all the theatres in London, that was the worst one they could have chosen to visit on that particular night, for, as the fates would have it, while they sat in their stalls, one of the side boxes in the second tier was taken possession of by four gentlemen, who were no others than Sir Harry Milton, Lieutenant Wyndham, Captain Maxwell (late of Her Majesty's ship Devon), and Lieutenant Pelham (late of the æroplane Britannia), both of whom had been cashiered, one by a court-martial and the other by the syndicate which had sent the Britannia to do battle with the Vengeur.

In such a place it was impossible that Lea's brilliant and uncommon beauty should not attract almost universal attention. Sir Harry recognised her at once, and then began to look curiously at her companion. Of course, he pointed him out to Wyndham, and then the two opera glasses came earnestly into play. Max's disguise was quite good enough to deceive even an intimate acquaintance passing him casually in the street, but it could not stand the searching examination that he was subjected to for the next two hours.

Feature by feature, gesture by gesture, he was identified without having an idea of what was going on. For, the moment their suspicions were aroused, Sir Harry and Wyndham kept themselves and their friends well in the background of the box. At length when the performance was over conjecture had so far become certainty that all four had determined to take the risks and act.

Just before the curtain came down they left their box and stationed themselves among the well-dressed idlers who were already lounging about the entrance to the theatre. As the occupants of the stalls and dress circle and boxes came slowly up the steps which led from the theatre, they watched each rank narrowly until Lea at last appeared leaning on Max's arm. This was Sir Harry's cue. He walked forward and raising his hat to Lea, said:

"Good evening, Mrs. Dail. Who would have dreamt of seeing you in London! What has London to offer so superior to the delights of Paris?"

Before she could reply, Wyndham stepped quickly up from the other side, with one swift movement of his left hand he snatched the moustache and beard from Max's face, and, taking him by the collar with his right, said in a loud clear voice:

"Good evening, Mr. Max Renault, Anarchist and murderer. Who would have thought of seeing you here to-night!"

Max, taken utterly off his guard, tried to wrench himself free and force his way through the excited crowd, which Wyndham's startling words had instantly brought about them, but it was no good, the surprise had been too carefully planned, and he was completely trapped. Captain Maxwell and Lieutenant Pelham elbowed their way through the crowd, each with a policeman at his heels, and when the crowd divided again, it was to allow the officers of the law to go out holding the famous Anarchist securely handcuffed between them.

(To be continued next week.)

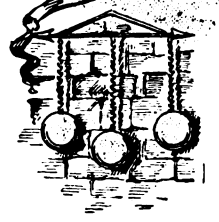
HOME NOTES! HOME NOTES!! HOME NOTES!!!

The Special Double Winter Number on sale THURSDAY, DECEMBER 13th.

A New Story by Mrs. HUNGERFORD commences in this issue.

Digitized by Google

THE LAY BROTHER'S RING.



MONSIEUR LAGRANGE sat behind his window at No. 28, Seymour Street, Pall Mall, looking over his accounts. The window was draped after a fashion that displayed both art and science. A few pieces of old lace and antique jewellery were exhibited in such a way as to inform the initiated passers-by that such articles were bought, sold, and taken in pledge on the premises; while true science was shown in the arrangement by which the master of the establishment could see into the street without himself being observed.

It was a convenient plan; and it enabled M. Lagrange to notice that a tall, pale, clean-shaven young man was peering in at the window in an inquisitive way. He had a semi-clerical aspect, wearing a low-crowned, black, soft felt hat, and that voluminous garment known as an "Inverness cape." His manner was nervous and hesitating, as of a man who found himself in an unwonted or embarrassing situation. He made as though he would pass on, stopped, looked at the name on the brass plate a second time, glanced up and down the street, and then, with an air of affected unconcern, walked into the establishment.

M. Lagrange's street door opened noiselessly, and admitted the visitor to a small, carpeted hall, in which the only apparent aperture was a window like that of the booking office at a railway station, formed chiefly of ground glass. The open part was close to the seat occupied by M. Lagrange, who had, of course, observed all the movements of his visitor.

After standing opposite the aperture for a minute or two without seeing anybody, the stranger rapped gently with his knuckles on the window sill, and shortly afterwards M. Lagrange, with the air of a man who was taking a gentle constitutional, sauntered past the spot.

"I have got a ring," began the stranger, speaking with a marked French accent.

Lagrange gave his visitor a bold look, before which the young man's eyes dropped, and held out his hand for the trinket.

With some hesitation the stranger produced a plain gold ring of a peculiar pattern, and laid it on the desk before him. It was very much like one of those old-fashioned rings which were made with a hollow space for a morsel of the hair of a deceased friend; only, in this case, a scroll-work took the place of glass; and this scroll-work was of a very delicate pattern, here and there pierced with minute holes. Lagrange had seen such rings before, and knew that in former days they had often been used as the repository of some small articles of value, such as a gem or a precious medicine.

Taking it up in his fat, shiny fingers, Lagrange (without a word of apology to the owner) carried the ring to a large plate-glass window under pretence of examining it under a better light. The pawnbroker then weighed the trinket in his hand, peered at it curiously through a magnifying glass, shook it a second, a third, a fourth time with increased interest, for he was certain that he heard something rattle inside.

Bending a little backwards, M. Lagrange took an observation of his visitor through a convenient hole in the ground glass, and then, moved by a feeling that the stranger's face was not unfamiliar to him, he wrote a few words on a scrap of paper, which he despatched through a tube.

"This is a quaint little thing," observed the pawnbroker, returning to his customer.

"A—yes."

"Have you any objection to give a reference? It is usual."

"Well—a—I'm not sure that the Father-Superior would like it. The ring belongs to our Order—the Order of St. Simeon. We lost all our property during the reign of the Commune in Paris, and then the French Government banished us with the other monks."

"What is all that to me?" asked the pawnbroker impatiently.

"One of the Fathers," said the stranger, in a humble tone, "told me to try and borrow a little money on the security of this ring. But, you understand, I must not sell it. It is a kind of relic, for it belonged to Father Clerc, the Superior of our Order, who was shot by the Communists in 1871. He got it conveyed out of prison to one of our friends."

"How?" asked Lagrange, who was beginning to feel interested.

"I cannot tell, I did not belong to the Order then."

"But you do now?"

"Yes, I am a lay-brother."

"Well, I don't mind lending you a sovereign. It's only worth the weight of the gold."

"But we must have more than that, Monsieur," and the lay-brother leant forward through the window and spoke in a low, eager tone: "We are all convinced that there is something remarkable about the ring. I have heard that Father Clerc always wore it, and warned us not to part with it, because it would one day bring back prosperity to our community."

"He sent that message out of prison along with the ring?" asked the pawnbroker, in a careless tone.

"So I have heard," responded the lay-brother

Could it be, Lagrange asked himself, that the imprisoned priest had used this ring as a means of conveying a secret message to the rest of the community? He felt interested and curious. Eventually he agreed to lend Brother Antoine three pounds on a special contract, which provided that if the ring was not redeemed within a month it should become the absolute property of Lagrange.

The young lay-brother cast a regretful glance at the ring, signed the agreement, slipped the sovereigns into his pouch, and left the establishment.

No sooner had the door closed behind his customer than Lagrange touched a bell which summoned his confidential clerk.

"Did you recognise the gentleman who left the house a moment ago?" he asked.

"I cannot be certain," answered the clerk, "but I fancy he is M. Le Comte Desnoëttes, a nobleman who used to visit monsieur years ago in Paris."

"Ah! Very likely. I fancied I knew the face. I thought I had assisted at the funeral of the gentleman's gay career! He tells me he has joined a religious order. Those poor devils often do when they are sold up. That will do, Marot."

Then the pawnbroker fell to examining the trinket which Brother Antoine had left with him. He even tried, by slightly enlarging one of the tiny holes in the scroll work, to catch a glimpse of the small object which his sense of hearing told him was concealed in the cavity of the ring. But in this he was quite unsuccessful, he could see nothing. All he could learn was, that if a precious stone was inside, it must have been wrapped in something to deaden the sound of rattling.

Not daring to break open the ring, Lagrange waited thirty days with the utmost impatience, hoping, almost against hope, that the young lay-brother would find himself unable, or would neglect, to redeem the trinket on the appointed day, and thus suffer it to become his property. He was convinced that the Superior of the Order would not have taken the pains to convey this ring to his brethren when he was in such imminent peril unless it contained something of value. Sometimes he felt as if he would give half his fortune to cut the trinket open.

Digitized by Google

One by one the days went by. Unluckily the month had thirty-one days. M. Lagrange reviled the idiotic arrangement of dividing the months of the year, and waited till the next day. As the afternoon drew to a close he became more anxious, more eager to possess the jewel and its hidden secret. He could not sit at the window. Every man who passed made his heart beat with the fear that it was Brother Antoine come for his ring.

At length Lagrange convinced himself that six o'clock had struck. He locked, and double-locked his door, drew down his blinds, seized an instrument, and in the twinkling of an eye hadcut the ring in two.

A tiny pellet of paper tumbled out.

Carefully and slowly the pawnbroker unrolled it. It was a morsel of very thin paper, closely covered by writing, so fine that it had evidently been written with the point of a pin. The colour was a reddish-brown—the colour of blood when it is dried.

With the help of a magnifying-glass, Lagrange read the secret message which the paper contained, written, of course, in French:

"My children, I die to-morrow, and I send you my blessing. The church plate is in the cistern of our own house, which has a false bottom. But our savings, amounting to nearly four million francs, I caused to be buried in the right-hand corner of the cellar of Jacques Guégan's house in the Rue St. Louis. He knows nothing of this. Courage and hope!—E. C."

Lagrange's fingers trembled, so that the paper fell from them on the desk before him, and his face became pale with excitement.

Four million francs—one hundred and sixty thousand pounds. Lagrange looked at his watch, seized a time-table, and turned over its pages with feverish haste. That night he crossed the Channel.

He could easily understand that the accumulated wealth of the Order of St. Simeon (which numbered many well-born men in its ranks) should reach the sum of four million of francs. And nothing was more probable than that the Superior of the Order should have buried the money in the house of some obscure sympathiser at the time of the siege of Paris. But the fear that haunted M. Lagrange's mind during the tedious midnight journey to Paris was—What if the secret has leaked out? or, What if the money has been accidentally discovered by someone who has had brains enough to hold his tongue? Once or twice the thought crossed his mind that this treasure did not belong to him. The poverty into which the Fathers of St. Simeon had fallen was probably due to the loss of this treasure, coupled with their expulsion from French territory. But M. Lagrange silenced his conscience with a growl. He had not carried on the trade of a money-lender in London for twenty years without being able to do that.

Having arrived in Paris, Lagrange sought out the Rue St. Louis, and found Guégan's house without much difficulty. It was a small, mean-looking place, hardly bigger than a cottage. Guégan was a shoemaker in a small way of business.

Lagrange paved the way diplomatically by ordering a pair of shoes, and then asked the shoemaker whether he had any cellars to let.

"Cellars! my faith, no!" answered the man of the lapstone. "The only cellar I have is paved with earth, but two metres either way. How could I let that? What do you want it for?"

Lagrange saw that he had made a blunder.

"I want it for a—a—store-place. But you are right. It is too small. I should need the lower flat also. Perhaps you would let the house?"

"Well—I have not thought of that," said the shoemaker, with a suspicious glance at his customer.

"What do you say to forty francs a month?"

"Not enough."

"But I should only occupy it a week."

Lagrange could have bitten his tongue off as these words escaped him, for he saw that they had roused the landlord's suspicions effectually.

It was in vain that he offered a higher and higher rent; the very fact of his being willing to pay a month's rent for a week's occupation of the premises seemed to make Guégan determined to refuse to let the place at all.

Lagrange saw that he would have to purchase the house out and out. Well, what did it matter? he said to himself. He could sell it again. The cottage and garden might be worth ten thousand francs.

"Would Guégan sell the house?" he asked.

"Yes," answered the shoemaker, with a grin. "What would the gentleman give?"

"I'll give you ten thousand francs down," said Lagrange.

The man darted a keen look at the stranger, shook his head, and calmly went on with his work.

"Eleven thousand—twelve thousand?"

"No."

Then Lagrange stopped. He saw that he must affect carelessness, or he would never get the house at all, and curtly saying, "Twelve thousand is too much; good-day," he abruptly left the shop.

But he could not rest for a moment. What if that horrid old man, who knew that the cellar was the centre of the eccentric stranger's interest, took it into his head to dig there in the meantime? Lagrange went to the Paris correspondents of his London bankers and provided himself with the equivalent of three thousand pounds. Then he provided himself with a notary, and, accompanied by this functionary, went back to the Rue St. Louis.

The old man proved a tougher customer than he had been before. He evidently saw that Lagrange had set his heart on buying, and he ran up the price till the pawnbroker, in despair, offered the man seventy-five thousand francs—the whole of his three thousand pounds. This was accepted; and that very afternoon the deeds were signed.

Lagrange, trembling with excitement, remained in the house during the rest of the day, and towards evening the shoemaker, having pocketed his money, went for a van and went off with his belongings.

Then the treasure-seeker set to work with pick and shovel, and dug deep into the solid earth—dug till the sweat poured from his brow, till his arms ached, till the walls of the house threatened to fall down and bury him.

If M. Lagrange could have peeped into the next street, and seen Guégan and the pretended lay-brother with a bottle of brandy between them, dividing, with many a joke and burst of laughter, the three thousand pounds which he had paid for the tumble-down cottage, he would have left off digging sooner.

THIRTY-TWO PAGES TO BE ADDED.

PEARSON'S LIBRARY

THE SUCCESS OF THE SEASON.

No. 3 Now on Sale, entitled

Thro' the Battle Smoke.

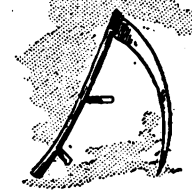
Illustrated by Messrs. KEMP TEBBY and RAYMOND POTTER.

A Complete Novel, with over 100 Illustrations,

FOR SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

FACING DEATH



ARRESTED, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged for murder—that is, the law called it murder. The prisoner had thought it all over many times, and he couldn't see that it was murder. He had taken up a stray mule. The owner came along and refused to pay the trifling sum demanded for expenses.

There was a fight, of course, and when mountaineers fight they mean to kill each other. He killed the owner of the mule. What was there wrong about that? Didn't he receive five knife wounds in the man's efforts to kill him? Wasn't it kill or be killed?

And why should they arrest him and confine him in gaol? He had no idea of going away. Why should he go? And why must he have a lawyer, and a jury, and a trial lasting four days when he could have told the judge all about it in five minutes? He summed up the whole case in his quaint, ignorant way when he rose in reply to the formal query, and said:

"Why, Jedge, I reckon they want to hang me, but doggone if I kin see what I've done to desarve it."

He received the sentence with a puzzled look on his face. Why put off its execution two months? It seems foolish to wait beyond a day to hang a man who had been sentenced to die on the gallows. He knew every man on the jury, and he couldn't understand why they were all down on him.

There were men who had slept in his cabin, eaten at his table, and hunted over the mountains with him, and the idea that they should bring in a verdict of guilty astounded him. It wasn't neighbourly. It wasn't doing as they would be done by. The gaoler tried to console him, but was waved aside with the exclamation:

"Don't, George! My head is so full of this fussin' around that I can't stand any more. Jest think of it! They called it murder, and ar' gwine to hang me for it!"

Twenty-four hours later he was imperturbable—stoical—as cool and calm as a man sitting at his own fireside. It had become clear to him that he was to die. It wasn't that he deserved it, and he could scarcely recall an incident of the trial, but he had to die, and that ended the matter for him.

He differed from an Indian only in the colour of his skin. One day his wife was admitted to see him. She had said to one of her neighbours:

"So they-uns ar' gwine to hang my Tom?"

"Yes, reckon he'll just hang."

"Shoo! 'Pears like a right smart of fussin' over nothin'. Tom had ter do it."

"Reckon he had."

"Reckon I orter go down and see he-un."

"Yes, I reckon yo' had."

"Then I will."

And one day, after a walk of twelve miles over the mountain roads, she arrived at the gaol and quietly remarked: "You-uns has got my Tom locked up yere."

"Yes."

"And he-un is to be hung purty soon?"

"Yes."

"Shoo! How triflin'! Reckon I'd better step in and see he-un fur a bit."

They brought him out of his cell into the corridor. He advanced and sat down beside the woman as if at their own doorstep, and she glanced all around her before saying:

"Heap better place than our old cabin, Tom?"

"Yes, heaps better, and good eatin'. How's the crops git on?"

"Mighty pore, Tom. Reckon that co'n never will be knee deep, and them taters is all dried up in the ground."

"Reckon yo'll git along somehow, arter all."

"Bound to, Tom—bound to. Doan't you-un worry 'bout me 'tall. What they-uns gwine to hang you fur?"

"Fur that killin', yo' know."

"Shoo! Yo' had ter do it."

"Of co'se."

"That yere Sam Andrews was just a-slicin' of yo' ter dawgmeat."

"Of co'se."

"Cut yo' mighty bad afore yo' did fur him."

"I showed 'em the cuts."

"But they-uns ar' gwine to hang yo'-un jest the same, eh?"

"Jest the same."

"How triflin'! Waal, Tom, what yo'un gwine to do 'bout it?"

"Jest hang, I reckon."

"Hain't gwine ter raise no fuss?"

"How kin I?"

They sat side by side, staring at the cell door across the corridor, for three or four minutes without another word. Then she said:

"Yo'r brother Jim will kill Bill Andrews, in co'se?"

"In co'se," he replied.

"And I'll shute, if I kin find the chance."

"Fur shoo. Reckon yo'd best cl'ar 'em all out, wimin and all."

"Yes, reckon I had. Gwine ter talk when they-uns hangs you, Tom?"

"Reckon not, I never did like talkin'."

"Reckon I'd best cum down that day."

"Do as yo' mind, but I reckon folks might talk."

"Yes, reckon they would. Reckon I'd best stay home. Gwine ter say any mo' to me, Tom?"

"Skassly. Doggone mean to hang me!"

"So 'tis, but they-uns is determined, I reckon. Mebbe I'll cum down next week—mebbe not."

"Jest as yo' mind. Gwine home now?"

"Yes, gwine right back. Good-bye, Tom."

"Good-bye, Linda."

Not a tear—not a kiss—not a handshake. It was their way. It was born in the flesh. She did not come again. When he was taken out to suffer death before a crowd of two thousand people he did not look about as if hoping to see her face once again.

She seemed to have gone out of his memory entirely. He did not even take a farewell glance at earth and sky. He just died—that was all. He was there to die, and he died. It might as well have been a log of wood at the end of the rope.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

XMAS FOR 1/3

Chest of Tea Included. (See below.)

"A HAPPY THOUGHT HAS STRUCK US," that we should like to make the readers of SHORT STORIES an extra special parcel of Christmas Cards. Simply plainly write nothing else but your name and address on the top of a piece of paper and the word "SHORT STORIES AUTOMATIC OWL PARCEL," and post it with Postal Order 1s. 3d., or 16 Stamps. And we will send per return, post paid on approval, all the following described Xmas Novelties. Notice, we send the parcel on approval. We do not hesitate to do this as we know "AS A MATTER OF FACT" that the first 3 Articles are worth the money. If you like the parcel, keep it. If not, return it, and we will return your money in full, and don't think any fairer offer can be made, do you? We are making up several thousands of parcels, as the demand must and will be great, and we shall not disappoint any one reader, as our stock is enormous, hence this great offer. Write any day before Xmas, but as early as possible. All Cards have choice and seasonable wishes. Sufficient to post to friends, and to decorate mantelpieces, to make the home bright for Xmas, will be found in each parcel as follows: A Sweetly Pretty Automatic Double Card, of a country scene—from the centre of a large tree is suspended a swing on which is seated a Pretty Little Girl, and a Little Boy in a Sailor's Suit is standing on the Swing. This really wonderful piece of workmanship, when stood up, works itself, without any winding with a key, the children swing happily to and fro, as if by machinery almost. The retail value of this one card alone we consider 6d. Another good Automatic Card is the "LIFE-LIKE FLYING OWL," marvellous mechanism, when stood up its large brown eyes blink at you, and its wings flutter up and down, without a key, again it works itself, value 6d. A Lovely Double Folding Card, with pretty gilt or silver flowers, fancy edge and open work, 6d. A Lovely Silver-Edged Art-Tinted Card, with natural-like primroses, and ivy leaves, wishes and verses in gilt, 6d. A Pretty Pale Blue Tinted Card, silver-edged, with lovely white flowers and leaves, 6d. A Wonderful Mechanical Standing Card—at one side is a pair of steps, which open to stand up, and then is seen "Father Frog" sitting at the foot smoking a pipe, and two young frogs are running up the steps; at the side is the large bird (a stork) gracefully watching the frogs antics, 4d. A Pretty Fancy Cut-out Snow Scene Card of trees, bridge, houses, church, &c., with lights in the windows 4d. A Lovely Card, with pretty heliotrope flowers and artistic basket work pattern, 3d. A Pretty Gilt-edged Card, with pretty art-shaded ferns and flowers in gilt, pink, and blue, 3d. A Card Representing a Chest of Tea, the lid opens, showing thetea, and a good Xmas wish, 2d. Dear Old Father Xmas Folding Card. Father Xmas is standing beside a donkey laden with presents for the children; in the background is seen a lovely sky, with numerous bright stars; one, being very brilliant, throws its rays across the whole scene, 3d. A Pretty Cut-out Card, with Pretty Sparkling Jewelled Flowers, tied together with Gilt Cords and Tassels, 2d. Besides all the above are Given Six more Pretty Xmas Cards, value 1d. to 3d. each, all Good Designs, and also Two SPECIAL OFFERS, which we Guarantee to Equally Benefit Each and Every Receiver of a Parcel. Our Motto is, "A BIG TRADE, NOT A BIG PROFIT." Established 1889. This is the Cheapest and Best Lot of Genuine Art Novelties Ever Offered in or out of England, we know. Remember, all Parcels are Sent on Approval. Address, MESSRS. PAIN BROTHERS, WHOLESALE "ART TRADERS," HASTINGS.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

DAMP FOGS WILL PREVAIL IN DECEMBER.

IT IS JUST AS USEFUL AT A "CRUSH," OR IN A HEATED BALL ROOM.

HINDE'S "CRISPA WATER," AN INVALUABLE PREPARATION FOR MAINTAINING A PERMANENT WAVE OR CURL TO THE HAIR. WILL MAKE LADIES INDEPENDENT OF THE WEATHER'S VAGARIES.

ALL CHEMISTS, PERFUMERS, OR STORES WHO SELL HINDE'S HAIR CURLERS WILL SUPPLY IT. PRICE 1/6 THE BOTTLE. THE NAME OF THE PATENTEES, HINDES LIMITED, IS ACROSS THE LABEL.

NEW MUSIC GIVEN AWAY.

14 DAYS ONLY. Send name and address, with 1d. for postage, for specimen New Piece of Music complete, together with my list of over 1,000 pieces of cheapest music. Songs or pieces from 1d. each, 12 selected newest pieces or songs, post free, 1s. 3d. Christmas Parcel, 10 seasonable pieces and songs, post free, 1s.

S. H. ROBERTS,
145, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

SCRAPS (£1,000). To Clear One Million Sheets of Coloured Picture Relief Scraps, I will post free to any one sending Seven Stamps before 25th December next a specimen parcel, containing not less than 20 sheets, with price list, &c.; 40 sheets, 1s.; 100 sheets, 2s. 6d.; assorted parcel (1,000 subjects) for 5s. Scrap books, 6d., 1s., 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s. 6d. post free. New Lists free on application.

S. H. ROBERTS,
145, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

ONE PERSON ONLY

in each family who sends for a 1s. bottle of our new exquisite Forest Fragrance, "VAP," we will give them, free of charge, a set of handsome real CHILIAN SILVER SPOONS, also, a Casquet of useful silvered ware. The whole packed and forwarded per parcels post to any address on receipt of 16 penny stamps. To get "Vap," effectively introduced, this plan may probably pay us in the long run better than spending thousands in costly advertisements. Address—P., 15, Eureka Manufacturing Company, Clapton, London, N.E.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

NOSE A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE. Medically approved for Red Noses, 3/9 post free, undercover. Pamphlet "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-. Machines for Ugly Noses. Particulars for stamp

LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

NOW READY, 23rd Edition. 150th Thousand. Post Free of Author, 5s

THE CURE OF

CONSUMPTION

CHRONIC BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, AND CATARRH,

BY AN ENTIRELY NEW REMEDY.

Under this treatment an extraordinary number of cases pronounced incurable by the most eminent physicians have been restored to health.

BY EDWIN W. ALABONE, M.D. Phil. D.Sc. U.S.A., F.R.M.S., M.R.C.S By Examination 1870.

LATE CONSULTING Physician to the Home for Reclaimed Females, the Lower Clapton Orphan Asylum, and the Clapton Dispensary.

LYNTON HOUSE, HIGHBURY, N.

BRONCHONIA

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY.

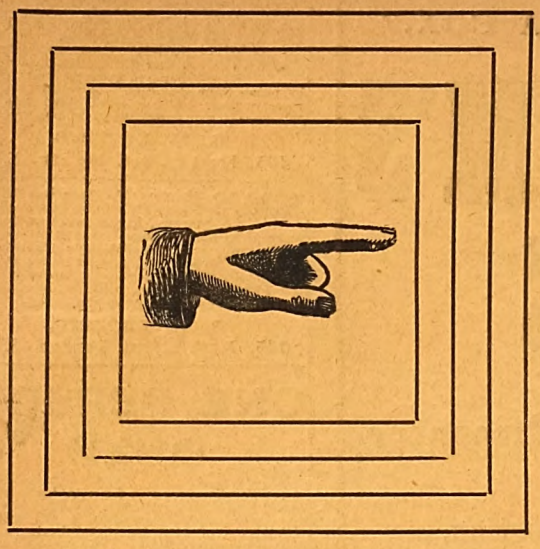
A MARVELLOUS REMEDY for all COUGHS, whether arising from CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, or THROAT IRRITATIONS. Its marvellous effects are testified to by eminent physicians.

2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle of all Chemists; post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.

J. HOWARD, 21, QUEENHITHE, LONDON, E.C.

One trial will prove its efficacy.

Digitized by Google



Delicate Children.

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children from two to fifteen years of age than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Recent Testimonials.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states: "Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

"Gentlemen,—I consider Infantina's Syrup a most satisfactory medicine for children. Mine are so fond of it that I have to lock the bottle away from them. There certainly is no trouble in getting them to take it. I have given it to three children—three, seven, and twelve years of age—and I can truthfully say it has made new children of them.—Yours sincerely, Caroline Cross."

"Gentlemen,—I can speak most highly of Infantina's Syrup for delicate children. My daughter, I fear, inherited a delicate chest from her grandfather, who died of Consumption. Your Syrup has quite stopped her cough, and she has really commenced to get fat. No other medicine seemed to do her any lasting good. She finds it so pleasant to take that she looks forward to each dose.—Faithfully yours, Mary Knight."

"Dear Sirs,—"I have found Infantina's Syrup a wonderfully strengthening medicine for children. I had no idea that a tonic would do so much for a delicate child. My little child has picked up marvellously since taking it.—Sincerely yours, Eveline Hodge."

"Gentlemen,—Infantina's Syrup has been a blessing to me. I was quite alarmed about my youngest boy's health; he seemed to eat less and grow weaker every day. I have only given him two bottles, and it has quite changed the child; you would scarcely know it is the same boy.—Yours truly, Mrs. Jane Field."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the Infantina Company, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 312.] FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 22, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

THE "CROQUET"

16 in. seat 10s. 9d.
18 in. ,, 12s. 9d.
20 in. ,, 15s. 9d.

A most suitable and seasonable present. Made in best buff Wicker, and upholstered in Art Cretonne. Cheques and P. O's. crossed "London & South Western Bank."

ARTHUR PUCKETT & CO., 67, Wigmore Street, LONDON, W.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE LONDON, E.

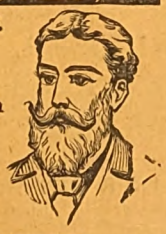
Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

FOR YOUTHFUL APPEARANCE. BEAUTIFUL HAIR

BRODIE'S IMPERIAL HAIR DYES, &c.

(REGISTERED) ONE LIQUID

No. 1 Black
No. 2 Dark Brown
No. 3 Light Brown
No. 4 Golden Brown or Auburn
No. 5 Pure Golden
No. 6 Brodie's Hair Grower and Restorer



Harmless, Perfect, Permanent and Odourless. Clear, no Sediment.

2/6, 3/6, 5/- & 10/6 (SECRETLY PACKED).

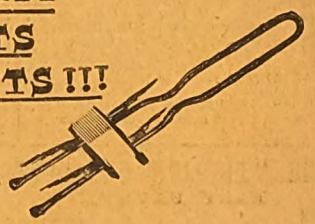
J. BRODIE, 41 MUSEUM STREET, LONDON

Established 1868. Once Tried, Always Used.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

A HAIR PIN WITHOUT POINTS HAS GOOD POINTS!!! SEE THE POINT?



Hinde's "Pyr Point" Hair Pin.

SAMPLES FREE ON RECEIPT OF POST CARD.

CAN'T SCRATCH THE HEAD, AND WON'T FALL OUT.

THEY COST YOU EXACTLY SAME PRICE AS OLD SORT.

EACH STORE AND WAREHOUSE KNOWS ALL ABOUT THEM.

Hindes Ltd., MANUFACTURERS OF BRUSHES & TOILET ARTICLES. BIRMINGHAM & LONDON.

Digitized by Google

BAKER'S NOVELTIES.

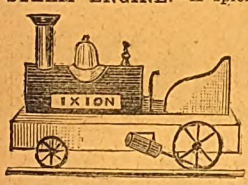
THE NEW "ECLIPSE" MODEL STEAM ENGINE.—The rage of the Season. These wonderful Engines work with a real oscillating cylinder (which if purchased by itself cost 1s.), strong metal boiler, funnel, large fly wheel, with pulley wheel attached for working other models, furnace, and filler complete. Carriage free 1s. 6d. Smaller size 1s.

Don't miss this grand opportunity.

THE MARVELLOUS "CHAMPION" SLIDE VALVE STEAM ENGINE.—As is no doubt well known, a slide valve cylinder is the most expensive kind made, and in fact our lowest for a slide valve cylinder itself is 7s., yet we now offer a large substantial Engine with powerful boiler, stand, furnace, fly wheel, pulley wheel, governors, metal supports, and slide valve cylinder, complete, 5s. 6d., with whistle, water tap, steam tap, very superior, 10s. 6d. These engines are sufficiently powerful to work all the models sold by us.

THE EXPRESS STEAM LOCOMOTIVE.—A beautifully japanned locomotive, with all brass fittings, dome, whistle, safety valve, starting lever, 6 wheels (all flanged), and two powerful cylinders. Only 10s. 6d., free 11s.

THE "IXION" LOCOMOTIVE STEAM ENGINE.—A splendid locomotive engine on four wheels with funnel, safety valve, dome hand rails, starting lever, two powerful cylinders with furnace complete. The cheapest locomotive out. 5s., free 5s. 6d., or with whistle 5s. 6d., free 6s. Without name plate 4s. 6d., free 5s.



THE ECLIPSE ELECTRIC COIL.—We are offering the most wonderful value in Electric Coils for this Season, as special leading lines. Each one guaranteed to work, and to administer good strong shocks. No. 1 Coil is finished complete, and mounted on stand with handles and connecting wires. Price 1s., post free 1s. 3d. No. 2 Coil is a larger and more powerful ditto, better finished, and furnished with brass terminals, and is a very superior article, 2s. 6d., post free 2s. 9d. No. 3 Coil is equal to many charged 10s. 6d. for. This Coil has a regulating handle for increasing or decreasing the strength as required, and is fit for any Drawing Room, Bazaar, Lecture Hall, &c. Price 5s. 6d., post free 6s No. 4, very handsome large Coil, with reversing motion, 10s. 6d. Any ordinary Bichromate Batteries will work these Coils, and as most people have batteries now-a-days, no further expense is incurred, but if needful, we supply a strong Bichromate Battery suitable for working No. 1 and 2 Coils for 1s. 3d., post free; or a larger ditto for the 5s 6d and 10s. 6d. Coil, for 2s., post free 2s. 4½d. We now give a small Battery free with every Coil sold.

THE ELECTRICAL DANCING NIGGER.—A great curiosity and a wonderful working model. The climax of electrical ingenuity and skill. By means of a powerful Electro Motor and Battery the Nigger will dance on the platform for half-an-hour at a time. A capital window attraction. Nigger, Motor, Battery, Platform, Connecting Wires, and everything complete. Price 3s. 6d., carriage free 3s. 10d.

ELECTRIC MOTORS for working Models, Machinery, &c.—All guaranteed to work, and spendid value for money. A beautiful little Motor on stand complete, only 1s., free 1s. 3d. No. 2 size much larger ditto, better finished and more powerful, with fittings, 2s. 6d., free 2s. 9d. No. 3 size, a really superior and very powerful motor, on polished stand, with brass wheel, brass terminals, and fittings, 5s. 6d., free 6s. Any bichromate battery will work these, or we supply battery for Nos. 1 and 2 Motors for 1s., free 1s. 3d.; and a powerful ditto for No. 3 for 2s., free 2s. 4½d.

Grand Illustrated Novelty Catalogue, 64 pp., 1,000 Illustrations. 1d. stamp.

BAKER & COMPANY, 34, Beech Street, Barbican, London, E.C.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades ESTIMATES FREE.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

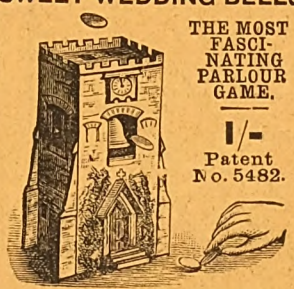
For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc, Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each. Pattern and PRICE Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

BLUSHING

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.



THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—
THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. S.," 87, Strand, London. Mention SHORT STORIES.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
TO Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. LADIES
TO No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:— LADIES
TO "By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise. LADIES
TO A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case. LADIES
TO Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope. LADIES
TO Write privately to— LADIES
TO Mrs. P. S. S., LADIES
TO 145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W. LADIES

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

MELVILLE'S
New Upright
GRAND PIANOFORTE
26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. It has all the latest improvements. Price 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE,
61, Charing Cross Road, London.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.
For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL
KNITTER
Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

LADIES' DRESS and EVENING SHOES.

On receipt of Postal Order for 2/9, we will forward, post free, one pair of Beautiful Dress Shoes, fit to go anywhere with, Beaded or Buckled fronts. Also on receipt of 3/9 we will forward one pair of White, Blue, Pink, or Cream Coloured Satin Shoes with Bows. Ladies please send your size and say Small or Broad fitting, with your address, to the LADIES' SLIPPER MANUFACTORY, 171D, Battersea Park Road, London.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BOILING WATER OR MILK.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

If you have
ECZEMA
OR A SKIN DISEASE OF ANY KIND,

A single application of "ANTECZEMA" gives relief, and a few more applications effect a cure.

"ANTECZEMA" is sold by Chemists, etc., or will be sent post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., or 4s. 9d., by

THE ANTECZEMA COMPANY,
83, CASTLE ROAD, LONDON, N.W.
Book on the Skin and Diet free.

A BOON TO LADIES
Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MADAME FRAIN'S
FAMOUS
FEMALE MIXTURE.
The most powerful and effective on earth.

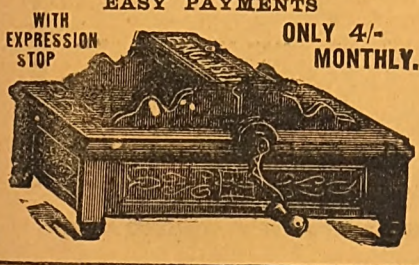
For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."
EASY PAYMENTS

WITH EXPRESSION STOP

ONLY 4/- MONTHLY.



Plays hymns, popular airs, quadrilles, polkas, waltzes, hornpipes, &c.; any tune can be played with artistic effect by any one. A mere child can play it. Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World.

Price 30s. Terms 4s. deposit and 4s. monthly.

Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid.

Write for list of music and full particulars.

(Mention this paper.)

J. M. DRAPER,
Organette Works, Blackburn.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 312.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 22, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

THE REVENGE OF LUIGI SFORZA

"HATE, jealousy—pooh, my dear sir, why you don't even know what they're like under those cold suns and fog-laden skies of yours. It is only here in the South, where the hot sun gets into our blood and brain and sets our very souls on fire, that such things are really known. Why I could tell you a story that happened not very long ago in Naples yonder, that would show you how an Italian can love and hate, and how his jealousy, when once aroused, can make him forget even his love in his hate, and change him into something worse than a wild beast; for I can tell you that the fiercest of wild beasts is like a tame dog compared with an Italian whose love has turned through jealousy to hate."

We were standing on the promenade deck of the North German liner Baiern as she steamed out of the Bay of Naples, watching the town lamps flash up out of the light haze which lay over the town, and the lazy smoke-cloud of Vesuvius changing to all sorts of strange colours in the level rays of the setting sun. I was an Englishman doing the usual globe trot, and my companion was a well-bred Italian of about five-and-thirty, whom I had met at one of the clubs to which I had an introduction, and who happened to be going out to Ismailia by the same steamer in which I was going to Colombo.

"Well," I said, "I am ready enough to be convinced, and still more ready to hear the story, so, as it is too early to turn in, and as we don't know a soul on board, save each other, yet, how would it be if you passed the time in telling the story, and I in listening and being convinced?"

"Very good," he replied. "Story-telling is, after all, more interesting than argument, especially when the story is one from real life, as this is, for I can tell you it caused a tremendous sensation in Naples at the time that the drama really occurred. I know the circumstances well, too, so far as they are known, and far better than the reporters of the newspapers or even the police officials got to know them, for all the characters were known to me personally, and the heroine was one of my dead wife's dearest friends."

"The police officials!" I echoed. "So then, of course, there is a crime in the story."

"A crime!" he said, with a laugh that at the time I thought strangely savage and bitter. "Yes, there was a crime—a crime so cunningly conceived and so ruthlessly carried out that I think only an Italian, and a Neapolitan at that, could have imagined and executed it.

"In telling the story to you, a stranger," he continued, leaning over the rail and flicking the ash of his cigar into the swirling bubbles that were drifting past the side of the moving ship, "I need only call the characters by their Christian names. It will be simpler, and serve the purpose quite as well, without needlessly going into family particulars which there is no reason to talk about. There were only three characters in the drama—two men and a woman; but, as you will see, quite enough to make a tragedy. The woman's name was Francesca, and the men's were Cosmo and Luigi.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

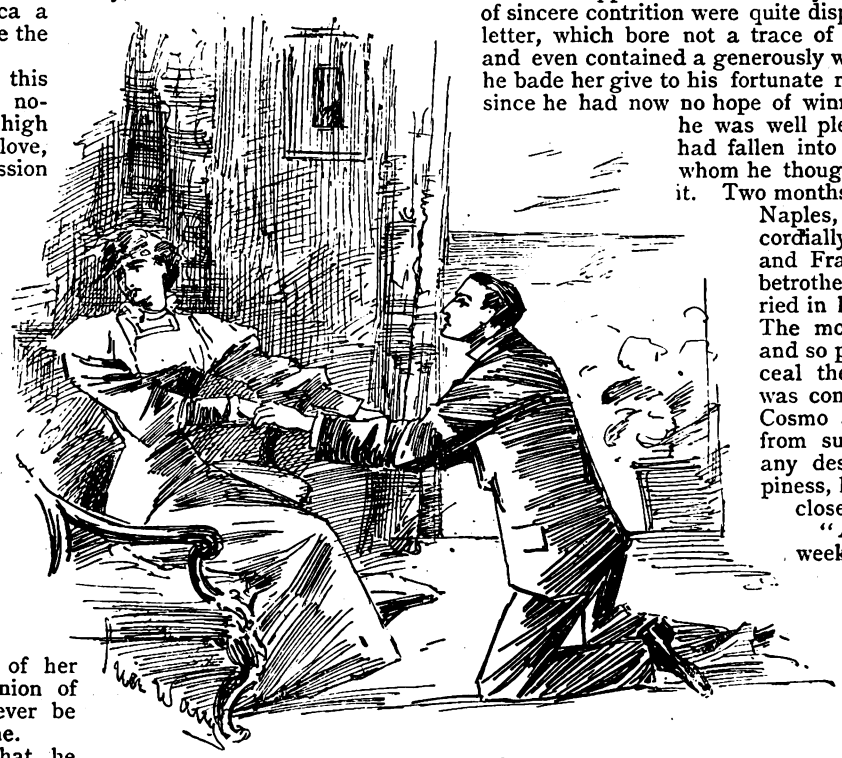
"Of Francesca it will be enough to say that she was young, well-born, and beautiful—yes, beautiful as you could imagine one of the angels of heaven would be incarnated in a human form. Cosmo and Luigi were also young and well-born and, for Italians, rich. Cosmo was a fine, tall, handsome fellow, with blue eyes and fair brown hair, for you will have seen enough of Italy by this time to know that all Italians are not dark; but Luigi was dark, with black hair and eyes, strong and a man of good presence, though not so tall as Cosmo by a good inch.

"I suppose it will hardly be necessary for me to tell you that both of them were in love with Francesca, and that hence sprang the tragedy; but there was this difference between them—Luigi had grown up with Francesca almost from childhood, and so, too, he had grown up with his love for her till it had become as much a part of his life as the very blood that warmed his veins. Cosmo was a Roman whose acquaintance Luigi had made in the Eternal City, and whom he had himself introduced to Francesca a little over a year before the tragedy took place.

"It was soon after this that Luigi, suspecting nothing and as full of high hopes as he was of love, finally declared his passion to Francesca, and asked her in return to give him the love that he had always believed would one day crown his life with delight. I can well imagine, and so can you, northerner though you are, the blackness of the gulf of rage and despair into which the heaven of his expectations changed when Francesca, with tears in her eyes and a sob of real sorrow in her voice, told him that he had mistaken friendship for love, and that the affection she had for him as the friend of her family and the companion of her girlhood could never be called by a warmer name.



In vain he pleaded his hopeless cause.

"It was in vain that he pleaded his hopeless cause with all the burning eloquence that his passion lent him, in vain that he besought her on his knees to tell him that the fate her lips had spoken was not final, that now she knew he had loved her long and deeply she might permit him still to woo her as a lover in the hope that love might beget love.

"But it was all of no avail. Francesca heard him to the end, and then told him, gently and kindly, but with a firmness that struck a chill of despair to his heart, that she could not permit him to hope where she knew there was no hope, and then Luigi rose to his feet, his love changed to unreasoning anger and his pleading into reproach, and told her that she had played with his heart for years and now that it was laid at her feet spurned it aside as a toy that had ceased to interest her. He swore that she had loved him, though she refused to admit it now, that she had wantonly given away to another the love that had been his, and should have been his to the end; and, when she turned on him and dismissed him in the wrath of her wounded pride, he swore that he would find the man who had robbed him of the fruition of all his dearest hopes, and take a revenge worthy of the wrong that had been done him.

"Then he left her with his evil words ringing ominously in her ears, and the next day she heard that he had left Naples to spend the winter wandering about the Eastern Mediterranean. From Athens he wrote her a long penitent letter, imploring her to forgive and forget the foolish words that the violence of his passionate despair had forced him to utter in her presence, and to think of him once more as her old friend and playmate, and as a man who was trying to live down his hopeless love and make himself worthy still to be her friend.

"The letter produced the effect that he had hoped and expected it would, for Francesca's anger had soon melted into pity, when she came to think how fearful a thing it must be for a man to love and hope for so many years and then to hear the voice of the woman he loves pronouncing the death-sentence of all his dearest hopes; so she wrote back assuring him of the forgiveness he asked for, and telling him that by the time he came back to Naples both of them must have forgotten the only angry words that had ever marred their friendship, and that they would be to each other as though these words had never been spoken.

"Whatever apprehensions she may have had on the score of sincere contrition were quite dispelled by Luigi's next letter, which bore not a trace of malice or resentment, and even contained a generously worded message, which he bade her give to his fortunate rival, telling him that, since he had now no hope of winning the prize himself, he was well pleased to hear that it had fallen into the hands of the man whom he thought most worthy to win it. Two months later, he returned to Naples, and his first act was to cordially felicitate both Cosmo and Francesca, who were now betrothed and were to be married in little less than a year. The months passed quickly, and so perfectly did Luigi conceal the inward passion that was consuming him that both Cosmo and Francesca, so far from suspecting that he had any designs upon their happiness, looked upon him as the closest of their friends.

"At length, only a few weeks before their marriage was to have taken place, Luigi's long waited opportunity came. Cosmo, who owned a large property in Sicily, found himself obliged to pay a visit to the island to make certain arrangements in connection with the marriage settlements. He went to Messina, and from thence to Palermo, and there, after a fortnight's absence in all, he disappeared. Not a trace of him or a clue of his whereabouts remained. He had been engaged nearly all one day with his lawyers and the agents of his estate, he had gone to bed in a hunting lodge on his estate, and the next morning he had vanished.

"There is no need for me to tell you of Francesca's sorrow and despair at this sudden and mysterious shadow that had fallen over the bright promise of her life; but, great as was her suffering then, it was as nothing in comparison with the agony that was to follow. Of all her family and friends none seemed to sympathise more heartily or to feel more deeply for her than the man whom she had rejected in favour of her missing lover.

"As soon as it was certain that Cosmo's disappearance could not be explained without supposing that he had been the victim of foul play, he went to Sicily and did all that money and industry could do to trace the missing man; but after ten weeks of constant searching he returned to say that he had failed and that there could no longer be any doubt but that Cosmo had either voluntarily fled for reasons of his own, or had been slain by some unknown hand for some equally unknown purpose.

Digitized by Google

"As far as appearances went one of these two seemed the only possible explanation, and yet in a few days both were proved to be false by a letter, bearing the Palermo post-mark and addressed to Francesca. It told her in just so many words that Cosmo was still alive, but that he was dead so far as she was concerned. If she wished to save him from a fate worse than death she must marry one who had loved her longer and better than ever Cosmo had done. The writer would wait a month for the publication of the news of her marriage in the Neapolitan papers. If it did not appear a further communication would be sent.

"No name was mentioned in the letter, and there was no signature to it; but it had the effect of plunging Francesca still deeper into sorrow and despair, and sending Luigi once more to Sicily on a second search that proved as fruitless as the first. The month passed, and of course the news of the wedding did not appear. Two or three days later, Francesca received a little oblong box bearing the Messina post-mark. She opened it with trembling hands, looked into it, and then, with a low wailing scream sank senseless to the floor. Her mother, who was in the room with her, summoned assistance and then looked into the box. It contained a man's forefinger cut off close to the hand and a slip of paper promising another similar communication in a month if the marriage advised by the writer had not taken place.

"I know it will be no use for me to try and tell you how great was the horror produced by this dreadful message. But, saving Francesca herself, no one seemed so deeply affected by it as Luigi. There could be no doubt but that he was the man whom the unknown sender of the summons ordered Francesca to marry under a penalty as unheard of as it was horrible, and equally there was no doubt as to whose finger it was that lay in the box. Still there was not a jot of evidence to connect Luigi with the hideous crime that was being perpetrated in some unknown spot.

"Though the details were, of course, kept private, the matter had been in the hands of the police from the beginning, and both the Italian and Sicilian police agents—detectives as you call them in England—had been using every effort to trace the unhappy man who was evidently the victim of as diabolical a conspiracy as a human brain had ever conceived.

"The second month passed, and then came a little square box addressed to Francesca, but this time bearing the Roman post-mark. Her father had given orders that all her letters were to be brought to him first, so he received the box and opened it. It contained a man's left ear and a slip of paper intimating that the right one would follow in another month, unless the marriage had taken place. The box and its contents were sent to the police, who redoubled their efforts, but still without avail.

"Francesca's father then appealed most solemnly to Luigi to confess privately to him if he had any hand in the horrible business, pledging his oath to let him escape scot free if Cosmo were set at liberty. But Luigi passionately repudiated the aspersion, and volunteered to go before the Judge of Instruction and submit to any examination as to his doings and whereabouts during the whole period. He called Heaven and all its saints to witness that, not only was he innocent of any complicity in the crime of the unknown miscreant, but he would willingly give his whole fortune to bring him to justice, and set Cosmo free to save Francesca from the slow death she was now dying from sorrow and horror.

"As for the suggestion that Francesca should marry him to save Cosmo, he declared that nothing would make him a party to such a hideous contract. Much as he had loved her and still respected and pitied her, he would rather follow her to the grave than lead her to the altar under such awful circumstances. After this there was of course nothing more to be said against him, for Francesca had never told anyone of his threat to be avenged on her and the man who had made his suit hopeless, and even she had forgotten it in the agony and perplexity of the hour.

"So the third month passed, and in due course the threat was mercilessly fulfilled. The right ear came in a box from Genoa, accompanied by precisely the same warning as before, saving only that the souvenir was to be of necessity varied next time. As far as was possible these latest horrors had been kept from Francesca, but it availed little, for she guessed that the threat of the first letter was being fulfilled, and the torture of her uncertainty was as great as that of knowledge would have been.

"At length, unable to bear it any longer she contrived to meet Luigi alone one day and implored him to tell her the truth. They happened to be in the same room in which she had refused his first and only offer of love. For some time he held out, but at last yielded to her supplications and told her all. Then, beside herself with the torment that she could no longer bear, she flung herself at his feet, almost on the same spot in which he had knelt at hers, and besought him to end her agony and save Cosmo by marrying her.

"No jealous lover's revenge was ever more complete than his was now, and yet he was not satisfied with it. He raised her from the ground and with tears in his eyes implored her to think of all that such a horrible sacrifice meant for them both, and for Cosmo too, even though it should rescue him from a fate which, hideous as it was, he would rather endure than escape it at such a price. In the end he succeeded in persuading her to wait yet another month, promising that if no deliverance came by that time he would place himself unreservedly in the hands of her parents and do whatever seemed best to them.

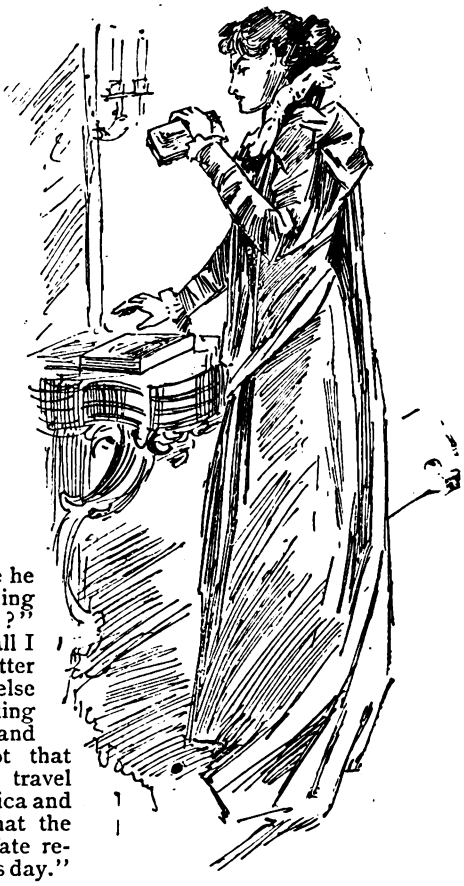
"Thus the fourth month passed, and on the very day that Luigi was to put his case before Francesca's father and mother, there came another larger box, this time from Turin, and this, through the stupidity or corruption of a servant, got into Francesca's hands instead of her father's. She opened it and in it found, severed cleanly from the wrist, a hand that had often clasped her own, and still bearing on its third finger the the troth-ring she had given Cosmo in exchange for the one she was wearing herself.

"Half an hour later, Francesca's mother came into the room and found her laughing softly to herself and stroking the dead hand gently with her own. She was mad — hopelessly mad, and the marriage was now a legal impossibility.

"That is my story, Signor, what do you think of it?"

"Horrible!" I said. "Hideous, almost beyond belief; but surely you have not told it all? What became of Cosmo and Luigi? And was it ever proved that he had a hand in the ghastly business, as of course he must have had according to all the probabilities?"

"I have told you all I know, and for the matter of that, that anyone else knows," said he taking out a fresh cigar and lighting it, "except that Luigi went away to travel for two years in America and the far East, and that the mystery of Cosmo's fate remains a mystery to this day."



Opened it with trembling hands.

Digitized by Google

Nearly two years had passed since I had said good-bye to my Italian acquaintance when he landed from the Baiern at Ismailia. I was sitting in the Café Ranieri in the Via Maria de Fiori in Rome, enjoying an after-dinner smoke and looking through the papers. I picked up the Tribuna, and as I opened the inside pages three or four staring head lines caught my eyes. One of them would have read in English:

"SOLUTION OF THE GREAT NEAPOLITAN MYSTERY."

And what follows here is a condensed translation of that portion of the report, filling nearly five columns of the Tribuna, which alone concerns the readers of the foregoing narrative:—

"Although all that was done had necessarily to be done with the strictest secrecy at the time, the police have now permitted the details of this extraordinary affair to be made public.

"It appears that Paolo Marini, after he had been sentenced to death for brigandage at Palermo, purchased the commutation of his sentence to penal servitude for fifteen years by giving the police information which led to the final breaking up of the band of the notorious Guiseppe Montani, who had for the last seven years been the terror of Palermo and its district. As is already known, Montani and the greater number of his followers fell under the bullets of the soldiers and gendarmerie, fighting desperately till the last, but still many were taken and paid the penalty of their crimes.

"In connection with this information, Paolo made a statement which at last clears up the mystery of that terrible tragedy which thrilled, not only Naples, but all Italy, about two and a half years ago. In spite of all his protestations of innocence and the entire absence of proof against him, Luigi Sforza was, as many have all along suspected, at the bottom of the vile conspiracy which wrecked the happiness of an honourable family, destroyed the reason of one of the fairest daughters of southern Italy, and ruthlessly sacrificed the life of one of its most promising sons.

"Luigi Sforza, strange as it may seem, was the foster-brother of the infamous Guiseppe Montani, and with him he hatched the horrible plot which, in one sense, succeeded all too well. Sforza's object was, of course, as is well known, revenge on the Signorina Francesca Cervigni and her family for the rejection of his suit, and on Signor Cosmo Tasselli for having, as he believed, supplanted him in her affections. Sforza advised Montani of Signor Tasselli's visit to Sicily, and he kidnapped him from his hunting-lodge on the night of his disappearance, carrying him off to one of his then unknown strongholds in the mountains.

Found her laughing softly to herself.

"Here he was kept while the first letter was sent, and when Sforza went to Sicily, ostensibly to search for him, a diabolical bargain was struck between the two scoundrels. Montani was to terrify the Signorina into a marriage with Sforza by the horrible and unheard of expedient of sending her portions of his unhappy victim's body coupled with threats to continue the mutilation till she consented to sacrifice herself. In order to baffle inquiries these ghastly fragments were sent through the post from various towns by the bandit's agents.

"Montani's price for this hideous work was to be the half of a very large fortune which the Signorina Francesca's only uncle had made in South America and left to her in trust, to be paid over to her on her wedding day provided she married with her father's consent. It has since been learnt that this portion of the plot would also have succeeded but for the insatiable thirst for vengeance which made Sforza overreach himself at the last moment, for the Signorina had actually yielded and consented to the unnatural marriage, but Sforza, then believing himself safe, preferred, with literally inhuman malice, to prolong her agony for another month.

"At the end of this time, and a day or so earlier than Sforza expected, the last of the horrible packages fell into the Signorina's hands by mistake, and under the horror of the sight of what it contained she became hopelessly insane. She was now, of course, incapable of both marriage and inheritance, and so the second part of the plot fell through. Montani then killed Signor Tasselli in a fit of fury, and several months afterwards he inveigled Sforza to Sicily on pretence of letting him still further satisfy his vengeance by seeing his rival killed before his eyes.

"It seems meanwhile that remorse or fear had driven Sforza to drink, and one night in a fit of drunken foolishness he boasted to Montani that he could have married the Signorina a month before the final catastrophe, but he did not think she had been punished enough. The knowledge of how nearly he had gained an immense sum of money, and of the vindictive madness that had lost it to him, so infuriated the brigand, that the next day, when Sforza was sober, he tied him to a tree, and made his men put him to death by just the same torments that his victim had suffered. The miserable man was literally cut to pieces, member by member, and limb by limb, as long as a spark of life, or a thrill of feeling, remained in his body. No man ever conceived a viler crime than he did, but it is doubtful if any criminal was ever so terribly punished. We subjoin a portrait of him taken a little over two years ago."

I looked at the portrait, and recognised it as that of the chance acquaintance who had told me the story on the promenade deck of the Baiern.

PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO

OF

FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES.

The Second Part will be Published on THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20th.

AND WILL BE

Twice as Good as Part I.

CONTENTS:

Miss Agnes Huntington: A Reminiscence of "Paul Jones."
Mr. Henry Irving as Matthias in "The Bells."
Miss Mimi St. Cyr: A Study.
Miss Ellaline Terriss as "Cinderella."
Miss Julia Neilson in "The Tempter."
Miss Jessie Preston as Little Jack Sheppard.
Madame Patti: A Study.
Miss Maude Adams in "The Marked Ball."
Miss Millie Hylton in "Don Juan."
Mr. Fred Storey in "Ruy Blas," and "Cinder-Ellen Up Too Late."
Miss Mary Ansell.
Miss Alice Lethbridge.
Mr. E. S. Willard in "The Middleman."
Madame Jane Hading.
Miss Janet Achurch.
Miss Marie Tempest as Manon.
Miss Loie Fuller as a Skirt Dancer.
Miss Moore in "Little Christopher Columbus."
Miss Billie Barlow as Little Boy Blue.

NOTE THIS:—Part I. was sold out almost on publication, and many would-be purchasers could not obtain a copy. Part II. will sell out even quicker. Order your copy now.

33 BEAUTIFUL PHOTOGRAPHS FOR SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

"TWENTY POUNDS REWARD."

"I TELL you, sergeant, I had it when I entered the train. I particularly remember looking at the time as we left Cannon Street, because it was then eleven minutes past five, and I remarked to my neighbour that we were nearly four minutes late."

Mr. Joseph Horsfall, J.P., of 71, Leadenhall Street, and Highfield Court, Highfield, was manifestly excited. His face was flushed; his overcoat, in defiance of the penetrating November fog, was unfastened and thrown open. There was something positively pathetic in the anxiety with which his eyes travelled from his undecorated waistcoat to the perplexed countenances surrounding him.

He was the centre of a small group of officials—the station master, the booking clerk and a couple of porters—one of whom, catching sight of the sergeant of police passing the level crossing just below the station, had with commendable promptitude run out and stopped him.

The man in authority was already busy with his note-book.

"What about your fellow passengers, Mr. Horsfall?" he inquired, with his pencil poised in readiness to enter the reply. "Did you notice them at all?"

"Three of them were residents and season ticket holders—Mr. Brookes, of Caldwell, Mr. Denny, and Colonel Pierce. A gentleman with whom I have constantly travelled, though we are not personally acquainted, went on to Dorking."

"Mr. Beale, of that town," put in the station-master, "I noticed him when I opened your door, sir. He was the late mayor. Well, it can't be any of them."

The booking clerk murmured something about the prevalence of kleptomania among the upper classes, but nobody listened to him.

"And the others, sir?" the sergeant continued; "any females?"

"Dear me, no, Troyle; it was a smoking carriage. Let me think." Mr. Horsfall put his hand to his head. "There were two other passengers. They left the train at some intermediate station. One was a clergyman, and the other—yes—a young man who sat on my right. He looked like a gentleman."

"There's nothing more deceiving than looks," Mr. Troyle averred sententiously. "Now this young gentleman, what was he like?"

"Like any other young man, wore an overcoat and a silk hat."

"Clean shaved, perhaps."

"Oh, no, a small moustache, and an eyeglass like the rest."

"Now, Mr. Horsfall, if you please, a description of the stolen property. A gold 'Albert' chain, I think you said, without locket or seal. And the watch——"

"A valuable gold repeater, a very valuable watch indeed. It was the gift of a most esteemed client—a deceased client. It would be quite irreplaceable."

"Any monogram or crest?"

"Both crest and shield were on the reverse of the case, and two initials, with a date engraved inside."

"Then it won't be offered at the pawnshops. They'll probably pop the case into the melting pot, unless it is detained in hopes of a reward."

"I will offer the reward at once." Mr. Horsfall's voice literally shook with anxiety. "I would not on any consideration have that watch destroyed. It shall be advertised in all the London newspapers. 'Twenty pounds reward'—I will gladly give that sum for its recovery."

"That ought to fetch it," said the sergeant, thoughtfully. "I should like to have a go for the thief—always taking for granted that the watch was stolen; but perhaps as you are so keen on this particular bit of jewellery, it may be safer to advertise."

"There's just a chance of its turning up at Dorking," suggested the station-master, who had wired forward instructions to search the carriage. "That is the answer," he added, as his ear caught the sharp tinkle of the telegraph call from the inner office. The answer proved unsatisfactory: "Have made careful examination of No. 222. No trace of missing property."

"I shall advertise," said Mr. Horsfall, dejectedly. "I have no desire to prosecute the thief; I am only anxious for the restoration of my property. I would not lose that watch on any consideration. The late Lord Sprintham presented it to me with his own hands, and I will gladly pay twenty pounds for its return."

"Twenty pounds reward, and no questions asked," groaned the sergeant aside. "It's a regular premium to pickpockets. However, it isn't my business. If I might offer a suggestion, sir," he added aloud, "I should say put 'No further reward will be offered' in your advertisement, or the gentry as have the watch may stick to it till they run you up to a cool hundred."

"Certainly, Troyle, certainly; a very good idea of yours. I will add 'No further reward will be offered' to my advertisement, though for the gift of the late Lord Sprintham I should not grudge even a hundred pounds. I shall have time to telegraph the notice to the Times and Standard to-night. They know me."

Mr. Horsfall bustled away through the fog, bent on reaching the post office as quickly as possible.

In due time the advertisement appeared in all the principal papers:

"Twenty Pounds Reward.—Lost between Cannon Street Station and Highfield, in first-class smoking carriage of 5.8 p.m. train, a gold repeater watch, engraved with shield and crest; also a heavy Albert guard. Anyone bringing the same to Messrs. Horsfall & Quills, 71, Leadenhall Street, will receive the above. N.B.—No further reward will be offered."

Mr. Horsfall read the little paragraph with much satisfaction. He went to town fully expecting to return with Lord Sprintham's gift once more in his pocket, but, as the hours wore on without any tidings of the missing watch, he grew less cheerful and less sanguine.

The two following days only served to deepen his depression. His usual good temper deserted him, he was morose with his clients, and snubbed an inoffensive clerk for bringing up a card just as the senior partner was preparing to leave the office.

"I can't wait," Mr. Horsfall said testily, "tell the gentleman he can see Mr. Quills."

"I did say you were just going, sir, but the gentleman thought it would be all right when you saw this."

This was a visiting card, neatly engraved with the name of "The Rev. Athelstane Bede," and at one corner, in smaller type, "The Clergy House, King Street, St. Giles, Grosvenor Gallery Club." Attached was a cutting of the advertisement of the lost watch.

"Eh, what?" Mr. Horsfall was all attention. "Let me see, I shall have ten minutes to spare if I drive. Get me a hansom, Dixon, and show the gentleman in at once."

The Rev. Athelstane Bede was a thin care-worn man, below the average height, and with an unmistakable air of impecuniosity about him. His clothes were worn, and decidedly glossy about the knees and elbows. There were dark circles round his preternaturally bright eyes, and a hollowness about the sallow cheeks, which created an uncomfortable impression that the Rev. Athelstane Bede was insufficiently fed.

His manner, however, was admirable, and the quiet dignity with which he introduced himself did not fail to impress Mr. Horsfall, whose respect for the Church was only second to his reverence for the State.

"I come on behalf of a young parishioner of mine," began the visitor courteously. "I am sorry to detain you, Mr. Horsfall, but I need not trespass long upon your valuable time. I think this advertisement will explain my errand. You offer a handsome reward for the recovery of a watch."

Digitized by Google

At this neat reminder, Mr. Horsfall took out his cheque-book.

"Yes," he answered with an air of satisfaction; "that watch you see was the gift of a valued friend, the late Lord Sprintham. The cheque has been filled in ever since the advertisement appeared." He tore off the slip of paper and stood with it in his hand. The clergyman unbuttoned his thin overcoat and drew from his pocket the watch and chain.

"You will be kind enough to give the crest and initials, Mr. Horsfall," he remarked with a pleasant smile. "Quite unnecessary, really; but as I am only a deputy in the matter, it is perhaps as well to observe the usual formalities."

"The crest is a hound, passant; the initials J.H., from G.O.V.S.; date, May 28th, 1887."

"Quite correct. I have much pleasure in restoring the gift of your esteemed friend. You will understand that, acting on behalf of another, I am not at liberty to refuse the advertised reward; but you may rest satisfied that the money falls into most deserving hands, and will be both gratefully acknowledged and wisely spent."

He pushed the watch gently across the table; his long thin fingers lingered over it as if they liked the touch of the smooth metal.

Mr. Horsfall folded the cheque and handed it politely to his visitor, with a few words of thanks. He glanced at the watch as he restored it to his pocket.

"You will excuse me, I am sure," he began; "but——"

"You are anxious to catch your train," said the clergyman as he pocketed the cheque. "I will not detain you."

The two men went downstairs together. As they reached the outer door, Mr. Horsfall turned towards his companion. "I should like to know—purely as a matter of curiosity, you understand, the little affair is a thing of the past now—but as a matter of curiosity, Mr. Bede, I should very much like to know where your young friend found my watch."

The Rev. Athelstane Bede hesitated for a moment, and looked hard at the elder man.

"Mr. Horsfall," he said suddenly, "your generosity in this matter inclines me to trust you, but an explanation would place me unreservedly in your hands. If I speak freely, have I your word, as a magistrate and a gentleman, that you make no attempt to take advantage of my information—that it shall, in short, remain a dead secret between us." Curiosity is a passion not wholly confined to the weaker sex. Mr. Horsfall readily gave the required promise.

"I am aware that I am about to give myself away," pursued the clergyman; "but with a man of your untarnished honour my secret will be safe, and to you I cannot lie. Your watch, Mr. Horsfall, was not found. It was stolen."

"Stolen!" gasped the magistrate. "Then Troyle was right."

"Deliberately stolen from your person," continued Bede, solemnly.

"By that young fellow who sat next the window?"

"By no young fellow—my sin shall not be imputed to an innocent man—I, Athelstane Bede, committed the theft. Hear me out, Mr. Horsfall; listen to the story of sore temptation before you judge the fallen sinner. I have laboured hard in the vineyard. I have not eaten the bread of idleness. I have allowed myself no luxuries. But my stipend is barely sufficient for the necessaries of life, and I meet with many who need help. I have given to the starving the money which should have been paid to my tradespeople. Bills accumulated. I was pressed for payment; my creditors would not be denied. Before me lay ruin and disgrace. I tried in vain to borrow money.

"When I entered your carriage last Monday evening I was in despair. You took out your watch. I saw its value, and the tempter assailed me. He whispered: 'Take it! A reward will be offered. You can claim it; pay your debt; save your reputation. It is doing evil that good may come. In the future you may save the sum, and return it anonymously through the post.' In my old 'Varsity days I had taken lessons in prestigiation, and had frequently, with the assistance of a friend, given entertainments for the benefit of various charities. My skill had not deserted me. I fell. Now you know all. Spurn me, despise me if you will. At least, I have not lied to you."

His eyes were fixed on the ground. Sorrow, remorse, shame, were depicted on his thin, worn face. Mr. Horsfall's kindly heart was touched.

"Upon my soul," he said, "I am very sorry for you, Mr. Bede. It must have been a great temptation, a very great temptation. We never know our weakness till it is put to the test. Bless me, I might have done the same thing myself! Had I been acquainted with the circumstances, I would gladly have lent you the money. Consider it as a loan, to be repaid when you are a rich man. It was an ingenious device, though. Really," his curiosity getting the better of his delicacy, "you must have had great practice at some time. You did it very cleverly. My overcoat was buttoned up, I remember."

"Had you worn half-a-dozen coats it would have made no difference. The method is unique."

"Most extraordinary—extraordinary!" murmured the old gentleman. "Really it makes one quite curious to know how it is done. I suppose, now, you would not—just to illustrate the principle——"

He stopped, rebuked by the sorrowful surprise and dignity visible in the clergyman's countenance.

"Beg your pardon, I'm sure. Quite forgot what I was saying. Pray think no more of it," stammered the abashed magistrate. "Good evening, Mr. Bede. I shall hope to meet you again under pleasanter circumstances. You must excuse me. I shall only have just time to catch my train. Good evening."

Mr. Horsfall hurried into the hansom, bidding the man drive quickly. He was rather late, and as they drew near the station he unfastened his overcoat to get the shilling ready for his fare. Fumbling in his waistcoat pocket for another sixpence he made a discovery which put all thoughts of returning to Highfield out of his head.

The newly recovered watch and chain were gone for the second time. Mr. Horsfall was fairly staggered. He leaned back in the cab breathing heavily, and could hardly gather voice on arriving at the station to send a porter for the police inspector.

Meanwhile the cabby, with the aid of another railway servant, made a careful examination of the hansom; but, of course, they found no trace of the late Lord Sprintham's token of friendship and esteem. Acting on the advice of the inspector, Mr. Horsfall had recourse to the nearest police-station, whence, after stating his case, he drove, accompanied by an officer, to King Street, St. Giles, first calling, however, at the office, whore they found the clergyman's card still lying on the table in Mr. Horsfall's private room.

The constable was inclined to consider the whole affair a plant.

"Likely as not there's no Clergy House in King Street, or, if there is, we shall hear that they don't know any one of the name of Bede."

But, as it happened, the constable was wrong. There was a Clergy House in King Street, easily to be recognised by the big brass plate on the door; and, to Mr. Horsfall's inquiries, the servant replied that Mr. Bede was expected back immediately. "Would not the gentlemen step inside and wait?"

Accordingly, Mr. Horsfall and the constable were conducted to the long bare-looking visitors' room.

There was a constant stir in the house. Bells rang, people came and went, voices without gave hurried directions. Presently the servant was heard explaining that a gentleman was waiting to see Mr. Bede; he "had not given any name; said that Mr. Bede would know him."

Then the door was flung open by a big muscular young man arrayed in clerical garb of the most correct cut and style.

"Sorry to keep you waiting," he began pleasantly, "I was obliged to go up West this afternoon, and have only just returned. It is about the School Board, is it not?" he added interrogatively, glancing from Mr. Horsfall to the constable.

"I think," hesitated the former, "that there is some mistake. It was for Mr. Bede I inquired."

"It is all right; my name is Bede."

Digitized by Google

"The Rev. Athelstane Bede, the Clergy House, St. Giles, and the Grosvenor Gallery Club?"

"That is my address. What can I do for you?"

Mr. Horsfall looked despairingly at the policeman.

"It is quite a different person," he said helplessly. "There is not the least resemblance between the two gentlemen."

"Case of mistaken identity?" inquired the curate.

"Case of swindle, I think, sir," responded the constable. "I told the gentleman all along as 'ow it was a plant."

"I must beg you to accept my humblest apologies," protested Mr. Horsfall when he had explained the situation. "You see, I had not a moment's doubt as to the truth of the story. The man looked like a gentleman, and a clergyman too. How was I to suppose him to be an impostor? There was his card. I have it with me. You will notice that it bears your name and address."

"Ah! that is quite possible. I had the misfortune about three weeks ago to have my pocket picked. There were four or five cards in my letter case (this most probably is one of them); there were also, I regret to say, three five-pound notes, the numbers of which I had not taken. We are brothers in misfortune, and I am afraid, sir, that your watch has shared the fate of my pocket-book."

"It looks like it," admitted Mr. Horsfall, gloomily; then his face cleared a little. "I'll stop that cheque," he said; "we shall catch him that way. I will write to the manager to-night."

The letter was duly written and posted, but circumstances for once were against the sacred cause of justice.

A dense fog delayed the bank-secretary's arrival at his post the next morning till half-an-hour after his usual time, and while Mr. Horsfall's letter lay unopened, amidst the pile of correspondence on the manager's table, his cheque was presented by a well-dressed young man, who received payment across the counter in gold.

Though a fresh reward was offered, coupled with a significant hint that no inconvenient questions would be asked, nothing more was heard of Lord Sprintham's gift. It had gone, most probably, as Sergeant Troyle had suggested, into the melting-pot, and not all the efforts of Mr. Horsfall, backed by the assistance of the Detective Department, could bring it back.

LASHED TO THE TOPMAST.

STRANGER to Canada, I think you said? First visit to Ontario? Well, you're heartily welcome to Indian Creek. Take a chair on the verandah till dinner's ready—we dine early in these New World parts.

Fine farm? Well, yes; Indian Creek is a nice place, if I do own it. All, as far as you can see—grass-land, corn-fields, woods, and creeks—all belong to it.

Stock, too—they call it the best-stocked farm in Ontario, I believe, and I dare say they're right, and yet I came to Canada twelve years ago, without even the traditional half-crown in my trousers' pocket. You look surprised. Would you like to hear the story? There's a good half-hour to dinner time yet, and it's a story I never tire of telling, somehow.

I began life as the son of a village carpenter in the south of England. You know that class pretty well, I dare say, and what a gulf was fixed between me and the vicar of the parish. And yet—and yet—from the time she was seven years old and I eleven, and she fell down in the dusty road outside the carpenter's shop and cried, and I picked her up, and smoothed the little crumpled pinafore, and kissed the dust out of her golden curls, I loved but one girl in the world, and that was the vicar's daughter, Winny Branscome.

Madness, you say. Well, perhaps so, and yet a man is but a man, and a woman a woman; and love comes, whatever one may do.

There's no class distinction recognised by childhood, and we were playmates and friends till she went to boarding school. If Miss Winny had had a mother, no doubt things would have been very different; but we were alike in never having known a woman's care; and the old vicar was blind to everything but his theological treatises.

But when she came back from the London boarding school, a beautiful young lady, all smiles and laces and little lovely ways—then I knew.

I had tried my best to study and work, and make myself more like the men she would meet; but what can a lad in an English village do?

I just had enough education to make every other lad in the place hate me, and beside the men in her world I suppose I cut an astonishing figure.

Yet the love of her was so beyond all else in me, that made hopeless as I felt it, I had no power over myself; and the first time I met her alone in the woods—she avoided me I saw, and I had to wait for a chance—I told her the whole story, and waited for the answer. She grew scarlet—a rush of colour that dyed her fair, sweet face—then deathly white.

"Dick," she said, and she trembled from head to foot, "you know it can never, never be; you know you are wrong even to dream of such a thing. Some girls would think it an insult—I know you better, but if my father heard of this he would say you had abused his kindness to you; he would never forgive you. Forget your madness." And she ran from me.

I let her go. I had seen the blush and the tremor, and I guessed that if I had been Mr. Loftus, the young squire, instead of Dick Hawtry, the carpenter's son, her answer might have been different.

A great resolve sprang up in my soul, and I took a solemn oath in those June woods. That very night I sold the old shop (my father was dead, and I had taken to the business), and with the money I bought an outfit, and started at once for Canada.

It was pretty tough work at first; but I worked like a galley-slave—starved, and pinched, and saved, and never spent a penny on myself, except for the books I sat up half the night to read and study.

Well, in this country the man who works and doesn't drink is sure to get on, and I had a mighty purpose in my head. By-and-bye I bought some land dirt cheap, and sold it for three times what I gave for it. Then I began to make money fast.

I should call my luck wonderful if I believed in luck, and didn't prefer to think I was helped by a Power far abler than my own. At last, ten years to the very day after I set foot on Canadian soil, I bought Indian Creek Farm, and began to build this house, till the neighbours thought my good fortune had turned my brain; for I fitted it up and furnished it for a lady, down to the little rocking-chair by my study table, and a work-basket with a tiny gold thimble in it.

And when all was finished, I took the first ship for Liverpool.

Ten years builds a city over here. It doesn't make much change in a Devonshire village. The very gates were still high off their hinges, as I left them; only the people were a little older and a trifle more stupid, and there was a new vicar.

Digitized by Google

Old Mr. Branscome had been dead six months—died very poor, they told me; there was nothing left for Miss Winny. My heart gave one great leap when I heard that. And Miss Winny? Oh, she had gone governessing with some people who were just off to Canada, and the ship sailed to-morrow from Liverpool.

The Liverpool express never seemed to crawl so slowly before. I got there to find every berth taken on board the Antarctic, and the captain raging at the non-appearance of two of the crew. Without a moment's pause I offered for one of the vacant places.

I was strong as a horse, and active enough, and, though the captain eyed me rather askance—I had been to a fashionable tailor on my way through London—he was too glad to get me to ask any questions.

So I sailed on the ship with my girl, little as she knew it. I saw her the first day or two looking so pale and thin that she was like the ghost of her old self, and yet sweeter to my eyes than ever before. The children she had charge of were troublesome little creatures, who worried and badgered her till I longed to cuff them well.

We had an awful passage. It was late in November, an early winter, and the cold was intense. It blew one continuous gale, and some of our machinery was broken, and we could not keep our course.

As we drew near this side of the Atlantic, we got more and more out of our bearings, and at last the fogs told us we were somewhere off the banks of Newfoundland, but where no one was quite sure. It seemed to me it had all happened before, or I had dreamed it or read it. At all events, it was hardly a surprise to me, when on the tenth night, just after midnight, the awful crash and shock took place—a sensation which no one who has not felt it can imagine in the least—and we knew that the Antarctic had struck.

It is a fearful thing, if you come to think of it—a great steamer filled with living souls in the full flow of life and health, and in one moment the call coming to each of them to die.

Before you could have struck a match the whole ship was in a panic—cries, terror, confusion, agony. Oh, it was awful! I trust never to see such a sight again. I made my way through it all as if I had neither eyes nor ears, and got to the state-room I had long ago found out was the one which belonged to my girl.

"Winny!" I cried, "come out! Make haste! There is not a moment to lose!"

The door opened as I spoke, and she stood just within, ready dressed, even to her little black hat. The cabin light had been left burning by the doctor's orders, and it fell full on me as I stood there in my sailor's jersey and cap. I wondered if she would know me. I forgot the danger we were in—forgot that death was waiting close at hand—forgot that the world held anyone but just her and me.

"Dick!" she cried; "oh, Dick, Dick!" and she fell forward in a dead faint on my shoulder.

All my senses came back then, and I lifted her up and ran for the deck. A great fur-lined cloak had been dropped by the door of the ladies' cabin. There was no light now, but I stumbled over it as I ran. I snatched it up, and carried it with me.

Up above all was in the wildest chaos—the boats over-filled and pushing off, the ship settling rapidly, people shouting, crying, swearing. One hears tales of calmness and courage often enough at such times which make one's heart glow as one reads them; but there was not much heroism shown in the wreck of the Antarctic.

The captain behaved splendidly, and so did some of the passengers; but the majority of them and the crew were mad with terror, and lost their heads altogether.

I saw there was not a chance for the overcrowded boats in that sea, and I sprang for the rigging. I was not a second too soon; a score of others followed my example, and with my precious burden I should not have had a chance two minutes later.

As it was I scrambled to the topmast, and got a firm hold there. Winny was just coming to herself. I had wrapped her round like a baby in the fur cloak, and with my teeth I opened my knife to cut a rope which hung within reach. With this I lashed her to me, and fastened us both to the topmast.

The ship sank gradually; she did not keel over, or I should not be telling you the story now; she settled down, just her deck above water; but the great seas washed over it every second, and swept it clean. The boats had gone!

One or two of the crew, floating on loose spars, were picked up afterwards—no more. The rigging was pretty full, at least in the upper part; down below, the sea was too strong. The captain was near me. I felt glad to think he had been saved—he was not a coward, like some of the others.

How long was the longest night you ever knew? Multiply that by a thousand and you will have some idea of that night's length. The cold was awful; the spray froze on the sheets as it fell; the yards were slippery with ice. I stamped on Winny's feet to keep them from freezing. Did you not notice that I limp a little? I shall walk lame as long as I live. Sometimes there was a splash in the dark waters below, as some poor fellow's stiffened hold relaxed, and he fell from his place in the rigging. There was not a breath of wind—nothing but the bitter, bitter fog.

Death stared us in the face; we seemed to live ages of agony in every minute, and yet, will you believe me, all that seemed little in comparison to the thought that, after all the struggles and the sorrows, after all those ten weary years, I had my girl in my arms at last!

She had pulled one corner of the cloak round my neck (I stood on a level just below her), and her hand lay there with it—it was the hand that warmed me more than the cloak—and her cheek rested against my own.

Often I thought its coldness was the coldness of death, and almost exulted in the thought that we should die together.

And then I would catch the murmur of the prayer she was uttering for us both, and knew that life was there still, and hope lived too.

Well, well! Why should I dwell on such horrors, except to thank the mercy that brought us through them all? Day dawned at last, and there was the shore near by, and soon rockets were fired and ropes secured, and one by one the half-dead living were drawn from their awful suspension between sky and sea, and landed safe on shore.

They had to take Winny and me together, just as we were, and even then they had hard work to undo the clasp of my stiffened arms about her. I knew nothing then; not for long after. And it is wonderful that Winny was the first to recover, and that it was she who nursed me back to life and reason.

And how did I ask her to marry me? Upon my word, now you ask me, I can't remember that I ever did. That seemed utterly unnecessary, somehow.

Somehow I was glad it was so; glad my girl had taken me, in my cap and jersey, for a common sailor, and yet loved the old Dick through it all; glad she never dreamed I was owner of Indian Creek Farm, and the richest man in this end of Ontario, and had wealth and position higher than Mr. Loftus, the young squire at home.

The people she was with had all gone down on that awful night; she had no one in the world but me. We were married at Montreal—and the captain of the Antarctic gave her away—and then I brought her home to Indian Creek.

To see her face when she saw the rocking chair, and the work-basket, and the thimble! Heaven bless her!

LOOK OUT FOR THE SPECIAL DOUBLE CHRISTMAS WEEK NUMBER
OF
PEARSON'S WEEKLY,
On FRIDAY, DECEMBER 21st.

A GIGANTIC SUCCESS.
PEARSON'S LIBRARY.
Now on Sale, No. 3.
THRO' THE BATTLE SMOKE.
A Complete Novel, Profusely Illustrated, for Sixpence.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

MAX RENAULT—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.
FRANZ HARTOG—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.
SIR HARRY MILTON—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia in his yacht, the Calypso, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.
HERBERT WYNDHAM—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.
FREDERICK AUSTEN—the inventor of the air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.
FRANK MARKHAM—the young captain of the Utopian yacht, Mermaid.
VIOLET MILTON—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is fearfully injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.
LEA CASSILIS (alias MME. DAIL)—a member of Autonomie Group No. 7, with whom Renault is in love.
DORA MERTON—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.
LUCY SUMMERS—another fair Utopian.
Renault, after levying blackmail with Hartog on the high seas, returns to Utopia with the object of destroying the colony, but finds it deserted. After a time he goes to Europe in the air-ship Vengeur, and together with Lea Cassilis visits the Criterion Theatre, London, where he is recognised by Sir Harry, and Lieutenant Wyndham, who effect his capture.

CHAPTER XXIX.

A SCENE AT BOW STREET.

THE arrest of Max Renault occurred at a few minutes past eleven, and before midnight the news—embellished, of course, by the wildest rumours and exaggerations—had spread far and wide over London, and had been flashed over the wires, not only to the provinces, but to the Continent and America as well.

Some accounts said that he had been arrested in the act of throwing a bomb on to the stage, and that it was only on his examination at the police-court that the real importance of the capture had been discovered. Others, again, said that the now famous air-ship herself had descended in Hyde Park, and had been captured with all hands on board; while yet a third rumour said that she was still at large and had gone to attack Windsor Castle out of revenge for her captain's arrest. The true facts were, however, as they were set forth at the end of the last chapter. Renault offered no resistance, and did not even utter a word of protest as soon as he saw that he was fairly in the toils. All he said was confined to a couple of sentences addressed to Sir Harry and that was:

"I am not going to deny my identity; I only wish to say that Mrs. Dail had, of course, not the slightest idea of it. I hope that, as a gentleman, you will see that she suffers as little inconvenience as possible."

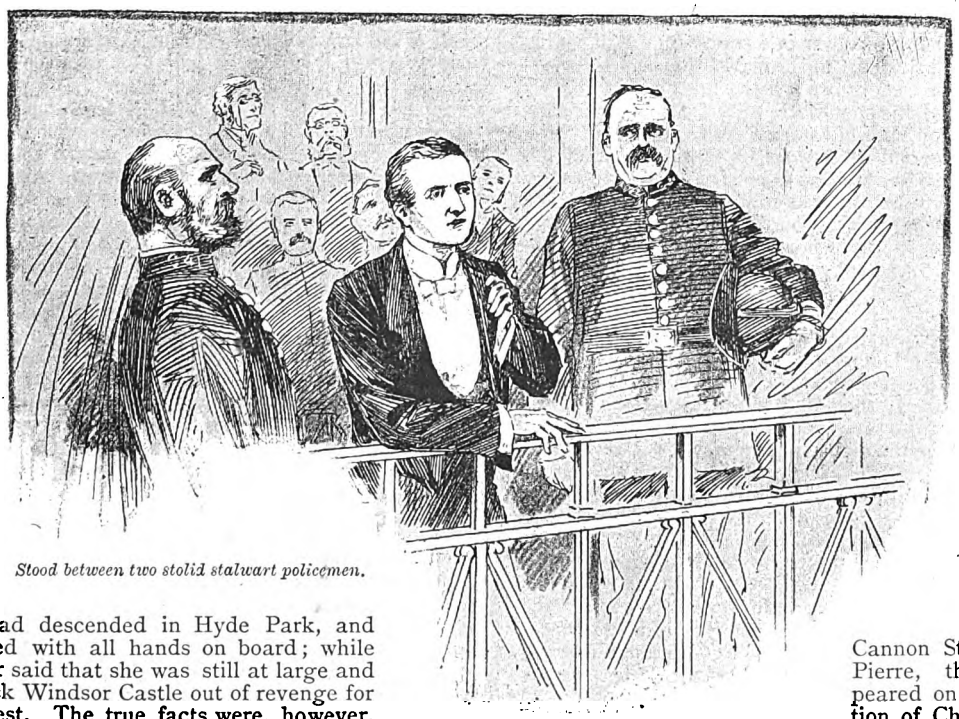
Sir Harry bowed in reply and at once offered his arm to Lea, who took it, and, after one brief frightened glance at Max between the two policemen, she went out with him, saying as she did so:

"What an awful thing!—and, would you believe it, Sir Harry, I have almost been silly enough to allow that man to persuade me to marry him. What an escape! Ugh! it makes me cold all over to think of it. Please get me a cab. I'm staying at the Métropole; my maid will be there waiting for me, and I shall get back to Paris first thing in the morning.

"No, please don't trouble to come with me. Really I would rather not. I shall be quite safe and——well, you see, I left the hotel with one gentleman, as he called himself, and it would hardly do to go back at this time of night with another, would it? Those hotel people do talk so. Thanks, this will do nicely. Good-night, and a thousand thanks for your kindness!"

She waved her hand to him from the cab, in farewell, and he called another and drove off to Bow Street to join Wyndham and his two friends. Lea drove to the Métropole, had her valise and Max's brought down, paid her bill, called another cab, and drove off at once to Charing Cross.

As she gave the direction, a man who had been lounging about the hotel entrance turned away and sauntered up the Avenue towards the station. He was the man who had left the Vengeur with them to act as means of communication between them and the air-ship, if necessary.



Stood between two stolid stalwart policemen.

When Lea had dismissed her cab at Charing Cross, she took a ticket for Cannon Street, and the man, following close after, took one for the same place, and got into the same carriage with her. She managed to find an empty first-class compartment, and by the time the train reached Cannon Street she had given her companion an account of what had happened, and a lengthy and minute message to Taxil. At Cannon Street they parted. Pierre, the sailor, disappeared on foot in the direction of Cheapside, and Lea got into a cab and drove to Aldersgate Street station.

There she watched the cabman out of sight, took a ticket for Farringdon Street, and then, leaving the station, got into another cab and told the man to drive her to an address in Westbourne Terrace where, three-quarters of an hour later, she was telling the story of Max's arrest to Rolland and his wife.

Digitized by Google

The next morning there was hardly anything on the newspaper placards but the great black letters which announced the event of which all England was already talking: the unexpected and almost grotesquely easy capture of the famous Anarchist and captain of the still more famous air-ship, which, as all the world knew, had destroyed, single-handed, three powerful cruisers and the same number of torpedo boats, and captured the aeroplane Britannia in mid-air to boot.

When Max was brought before Sir John Bridge at Bow Street at ten o'clock the next morning not only was the Court packed to suffocation but Bow Street itself was filled with an anxious, excited crowd, bent on getting a glimpse of those who had played the chief part in the capture of the prisoner. As Sir Harry and his friends drove up the crowd parted and cheered them as they went through. Outside reporters took snap shots at them as they entered the court and rushed off to have them reproduced to embellish the sensational narratives of their adventures in Utopia and on the Atlantic which the nimble fingers of hundreds of compositors were already setting up to form a sequel to the police court proceedings.

The proceedings themselves were of the simplest possible character, but they were none the less interesting on that account. When Max was brought into the dock he stood leaning on the rails in front, between the two stolid, stalwart policemen who guarded him, with an unconcern that could not have been more absolute if he had been a spectator watching the most trivial of cases. He politely but firmly refused all offers of legal aid, and with equal politeness disregarded the magistrate's warning that anything he said might be used against him at the Assizes if he were sent for trial.

First Lieutenant Wyndham, then Sir Harry, then Captain Maxwell and Lieutenant Pelham appeared in succession in the witness-box and told what they knew of the accused, his merciless crimes and his extraordinary exploits. The quietly-told, circumstantial narratives were spoken in the midst of a breathless silence which was broken for the first time when Sir Harry described Max's attempt to carry off his sister in the air-ship, and then all eyes were turned for a moment on to the accused, and a low murmur of irrepressible indignation ran like a fierce growl through the crowded Court.

Max simply lifted his eyebrows a little, and, with an almost imperceptible shrug of his shoulders, turned to Sir Harry and waited for him to go on with his story. When Captain Maxwell told of the destruction of the Devon and described how first her men had been mown down helplessly by the storm of Maxim bullets from the air, and then how the shells had riddled her decks, set her interior on fire, and at last exploded her boilers, the crowd in the Court moved uneasily as they sat or stood, and looked at each other with frightened, wondering eyes as much as to say:

"If that is possible what would happen to us if the air-ship came above the Court just now?"

Max saw this too and smiled. It was exactly the effect that he desired to be produced. Last came Lieutenant Clinton, and described the ill-fated expedition of the Britannia in detail, from the rescue of Captain Maxwell and his two companions in the sinking Devon, to the time when Taxil set them free after Peter Jackson had fired his momentous shot. Now, for the first time Max seemed to show a real living interest in what was going on. He followed every word with the minutest attention, looking alternately from the witness to the magistrate, and as soon as Pelham had stood down he said very quietly:

"Is it permitted for me to say anything now?"

"If you have anything to say," replied Sir John, "or if you have any reason to give why I should not commit you for trial, as I at present intend to do, I am of course bound to hear you, but I must again warn you, as you have refused the protection of any legal adviser, that anything you may have to say is, under the circumstances, more likely to do you harm than good.

"You are accused of the most terrible crimes, and, so far as this Court is concerned, the evidence against you is more than sufficient, seeing that you have already admitted your identity. It is my duty to advise you to say nothing now, but to take steps to engage proper legal assistance and then follow your counsel's advice implicitly."

"I am obliged to you for your advice, Sir," said Max in a low, even tone, which seemed strangely loud in the breathless stillness of the Court, "but at the same time I am quite prepared to take the risk of disregarding it. I care as little for your laws as I do for the assistance of a highly respectable lawyer who would only want hiring to defend even such a criminal and enemy of society as I have no doubt these good people here think me.

"We are at war, I and the society you represent. The last turn of the game has been in your favour. I and my people spared the lives of these gentlemen who have given evidence against me—evidence which I suppose is quite enough to hang me if you only have the power to do it. That shows how unwise it is to be too merciful in warfare.

"Still, I must compliment them, if not upon their gratitude, at least upon their moderation and their accuracy. I have listened carefully to everything they've said, and I have the pleasure of saying that it is all true. And now, Sir, you have given me well-meant advice; permit me to give you some in return. You say you intend to commit me for trial. That means, I suppose, that I shall be locked up in your cells till I make my next appearance at the Old Bailey. There the form of trial will be gone through, and I shall be condemned to death in the usual way.

"You will not hang me because you can't, but you will try to do so at your peril. I am stronger than the law, and if the law tries to injure me it will get the worst of it. I am alone here, but there is a power behind me which can and will exact such a penalty, even for the temporary inconvenience which you may put me to, that the wisest thing you could do would be to take steps to insure my liberation and safety. You have heard something of what that power can do. It will do nothing till sentence of death has been passed upon me. I need say no more, and, therefore, Sir, if you wish to send me for trial do so."

"I am stronger than the law."

As he finished his audacious speech Max stared straight at the magistrate and, without moving a muscle of his countenance, waited for his reply. It came, curt and sharp.

"You have outraged the laws of society and this country, and those laws will be vindicated without regard to any possible risk. You have been allowed to speak, and you have made a very foolish speech, in spite of its bravado, which in all human probability has finally sealed your fate. You are committed to take your trial at the Assizes which will be opened on Monday next, on the double charge of piracy and murder on the high seas. Let the prisoner be removed."

Then the tension which had held the crowd silent broke, and as Max was marched from the dock between the two policemen there was a rustle and a movement of feet and a low hoarse murmur through which angry exclamations broke as everyone thronged forward to get the last glimpse of him as he disappeared through the prisoners' door. Then as it closed behind him the Court slowly emptied of all save those whose duty keep them there. No one had any interest for the other cases that were coming on. There was only one topic for the public of London that day and no one cared to talk or hear or read of anything else.

In less than an hour the newspaper offices were pouring out special editions containing fuller and fuller reports until every word that had been spoken during the proceedings was set forth with the most minute accuracy. It was upon this that Max had counted when he made his speech to the magistrate. It was by no means so foolish as Sir John Bridge had honestly thought it to be.

Digitized by Google

Max knew that every word would be printed by the newspapers and he deliberately used them for the purpose of conveying his instructions to Taxil and the crew of the Vengeur. Those instructions were simply that the Vengeur was to keep out of the way, and nothing was to be done until sentence of death had been passed upon him. Then, by some means, which he trusted to them to devise, he was to be rescued, and after that, or if the attempt failed, vengeance was to be taken for his arrest or death as the case might be.

Soon after nightfall that evening Taxil dropped the Vengeur to the ground in a lonely glade in the centre of Epping Forest, and found Pierre waiting for him there by appointment with a bundle of newspapers under his arm. That was Tuesday evening. On Thursday morning London woke up to find posted in a hundred different places—on the walls of the Law Courts, the Government offices, the base of Nelson's column in Trafalgar Square, the Bank of England, the gates of Buckingham Palace, the Marble Arch, and even the terrace of the House of Commons—a small, red placard about eighteen inches square, of which the following is a copy:—

TO THE GOVERNMENT OF ENGLAND AND THE PEOPLE OF LONDON.

You are hereby warned that if Max Renault, at present in prison awaiting your so-called trial for murder and piracy, is condemned to death, the sentence will be executed upon you and your property. If it is carried out on him the vengeance exacted will be taken first on your Queen and Royal Family, and then upon the members of your Houses of Parliament, your judges and your lawyers, and after them upon yourselves generally. If Max Renault is placed alone and free on the gallery of the north Tower of the Crystal Palace at midnight on Saturday, London will be spared; if not, what is written here will be done at the proper time.

Signed, for the Anarchist
Central Executive,
RAOUL TAXIL,
In command of the air-ship
Vengeur.

A small red placard.

CHAPTER XXX.

SENTENCE OF DEATH.

THE impression produced on the collective mind of London by this audaciously worded poster may be safely left to the imagination of the reader. How in some quarters it excited derision and in others panic; how the timorous heard the news of it with dread, and how the secret enemies of Society read it with a smile on their lips and potential murder in their hearts; how the penny newspapers published leading articles ranging in tone from the alarmist speculations of the Daily News to the easy, if wholly insincere, banter of the Daily Telegraph; and how the halfpenny papers vied with each other in a contest of imagination and mendacity which stopped at nothing from the publication of entirely fictitious correspondence with non-existent Anarchists to an interview with the captain of the air-ship and author of the placard.

All this was visible on the surface, and so far differed but little, save in degree, from any of the thousand and one scares and sensations which had for many years been the amusement of the public and the livelihood of the journalist. But beneath this there was another feeling, a feeling which no one could express since no one had ever experienced it before.

There was no denying that the air-ship was in existence, or that her destructive powers were nothing short of appalling—her exploits in the Atlantic had conclusively proved that, and if she could destroy in swift succession three heavily-armed warships, what would she be able to do against a defenceless town? Granted that she made the threatened attack, what would its effects be like? Where and how would the blow be struck? Upon whom would the impending death that would be floating in the skies fall?

There would be no respect of persons. The Speaker in the chair of the House of Commons would be as much exposed as the beggar in the street. In a word London was confronted with a new terror—the terror of the unknown, and no matter what was said or printed in public, every reasonable man felt in his heart that the placard was no empty boast, and that the danger was a very real one.

The five days that elapsed between the proceedings at Bow Street and the trial of Max Renault for his life at the Old Bailey passed amidst ever-growing excitement and ever-spreading uneasiness, but the red placard had been the last sign made by the Anarchists.

The demand for the release of Max had, of course, been ignored—as his friends apparently expected it would be, since, as far as was known, they had not even come to the appointed place. Naturally, too, the newspapers informed them that this would be the case. Neither on land nor in the air had a trace of the Vengeur been seen, though millions of eyes were looking anxiously for her.

Max himself preserved an aspect of absolute indifference to the fate that appeared so certain. He declined all legal aid in the preparation of his defence, if he had any, and communicated with no one outside the walls of Holloway. Lea had reappeared in Paris two days after his arrest; and then, hearing that an outcry was being made against the English police for allowing her to go out of the country unquestioned, she at once returned to London, put up at the Métropole, and communicated with Scotland Yard, saying that if she could be of any service to the prosecution she was ready to give what evidence she could.

This had led to an interview with one of the heads of the Criminal Investigation Department, in which she managed to befog and mislead the official so utterly that, on his report, it was decided not to call her, it being, doubtless rightly, considered that there was more than enough evidence to hang Renault several times over, had that been possible or desirable

As for any connection between him and the wealthy and fascinating idol of half Paris which could be construed to her disadvantage, such an idea had never seemed to enter the heads of the authorities at all, and so Lea went back to the Rue Vernet before the trial to receive the condolences of her large circle of acquaintances on the unpleasantness of the experience that she had passed through, an unpleasantness which some said was amply compensated for by what Paris considered to be the piquant novelty of the adventure.

Digitized by Google

"One word more, if you please, my lord."

The trial at the Old Bailey, although it naturally excited an interest that was literally world-wide, was in itself almost devoid of sensational incident. As a matter of fact there was no question to try, since the prisoner had already admitted that the fatal evidence against him was true. When he was asked whether he pleaded "Guilty" or "Not guilty" he replied in a low, clear tone:

"Not guilty."

"Then are we to understand," said the judge, "that you do not adhere to the statement you made before the magistrate, and that you have evidence to call in your own defence?"

"I have no evidence to offer," replied Max, "and what I said in the police-court I am prepared to say here."

"But that contradicts your plea of not guilty," exclaimed the judge. "The same witnesses that appeared against you before the magistrate will be called here to-day and will give the same evidence. In the police-court you voluntarily admitted that that evidence was true, and yet you have just pleaded 'Not guilty.'

"I can hardly think that a man of very considerable intelligence, as you appear to be, standing in the presence of a court that is about to try him for his life, could find it possible to indulge in a mere play upon words. It is greatly to be regretted that you did not employ counsel, as I understand you could well afford to do, and, even if not, counsel would have been provided by the Crown. At any rate, you would have been spared the commission of an absurdity which, under the present circumstances, is something more than painful."

"My lord," replied Max, in a tone that took all respect out of the form of address. "I plead 'Not guilty' because I am charged with what you call murder and piracy, and to that plea I shall adhere. I and my comrades have as much right to make war, if we can, upon this country as this country has to make war on Russia. I care nothing for the sophistry which calls it war in the case of the nation and murder or piracy in the case of the individual.

"I fought the vessels which I destroyed fairly, and when some members of their crews fell into my hands I treated them honourably, much more honourably, in fact, than they treated me. Their lives were in my hand, and I let them go; for that I was fired upon, wounded in two places, and almost killed. If I had killed them when I had them defenceless, I should have felt bound to plead guilty to the charge of murder—supposing it could have been brought against me, as it could not have been."

Great and all as was the horror which Renault's crimes had inspired the whole of civilised humanity, there was yet something in the spectacle of this solitary man, confronting the sternest, though the most impartial tribunal in the world, disdaining all outside aid, and literally pronouncing his own condemnation beforehand rather than condescend to take advantage of a quibble or an untruth, which produced a marked impression on everyone in the crowded court.

The most stolid of the jurymen could not resist the suggestion of romance with which the whole situation was so pregnant, and even the judge's voice when he next spoke had something less in it of that tone of scornful toleration which is usually used from the Bench to those who are unable or unwilling to purchase the assistance of a professional advocate.

"It is no part of my duty to discuss such a question as that with you. I am here to interpret and enforce the laws of England as they stand, and, according to those laws, the offences for which you are about to be tried are capital offences, and there is an end of it. As a matter of form I will accept your plea of 'Not guilty,' and, therefore, the trial will proceed. Mr. Maudesley, I believe you open for the Crown."

As the leading counsel for the prosecution rose to his feet, amidst a faint rustle of garments and a low half-repressed murmur of anticipation, Max made an expressive gesture with his hands, and said in a slightly higher tone than he had used before:

"One word more, if you please, my lord. After what I said in the police-court, and after what you have just said here, this trial can only be a formality which will be very nearly a farce. I am in no humour to assist at an entertainment for these people here."

As he said this he jerked his thumb contemptuously towards those parts of the court which were packed with fashionably dressed men and women who had used the most strenuous endeavours to get places for the grim drama that they expected to see.

"Nor," he continued with an added note of contempt in his voice, "do I wish to be bored with the ready-made sentiment of this learned gentleman whom I could have hired to defend me if I had chosen. To save time and trouble, therefore, I will anticipate the foregone conclusion and withdraw my plea of 'Not guilty.'

"I did everything that your witnesses would swear I did, and I only regret now that I didn't do more, for had I done that, neither I nor they would be here to-day. I am guilty of what you call murder and piracy, and what I call war. Now, my lord, I hope I have simplified your task; but before you pass sentence of death, as I presume you will now proceed to do, let me repeat the warning——"

"Silence, Sir!" exclaimed the judge in quick stern tones which made the words ring like pistol shots through the crowded court. "You have been permitted to trifle with the law whose dignity I am here to uphold because you are undefended by counsel, and English justice condemns no man, however vile a criminal he may be, unheard, but I shall not permit you to insult it by the threats which you call warnings.

"You have pleaded guilty to a series of crimes and outrages which have caused the sacrifice of hundreds of lives. Your own life is therefore forfeit to the law, and the law will take its due, no matter what the consequences may be. Even if it were in the power of you and your followers to

"That is the death sentence of London."

Digitized by Google

lay London in ruins before sunrise to-morrow, it would still be my duty to do that which I am about to do, and I shall do it.

"Gentlemen," he continued, turning to the jury. "You have heard the prisoner withdraw his plea of not guilty, and, with a bravado and callousness utterly shocking and disgusting alike to our sense of propriety and our feelings of humanity, glory in the commission of crimes which excel all similar crimes perpetrated by the abandoned wretches among whom he seems proud to number himself. Under such circumstances, happily unparalleled in an English court of justice, there can, I conclude, be no doubt as to your verdict. Do you find the prisoner, on his own confession, guilty or not guilty of the crimes of murder and piracy on the high seas with which he stands charged in the indictment?"

For a moment there was silence so intense that the throng in the court could hear their own hearts beating and their own breath going and coming. The foreman of the jury glanced inquiringly at his colleagues. Every head was bowed in unanimous assent, and then he rose to his feet and said in a voice that he did his best to keep steady under the excitement of the moment:

"We find him 'Guilty,' my lord."

"Prisoner at the bar!" said the judge, turning to Max and taking up the fatal square of black cloth in his right hand. "You have been found guilty, on your own confession, of the crimes of murder and piracy on the high seas. It is my duty to ask you now whether you have any reason to give why sentence of death should not be passed upon you."

Max leant his folded arms on the rail of the dock and, after one quick, searching glance, first at the jury and then at the throng that packed the court, looked the judge full in the face, and said with a sneer that he made no attempt to disguise:

"Since that will also be sentence of death on those who are my enemies, I have neither reason nor objection. Say on, my lord!"

Then he stood and, still with unshrinking eyes and smiling lips, watched the judge put on the black cap and heard him say the solemn words which, unless some miracle should be interposed to save him, consigned him to a shameful death and a felon's grave.

"—— and may the Lord have mercy on your soul!"

The last of the fatal words had scarcely died away in the hush that had fallen on the now breathless throng, when Max suddenly straightened himself up and, before the warders could stop him, cried in a loud, clearly-ringing voice:

"That is the death sentence of London! That for your law and your justice. Fichtre!" And with that he snapped his fingers in the faces of judge and jury, and the next moment was hurried from the dock by the two warders.

(To be continued.)

HER BOY.

AND now he was dead—her boy, the only one! She could not sleep; she could not think of anything else. She was conscious only of a feeling of inexpressible loneliness; all the sunshine and warmth had vanished, leaving a cold, dreary void. As she now sat by the side of the little bed, staring into space, so had she sat for hours—motionless, as rigid and white as the boy who lay there before her. He had been her second self—her all, her idol. And now he was gone!

Two children had been born to her and had died within a few weeks of birth. When she lost the second, a dull despair took possession of her, and the doctors began to despair for her reason. Then came this one—a boy, her bonnie boy—and from that moment she lived again—lived for him.

She would not allow any paid servant to attend to him; she herself watched over him—nursed, washed, and dressed him. His cot stood near her bed, and as he slept she sat by his side and listened to his every breath. Then she worked and sewed for him; nothing was too costly or too good for him. The prettiest and sunniest room in the house was set apart and fitted up for the baby boy. She gave up visiting and stayed at home that no harm should befal him through her absence. She herself cooked his food; everything was carefully prepared and tasted.

He learnt to walk by holding her hand. She stooped and crept along the floor with him, he disarranged her hair and her dress with his chubby fingers. What did it matter? She forgot all, except that she was his mother!

He was a bright, intelligent little fellow. He wanted to know everything, examine everything, and she was never tired of answering his questions. She invented games and tales to amuse him; all the treasures of a richly-stored mind, hidden from everyone else, she poured out for her darling. He should be prettier and cleverer—and better—than all!

As he grew, she began to make plans for the future. He should become great and famous! Her love made her ambitious, almost greedy. She scraped and saved, and urged her husband to continual work and restless endeavour. Life must be made smooth for her boy; he must never have to slave for a living, or be at the beck and call of everybody.

He had never been ill; not for one moment had he caused her any anxiety on that head. "A splendid little fellow," the doctor called him; every limb was like iron, and supple withal. He became the best gymnast in the school; and he grew up as good-mannered, and as polite to ladies who visited his mamma as a knight of olden time. She had reason to be proud of him.

Five days ago he was in good health; now he was dead. Diphtheria. Nobody knew how he had caught the fatal disease; he had not complained of feeling ill, but had looked pale and tired. She had brought him home, and the best doctors were called in; they did not hide the fact that his life was in great danger, but she would not believe them.

"He will live," she said, shaking her head. "He will live! It would be too cruel to take him from me. He is the only one I have in the world!"

She never moved from his bed day or night. She laughed and joked with him, and made plans about what they would do when he was well again. They would go to the mountains, and papa would buy him a pony, a pretty little brown pony. He had wanted a pony for a long time; he smiled at the realisation of his heart's desire, his whole face beamed with delight as he said: "Good papa!"

She left the boy for a moment to draw aside the curtains and let in the sunshine—he liked the sun so much. She turned to him with a smile.

"Do you like that, my de a

But he did not answer. "Good papa" had been his last words; he had died with the beaming expression produced by her promise.

She would not believe it. She threw herself upon the bed, pressed her lips against his, shook him, and called to him. "My boy! my boy!"

Dead!

She sat by the bedside unconscious of all that was taking place outside. She knew not whether it was day or night, whether the time was passing or standing still. Someone opened the door and came in softly; a tall, spare man, with tired-looking eyes, and an expression of deep grief on his cadaverous face.

"Will you not lie down, Elizabeth?"

"No!" she answered in a hard tone. "I cannot sleep. I will stay here."

He stepped to the head of the bed and bent over his son's body; he was going to kiss the still, wax-like face, when she uttered a cry:

"Don't touch him! Don't touch him, I say!"

Digitized by Google

He looked at her with his tired, sorrowful eyes. "Poor girl," he said; and went away as softly as he had come.

Alone she watched by her dead. In an adjoining room she heard her husband's footsteps as he paced up and down, up and down, the monotonous tread interrupted occasionally by what sounded like a groan. Then the sounds ceased.

He was much older than she; a quiet, earnest man, whose profession occupied a great deal of his time. She had married him at the wish of her parents, and because she knew him to be trustworthy. The marriage had not been unhappy; he had always been very good to her, but she had been much alone. When this boy came and lived, she was happy. And her husband——?

She did not see much of him. He came home in the afternoon, and they had dinner together—except when she was busy with the boy, when he dined alone. And after the meal he retired to his room, and worked hard. He had a cold, narrow room at the back of the house; he had given up the one orginally occupied by him, because the doctor had said that it was the brightest and healthiest room in the house.

He never complained, and always gave way to his wife in everything; if the thing pleased her, that was sufficient. Year by year she was able to put by a respectable sum for the boy out of the liberal allowance that he was able to make to her by his constant work, and she looked forward to the time when she would be able to give the boy a grand start in life. Her love for the child was all-engrossing, and her husband was but a secondary consideration. It was always "My boy." But John never complained. She was usually asleep when he went out in the morning, and at night when she had a few minutes with him, her conversation was all about the boy's doings.

When the child was about two years old, his interesting ways caused John to go to the nursery on several occasions. The child was delighted to see the earnest-looking man who jumped him up and down, allowed him to "ride-a-cock-horse," and pull his whiskers. But the mother became impatient at games in which she had no part. Why should the child be so pleased?

At last she could bear it no longer. She called him to her, ut the boy refused to leave his father. A pang went through er heart; she spoke angrily to him, and the little fellow began to cry. His father sat him down gently and bade him go to his mother.

John did not go to the nursery again, and she was glad. John had his profession and his fellow-workers; she had only her boy. She blamed herself for her jealousy, but it was stronger than she. When her boy went to school she learnt Latin secretly so that she could help him and he would not be obliged to go to his father for assistance.

"Good papa!" She grudged him even that; the words struck her to the heart. "Look at me just once and say 'Mother,'" she moaned. It seemed to her that she could have borne the loss more easily if his last words had been for her. But he was dead, and his sweet lips would never say another word. "Good papa!"

Why did the words torment her so? They drew her mind from the dead to the living, to the elderly man in the back room who was sorrowing for his son. She had driven him away! "Don't touch him!" she had cried aloud; and in heart she had added: "He is mine, mine!"

The awful selfishness of her motherly love now became suddenly clear to her, and she shuddered.

How peaceful the boy looked! Several times, as the candle flickered and shone more brightly for a moment, and the light fell upon the dead boy's face, it seemed to her as if he smiled and his lips moved—"Good papa!"

She understood it now. "Yes, yes, he is a good papa! I will go and fetch him!"

The father sat in his old armchair, his face buried in his hands. The room was dusty and untidy, the picture of neglect. She had entered the room quietly, and he had not noticed her.

"John," she said softly.

He looked up quickly, with a vain attempt to hide his tears.

"What is it, dear? Can I do anything for you?"

His first thought was of her. Sympathy and compassion filled her heart now. She stretched out her arms to him. He hesitated, not understanding the movement; but the look in her eyes explained all, and he clasped her to his breast.

"My wife, my poor, dear wife!"

There, close to his heart, the first tears came to relieve her, and she sobbed bitterly. When the paroxysm was passed, she looked up at him and said softly and humbly:

"Come with me; come and see our boy!"

HE noble Chao-Se was very unhappy. Nevertheless, his rice crop had been unusually abundant; the white flowers of the tea plant filled his gardens; his silk cocoons were never richer; and to crown all, he was the lucky possessor of an autograph letter from the Emperor, in which could be seen the word chaon, a credential of long life.

Why, then had our noble Chinee ordered the image of Fo to be belaboured with sticks, leaving a mere wreck of that deity standing amidst fragments of his former porcelain and imposing figure? And that evening, at supper, why had he disputed with his ancient cook the excellence of a magnificent dish of roast dog that all the guests had pronounced exquisite, disdained a cup of the finest Kyson tea, and paid no attention to his pet monkey in spite of all its playful caresses?

"Respected kinsmen," said Chao-Se gravely, after the meal had ended, to the three venerable Chinamen squatting at his side, "you all know that I intended presenting my son at the court of our Celestial Kingdom."

The speaker and his hearers inclined their heads until their pigtails swept the floor, and it became necessary to remove the monkey, who imitated the action of these grave personages. Chao-Se continued:

"My son, Te-Ku, has not regarded my teachings; he does not know how to bend the body gracefully eighteen times in making our court bow, nor is he familiar with the unalterable forms of our celestial etiquette; he has rejected my old friend Ling's virtuous daughter, whose tiny feet could be encased in nut-shells; and, let this astonish you, dear friends, defied by Chung, whose honoured body now reposes in the tomb, he refused to disembowel himself, while his adversary expired triumphant with his body ripped open in the most approved fashion. In this disgrace I have called you together, being resolved to follow your advice as to the best means of saving the family honour."

"You should, above all, disinherit Te-Ku," said the eldest of the council.

Digitized by Google

"And divide your possessions among us," added the second.

"And as the family honour is tarnished, a sacrifice is necessary," said the third. "You should strangle yourself, in order that the reputation of our house may not perish."

Such was the decision of the council. Chao-Se now, too late, regretted having convoked it.

. . . . . .

"What present is this you are bringing me?" asked the wife of Chao-Se, that same night, noticing that her husband had placed a small ivory box upon the table of her room.

"Beautiful and dearly beloved Tian, I have a surprise for you," replied the noble Chinee, gallantly.

Tian gathered herself up on her couch, exposing to view a pair of tiny feet, some two or three inches in length.

"You have been a good wife," continued Chao-Se kindly, "and I desire that you should figure in history as a model of virtue. Well then, the family council has decided that I must sacrifice myself to restore our lost reputation; but as I have a certificate of long life from my sovereign, it would be an act of ingratitude on my part to cut short my own existence. I have therefore selected you, dear Tian, as my substitute, that you may save our honour with the silk cord you will find in the box. I am sure you will be grateful to me for this mark of distinction and proof of my deep affection."

"Sir!" exclaimed Tian terrified, "I dare not kill myself. I am as timid as a chicken."

"Calm yourself, my dear; if you cannot do it alone, being as timid as a chicken, I'll get the cook to help you," and the noble Chao-Se embraced his wife tenderly, and withdrew from the apartment.

. . . . . .

Tian appeared calm; Kin, the cook, was uneasy.

"Dost thou wish to fly with me?" asked Tian gazing lovingly at the poor cook.

"My lady!" exclaimed he, trembling.

"To fly from a house where they do not appreciate thy roasts, to unite thyself to me and become master of my magnificent jewels."

Kin kissed the floor to express his gratitude.

"There is a way to accomplish all this. Thy master, Chao-Se, protected by the Emperor's decree, will yet live many years, during which time we shall be able to leave this earth and lose ourselves in space."

"I don't understand."

"It is very simple! I wish thee to accompany me in this journey. Take this cord and hang thyself outside the door whilst I gather up my jewels and prepare to follow thee."

Kin opened his oblique eyes in horror. Tian gave him a languishing glance.

"Good-bye," she said, "do not fail me," and pushed him gently towards the door, slipping around his neck the soft silken cord.

As Kin left the apartment he heard a noise in an adjoining room. "It must be the monkey," he said to himself, and then continued meditatively: "For two reasons I had better not kill myself: in the first place, because I have no certainty of reviving in the other world; and, secondly, because if I do come to life again, the mighty Fo will be able to take vengeance upon me for the beating I have given his image."

Again the noise was heard. It was not the monkey but Te-Ku who made it, robbing the treasure chest of his father. The garden window was open; the jewels showed glitteringly through the open mouth of the sack. Kin, indignant, could not do less than reproach him for his conduct, at the same time revealing to him the predicament in which he had placed the family.

Te-Ku implored him to speak lower, but Kin responded each time in a louder voice. At length the unhappy youth exclaimed, conscience-stricken: "Give me the cord; I am the true culprit, and to me should belong the sacrifice!" And making a noose in one end of the fatal cravat, he tied the other to the window frame, swung the bag of jewels to his shoulder for the expenses of the journey, and, embracing the cook affectionately, said to him:

"Go now, and leave me alone. I do not wish thee to witness my death agony."

Kin had not complete confidence in his young master, but did not dare disobey his command.

"I've got myself nicely out of that scrape," said Kin, with a sigh of satisfaction, passing his hand around his neck.

. . . . . .

The following morning at daybreak the relatives of Chao-Se, attired in white, the mourning costume of the Chinese, presented themselves at his house, prepared to render to his corpse the last tributes; but to their great surprise they found him awaiting them, also dressed in white, and maintaining a ceremonious attitude.

"What, still alive!" they exclaimed, indignantly.

Chao-Se related to them all that had occurred: his scruples, the timidity of his wife, the substitution of the cook, and the voluntary expiation of his son. The others, after an animated discussion, agreed to accept this solution of the difficulty.

"Let us go to the garden, into which nobody has yet entered," said Chao-Se, solemnly. "There we shall view the body of my unhappy son."

The committee made their way to the garden, but upon arriving at the scene of the catastrophe, were stupefied with amazement. Suspended by the silken cord, and swinging to and fro like a pendulum, was the rigid body of a monkey.

"That is not my son!" exclaimed Chao-Se, horrified.

"Sir, I saw him place the noose around his neck," replied the cook. "Without doubt the monkey has fled in the figure of your son, leaving his own image behind him. There is something of magic in this. . . . . The divine Fo is avenged!"

"No such thing," said the prospective inheritors of the estate, with decision. "It's the body of Te-Ku. Don't you see the resemblance to the father? It is his very image!"

"But, gentlemen," protested Chao-Se," defending himself, "look at that mouth!"

"It is your own, noble Chao-Se," replied the others.

"And those ears ——"

"Are identical with yours"; and in a whisper, "Remember that a victim was required!"

The distinguished Chinaman admitted at length that the body was that of his son, although certainly somewhat disfigured.

Consequently the death of Te-Ku was officially certified to, the remains were given a magnificent burial, and the family council declared the honour of the house of Chao-Se to be fully re-established.

. . . . . .

In spite of the certificate of long life, Chao-Se survived his son only a few months. Then came to take charge of the inheritance a young man who claimed to be Te-Ku, and declared that he had fled from the paternal mansion some time before, jumping from the garden window.

The case having been submitted to the highest tribunal in the land, a learned mandarin rendered the following decision:

"The death and burial of Te-Ku having been legally proven,

"No one having been missed from the house of Chao-Se on the night in question except a monkey, whose whereabouts are now unknown:

"Be it decided, therefore, that if the claimant speaks truly in regard to the flight, he can be no other than the monkey;

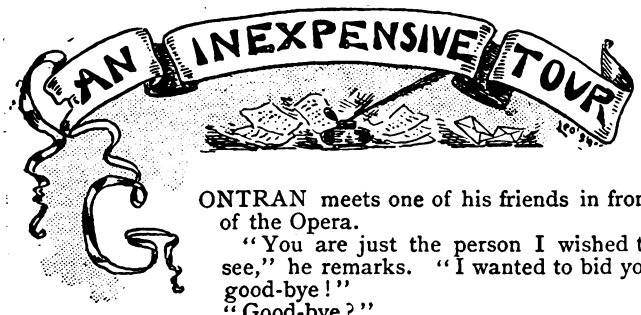
"And if he has failed to speak the truth he deserves to be executed with the cord that the relatives of the deceased still retain in their possession."

In this alternative Te-Ku decided to declare himself a monkey, and was forthwith handed over to a travelling mountebank.

TO OUR READERS.

In consequence of the Christmas Holidays, the next issue of SHORT STORIES will be published on Saturday, December 22nd, instead of Tuesday, December 25th. It will be our Special Christmas Week Number, and will contain five complete short stories of a seasonable nature, besides an instalment of Mr. Griffith's exciting serial profusely illustrated

Digitized by Google



GONTRAN meets one of his friends in front of the Opera.

"You are just the person I wished to see," he remarks. "I wanted to bid you good-bye!"

"Good-bye?"

"Well! I am going away shortly. London is not fit to live in at present, and I do not understand how you, one of our set, consent to wander in these intolerable streets."

The friend bows his head and walks away somewhat humiliated. Gontran goes on his way triumphantly, announcing the great news to all his friends. One of these, little Lloyd, who is more inquisitive than the rest, asks him where he is going.

"I have not decided yet," answers Gontran.

"To a watering-place?"

"Pooh! I dream of Italy."

Little Lloyd, who wishes to find out just what is in Gontran's mind, remarks very seriously:

"They say it's a beautiful country!"

"I believe you," says Gontran ironically.

He then looks at him askance, and walks away. For fifteen days he takes pains to proclaim clamorously his departure, gives and takes commissions, and continually changes his plans.

At last, his friends, really tired of hearing always the same old story, begin to wonder when they meet him:

"How is it you have not gone yet? Still here? When do you start? Have you decided to remain?"

Gontran feels that he really must do something at once, and one evening, meeting his best friend, the Hon. Charles Seawell, remarks, "I have decided to start to-morrow."

"At last!"

"You will allow me to send you my impressions from time to time?"

"Thanks—delighted, of course."

"I authorise you to communicate an abstract of my notes to our friends of the club," adds Gontran.

"Certainly. Shall I accompany you to the station?"

"Thank you, no; it would be useless."

It would indeed have been useless, as, on the following evening, protected by the falling shadows, Gontran, with little luggage, mysteriously took a cab, directing it, not to the station, but towards the distant quarter of Stoke Newington.

There he took a room for four pounds a month in Cometa Street, a street in which one need have no fear of meeting any of the West End set. All the summer he remained there. He hired an old servant to attend to his wants, and also bought the necessary material for a large correspondence.

Eight days afterwards the Hon. Charles received a letter, of which the following is an abstract:—

"Steamship, General Garibaldi, 14th May, 18—.

"How beautiful the sea! How freely one breathes when surrounded by this immensity of water! Ah, my dear Charlie, how I pity you, who have to remain in that infected London. As you wish me to write all my adventures and sensations, I shall begin by remarking that I sailed from London on the General Garibaldi, a steamer plying between London, Genoa, Vecchia, and Naples. You know my social temperament, so that it is hardly worth while to mention that I immediately made the acquaintance of the captain by offering him cigars. Captain Austen is a dear old fellow! Going out of port the ship began to tip a little. How wretched it is to be seasick! Luckily I did not suffer long. I have not told you yet about the passengers of the General Garibaldi. All sorts of people! There is one girl who is enchanting—a little girl with a wealth of hair falling on her shoulders. She often looks at me, and I—Pst! I must not tell everything in a day.

"After all this talk, my dear Charlie, I stop writing to go on deck and admire the far-off lines of the Corsican coast on the blue horizon.

"Yours affectionately,
"GONTRAN.

"P.S.—You will receive this letter, as well as those which follow, through a third party who attends to my business interests in London."

A fews days afterwards a second letter came from Gontran, dated in Genoa:—

"Hold me, my friend, hold me, as I cannot restrain the great admiration which overcomes me, while I exclaim, Wonderful! delightful!—no one can imagine anything like it! Genoa is a city that does not resemble any other. It has a gulf, and oh! what a gulf! and marble everywhere, too much marble! They say the Ligures founded Genoa about seven hundred years before Christ. Later, the Romans united it to Gallia Cisalpina. After the fall of the Roman Empire it was taken and passed through the hands of different barbarous populations, until it became liege to Charles the Great. At the beginning of the fifth century, Genoa declared itself an independent city, and was governed by consuls, upheld by the senate. The people gathered in assembly on the public square, and took part in the administration.

"In 1379, the Genoese and the Venetians, who controlled the seas, began to fight each other furiously, and completely demoralised one another." (Here it may be well to remark that Gontran had, before departing for Cometa Street, bought a Baedeker Guide.)

"By the way; I have found my American girl of the steamer at Genoa. We live in the same hotel, and she is accompanied by an uncle, and two cousins with pointed teeth. I have been told that she belongs to one of the richest families of New York. The day after my arrival I began the attack. In love, I never waste time. A maid, generously bribed, has promised to convey to Miss Arabella (this is her name) a note, the triumphant result of which undertaking I patiently await."

When Gontran wrote these sweet words he had just dictated the items of his washing-list to his washerwoman, whose orthography had deeply interested him.

Thus the letters to the Hon. Charles followed one another for three months. It was a flood of rhapsody. The most wonderful and amusing adventures were described in them: Excursions in gondolas in Venice, fantastic serenades on the Lake of Como, battles with brigands, invitations to the Vatican. The last letter was dated from the foot of the crater of Vesuvius.

. . . . .

Three months later, at Ascot, a man throws himself into another man's arms:

"Charlie!"

"Gontran!"

"As you see!"

"You look wonderfully well. My best compliments for your beautifully bronzed complexion."

"Send your compliments to the sun of Naples and the breezes of Sorrento."

"Oh, yes, I know!"

"Did you receive my letters?"

"Every one of them!"

"Did they interest you?"

"They astonished me."

The Hon. Charles seems to think a minute, and then he asks with a smile:

"So you are satisfied with your trip, are you?"

"Can you ask such a question? Enthusiastic, my dear fellow!"

"If such is the case, I think you ought to pay me the rent of the room in Cometa Street, which you have unfortunately neglected to do. You see, my dear Gontran, I have only these small dividends to live on. My dear fellow, I am your landlord."

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HOW SHOULD STOUT LADIES DRESS?

Some considerable controversy has been going on in one of the American fashion magazines on this subject, started by the threatened inundation of crinolines.

Fancy a fat lady in a crinoline! Or better still, fancy ten fat ladies in ten fat crinolines, with, say, five a side in a none too fat omnibus!

The Yankee humorist says: "A fat lady can beat a fat man; she can stick a stiletto-like pin through her head till it comes out the other side and hold on her bonnet, but the fat man can't." Let's have those ten pins to complete the picture of those ten crinolines. Would we of the sterner sex not like to "lynch" the fiend who invented mountainous hats and feathers for front rows in theatres? Blondin can walk across Niagara on a tight rope, but can he walk a theatre corridor with three ladies' trains in front of him? The fashion miscreant, and the barbed wire inventor, have much to answer for. One fashion paper argues that if the portly lady adds a little slashing of light on a dark backgrouud, artistically and judiciously, it has the effect of apparently reducing her size by half a stone. How ludicrous all this seems! What is the seven pounds imitation reduction? We have known Mr. Russell, the eminent Specialist on Corpulency, reduce a lady eleven pounds in seven days, and not an imitation reduction, but an absolute fact, at a cost of probably less than is paid to the "faking" dressmaker. Those who are acquainted with his methods, or have read his work, "Corpulency and the Cure," can bear us out that he talks with as glib unconcern of fourteen-pound, twenty-eight pound, and even half-hundredweight reductions of unhealthy waste accumulations as a steamboat stoker would talk of coal. The dressmaker simply attempts to hide the disease—creating adipose, carried about by the unfortunate victim to obesity—whereas Mr. Russell (of Woburn House, 27, Store Street, London, W.C.) aims to remove the cause, and thus impart health. Of course, no lady likes the brute of a man who enters into a crusade against tight-lacing in a blunt common-sense way; but he is, however, right when he claims that tight stays with embonpoint is suicidal, especially when a few doses of a most pleasant, agreeable, and exhilarating tonic, made entirely from herbs, will reduce one's weight so easily with a corresponding improvement of health and strength, and with it that bright eye and healthy complexion which we all like to see in a lady. If our roof leaks and lets the rain in, we can shelter ourselves from it by opening an umbrella; but if we get the slater to stop the cause, he is the true benefactor, and not the umbrella maker. So it is with the reducer of fat and the dressmaker. The fair sex begin to see that he is their benefactor; he does not ruthlessly rip up the bodice, like uncouth Dr. Abernethy; he is better informed, for he actually knows that in twenty-four hours that identical inimical appendage will be in a state of subjugation. In other words, a dangerously tight lacing on Monday will be slack by Tuesday, after taking three simple doses of his mixture. "Has one to starve one's self?" asked a lady once. Not at all, for it is a singular fact that one eats more under his treatment.

It is perhaps not singular, if we investigate. A fat man is unhealthy; he is, in fact, diseased; as the disease is being cured the organs become healthy, the patient is more buoyant, and takes more exercise, and requires more food (it is also traceable to other reasons without exercise). Then, again, with stilt-like high heels, fashion—well, I think we had better drop this theme, we shall get into hot water with our fair readers; we are married. We generally get the old bachelor-editor to write on these subjects; he is not a bit afraid of women, as he calls them.

But seriously, if any lady, or gentleman, as far as that goes, wishes to reduce their weight, we commend them to Mr. Russell's work, "Corpulency and the Cure," which is published at Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., and only costs 4d. in stamps, post free. But to revert to the subject of crinolines, honestly we are pleased to see the really sensible and steadfast way in which ladies have made their standpoint, and we suggest that they should have a medium of their own to rule the fashions to their own liking, and not be the victims of the profit-seeking professional modiste.

DO STOUT PEOPLE LIVE LONG?

This is a question which has occupied the attention of medical authorities from time immemorial. Some argue that the lean kind take longer to shuffle off the mortal coil than their stout brethren. The statistics naturally favour this argument, and no doubt are correct to a great extent, because sufferers from obesity are more susceptible to disease in consequence of the debilitated state of the system when clogged with abnormal adipose tissue; but a curious fact has been overlooked, viz., that corpulency generally commences about the age of thirty-five to fifty, after which time it seems to decrease; therefore, before the proverbial "three score and ten" is reached, the whilom fat man is, by a natural process, again reduced to what may only be called moderate plumpness, and thus cheats the statistician. Stout persons can now, thanks to science, reduce their weight in a most extraordinarily rapid manner, without the slightest injury to their constitutions, or without resorting to those drastic remedies which only operate for a time, or by the continuance of the use of toxical drugs extending over such a period that renders it baneful to the long-suffering patient. An eminent Continental therapeutist recommends the victim to obesity to eat fat meat, while an equally eminent American prescribes lean ditto, and the stomach is to risk an accumulation of serious disorder by swallowing a pint of hot water daily, a most nauseous remedy, we should think, and not unattended with danger. The past master in the cure of corpulence is Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., whose book (256 pages), entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," price only 4 stamps, seems to impress us considerably, for he reduces more weight by his system than the Continental and American physicians, without any of the absurd restriction which would make life scarcely worth living. He uses simple herbs, the properties of which he seems to possess a more than usual knowledge of, and he makes but little secret of his method, so refreshing after the mystery made of most chemical and herbal concoctions of various complaints.—Wetherby News.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

DAMP FOGS WILL PREVAIL IN DECEMBER.

IT IS JUST AS USEFUL AT A "CRUSH," OR IN A HEATED BALL ROOM.

HINDE'S "CRISPA WATER," AN INVALUABLE PREPARATION FOR MAINTAINING A PERMANENT WAVE OR CURL TO THE HAIR. WILL MAKE LADIES INDEPENDENT OF THE WEATHER'S VAGARIES.

ALL CHEMISTS, PERFUMERS, OR STORES WHO SELL HINDE'S HAIR CURLERS WILL SUPPLY IT. PRICE 1/6 THE BOTTLE. THE NAME OF THE PATENTEES, HINDES LIMITED, IS ACROSS THE LABEL.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

ONE BOX OF

DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY, 12, Gaskarth Road, Balham Hill, London, SW., Beware of injurious imitations.

A XMAS BARGAIN.

Consisting of 200 Genuine Foreign Stamps, all different, including Transvaal, 1d. on 6d, in two lines, British Bechuanaland, Orange Free States, 2½d. provisional unused, Straits Settlements 1 on 8 cent. yellow, Van Dieman's Land, New South Wales 5d. square green Sirmoor, Travancore used, Zululand, Zanzibar, Siam 1 on 64 atts, Holkar, Falkland Islands, St. Helena, Negri Sambilan, Paraguay (post marked), price only 3s. 6d., postage extra. A small collection of 500 Genuine Foreign Stamps, all different, price 5s. 6d.—JNO. GRAVES & Co., Stamp Importers, Bury St. Edmunds, England.

TO ADVERTISERS

Wishing to reach families, a Test Advertisement in SHORT STORIES will bring profitable results. Scale of charges as follows:—

Front Page, £12 10s. per Insertion.
Back or Inside, £10 per insertion.
Per Inch, 5s. per insertion.

Less 5 per cent. for 13 times.
,, 10 per cent. for 26 times.

Delicate Children.

Parents will not realize the fatal error of neglecting the first symptoms of delicacy in their children. Looking at the matter from a purely selfish point of view, it is a considerable saving to one's purse, for medical authorities all admit that one single dose of medicine given in time will be worth 999 after the mischief is done. Once allow the seeds of ill-health to sprout, and remember you will have a harvest to cope with.

If there is constitutional weakness in yourself, bear in mind that your children are liable to inherit it, and therefore that their ailments warrant a double amount of anxiety and care. If you attack the delicacy tonically before the child is 15 years of age, and it is a complete waste of time to treat it in any other way, the whole system will be built up and the nutrition of the body renewed and strengthened, and the result arrived at will be a thoroughly sound and healthy organisation.

Because your children are delicate and weak, do not imagine for a moment that they need remain so, for youth responds readily to a tonic treatment.

No matter how undermined the constitution may be, it can be permanently reconstructed by putting new blood tonically into the system.

Delicacy, natural feebleness, and languor in children cannot prevail against the curative properties of Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which contains all the necessary ingredients for rebuilding a delicate constitution. It restores to the blood the vital elements eliminated by fragility, gives the brain its necessary stimulus, and the muscular system a new elasticity; in a word, what is lacking in failing health, it supplies. All delicacy, no matter how chronic or obstinate, will yield before it.

It is useless to patch up here and there; go to the root of the mischief and attack that, every organ will then come under its influence and become healthy. It is too well known that a delicate chest leads to consumption only when the child is imperfectly nourished; germs find no soil in a perfectly healthy body.

Infantina's Syrup must not be confounded with any of the old-fashioned out of date oily compounds, for it is quite different. It resembles in appearance and taste a fruit syrup, is pleasant to the taste, and far surpasses such nauseous mixtures.

Infantina Syrup is a perfect tonic for children from 2 to 15 years of age. It is sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly, remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA CO., 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

CHRISTMAS STORIES! CHRISTMAS STORIES!!
CHRISTMAS STORIES!!!

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 313.] FOR WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 29, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

1 RISING SUN STOVE POLISH. EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

In HALF the TIME with HALF the LABOUR you can produce MORE POLISH with TWO Penny Packets of RISING SUN than with HALF-DOZEN of ordinary Blacklead.

Sold in ½d., 1d. & 2d. Packets

THREE GREAT BOONS

3 MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, &c. &c.

REQUIRES no addition or preparation.
SAVES time, labour, and uncertainty.
PRODUCES beautiful white glossy linen.
Sold in 1d. Packets, or 3d. and 6d. Boxes.

Sample of any one post free 2 stamps
C. Chancellor & Co., London, E.C.

2 RISIN' SUN METAL POLISH GIVES TO ALL KINDS OF METALS A BEAUTIFUL SOFT BRILLIANT POLISH

With the MINIMUM of LABOUR this LIQUID POLISH produces a MOST BRILLIANT APPEARANCE, which lasts much longer than that produced by any Paste Polish.

Sold in 1d, 3d, 6d, & 1/- Bottles

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY
The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.
Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.
SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS.

Heraldic Designs and Trade Marks and Tradesmen's Windows, Facias, Signs, or Tablets.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

MOST EFFECTIVE MEDIUM

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

Call and see our Stock or send for Price Lists.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd.,
61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.
(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

IZOD'S

LONG WAISTED. A GREAT SUCCESS.

THE LONG WAISTED.

200 Dozen or 2,400 Pairs of this Celebrated Make alone delivered this season in London per Day. The great question of the day with all Ladies is the Fashion in Corsets, which grows year by year, until our Special Artistes have produced corsets for every type of figure.—
IZOD'S CORSETS are cut on scientific principles, with a precision of accuracy formerly unknown.——
IZODS draw Ladies' attention to their Long Waisted Corsets, which have been designed by their British and Foreign Artistes, which are the best the world produces.—
The Ladies' Tailors always recommend these celebrated goods for the elegance with which they set off a tailor-made dress and create a long waist and graceful figure. They are made in a variety of qualities, and are beautiful and inexpensive. Every pair stamped on busk Izod's Long Waisted, and also on lid of the box.——
To be had of all Drapers and Ladies' Outfitters in Europe, India, Canada, United States, Australia, the whole of the British Colonies, and throughout the world.——
Write for our Sheet of Drawings.

E. IZOD & SON, 30, MILK ST., LONDON, E.C.
Manufactory: LANDPORT, HANTS.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

TO ADVERTISERS

Wishing to reach families, a Test Advertisement in SHORT STORIES will bring profitable results. Scale of charges as follows:—

Front Page, £12 10s. per insertion
Back or Inside, £10 per insertion
Per Inch, 5s. per insertion ...
Less 5 per cent. for 13 times.
" 10 per cent. for 26 times.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

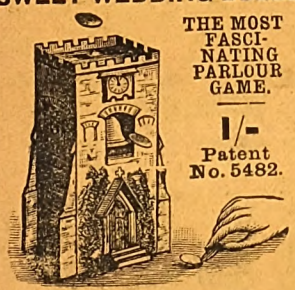
SWEET WEDDING BELLS.



THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY, 12, Gaskarth Road, Balham Hill, London, SW., Beware of injurious imitations.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each. Pattern and Price Lists post free. Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

LEEDS CITY DRESS AND MANTLE CLOTH MANUFACTURING CO.,

70a, Wellington St., Leeds.

Send for patterns, Free and not to be returned, of our Dress Cloths, Serges, Beavers, and Worsteds. Any length cut, and carriage paid.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. S.," 87, Strand, London. Mention SHORT STORIES.

FOREIGN STAMPS GIVEN AWAY!

We will give to every applicant for our large new Price List, &c., 30 Genuine Foreign Stamps; all different, including Transvaal, British Guiana, Kustend and Czernawoda, 2 Spain (baby king), Victoria Great Britain (I.R. official), 3 Cape Colony, 3 Canada, 4 Indian, 5 United States (including Columbus issue), the lot sent post free for 2d. Send 3½d. at once for our 32 page Illustrated Stamp Album, containing upwards of 1,000 full size engravings of stamps. Special offer—A Collection of 500 stamps, all different for 5s. 3d.

JNO. GRAVES & CO.,
Stamp Importers, Bury St. Edmunds.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.

For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

EASY PAYMENTS — ORGANETTES — ONLY 4/- MONTHLY

Wonderful instruments. Anyone can play them. Over 700 tunes ready.

Particulars free. Draper, Organette Works, Blackburn.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

MELVILLE'S
New Upright
GRAND PIANOFORTE

26 GUINEAS (Net Cash Price).

This Piano is confidently recommended as the very best instrument ever produced at the money. It has all the latest improvements. Price 26 Guineas. Inspection and trial is invited.

MELVILLE,
61, Charing Cross Road, London.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to DR. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

BLUSHING

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

Eczema

and all Skin Eruptions are cured by a Healing Cream widely known as

"Anteczema."

"Anteczema" is sold by all Chemists and Stores and may be had post free for 1s. 3d., 2s. 9d. and 4s. 9d., of the ANTECZEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.

Little Book Free. NAME THIS PAPER.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL
KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—
THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES. Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS. No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise. A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case. Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 2, RED LION COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 313.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING DECEMBER 29, 1894. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

SANTA CLAUS.

A TALE OF THE FRANCO GERMAN WAR.

I.

PERHAPS it is rather a curious Christmas story after all.

Old Captain Rolland, the marine officer who was in charge of my division, and who was noted for his vigilance, had sent us forward on outpost duty along the Doubs river as far as Plommecy, twelve leagues or so from Besançon. We had been on the march all day, part of the time along the towing-path, where a foot of snow was lying, part of it on wide cross-roads, which troops of cattle had changed to so many rivers of mud.

Thanks to the winding of the river, in spite of all our short-cuts, it was close on nightfall when we reached Plommecy. Our fatigue had reduced us to a dull silence, as we tramped slowly along with the heavy, regular swing of weary troops. Every now and then a man hitched his knapsack up with a jerk of the shoulders. An old smuggler, whom we called "The Sapper," in allusion to his heavy beard, was the only man who kept a little gaiety, and was able to jest. He retained the light but firm step with which he had begun the day, and from under a moustache full of icicles he hummed the eternal refrain of an old marching song:

"My coat has two buttons,
March along, march along;
My coat has three buttons
Gaily march along."

All Rights Reserved.

We regained a little of our former energy as we drew near Plommecy. On the distant river bank in front of us the snow-covered roofs were visible as great white spots upon the background of a grey December sky.

"Come, my lads," said the Sapper, "put your legs into it!" and he struck up another ditty:

"There's lots of drink ahead of us, lads,
There's lots of drink ahead!"

The detachment began to double as if by one accord.

As for the Prussians, they never came into our thoughts. We had been out looking for them since morning, and had not seen a solitary uniform.

All the same we began to think of them when we came to the outskirts of the village. There was no movement in it; not a light to be seen, and a silence of the dead. It occurred to us that it was just possible that we were walking into a Prussian ambuscade. Each man changed his chassepot from half to full cock, and brought the trigger within easy reach of his finger. Tired legs recovered their elasticity; stiffened backs grew supple enough to crouch behind walls, and so we entered the end of the village street, ready to find rest from our day's march in a night of fighting.

"By Jove! the place is a graveyard!" someone said. "Suppose we knock at this door. The inhabitants will tell us what is afoot. At any rate we shall find someone to speak to, even if they answer us with lead."

He knocked at the door. No one answered. Someone knocked at the next door, with the same result When we tried the third, our lieutenant kicked at the lower panel with al his strength. The door gave way before the shock, and he entered the house, revolver in hand. Ten men followed him. The other five of us waited in the street to keep watch for an attack.

In three minutes, our comrades emerged with anxious faces and the news that the house was empty. The next and next that we tried were standing open. It was the same everywhere; the village was deserted.

"Diable! diable!" said our lieutenant. "The Prussians must have passed through here while we were watching the waters of the Doubs. The peasants must have taken refuge at Haume. We shall have to keep a sharp look-out to-night."

He proceeded to place a sentinel at each end of the street, and a third upon a cross-alley that led out to the open country. The rest of us followed him to a farmhouse that seemed the chief building of the village, in order that we might cook our supper and prepare the night's lodging.

Digitized by Google

But our leader had scarcely opened the yard-gate when all our suspicions were confirmed. It was here that the Prussians had had their quarters. We could see marks of their presence in the over-turned water-trough, the hay so prodigiously taken from the barn and littered about the stable, the burst door of the cellar, and the empty bottles scattered among the straw on which the troops had evidently passed the night in the yard, their officers sleeping in the house.

Three bounds carried us indoors. There was no longer room for doubt. A table littered with dirty plates, half-emptied glasses, wine-bottles with their necks broken off, all bore witness to a gluttonous orgie. In the fire-place, a huge heap of logs, piled up on top of one another, was still burning. The bed was in disorder of the wildest description. Muddy boots had left their marks on the sheets of fine white linen.

Whilst our lieutenant was considering if there was no possibility of successfully pursuing the villains, the Sapper, who had gone off to rummage the stables, and see if he could light upon a few eggs, called to us suddenly from across the yard. We all hastened to the sound of his voice.

The Sapper was endeavouring to comfort a little fellow of some twelve or thirteen years, who was weeping as if his heart would break. He had picked the child up in his arms, and kissed him, smothering his sobs in his great beard. As we came up he was saying:

"I promise you we'll catch them. Don't cry, laddie. You shall have one of them to kill yourself."

He entered the house, revolver in hand

We could not understand what was the matter. But the officer found and lit a lantern. As its light suddenly illuminated the stable, the whole story became clear. Two bodies were lying in a corner near the rack, a man and a woman. Behind them on the wall were spread two large splashes of blood and brains. The two corpses were holding each other by the hand.

"Father! mother!" wailed the little fellow, without heeding the Sapper's attempts at consolation. At the sight of us, however, he grew quieter, and was able finally to tell us the story of his misfortune. The peasants had left the village three days before at the news of the Uhlans' approach. His father and mother had been the only ones willing to stay. The Prussians had come and plundered everything.

At the moment of their departure, his father had not been able to refrain from insulting the officer in command of them. The officer had struck the old man, who had sprung at him, and tried to throttle him. Then the Prussian had ordered the man and woman to be dragged into the stable, and had himself blown out their brains with his revolver.

"Oh! I shall know him again, the brigand," cried the child; "and I'll kill him when I see him!"

Then he suddenly turned to our lieutenant and asked:

"Will you take me for one of your volunteers?"

The officer saw that to refuse would be to plunge the child into despair, and thought that it would always be time enough to show him the absurdity of his desire when his grief was appeased. So he answered simply:

"Yes."

"Then give me a gun and I'll go with you to kill Prussians."

"I have not a single spare rifle, my good boy," answered the lieutenant. "Come with us to Besançon. We can find you one there."

The child, a little consoled by this promise, allowed himself to be taken to the fireside in the kitchen whilst we buried his parents as well as we could. The next day he returned with us. At the end of five or six leagues he was utterly worn out with fatigue. The Sapper put him astride of his own knapsack to the end of the day's march, and marched gaily along with his light, firm step, still humming his interminable refrain:

"My coat has a hundred buttons,
March along, march along,
My coat has a hundred and one buttons,
Gaily march along."

II.

The next day and the next again the child spent in our company, and no one could muster courage to tell him that volunteers of thirteen were not accepted. Each day he became more urgent in his demand of a gun, and grew more vexed that he was not already clothed and armed like a soldier.

"If you were ordered off to-morrow," he said, "I should not be ready, and you wouldn't take me with you."

That was on Christmas Eve. We had planned to have a little feast of a kind in the house of the good fellow who boarded ten of us in the Chaprais suburb of Besançon. The child was to be with us. Our gaiety might cheer him up. So we sent him to bed at seven, and promised to wake him up at midnight.

At half-past eleven I arrived, a little ahead of the rest. I went up to the room in which the child was asleep, so as to leave the dining-room free to Mother Gaudot, who was preparing the supper, and my light did not wake him. It was cold in the room, and I looked mechanically towards the fire-place.

Behold the strength of habit! The child had forgotten his grief for a time, and had hung up his stockings over the chimney-piece, as he was accustomed to do in the good days when Santa Claus never failed to bring the Christmas presents.

The poor little fellow had no idea that, his mother being dead, Santa Claus was dead too. He was quite hopeful, and had fallen asleep to wait tranquilly for the gifts of Providence.

What a miserable waking he would have! To be thus, as it were, abandoned by heaven would put the last touch to his woes. His parents were slain, and he was alone in the world, and now Santa Claus had forgotten him, too. The orphan was bound to feel himself doubly orphaned.

Digitized by Google

The Sapper was endeavouring to comfort a little fellow.

Of a sudden an idea came into my head. I turned and rushed downstairs.

"Mother Gaudo," I cried, "the child is asleep upstairs. Try and see that no one wakes him before I come back. Tell the other fellows that it is for his sake. Wait till I come before you begin supper."

I ran as fast as I could to the armoury, where I knew one of the guards. At a few minutes past the stroke of midnight I was back again. All the rest were waiting for me.

"Hollo, what is the meaning of this?" cried the Sapper.

"Let me pass, you fellows," I answered, hiding my burden under my greatcoat. "The lad is not awake, I hope?"

"Not he, parbleu!"

I crept upstairs as softly as I could, without confiding my errand to anyone.

"Now," I cried, as I entered the dining-room again, "call him if you like, but don't go up."

They called and hammered on the ceiling. In less than a minute the child appeared, radiant and smiling, in his night-shirt, with a shako on his head, and a cartridge-pouch girded about his waist. In his hand he brandished a short cavalry carbine.

"Merry Christmas!" he cried. "See what a fine gun Santa Claus has brought me!"

III.

The next day we were ordered off on an expedition. Four days later we fell in with the Prussians near Belfort, and a skirmish ensued.

It was early in the day on the outskirts of a forest. The mist that clung about the underwood was torn here and there by the flashes of rifles. We could hardly see the enemy. Of a sudden our little volunteer uttered a loud cry:

"There he is! there he is! I see him! There, behind the big oak."

He pointed at a tree standing by itself in a clearing, behind which, in fact, we seemed to see a horseman moving. The boy had recognised the officer of Uhlans. He rushed forward too hastily from his shelter. His spring left him uncovered, and he fell with a bullet in his breast. The officer had brought him down with his revolver.

"You coward!" cried the Sapper. And he brought his rifle to his shoulder with a steady hand. Crack! the officer's horse fell with a broken foreleg, and dragged its master down below it.

PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO

OF

FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES.

The Second Part was Published

On THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20th,

AND IS

TWICE AS GOOD AS PART I.

CONTENTS:—

Miss Agnes Huntington: A Reminiscence of "Paul Jones."
Mr. Henry Irving as Matthias in "The Bells."
Miss Mimi St. Cyr: A Study.
Miss Ellaline Terriss as Cinderella.
Miss Julia Neilson in "The Tempter."
Miss Jessie Preston as Little Jack Sheppard.
Madame Patti: A Study.
Miss Maude Adams in "The Masked Ball."
Miss Millie Hylton in "Don Juan."
Mr. Fred Storey in "Ruy Blas," and "Cinder-Ellen Up Too Late."
Miss Mary Ansell.
Miss Alice Lethbridge.
Mr. E. S. Willard in "The Middleman."
Madame Jane Hading.
Miss Janet Achurch.
Miss Marie Tempest as Manon.
Miss Loie Fuller as a Skirt Dancer.
Miss Moore in "Little Christopher Columbus."
Miss Billie Barlow as Little Boy Blue.

NOTE THIS:—Part I. was sold out almost on publication, and many would-be purchasers could not obtain a copy. Part II. will sell out even quicker. Buy your copy at once.

33 BEAUTIFUL PHOTOGRAPHS FOR SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

"Forward! Avenge our little comrade!" cried the Sapper.

We covered the clearing at the double. The Prussians, seeing their leader down, gave way before us. The Sapper was the first to reach the dismounted officer, and received a bullet in his shako.

"Fire away, old fellow!" quoth he, as he gripped the Prussian's wrist with a hand of steel. The four remaining chambers of the revolver emptied themselves harmlessly in the air, and the Sapper, flinging his prisoner to the earth, put his knee on the officer's chest.

"Bring the lad along?" he cried. At that moment the lad was in the throes of the death agony.

"It's impossible," someone cried, "he's dying."

"Sacrebleu!" cried the old smuggler, "he shall not leave us without his bit of satisfaction."

Seizing the Prussian round the waist, and keeping his arms fast behind his back, the Sapper carried him bodily off to where the boy was dying. The child smiled feebly, and life seemed to come back to him.

"Coward! coward!" he gasped.

We had placed him with his back against a tree. The Sapper forced his prisoner to kneel in front of him.

"Kill him, my lad! Come, kill him! You know I promised you you should."

The boy fumbled weakly at his carbine, which was lying on the earth between his legs. Suddenly a convulsive movement seized him. Throwing all his remaining strength into one last effort, he brought the stock up to his wounded bosom, pointed the barrel at the German's face, and pulled the trigger as his eyes were closing. The officer's brains were scattered on the ground. As for the boy, he was quite dead when we lifted him.

"Poor little fellow!" said the Sapper, swallowing a lump in his throat. "In spite of everything, he had a fine Christmas present!"

Digitized by Google

MATTSPELLE: A SWEDISH CHRISTMAS STORY

EARLY one morning a light gleamed in the barn chamber. Mattspelle, who had risen a half-hour earlier than usual, had lighted a bit of candle stuck in a bottle, and stood arranging his hair before a cheap little looking-glass, hung on the window sash. It was Christmas eve and he must look his best.

He had a most obstinate shock of tow hair. On weekdays it stood out in all directions round his calm, good-natured face, with its round cheeks and light blue, absent-minded eyes. On Sunday, cold water was brought into use; the mat lay in order only as long as it was wet, and then it was the old story again.

But on holidays it occasionally happened that Mattspelle looked really tidy, for he had procured some tallow wherewith to anoint his locks, and for several days afterwards his hair shone so that it was hard to tell what was its original colour. To-day he combed and brushed, and brushed and combed, until not only his hair but his face shone.

He was glad that it was Christmas Eve. He thought of the porridge and ham and all the good things, and of the presents which the master and mistress never failed to provide for their servants.

He was in luck to get such a good place with Mr. Stenstrom. It was a year last summer since he had come here, and he might have come sooner if he had only been confirmed. For two years he had tried in vain. He was so stupid; he could scarcely answer a single question. The third year it was the same way, with regard to questions, but this time he knew something—he could repeat the catechism from cover to cover. If he were asked how many persons there were in the Trinity, he blinked from under his tow head and said not a word. But if someone started him on the catechism, he could rattle on like running water. So he was confirmed, for surely no one could deny that he knew his catechism.

In spite of this, however, it was hard to see any growth of intelligence in Mattspelle. He was not quick nor bright, but he was strong as a full-grown man, and did what he was told, as a soldier obeys orders. If he were sent to tar a boat, he tarred it both outside and in, for no one had told him where to stop; and if his master bade him shut the door tight, he would slam it so that the glass almost cracked. He was a conscientious fellow.

The bell rang at one o'clock. On Christmas Eve, everyone, old and young, master, mistress, and servants, had lunch together, and dipped bread in the gravy.

The kettle was in the kitchen, which had been decorated for the occasion. Chopped evergreen was strewed on the floor, and branches of it were all about the room. The shelves holding the burnished coppers were decked out with fancy paper; fresh white cloths were spread over the tables.

The kettle was there in which the Christmas ham had been cooked, and here everyone came up to dip his slices of bread and lift them out on to small plates. On the tables were ham and sausages and potatoes and Christmas ale. One could well satisfy himself with these, and the rest was kept for supper.

At present no one seemed to want anything else. The slices vanished as if they were candy, and the children would scarcely leave off eating them. They pushed and crowded each other, and played boats with their bread slices in the kettle, until the pieces fell apart.

But the happiest of all was Mattspelle. He stood behind the others, with a look of great content on his face. Not a word did he utter, for Mattspelle seldom opened his mouth except to eat, and he did not crowd to the front, for he was no forward fellow. But when the house-mother asked him if he wanted more bread, his round face shone still brighter, and when Marie the housemaid took his bread and dipped it for him, he even smiled.

The mistress was thankful when the lunch was over. She expected her sister and her brother-in-law, the postmaster, and their two children to supper, and there was yet much to be done. The cakes were not ready; the little ones must be brushed and have fresh collars; the presents must be sealed up; the Christmas table must be arranged. There were a thousand things to do.

Just as she was busiest in the kitchen, she remembered that there were some things to be brought from the store. She went in to her husband to ask if he could spare one of his men.

"Certainly!"

Mattspelle was sent for, and soon the sleigh was brought to the door. The mistress came out with a long list of articles needed, and baskets, jugs, and bags were put into the sleigh. And, first and last, Mattspelle was cautioned to be careful, and look to everything.

Oh yes, he would be very careful. That was all right. And he grasped the reins, ready to start; but at this moment out rushed eight-year-old Kerstin.

"Mamma, I want to go too!"

She was a regular tomboy. She liked to be in the stable and cow-yard with the cattle, and enjoyed nothing more than to ride on the hay-cart, the wood-cart, and in the sleigh, if nothing more tempting offered. She had nearly missed Mattspelle, for she and her brother were quarrelling over a present which was sealed up, and which she was determined to secure for herself. But just then she heard Svarten neigh, and it was to her like a battle-cry.

"Can't you stay at home on Christmas Eve?" said her mother, trying to push her back into the house. "It will be dark before he gets back, and it is so cold!"

Kerstin stamped her foot and shrieked:

"I will! I will! Papa says that we must be out every day, and I have stayed in all the morning"; and, peeping from under her mother's arm, she cried to Mattspelle: "Wait a bit, I'm coming."

She darted like an arrow into the house, and before the slow Mattspelle could obey his mistress's orders and drive on, the child was back, with her cloak flying open, and her fur cap perched on her head. She jumped up beside Mattspelle, jerked the reins from his hands, and chirruped "Svarten."

The mother called after her and was obliged to coax and beg her to wait a little till someone could bring wraps, so that she might not catch cold and fall ill.

Mrs. Stenstrom was really vexed, and scolded, while she carefully wrapped up Kerstin's little feet, hands, and body. She was "a naughty, wilful child, who always wanted her own way," and if it were not Christmas Eve, she would "tell papa, and put an end to the matter."

"Oh, papa would let me go," cried Kerstin, getting on the last mitten, and taking a fresh grasp of the reins.

She sat beside Mattspelle, her little nose in the air, her blue eyes scarcely showing under the fur. She nodded and smiled to her mother, the little white teeth gleaming, and mamma must nod and smile back, although she really was vexed with the spoiled child.

The sleigh flew off, and Mrs. Stenstrom went in. When the father was told of Kerstin's escapade, he only laughed. She was the most mischievous of the children, and it was just as well she was out of the way when they were all so busy, he said.

Digitized by Google

Time passed. Everyone was busy, sealing up presents and writing rhymes. Papa was called in to dress the tree, or else it would never be finished. Twilight came. The lights were lit and the supper-table spread. At five o'clock, it was pitch-dark. The guests were expected at any moment, and the hostess had gone to dress.

But where were Kerstin and Mattspelle? The mother had once or twice wondered that they had not yet returned, and the father had grumbled over the delay. Still, there was no cause for alarm, for one was always obliged to wait in the stores on such a night.

Pretty soon Emma the cook, crossing the yard, heard sleigh-bells and saw Svarten and the sleigh, with Mattspelle on the seat. Kerstin was not there; but then, she was such a wild youngster, always jumping out of the carriage without being helped! Probably she was out, shutting the gate.

Emma called to Mattspelle:

"Hello, Mattspelle! It looks as if you had brought back a smarter load than you took with you."

Mattspelle hardly saw her, although she carried a lantern. He drove on a little, and stopped before he had reached the kitchen door, got down, and began attending the horse.

Emma had a presentiment of some disaster, and went forward, throwing the light on his face. He looked strange, and turned away his eyes.

"Has anything happened?"

Mattspelle said nothing.

"Answer man. What have you done with her?"

Emma took hold of him and turned him round. He stood there before her, and dropped the whip in the snow.

"I—I—could not help it."

His voice sounded as if the tears were not far away, and he looked at Emma pleadingly, as if he hoped she might help him.

Meanwhile there was a stir within. The bells had been heard, and maids and children peered from the windows and doors, and hastened out when they saw that something unusual had happened.

Emma brushed past them, pointed at Mattspelle, and gasped out something unintelligible. Almost breathless, she hurried into the drawing-room, where the master was lighting the candles in the sconces.

As he looked at her, he trembled. He thought the house was on fire.

"What is it?"

"Mattspelle has come back, and without Kerstin."

The master rushed out, pale with fright. The hall was full of people, and they had got Mattspelle within the door. He stood in the midst of them, cap in hand, pale and frightened so that, in spite of the grease and cold water, his hair stood out in all directions. His eyes were fixed on the floor. Thus far no one had succeeded in getting a word out of him.

"What does this mean?" cried Mr. Stenstrom. "What have you done with her?"

"I couldn't help it," answered the man, but without lifting his eyes. "It wasn't my fault—she fell down—the hill."

"Did she fall off? But she isn't lying there now?"

He took the man by the shoulder and shook him.

"Answer, fellow!"

"Ye-e-s," said Mattspelle.

"And you did not lift her up?"

No answer.

"You went on again?"

Mattspelle glanced up a moment, then looked at his feet again.

"It was all over," he said.

"You don't know what you are saying, fool!" shrieked the unhappy father, and shook him again. Suddenly he released him, and cried out:

"Bring lanterns."

All was excitement. The mother, almost overcome by the news, rushed out into the snow after her husband, while one of the maids hastened after her with wraps. The house was deserted.

Mattspelle slowly lifted his eyes and gazed at the excited people. An expression of surprise was depicted on his large, heavy features. He pulled his hair, but not a word came from him.

"Where did it happen?" asked one of the party hurrying back. In the confusion no one had thought of this.

"It was close by the second gate," said Mattspelle, and pointed in that direction.

His questioner took him by the arm, and pushed him down the steps.

"I'll teach you to stand there and point! Aren't you able to go with us and show us the place?"

Mr. Stenstrom had got into the sleigh with his wife and driven off. The others hurried after.

The husband tried to calm his wife. Probably the child had struck on a stone and had fainted, and that idiot had lost his wits and driven off without her. Nothing more alarming could have happened.

Soon sleigh-bells were heard. They came nearer.

"It is the postmaster's sleigh," said someone.

It was indeed the postmaster, who sat on the box with the coachman, and in the sleigh were his wife and the children, almost hidden in furs. The sleigh stopped.

"What has happened?" was asked.

Mr. Stenstrom began to explain, and just then a little hand was thrust out of the mass of furs, waving a cap.

"Hello, papa, here I am."

It was Kerstin's voice. The father and mother could not believe their eyes. Yes, their darling stood before them. The mother must feel her with her trembling hands.

"How are you, darling? Did you hurt yourself? How did it happen? Where did you find her?"

"Find her!" No one understood, and Kerstin opened wide her large eyes. What was the matter with them? She was all right.

While Mattspelle waited in the shop for his purchases, she had gone into the postmaster's, and there it was decided that she should return with them, instead of with the man. That was all.

"But didn't you tell him when you went in?"

Of course she did; and he had been invited into the kitchen and treated to cake and wine.

"Where is that blockhead?" burst out the father, and turned so abruptly that he very nearly knocked over Mattspelle, who stood there as if wishing to attract his master's attention.

"Ah, there you are, you numskull! What's this yarn you have been telling us? Didn't you know that Kerstin was coming back with the postmaster?"

Mattspelle stared. "Ye-e-s," he finally said.

"Well, then, how could you lose her on the way?"

No answer. Mattspelle scratched his tow head and looked away.

"Perhaps it was something else you lost?"

"Ye-e-s."

"What was it then?"

This was beyond Mattspelle's comprehension. Didn't his master know for what they had been searching so late in the evening?

"Don't you hear me, boy?"

"It lies down there in the ditch," and in the snow a thick something was slowly trickling.

"What is it?" asked his mistress.

Mattspelle twisted his cap. Were they blind, too?

"Why, it's the syrup jug."

"The syrup jug!"

It was Mrs. Stenstrom's large jug which lay there, and for which they had searched with such sorrow and anxiety. For a moment no one spoke. Then all began to shout and laugh, so that they could scarcely stand, and the Christmas joy which appeared to have gone for ever, began anew out in the snow.

The only one who stood silent and astonished was Mattspelle. It seemed to him that people were very queer. To be sure, he had wondered a little at the fuss made over the jug, but then to have such mirth when they found it smashed into bits—that was, indeed, strange.

"Was that anything to laugh at?" thought Mattspelle.

Digitized by Google

A CHRISTMAS CARD

IT is both painful and perplexing to be answered by a heavy sigh when one expects an exclamation of pleasure and admiration; so it was not wonderful that Mrs. Austin, under these exact conditions, looked anxiously into her husband's face.

She was holding up for his inspection a large wax doll, one of the treasures for Madge, the blue-eyed darling of four years, who was counting the days until Santa Claus should come. Every stitch of Miss Dollie's elaborate costume was the work of Mrs. Austin's busy fingers in hours when Madge was dreaming of full stockings and Christmas trees, and the last stitch set, the result was displayed for "papa's" approval.

Now papa was quite as devoted a parent to Madge and two-year-old Harold as mamma, and took deep interest in all nursery matters. It may be that the memory of two other curly heads and baby faces that had brightened the nursery for a few brief months and then been hidden beneath the grave deepened the love for the children who came later to comfort their aching hearts.

But it is certain that the little Austins were as much loved and petted as children could be, and did not dream more hopefully of Christmas treasures than their parents did lovingly of supplying them.

So it was with some alarm that Mrs. Austin put aside her last triumph in needle-work and threw her arms around her husband.

"What is it, Charlie?" she asked.

He drew her into a loving embrace before he answered sadly:

"I met my father again to-day. Margaret, it will kill me to have things go on as they are. He was wretchedly shabby, feeble, and broken, looking so old and so ill that I could not keep the tears out of my eyes. But he would not speak to me. I said all I could say in the street, but he stopped short and said, 'I do not know you, sir! You will cease to annoy me!' I could not make a scene in the street."

There was a choking sound in Charles Austin's voice as he ceased speaking, but, being a man, he kept back the sob that would have followed.

"At Christmas time, too," she said. "It is useless to send presents, Charlie; he has sent them back every year."

He drew her into a loving embrace.

. . . . . .

The story was an old one, a true-love marriage made in the face of disinheritance and paternal displeasure. Mrs. Austin had been a poor girl, employed in the factory of Simon Austin, then a man of great wealth and good social position; a man purse-proud, arrogant, and full of his own importance.

When his only child, his idolised, indulged son and heir, told him of his love for pretty Margaret Hay, a factory girl, living in the factory boarding-house and wearing calico dresses, the old man was a maniac in his fury.

He would not see that the girl was pleasing in manner, refined in taste, well educated, and sweet tempered, one to brighten any home, and make any good man thoroughly happy. He gave a fierce command that the matter should end there and then.

Charles Austin, utterly unaccustomed to be crossed in any fancy, refused an obedience never before exacted, and the conversation ended in a stormy quarrel and the young man's expulsion from home.

But, with good fortune that does not often follow disobedient sons, Charles was at once taken into the employ and favour of his mother's brother, an eccentric old bachelor, who gave the young couple a home in his own luxurious house.

It was a new life to the old gentleman, and he took the keenest interest in all the household affairs as Margaret managed them, loved and mourned the older children, and, dying when Madge was but a year old, left his entire large estate to his "beloved nephew, Charles Austin."

And while the sunshine of prosperity had no clouds for this wayward son, the father's fortunes had gone all awry. Some commercial panic was the first blow to Simon Austin, and an effort to repair the loss by speculation only added to disaster.

He missed the cool, clear head of the son who had of late years been his active partner, the judgment he had first trained and then trusted to guide his large business. He was angry, and his angry impulses led him into dire blunders, until he grew so involved that there was no escape, and he failed for more than his entire fortune.

At once Charles hastened to him, offering his entire wealth to save him, only to be met with a proud, fierce refusal to be under any obligation to a disobedient child or his beggar wife.

Over and over again, as poverty became more and more bitter to the man broken and aged, did his son implore him to allow him to help him, offer him a home, love, care, obedience even, only to be thrown back with angry scorn.

A proud man always, Simon Austin cherished his wrath as the last remnant of the old arrogance, and would not bend one inch. He received anonymous letters, telling him that sums of money were in the bank in his name, and wrote back refusing to claim them.

He mistrusted every offer of service, and returned to Charles every scrap of aid sent to him, often perplexing his son by sending what had not come from him, though he always refused to believe him.

And being old and broken in health, he sank lower and lower, unable to fill lucrative positions, and taking the work that gave him barely food and the poorest clothing.

Digitized by Google

Very sadly the son and his wife talked of the impossibility of helping one who would not let any appeal touch him, until suddenly Margaret cried:

"Charles, I have an idea. Let me try to win your father over. I will send him a Christmas card."

"My dear, he would not open the envelope."

"Let me try; and see if your father does not dine with us to-morrow."

"Dine with us! Margaret, you must be crazy!"

"Not a bit of it. Just let me have my own way, dear."

"Do you ever fail to get that?" was the laughing query, for something in his wife's face gave fresh hope to Charles Austin's heart.

. . . . . .

It was a very mean room in a very poor house where the sun of a bright Christmas morning awakened Simon Austin. Everything in the shabby place told of the lack of woman's care and love.

Dust hung upon everything. There were no dainty trifles of needlework; the curtains were dingy and crooked, the carpet torn and dirty.

Very wearily and slowly the old man dressed himself, lit a fire in the grate, and rang for the poor breakfast his landlady provided. Dinner and tea he was supposed to buy outside; but very often this muddy coffee, stale bread, and tough chop or steak constituted the sole repast of the twenty-four hours.

It was Christmas Day, and no business took the old man out, so, after the untempting tray was removed, he took a newspaper and drew shiveringly to the fire.

But before he had read one column there came a knock at the door, and it opened wide and closed again behind a child—a little girl, in a quaint Mother Hubbard cloak and hat, with large blue eyes and clustering golden curls, and holding a large flat basket of fresh, beautiful flowers.

While the old man gazed at her in silent amazement, she said, in a sweet, childish voice:

"If you please, dear grandpapa, I am your Christmas card!"

"You—you are what?" he said, utterly bewildered.

"If you please, dear grandpapa, I am your Christmas card!"

"Who sent you here? What is your name?"

"Mamma brought me here. I am Madge Austin, dear grandpapa——" and, then, half-frightened at the strange face and the poor room, the child's eyes filled and her lips trembled.

"I want to go home!" she whispered.

"Don't cry," Mr. Austin said, taking her in his arms very tenderly. "Don't cry, dear; I will take you home."

"Oh, if you please, because my big doll is there, and all the toys Santa Claus brought, and brother Harry." Then with a look of inquiry, "What did Santa Claus bring you?"

"Nothing."

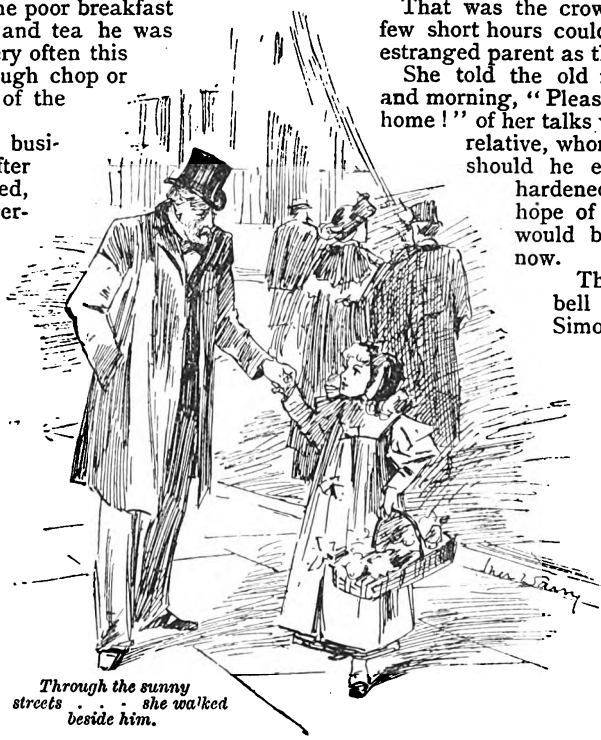
"Oh!" with a very deep-drawn sigh; "was it because you are up so many stairs? But he always comes to our house, and mamma said perhaps to-day he would bring us our grandpapa! We haven't got any now, you know, and mamma said that if he did come we would love him just the same as papa, and he would love us. And please, grandpapa, so we will."

And the child put her little arms round the head bent down before her, and lifted the face quivering and tear stained.

"Oh, don't cry! Oh, please don't cry; only naughty girls and boys cry. Oh," and again terror found voice in the plea, "I want to go home."

"Yes, yes, I will take you home. Bring your flowers, child. This is no place for flowers or—or Christmas cards."

Down the creaking stairs the old man led the child, tenderly, watching that the little feet did not slip or stumble. Through the sunny streets, unheeding the cold, she walked beside him, prattling of her home, and of the dear grandpapa that she had been taught to love.



Through the sunny streets . . . she walked beside him.

That was the crowning amazement. No child in a few short hours could have been taught to talk of the estranged parent as this child talked.

She told the old man of the prayer she said night and morning, "Please, dear Lord, send my grandfather home!" of her talks with her mother about the unknown relative, whom she was to reverence and love, should he ever come home, opening to the hardened, but, oh, such a lonely heart, a hope of rest and affection, that he felt it would be bitter as death to thrust aside now.

There was no need to ring the bell of the stately mansion to which Simon Austin led his grandchild. Eager eyes were watching for the coming of the pair. Eager hands were waiting to open the door. Tender arms and strong hands led Simon Austin into the parlour; Margaret's kisses fell warm upon his wrinkled cheeks; Charlie's hands removed the shabby overcoat; baby Harold clung to his knees, shouting:

"Dandpa's tum! Santa Claus bringed dandpa!"

No pride could stand against this loving, sincere welcome. So pride collapsed.

"You really want me, Charlie?" the old man faltered. "It is not mere charity?"

"Hush!" whispered Margaret. "Do not grieve him by such a word. He will never be happy till you come home, dear father."

And so Christmas once again gathered up the tangled threads of estrangement, and knit them into strong bands of home love.

SPECIAL TO OUR LADY READERS.

A New Monthly Paper, entitled

"THE HOME DRESSMAKER,"

Edited by ISOBEL of "HOME NOTES,"

Will appear on JANUARY 1st.

It will contain a large number of designs of the newest fashions, and will be illustrated by the first fashion artists of the day. With every copy a paper pattern will be given away.

The Price of this Paper is only 1½d.

PEARSON'S LIBRARY.

No. 3. A complete Novel, entitled

THRO' THE BATTLE SMOKE,

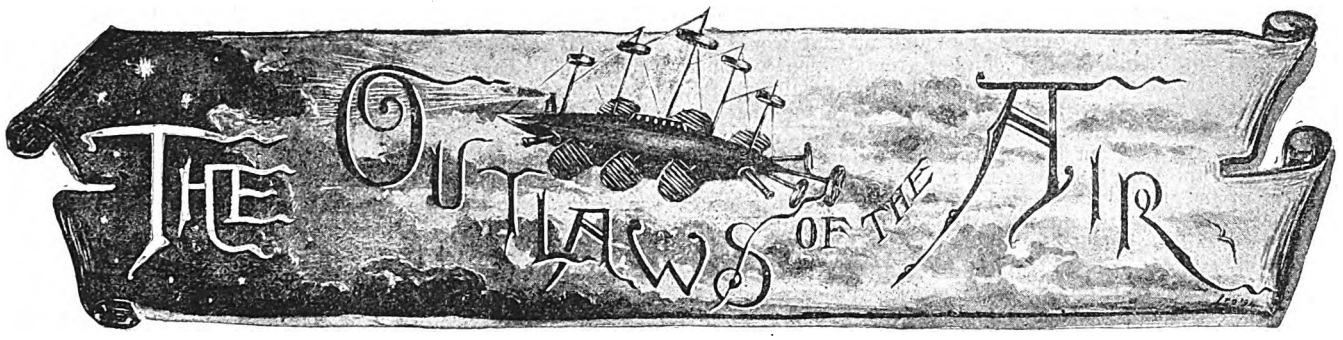
With over 100 Illustrations by Messrs. A. KEMP TEBBY and RAYMOND POTTER.

NOW ON SALE, PRICE SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google



By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

Franz Hartog—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

Sir Harry Milton—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, in his yacht, the Calypso, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

Herbert Wyndham—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

Frederick Austen—the inventor of the air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

Frank Markham—the young captain of the Utopian yacht, Mermaid.

Violet Milton—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is fearfully injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

Lea Cassilis (alias Mme. Dail)—a member of Autonomie Group No. 7 with whom Renault is in love.

Dora Merton—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

Lucy Summers—another fair Utopian.

Renault, after levying blackmail with Hartog on the high seas, returns to Utopia with the object of destroying the colony, but finds it deserted. After a time he goes to Europe in the air-ship Vengeur, and, together with Lea Cassilis, visits the Criterion Theatre in London, where he is recognised by Sir Harry and Lieutenant Wyndham, who effect his capture. He is tried, and condemned to death.

CHAPTER XXXI.

A Calm Before a Storm.

According to the merciful practice of the English criminal law, three Sundays are allowed to elapse between the passing of sentence of death and its execution, the execution as a rule taking place on the Tuesday following the third Sunday. Sentence had been passed on Max Renault on Monday, the 5th of April, and, therefore, as the newspapers speedily informed the general public and the thousands of Anarchists, scattered all over the Continent and America, who had gloated over his exploits with fiendish delight, and had already given him the first place in their evil hierarchy, the execution was fixed for Tuesday, the 27th.

This gave an interval of about five weeks from his arrest which, added to the two months which had passed since the arrival of the Nautilus in British waters, made a period of over three months during which every effort had been strained both by the Anarchists and the Utopians to push on the construction of their respective aerial fleets, which another month or so would now probably see equipped and afloat.

Sir Harry and his friends naturally had one great advantage in being able to have their ships laid down, built, and equipped out of hand without any fear of interference by the authorities, while the Anarchists were forced to have the sections of theirs made by various and widely-separated firms, and then had to take them away to be put together on the floating dockyard into which they had transformed the Bremen. On the other hand, this advantage was, if anything, more than neutralised by the fact that their enemies were already in possession of the only air-ship capable of taking the offensive at any moment, and that too in a style that would far eclipse her former depredations.

The immediate consequence of Max's visit to America and Europe had been the completion, under the specified time, of the armament which Hartog had designed for the Vengeur, and, while the whole world was wondering what had become of her, she was lying snugly hidden on an uninhabited islet in the Faroe group, taking on board her guns and ammunition from the Pilgrim. When she took the air again she carried four pneumatic shell-guns capable of throwing projectiles charged with five pounds weight of either anarchite, or fire-mixture, to a distance varying from two to five miles according to her elevation.

These were mounted two ahead and two astern, and on each broadside she carried two automatic guns of the Maxim pattern, but of very light construction and small calibre, from each of which could be projected, every minute they were in action, seven hundred conical nickle-coated bullets, which would kill at a range of from four to five thousand yards. In addition to these she carried five hundred specially prepared projectiles made of papier-mâché, and charged with fire-mixture for use in her vertical bomb-tubes.

As her net lifting power was nearly two tons over and above the weight of the hull, machinery, and guns, she was able to carry a quantity of ammunition sufficient to do an enormous amount of damage, considering the very advantageous conditions under which it would be discharged—conditions which would allow every projectile to be sent home to its mark with the most deliberate aim.

As soon as the Pilgrim had performed this part of her work, she set out for Liverpool, where the Anarchist agents had instructions to send the parts of the air-ships and their equipments as they were completed, and there, under the noses of the authorities, the harmless-looking cases were shipped as hardware and machinery for the port of Monte Video, and carried away as soon as a cargo was completed to the island of Trinidad, off the coast of Brazil, where she was met by the Bremen and the Destroyer.

Meanwhile, a series of conferences were being held between Sir Harry and his Utopian friends, and the Syndicate which had built the Britannia and now had six other aeroplanes under construction. Of this syndicate the ruling and moving spirit was Mr. Hiram Maxim, the inventor of the aeroplane and the automatic gun which, in its deadly fashion, had sung the praises of his inventive skill in so many parts of the world.

The issue of the conflict between the Vengeur and the Britannia had conclusively proved that the flying machine was no match for the air-ship proper. In fact, years before, Mr. Maxim had said that if ever an air-ship could be made that could raise itself vertically from the ground and keep itself suspended motionless in the air at any desired elevation within reason, it would be an immeasurably superior engine of warfare to his own aëroplane.

Now that there could no longer be any doubt that such an air-ship had been built, Mr. Maxim, with the impersonal unselfishness of the true scientist, promptly admitted the fact, and set himself to work to design an air-ship that would beat the Vengeur. This was the common ground upon which he and Sir Harry and his friends met, and the result was that they put their resources and their knowledge together and formed a corporation under the title of the Aerial Navigation Syndicate, the first act of which was to return the unspent balance of the Government grant to the Exchequer, so as to be rid of the official inspection and interference which had seriously hampered the movements of the old Syndicate, and set to work on an independent basis.

Digitized by Google

Adams and Mr. Austen still retained in their own exclusive keeping the secret of the composition of the motor-fuel to be used in the engines, and the last of the Articles of Association was to the effect that no attempt was to be made to trespass upon this forbidden ground. The Syndicate possessed a capital of three millions, and, as the event proved, no capital ever before subscribed for any object made such enormous profits as this did, though how they were to be made, remained a matter of pure conjecture until the world rubbed its eyes and wondered why it had never thought of such a scheme before.

The advantage of their alliance with Mr. Maxim very soon became apparent to Sir Harry and his friends. His unrivalled inventive skill, and the immense experience he had gained in the long course of experiments that he had made in connection with the construction of his aeroplane, at once bore fruit in improved designs for the new air-ships. Not only were they to be made larger and more powerful, but several improvements were to be made both in their internal construction and the materials used, which were expected to greatly increase their strength and carrying power, and would so enable them to carry a more powerful armament and a greater quantity of ammunition.

A fleet of twenty-four of these air-ships had been laid down in ten different manufactories scattered over the British Isles, and all the firms engaged in the work had been obliged to give a pledge, under heavy penalties, not to disclose any particulars connected with the work, or to allow the workmen engaged on one part to know what was being done in another department. Added to this, the firms that were building the hulls knew nothing about the machinery; and even the various parts of the engines, the propellers, and the lifting fans were made by different engineering firms under orders given in different names.

Mr. Hiram S. Maxim.

As a matter of fact, two or three of these firms were actually employed at the same time in making portions either of the air-ships or their machinery for both the Anarchists and the Syndicate; but, as the most elaborate precautions were taken on both sides to keep all reliable information out of the newspapers, and as the prices paid by both were so high, the various manufacturers found the keeping of the secrets far too profitable to run any risks of the momentous work on which they were engaged becoming known to anyone save themselves and their employers.

The object of this policy of secrecy was, in the first place, to obviate as far as possible the danger of discovery by Anarchist spies, which would in all probability lead to the destruction by the Vengeur of any dockyard or manufactory that was found to be making any part of the Syndicate's ships. Added to this, the Syndicate had ulterior motives in view, which carried its plans far beyond the extermination of the Anarchists as a fighting force.

The British Government had refused to avail itself of Mr. Austen's offer to place the designs of the Nautilus at its disposal unless the secret of the motor fuel were also given up to them. This was, of course, impossible, and so the Nautilus and her sister ship, the Aries, which was being constructed as rapidly as possible at Elswick, were to remain, for the time being at any rate, the only examples of that type of warship in existence.

An immense amount of popular indignation was naturally aroused by the publication of the news that the Government had virtually retired from the building of any aerial craft which could hope to engage the Vengeur on equal terms. Questions were asked in Parliament and answered in the usual terms of official reticence and ambiguity. The Syndicate kept its own council rigidly, and the interviewers who besieged its members were sent empty away one after the other until they gradually got tired and relieved their disappointment by spreading reports that the Syndicate had nothing to tell because it had nothing to do.

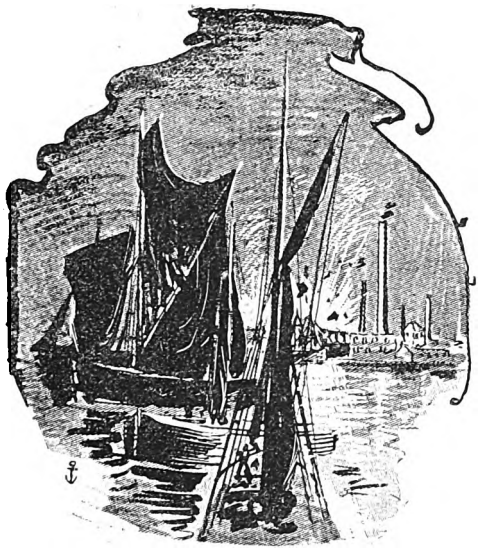
It was reported on wholly erroneous grounds, or rather upon no grounds at all, that all efforts to transform the aeroplanes into air-ships such as the Vengeur were believed to have ended in failure, and this sent public opinion round the other way, until it praised the Government and the War Office for refusing to spend the money that was so urgently needed for strengthening the Army and the Fleet upon experiments in an entirely new fighting arm which, for all anyone knew for certain, might never be brought to perfection. The members of the Syndicate, far from denying these reports, rather encouraged them, as their work depended in no way upon popular favour or support, and anything that tended to increase the mystery in which they were shrouding their plans was so much added defence against the very probable attacks of their enemies in the Anarchist camp.

As for the Vengeur and the Destroyer, as day after day and week after week went by, and nothing was heard of either of them, it began to be believed either that some unknown misfortune had overwhelmed them, or that the capture and now certain fate of their leader had so disorganised them that, like a body without a head, they had become incapable, for the time being, of definite action.

Even the Utopians were themselves deceived by the quietude of affairs since the arrest of Renault. They felt certain that he was not the man to disclose the secret of the motor-fuel to any of his followers, for to do so would be to surrender the one claim he had to supremacy among a band of men whose especial boast it was that they owned no law, but that of their own individual wills. From this they argued to the conclusion that the Vengeur had exhausted her supply of fuel and that, while the only man who could and would replenish it was lying waiting for death in Newgate, the air-ship, as useless as a steamer without coal, was hidden in some out-of-the-way place, impotent for any further mischief.

But while the public was diverting its attention from the doings of the Anarchists to the war with Russia, which the rapid breaking up of the ice in the Baltic would in a few days bring from the East to the West, and while the members of the Syndicate were permitting themselves to be lulled into a false sense of security, the enemy had been hard at work with equal secrecy and equal energy. Lea Cassilis, from her house in Paris, had been in constant communication with the Anarchist groups, both in England and all over the Continent, perfecting the preparations for the simultaneous striking of a number of blows at the social organisation on the day fixed for Renault's execution.

Digitized by Google



One happened in London on the banks of the Thames.

Spies had also been ceaselessly at work, ferreting out as far as was possible the designs of Sir Harry and his friends with regard to the building of the new aerial fleet, for Lea had learnt from Max that Mr. Austen at least, and probably Adams as well, knew the all-important secret of the motive power, and would, therefore, be certain to build other air-ships to replace the stolen one.

Their comings and goings were watched, and their footsteps dogged day and night by Anarchist spies, and, in spite of all the precautions that they took, their lives were in danger, and might have been taken a dozen times over, had not Lea, still firmly convinced that some means would be found to rescue Max, and, believing that his vengeance would only be satisfied by killing them himself, had expressly forbidden their death, at any rate until it was known whether or not Max would be able to take his vengeance for himself.

So successful, however, were her spies in their efforts to find out what the Syndicate was really doing that, on the night of the Sunday before the Tuesday fixed for Max's execution, four explosions occurred almost simultaneously in four of the works where parts of their air-ships were being constructed. One happened in London on the banks of the Thames, another at Sheffield, another at Birmingham, and another on the Clyde.

How they were carried out was, of course, a mystery, and remained one; but so well were they planned and executed that essential parts of no fewer than eight of the twenty-four air-ships were utterly ruined, and the building of the complete fleet was thus delayed for quite three months longer. The next morning, the "Anarchist Terror," as the newspapers had come to call it, was more widespread than ever. The explosions were taken as a direct renewal of the warning that had been given by Max himself and in the red poster.

Popular excitement rose to fever heat in a few hours; the news from the seat of war was once more at a discount, and the Anarchists and their threats and possible doings once more occupied the first places in the columns of the newspapers and the excited imagination of the public. It was confidently reported, and almost universally believed, that the Vengeur had passed from town to town during the night and bombarded the works, which had been destroyed from the clouds; and then the man in the street began to ask his neighbour, with anxiety by no means unmingled with fear, what would happen to London itself if, after all, the Anarchists were able to carry out their threats against it?

CHAPTER XXXII.

AT THE LAST MOMENT.

As soon as day dawned over London, on Monday, the 26th of April, the policemen and that portion of the inhabitants who happened, whether by reason of business or pleasure, to be abroad, were astonished and not a little disquieted to find hundreds of red placards posted in all the conspicuous parts of the city and its surroundings, bearing the simply ominous inscription:—

BEWARE!

AND TAKE WARNING WHILE THERE IS YET TIME.

WE WILL HAVE

LIFE FOR LIFE AND BLOOD FOR BLOOD!

—The Anarchist Executive.

But not only was the placard posted on the walls of public and other conspicuous buildings. In the form of a leaflet it was scattered in thousands about the streets and even on the house-tops. In vain did the police attempt to collect these after they had torn the placards down. They were picked up by the early-comers into the streets and passed eagerly from hand to hand; then the evening papers, published soon after seven in the morning, got hold of them and reproduced them in their boldest and blackest type, so that by mid-day the scare was complete.

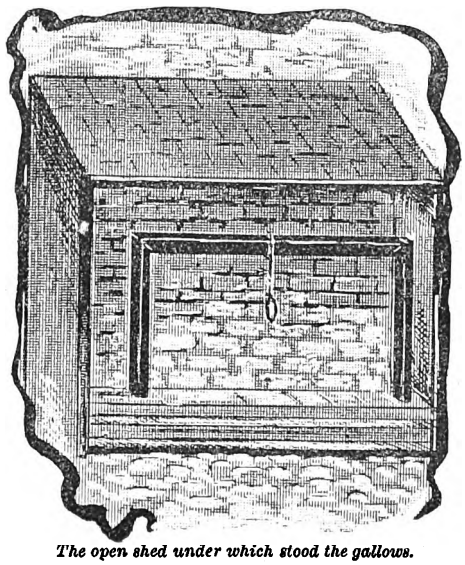
Then came the irrepressible monger of sensation, and he, having no facts to go upon, promptly elaborated from his inner consciousness letters from non-existent correspondents, describing how, in the watches of the night, they had seen—at any rate with the eye of imagination—a vague and ghostly form corresponding to the published descriptions of the air-ship, floating to and fro over London, and scattering a red rain of leaflets far and wide over the streets and house-tops.

That day, important news which had come to hand, telling of the break-up of the ice in the Baltic and the mobilisation of the Russian fleet, was crowded into obscure corners to make room for romantic descriptions of aerial exploits on the part of the Vengeur, which no human eye had ever seen her perform, and with equally imaginary narrations dealing with the manner in which the real inspirer of all this panic, and the veritable hero of the moment, was passing the last few hours that were left to him on earth.

What he ate and drank, the books he read, the number of hours he had slept each night, and the very words with which he was supposed to have refused the ministrations of the chaplain; his behaviour towards the warders, and even his demeanour when alone, were all set forth with a well-simulated accuracy which spoke volumes for the imaginative capacity of those who had corrected the dearth of reliable facts out of the plenitude of their own inventiveness.

To all this was added a touch of realism which, in the eyes of the multitude at any rate, endowed it with unimpeachable veracity. Line-sketches were given of the condemned cell, showing the arch-Anarchist seated at the wooden table with his face buried in his manacled hands, while two stern-faced warders kept watch and ward on either side of him.

Later editions followed this up with plans of Dead Man's Passage, the yard of Newgate, and the open shed under which stood the gallows ready to receive their victim. Then, when the sensation worked up by the newspapers had reached its height, rumours began to fly about from lip to lip to the effect that the air-ship, which was now a fearful reality in the popular mind, had been seen here and there and everywhere,



The open shed under which stood the gallows.

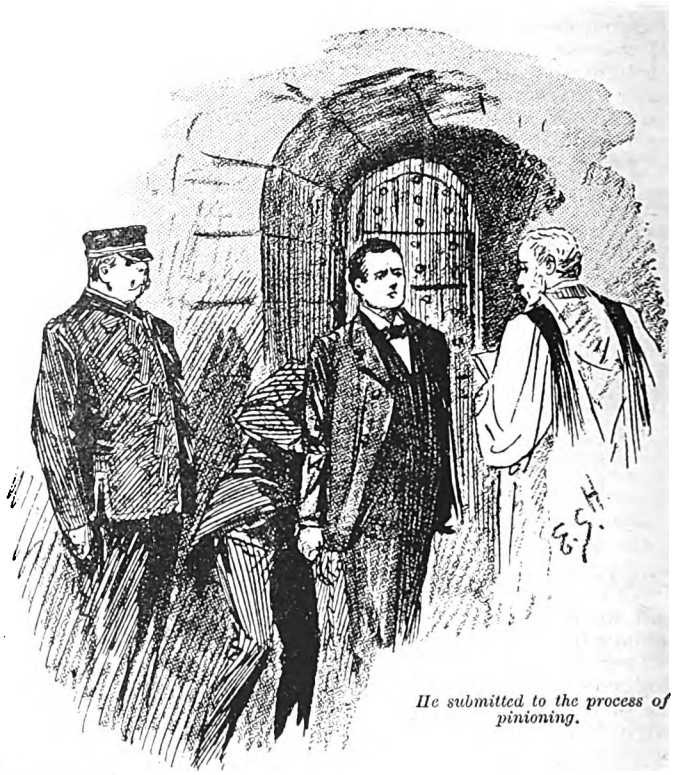
Digitized by Google

swooping down through the clouds and hovering over affrighted towns and villages, flying at full speed through the air on some unknown errand of slaughter and destruction, and even hovering over Osborne House with intent to bury the Queen and her household in its ruins.

Everybody appeared to feel confident that some extraordinary attempt at rescue would be made, and the wildest theories were advanced in anticipation of it. It was even suggested that for once the French method should be adopted, that the hour of execution should be altered, and that Renault should be taken unexpectedly from his cell and hanged out of hand without warning.

The Home Secretary was actually asked a question in Parliament as to whether, in view of the exceptional circumstances, he did not think it advisable that something of this sort should be done; but the questioner was met with a cold rebuff and informed that the Government declined to be intimidated by the vague threats that were being circulated, and that the law would take its course in the ordinary way, and at the appointed time—namely, eight o'clock on the following morning—an intimation with which the Anarchists were promptly made acquainted through the medium of the evening papers.

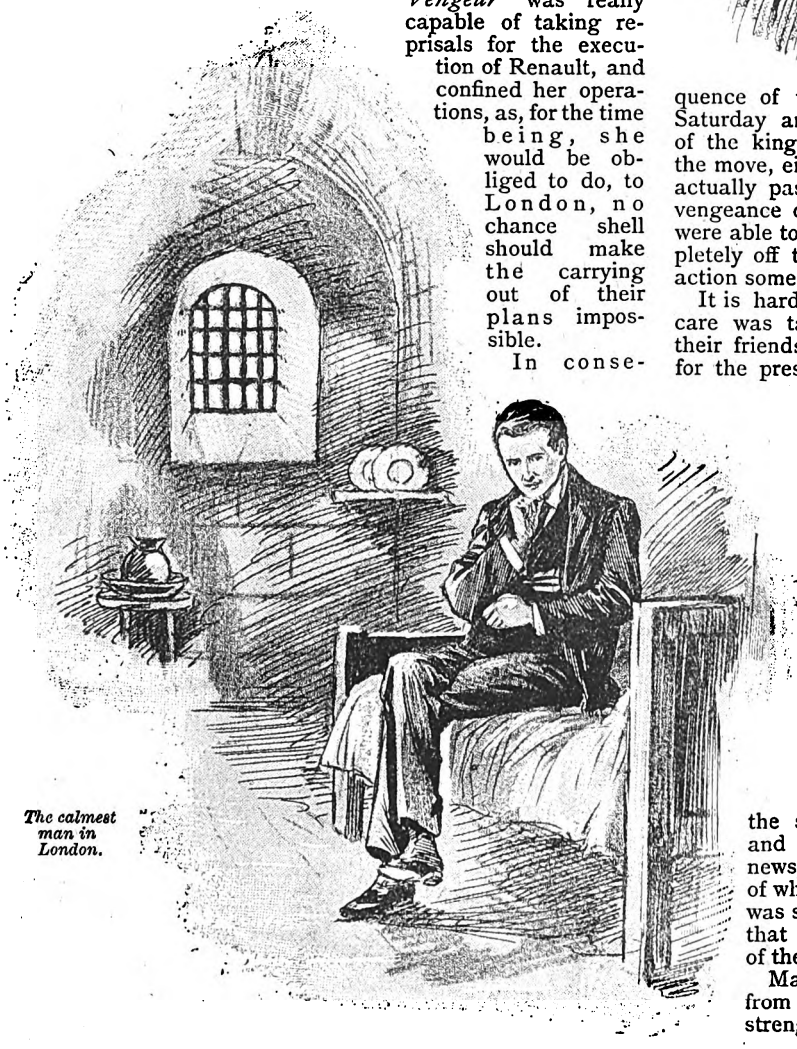
Meanwhile, Sir Harry, Mr. Austen, Adams, and Lieutenant Wyndham, and his two naval friends had come to the conclusion that, for the sake of the momentous projects which they, as active members of the Aerial Navigation Syndicate, had in view, it would be better for them to scatter as widely over the British Islands as they could, so that, in case the Vengeur was really capable of taking reprisals for the execution of Renault, and confined her operations, as, for the time being, she would be obliged to do, to London, no chance shell should make the carrying out of their plans impossible.



He submitted to the process of pinioning.

In consequence of this decision, they had all left London on the Saturday and Sunday by different trains for various parts of the kingdom with the intention of keeping constantly on the move, either on land or sea, until the hour of execution had actually passed, and it was known what form, if any, the vengeance of the Anarchists was to take. In this way, they were able to put the Anarchist spies, for the time being, completely off their track, and, it is probable, to this course of action some of them, at any rate, owed their lives.

It is hardly necessary, perhaps, to mention that very good care was taken to send Dora Merton, her mother, and all their friends into places where they would be safe, at least for the present, from the attacks of their enemies. Some had gone to remote villages in Wales and Scotland, some were scattered among English watering-places, and some had been sent to the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands; and, as all had, of course, renounced the picturesque Utopian costume on their arrival in England, they found no difficulty in losing themselves among the inhabitants of the places in which they took refuge.



The calmest man in London.

By nightfall on Monday, the whole of London was in a state of feverish and irrepressible anxiety and apprehension. The terror of the unknown hung over everyone, from the mansions of Mayfair to the slums of Whitechapel. No one talked of anything but the approaching doom of the arch-Anarchist and the vengeance that had been threatened by his still invisible allies. An epidemic of unreasoning fear had seized upon the whole people, from those who wandered about the streets arguing and gossiping with each other and buying up every new special edition that the newspaper offices kept pouring out full of repetitions of what had gone before, to the Cabinet Council that was sitting in Downing Street discussing the telegrams that were constantly arriving from the various points of the Empire threatened by Russian attack.

Many believed that London would be bombarded from the air during the night, and this belief was strengthened by a fire which broke out among some warehouses on the Rotherhithe bank of the river, but which had, in fact, nothing whatever to do with the work of any incendiary. Of course, it was taken for granted that the Anarchists had set them on fire, and thousands of people wandered about the streets all night, wondering where the next conflagration was going to break out, or when the fire bombs would begin to descend from the sky.

Digitized by Google

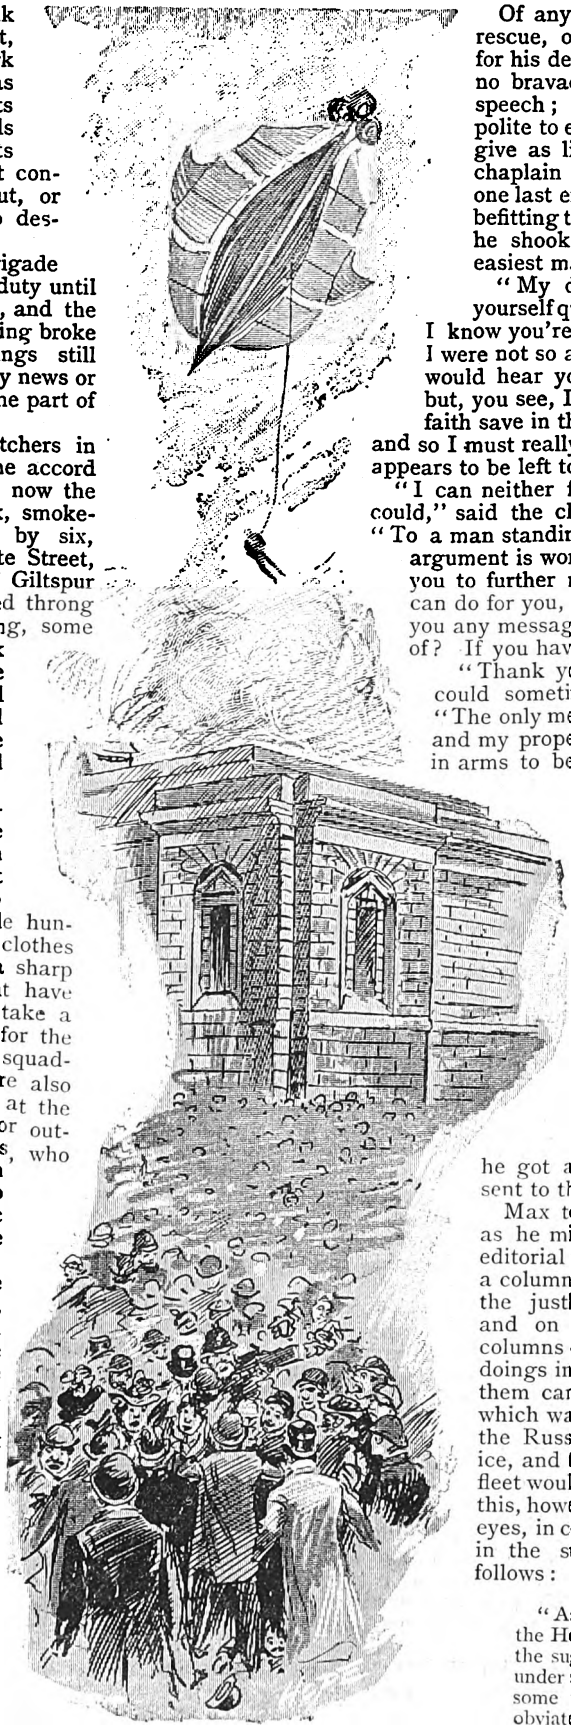
The whole strength of the Fire Brigade and of the police force was kept on duty until the morning, but nothing happened, and the grey dawn of a cloudy April morning broke over London, showing its buildings still uninjured, and without bringing any news or warning of aggressive action on the part of the Anarchists.

By five o'clock, the anxious watchers in the street began to move with one accord from all points towards what was now the common centre of interest—the dark, smoke-grimed prison of Newgate; and by six, Ludgate Hill, Old Bailey, Newgate Street, Holborn, and the southern end of Giltspur Street, were packed with an excited throng of anxious, palefaced people waiting, some to see the hauling up of the black flag, and others who could not see it, to hear the shout of relief and the cheer of triumph that would hail its appearance as the sign that the master spirit of the Anarchists had ceased to exist.

All round the prison and its approaches, strong cordons of police were drawn up to keep the crowd in the roadways, and to prevent it getting on to the pavement or too near to the doors of Newgate, while hundreds of other policemen in plain clothes mingled with the crowd, keeping a sharp look out for Anarchists who might have come armed with hand bombs to take a mad and indiscriminate vengeance for the death of their chief. Half-a-dozen squadrons of Lancers and Dragoons were also kept in readiness, but out of sight at the Horse Guards, in case any rioting or outrages on the part of the Anarchists, who were believed to be in strong force in London, should make it necessary to clear the streets, and all the public buildings were guarded by double sentries and extra policemen.

Amidst the general excitment, the man who was the cause of it all was, outwardly at least, the calmest man in London. Certainly, no one in the whole metropolis had slept more soundly than Max Renault had done when the warders woke him at half-past five. He dressed himself leisurely, and with his usual care in his own clothes, which, in accordance with the usual custom, had been returned to him after his sentence. At six, his breakfast was brought to him, and he ate as hearty a meal as though he had been going out hunting, instead of to the gallows, and when it was over he washed it down with half-a-pint of champagne, in which he drank success to Anarchy and destruction to Society.



Of any attempt that might be made for his rescue, or any revenge that might be taken for his death, he said not a word. There was no bravado in his manner or boasting in his speech; he was simply cool and collected, polite to everybody, and apparently anxious to give as little trouble as possible. When the chaplain entered the condemned cell to make one last effort to bring him into a frame of mind befitting the terrible position in which he stood, he shook hands with him, and said, in the easiest manner imaginable:

"My dear sir, I'm afraid you're giving yourself quite unnecessary trouble on my behalf. I know you're doing it from a sense of duty, and if I were not so averse to listening to wasted words, I would hear you with pleasure, if not with profit; but, you see, I have no creed but Anarchy, and no faith save in the ultimate triumph of its principles, and so I must really decline to waste the short time that appears to be left to me in unprofitable conversation."

"I can neither force you to listen, nor would I if I could," said the chaplain gravely and almost sternly. "To a man standing as you do on the brink of eternity, argument is worse than useless, and I will not tempt you to further mockery. Is there anything that I can do for you, I mean in the worldly sense? Have you any message to leave or any property to dispose of? If you have, you may command me."

"Thank you," replied Renault, smiling, as he could sometimes smile, with a rare sweetness, "The only message I have to give has been given, and my property belongs of right to my comrades in arms to be used in the work to which we are devoted. And now, if you wish to do me a real service, get me one of this morning's papers, and let me read quietly until the time comes."

The good chaplain was far too familiar with the behaviour of men in Renault's position not to be able to see that his callousness was genuine, and in no measure assumed. He saw, too, that to make any attempt to perform the last offices of the Church for him would only be to give him opportunity for scoffing which might, if he were provoked too far, degenerate into blasphemy; so he left the cell and went to the governor's room where he got a copy of the Standard, which he sent to the condemned cell by a warder.

Max took it and soon became absorbed, as he might well be, in its contents. The editorial page opened with a leading article, a column and a half long, on his career and the justly merited fate that awaited him, and on the next page there were three columns concerning the Anarchists and their doings in all parts of the world, and after them came the war news, the chief item of which was to the effect that Kronstadt and the Russian Baltic ports were now free from ice, and that the mobilisation of the Russian fleet would be complete in a day or two. All this, however, was of no importance, in Max's eyes, in comparison with one brief paragraph in the summary of news which ran as follows:

"As stated in our late edition last night, the Home Secretary has declined to entertain the suggestion that the convict Renault, now under sentence of death, should be executed at some unknown date and hour, in order to obviate any possible attempt at rescue. Such a rescue is rightly considered to be absolutely impossible, and the execution, which is fixed for eight o'clock this morning, will have taken place before these lines are in the hands of the majority of our readers."

Digitized by Google

Max continued apparently absorbed in the perusal of the paper until a quarter to eight, not even seeming to hear the muffled note of the bell of St. Sepulchre as it tolled his own death-knell. When the governor and the chaplain entered the cell with the executioner, he looked up, laid the paper down, and rose to his feet with a slight bow. The governor briefly informed him the purpose they had come for, and without a word he submitted to the operation of pinioning.

As soon as this was completed the door of the cell was thrown open and the usual procession was formed, the governor leading the way and the chaplain bringing up the rear, reading the burial service of the English Church. So they went from the cell down Dead Man's Passage, and out into the yard. On the threshold, Max paused for just an instant, giving a glance up into the sky, in which the clouds hung low, and then one look at the open shed under which the rope was already dangling from the black-painted beam.

So far he had not opened his lips; but when a fourth of the way between the passage and the scaffold had been traversed, he stopped suddenly, drew a deep breath, and then a long, piercing, screaming cry came from his lips, and rang out high above the murmur of the excited throng outside the prison walls. The next instant, the murmur of the crowd was changed into a roar of amazement, which grew shriller and shriller until it became one mighty, long-drawn yell of fear.

Before the cry Max had raised had died away, a huge grey shape dropped swiftly and vertically from the clouds and passed from the view of the crowd behind the walls of Newgate Yard. Then came the sound of a rapid fusillade of small-arms, and then the air-ship soared up again with the still, pinioned body of Max dangling in a lasso from one of the ports in the hull. Before the Vengeur had reached the clouds it had been hauled in. Then she stopped, just under the clouds, and the vast crowd, knowing intuitively what was to come, began to surge to and fro with wild yells and hoarse shouts of terror, for the rescue had been achieved after all, and the moment of revenge had come.

(To be continued.)

A NEW YEAR'S CALL

THEY both lived in "Victoria Mansions" on the top floor, where the rooms were small and comparatively cheap. They were always coming up in the lift together, and she had looked at him and wondered if he was ever in love; and he had looked at her and wondered whether any man came to see her. The day after Christmas they got into the lift together with three other people, but the others all got out on the lower—and more expensive—floors, and then she carefully looked at the blank walls sliding by them, and he looked at her till the lift stopped at the top floor, and he, with an awkwardness that was entirely uncharacteristic, knocked all her bundles out of her hands as he stepped back to let her out first.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, Miss Arnott," he said, as he stooped and scrambled for them, and, the light of successful strategy in his eyes, he added:

"I suppose I ought to apologise for knowing your name—but, you see, I do know it—the last one, that is."

"Thank you," said Miss Arnott, as she took the last lingeringly delivered bundle, and the lift door banged and the lift boy sank behind them.

"I wish you a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year," said he.

"You should say a Happy New Year and a Merry Christmas, for it's too late to wish anything for this year's Christmas," she said, dimpling and making talk out of nothing. Then she suddenly grew gravely courteous, and murmured "Thank you" again, and bowed and hurried down the passage.

"Well, it's a beginning, and it's nonsense not having some acquaintance with a nice girl like that when she's right under your elbow," he said to himself, as he turned his key in his door. After he had seated himself for an after-dinner cigar he moralised on the idiotcy of the conventions that put it out of his power to call on Miss Arnott, tell her he was a respectable person with an uncle who was vicar of the Church of the Holy Bulrushes, and that he'd like to know her—without ulterior motives.

"But that's the row," he said to himself; "this idea of matrimony so fills up everybody's mind that you can get no pleasant companionship with women because you are supposed, of course, to have intentions, or not to have them, and then you are a bold, bad man. I can't tell Miss Arnott that my intentions are perfectly honourable, but also absolutely non-matrimonial: and although she looks like an uncommonly clever girl, she'd probably never get so far past her education as to dream of such a novel position on the part of a man who knocks bundles out of her hands to get to speak to her. But, by Jove, if she only knew it, I've got such a simple human loneliness on me I'd go out of my way to talk to that old dowager on the first floor with the glass eye."

Miss Arnott was saying to herself, while she made herself a cup of tea: "I wonder what he'd have thought if I had said: 'Thank you, Mr. Noyes'; that would have been rather funny, but then he might have thought it was rather fast, too. I shall not notice him next time I see him. That's the only safe and proper thing."

She felt so pious in having made this resolution that she felt bound to show how sincere it was by carefully listening at her door the next morning till she heard his shut, and knew he was waiting at the lift; then she came out of her room just as the boy opened the lift door, and called out: "Oh, never mind, don't wait; I've forgotten something," and went back.

That was to show Mr. James Noyes (she knew his first name), that she was not seeking to go down with him.

"She doesn't want me to forget all about her, anyway," said that misguided young man in his own mind.

Before New Year's Day they were bowing ceremoniously when they met, and he was watching for a chance to knock more bundles out of her hands in the pursuit of a platonic friendship. She went to the Church of the Holy Bulrushes to watch the old year out—though she never had been there before. She knew more by that time about Mr. Noyes' antecedents and present position as a promising young architect of limited performance than he did himself, and what she thought on not seeing him at church, and so not receiving his humble suit to see her home, was that while he might be a pleasing person to know, she pitied the woman he might marry—he was evidently of a very light and fickle nature—and his legs were too thin. After that she quite dismissed him from her thoughts, and began speculating on putting a midnight New Year's service into her next story—for she wrote stories and had come to London to live for fame and to pick up her bread and butter incidentally. She was young for the lonely position she occupied, and pretty, but, despite the little wondering feminine vagaries of her mind, she was solely convinced that a life of celibacy was the one calculated to nourish her genius, and that to nourish her genius was her duty.

Digitized by Google

New Year's morning she got up thinking about all the social festivity she had heard of on that day. She was so belated that she did not know that New Year's calls were out of date. She felt a pathetic figure when she reflected that there was no one to call on her. She knew no one but two or three editors, who felt they had munificently fulfilled all social obligations to a promising contributor when they had asked her to something known as a literary reception, and had let her look at their lions and talk to vague young men connected with publishing houses. She had even always come home with a messenger boy—at her own expense—and, to her simple provincial mind, literary receptions had seemed to imperfectly represent the pleasures of the world.

To-day she felt a longing to be gay, just as gay as if she had no genius to nourish, to wear good clothes, and look pretty, and listen to silly compliments.

"No one will call; no one can call, of course. It would be the most presumptuous thing in the world for Mr. Noyes to think of such a thing, and I don't believe he's so far gone in rudeness as that," was one train of thought in her mind, and the next was to conclude that, as she was so lonely and it was so dreary to be lonely on New Year's Day, she'd play she was going to receive, and she'd dress herself nicely and get out a bottle of sherry and buy a cake, "just as if I were a little girl and could pretend anything I wanted to, and have it almost as good as true," she said to herself.

Mr. James Noyes shaved himself pensively as he reflected that his choice for a New Year's dinner lay between the house of the vicar of the Church of the Holy Bulrushes and a restaurant. "You can't always be going to a preacher's house for dinner if you never go to hear him preach," ran his thoughts, "and anyhow one's about as dismal as the other. Then that red-headed daughter of his will marry me before I know it, if I don't look sharp. It's that kind of thing that makes you reconciled to girls like Miss Arnott going in for a career and all that."

It was about noon when Miss Arnott got her preparations for the reception of imaginary visitors completed. The sherry was one of half a dozen bottles that an old bachelor uncle had sent her for Christmas. She had not opened it because to drink wine alone seemed to her sadder than to have the wine. like the company fashioned of thin air.

She had cake and a tea service laid out, and she had dressed herself in an old white muslin gown because it was becoming, though darned, and strung herself over with beads like a fancy shop window because they were becoming too, and she loved them, and she did not intend to allow any imaginary woman to come near her, for she knew she could not prevent even imaginary women from saying she looked silly—but imaginary men might be trusted to admire.

As she gave a touch to her curtains that they might admit her glimpse of the Park and at the same time shut out the sight of a neighbouring wall that advertised liver pills, there came a knock at her door; she opened it, fearing it was the washerwoman, and there stood Mr. Noyes, with his overcoat on, his hat in one hand, and a kitten in the other.

"I found your property straying in forbidden paths," said he, holding out the animal.

"Why—I—dear me, the idea. It was very kind of you to bring her home. Come to me this minute, you naughty Toodles," said the lady, with that remarkable feminine social tact one reads about, for she had never laid eyes on the cat till that moment.

Noyes appreciated it, for he had just bought the cat at a shop down the street.

"I see you are receiving," said he.

"Yes; won't you come in?" said she.

"I'm just starting on my rounds," said he, "and I'm glad to make so charming a beginning."

While they were attending to these lies, the kitten, put down on the floor, was dragging herself about, legs bent, in a most unhappy manner. Looking for conversational material, Miss Arnott exclaimed:

"Dear me! what is the matter with that cat? How oddly she behaves." She hated cats, and knew nothing about them.

"Why, cats always do that in a strange place," said the male diplomatist, and then he turned very red. The two stared at each other, and then laughter broke forth and the acquaintance was an accomplished fact.

"I'm not receiving," cried Ada, when she got her breath. "I'm not going to tell any more fibs to-day. This is all just a little play I got up because I was so lonely; I was 'making believe,' as the children do."

"Poor little thing," murmured Jim Noyes, so low that no one was obliged to pretend to hear him. Then he said: "And I'm not making calls. I've called on you, but then, you see, officially I don't know you."

"Officially you are only a figment of my imagination, but I always wanted real bread and meat for my dolls, so you must have some real sherry, and you'll have to help uncork it."

It was an hour before the young man suggested that New Year's calls must have an end.

"I'll have to have make-believe visitors the rest of the day," said Ada.

"And I'll have to make make-believe calls, and, what's worse, make-believe eat and drink, for I'm not going to have any dinner till after the theatres are out."

"Why—why not?"

"Oh, dining alone in a restaurant on a holiday is so dismal at the best, and I'm going to wait till they are at their brightest with supper parties of happier people."

"Then you'd better make another call here, and help yourself through the interval with some more cake."

"And will you play that I am a dozen different young men, each more brilliant and entertaining than the other?"

And so the afternoon of New Year's Day was entered upon. So far the game had been played by the man and the girl and Nature, but now Fate stepped in.

Ada lit a match to set light to the gas, and while she talked and held the match and forgot about it, the blazing end fell off and dropped upon the last summer's muslin dress, and light flames shot up round her. Noyes caught his overcoat from a chair, sprang and wrapped it round her, and the danger was over in a disgustingly brief time; still it had done its work, and the two strangers were left in a highly intimate attitude, the girl sobbing hysterically, and both with their emotions loosened by a genuine taste of peril.

"Darling!" said he, smoothing her hair, and the word seemed to have said itself without any collusion on the part of his brain.

"Oh!" said she, and hid her face on his shoulder, and he murmured some more words that surprised him, and kissed her hair, and her ear, and a bit of her cheek, in a dazed and helpless way.

When she lifted her face it was to say: "And we haven't been introduced yet; you'll have to get your uncle to do it I go to his church."

And with that remark Mr. Noyes felt—he didn't stop to think why—that his fate was sealed, and that it was rather nice after all. What he said was: "We'll get him to do it all," and though the remark was a little blind, the girl seemed to understand it.

"We turn over our new leaf with the New Year to some purpose," he said, as they sat in the twilight and neglected to light the gas.

"It will be turned over when we are introduced," said she. "I don't approve of free-and-easy ways about such matters; I never did."

And Noyes himself, though now more than half persuaded that he had done just what he meant to, is himself not so sure as he once was, that conventionality spies dangers where there are none, and he takes satisfaction in the entire propriety of Ada's views, and accepts her conduct as a special compliment to himself. She tells him how he fell in love with her before he ever spoke to her, and that they met at his uncle's. the vicar's.

Digitized by Google

THE NOAH'S ARK CHAP.

E allus used to larf at that there curate chap—the bloke with the corpsy face, and the holler eyes, with the soft 'at and the long cloak, just like one o' them Johnnies they puts in Noah's Arks. In our alley, Marrerbone Alley, Rotherithe, we didn't used to care about 'im a comin' down an' tellin' us what was right and what wasn't, and a doin' the soapy business along o' the kids and the old women, and playing the goody-goody fake all about.

So each time we see 'im a comin', with 'is cloak and 'is 'at, and 'is shoes, and 'is white stockings, and 'is rumbereller, and 'is trac's, me and Blue Peter and Tom Stepney, and Pat Mulrooney, and others, we used to make game on 'im, and now and then a bit 'o dirt, or a heggshell, or somethink would ketch him, and we'd arsk 'im rare questions, and call 'im all kinds o' names, and make game on 'im generally.

D'ye think that stopped 'im from comin' down Marrerbone Alley? Not 'im. He come down just as usual, and don't seem to mind no more about the chaff and the heggshells than he did about the rain, or the snow, or the stinks, or the dirt. More'n that he gits 'old of Pat Mulrooney one day, an' he talks to him and tells him straight as 'ow he oughter be ashamed on 'isself for hilltreatin' a man as was doin' his dooty, an' when Tom Stepney comes up, meanin' fun, Noah's Ark turns round to him, and gives him as good as he got, speakin' quiet like and cool and never turnin' a 'air, although Tom and Pat is nasty chaps in a row, and—well, we let 'im alone after that, for he was a good plucked 'un, although he 'ad a soft 'at and a long cloak, and carried a rumbereller, and chucked the trac's around like a bill-poster.

It was a precious hard Christmas time for us in Marrerbone Alley—as 'ard as I can mind, and the Lavender Basin was froze over, and there wasn't no work and me and the others was a settin' idle and doin' nothink, and the women and kids was bad off for fire and grub and everythink. There was a kid died at Number Four—died o' cold, they said—but there was others as bad off, and no one couldn't pass down the halley without 'earin the cryin' for food or for fire. Them as 'ad bread was well off; them as 'ad meat, no, I mean 'im as 'ad meat, for there warn't only one, was a proper dook.

I've lived in that there halley ten year, but I never mind it's bein' so quiet. Somehow folk 'adn't the 'eart to fight or talk, and John Robinson, the slop, what in general just put 'is boots in the halley and go on, it was so quiet 'e came hall the way down it, thinkin' as 'ow there must be somethink wrong, and didn't seem to be at all 'isself at not bein' called a name or two, or gettin' a slop pail over 'im. This lasted a matter o' a fortnit, and things were beginnin' to look so black that me and Pat and Tom Stepney and some more on 'em went out on the singin' lay, with spades on our showelders, and all this bad time Noah's Ark never come nigh us.

"Jes' like them passons," says we; and we got a kind o' mad with 'im, not that 'is preachin' and trac' givin' could warms 'ands and feed hemptiness, but there was soup tickets an' things in 'is give, and he'd ha' come down the halley 'andy like. "I'll bet yer a pot o' black and tan," says I to Tom Stepney, "that there Noah's Ark will 'ave a fust-rate Christmas dinner nex' week, and be 'anged to hus chaps and our women and kids in the halley." "That's so," said Tom. "What dy'e say to lookin' on 'im up!"

But we was saved that trouble, for the werry next day who should come down the halley but Noah's Ark 'isself. But he warn't the same as he was. He was uncommon pale, and his heyes was bright and in mournin' like all round, and he'd a woollen fakement round his throat, but the same cloak, and soft 'at, and shoes with white stockings.

So I told him straight—I 'ad meant to tell him proper, but I 'adn't the 'eart to when I see them heyes o' his, and 'ow he ketched his breath; so I told him straight as 'ow things was bad, and never a soul'd ben down the halley since he came, and there wasn't no bread, let alone a two-eyed steak or a bit o' block ornament, and that there wasn't no coals, and that the women was ailin', and the kids dyin'.

Noah's Ark looks very queer, and fidgets with them big shoes of his, and turns his 'ed away, and blessed if I didn't see his lips a workin', and his eyes a gettin' moist. "I'm—I'm very, very sorry," he says. "I'll do all I can to help you. I'm afeard it ain't much, but I'll do my best. No bread, eh? No coals, eh?" and off he walks as if someone had struck him. That werry same evenin' there was bread and meat and coals in hevery 'ouse in the halley.

Next week were Christmas week. Me and Tom Stepney got a job at the Bricklayers' Harms Station, 'elping of the 'ands there to take the 'ampers and things from the railway trucks, and loadin' them on the railway vans. My eye! some on 'em was 'ampers, and no mistake, and I says to Tom Stepney, says I, "Tom, there's a halley we knows on where one o' these yere 'ampers wouldn't come amiss, eh, mate?"

All of a sudden I ketches 'old of one, a werry big un it were, and it had a ticket on it, and on the ticket whose name do I see but Noah's Ark's, and above it a crown with knobs on it, and the name printed of some castle or other?

"Noah's Ark's in luck," says I to Tom; "he'll have a Christmas dinner anyway."

Well, two days before Christmas, Noah's Ark comes down the halley. "Look 'ere," he says, "I've got a treat for the lot of you. Hevery man, woman, and child here is to be at the mission 'ouse at twelve o'clock sharp to-morrer. Don't bring anythink," he says, "but clean faces and 'ands, and good happytites."

Then he walked away, coughin' like mad, and hus all a wonderin' what the lay was.

We was there, you take your Alfry Davy, at twelve o'clock sharp on Christmas Eve. There was nigh on forty on us, men, women and kids, and there was Noah's Ark and his lady and miss, and 'alf-a-dozen other gentry, and there was two long tables with white cloths on 'em, and jugs and glasses, and then Noah's Ark 'ammers the table, and axes us all to stand, and he puts in a prayer, and then—well, I never 'ad sich a feed, nor 'adn't anyone else, let alone perhaps Mrs. Lockyer, what 'ed been in service.

"Tom," says I to Stepney, "blessed if Noah's Ark ain't give us that there 'amper with the nobby crown on the ticket."

Next day was Christmas Day, and we'd been talking about the blow out, a lot on us, and we says as 'ow some on us had oughter call on Noah's Ark and thank 'im and wish 'im merry Christmas, and tell 'im how we'd sorter misunderstood 'im, and ax 'is parding. So we goes, me and Tom Stepney and Pat Mulrooney. Noah's Ark lodged hover a saddler's shop, and when the saddler comes to the door and sees hus three chaps he looks huppish, and axes what we wants. So we tells 'im. "Can't see him," says he. "He's a eatin' of his Christmas dinner, what d'ye want for to hinterrupt 'im, same as you 'as me?"—which was true enough, for there was a bit o' pertater on his chin, and there was a plum puddin' a goin' into his room at the end of the passage.

But we goes up, and knocks at the door, and sure enough, there was Noah's Ark and his missis, and his four kids, a eatin' of their dinners.

It's gawspel truth as I'm tellin': Noah's Ark's Christmas dinner was polonies and bread and water. He'd give the halley 'is Christmas dinner!

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

DELICATE CHILDREN.

Parents will not realize the fatal error of neglecting the first symptoms of delicacy in their children. Looking at the matter from a purely selfish point of view, it is a considerable saving to one's purse, for medical authorities all admit that one single dose of medicine given in time will be worth 999 after the mischief is done. Once allow the seeds of ill-health to sprout, and remember you will have a harvest to cope with.

If there is constitutional weakness in yourself, bear in mind that your children are liable to inherit it, and therefore that their ailments warrant a double amount of anxiety and care. If you attack the delicacy tonically before the child is 15 years of age, and it is a complete waste of time to treat it in any other way, the whole system will be built up and the nutrition of the body renewed and strengthened, and the result arrived at will be a thoroughly sound and healthy organisation.

Because your children are delicate and weak, do not imagine for a moment that they need remain so, for youth responds readily to a tonic treatment.

No matter how undermined the constitution may be, it can be permanently reconstructed by putting new blood tonically into the system.

Delicacy, natural feebleness, and languor in children cannot prevail against the curative properties of Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which contains all the necessary ingredients for rebuilding a delicate constitution. It restores to the blood the vital elements eliminated by fragility, gives the brain its necessary stimulus, and the muscular system a new elasticity; in a word, what is lacking in failing health, it supplies. All delicacy, no matter how chronic or obstinate, will yield before it.

It is useless to patch up here and there; go to the root of the mischief and attack that, every organ will then come under its influence and become healthy. It is too well known that a delicate chest leads to consumption only when the child is imperfectly nourished; germs find no soil in a perfectly healthy body.

Infantina's Syrup must not be confounded with any of the old-fashioned out of date oily compounds, for it is quite different. It resembles in appearance and taste a fruit syrup, is pleasant to the taste, and far surpasses such nauseous mixtures.

Infantina Syrup is a perfect tonic for children from 2 to 15 years of age. It is sold by Chemists at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly, remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA CO., 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

DAMP FOGS WILL PREVAIL IN DECEMBER.

IT IS JUST AS USEFUL AT A "CRUSH," OR IN A HEATED BALL ROOM.

HINDE'S "CRISPA WATER," AN INVALUABLE PREPARATION FOR MAINTAINING A PERMANENT WAVE OR CURL TO THE HAIR. WILL MAKE LADIES INDEPENDENT OF THE WEATHER'S VAGARIES.

ALL CHEMISTS, PERFUMERS, OR STORES WHO SELL HINDE'S HAIR CURLERS WILL SUPPLY IT. PRICE 1/6 THE BOTTLE. THE NAME OF THE PATENTEES, HINDES LIMITED, IS ACROSS THE LABEL.

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY.

BRONCHONIA

A MARVELLOUS REMEDY for all COUGHS, whether arising from CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, or THROAT IRRITATIONS. Its marvellous effects are testified to by eminent physicians.

2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle of all Chemists; post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.

J. HOWARD, 21, QUEENHITHE, LONDON, E.C.

One trial will prove its efficacy.

Digitized by Google

THE SOAP FOR HARD WATER.

LATHERS FREELY in the HARDEST WATER

THE SOAP FOR SOFT WATER.

WATSON'S

MATCHLESS CLEANSER

A HOUSEHOLD REQUISITE

LARGEST SALE OF 1lb TABLETS IN THE WORLD.

THE SOAP FOR HOT WATER

THE SOAP FOR COLD WATER.

"THE QUEEN" says:—"'Dulcemona' Tea should have a large future before it if it keeps up to its present standard of EXCELLENCE. It is MOST DELICATE in FLAVOUR, and REFRESHING to a degree."

YOUNG, FRESH,

Make the most of life by drinking

Dulcemona Tea.

INVIGORATING.

1/6,

1/10,

2/-, AND

2/4

per lb., in Lead Packets, and 3lb. and 5lb. Tins only.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE—FIRST-CLASS GROCERS.

Wholesale only—11 and 11a, UPPER THAMES STREET, E.C.

Digitized by Google

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO ALL OUR READERS.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 314.] FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 5, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

IF YOU INTEND TO BUY

Buy New Carpets at the Price of Old.

It would be ridiculous to buy old carpets, old designs, shop-worn, out-of-date goods, when you can purchase a stylish GENUINE, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE TRIUMPH CARPET suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., for

4/- Each. 4s. Postal Order or 50 Stamps, 4/- Each.

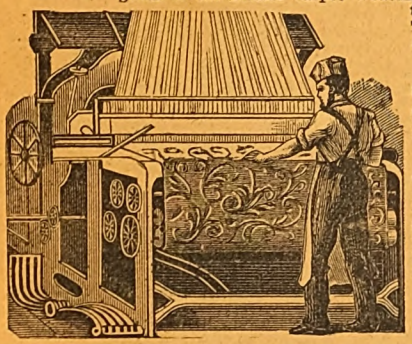
handsomely bordered and woven in fifty different patterns and colourings, to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY-SIZED ROOM. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, below the actual cost of production. Thousands have already been sold at almost double above prices.



With every carpet we shall supply a very handsome Rug to match, for 1s. 3d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER—Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9s. 6d.; Four Carpets and Four Rugs for 18s.; Eight Carpets and Eight Rugs for 35s.

Money willingly returned if not approved.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value."

Hundreds of unsolicited testimonials are being received from delighted purchasers who have had these carpets in use for years.

Stafford Road Post Office, Wolverhampton. M. A. Dudley, writes:—"Having purchased two of your Carpets between three and four years ago, I am thoroughly satisfied, and have recommended them to several people, who I know have tried them, and are equally satisfied."

65, Abbey Street, Nuneaton, Warwickshire. "Mrs. Bostock will thank the British Carpet Weaving Co. to send her one of their Carpets, for which she encloses postal order. She has had one of these Carpets in constant wear for some years now, and finds it the best wearing and cheapest carpet she can get."

Do not miss this opportunity, it may not occur again.

CARPET ORDER FORM.

On receipt of this order form, and Postal Order or stamps, we guarantee to send any goods, as above, to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Money returned if not approved.

(Signed) THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

All orders despatched in rotation same day as received. Cheques and Postal orders to be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Secretary, and crossed "UNION BANK." Address—

The British Carpet Weaving Company,
31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

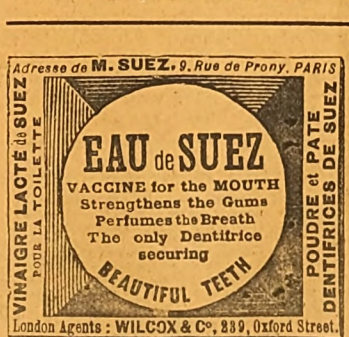
Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn. London. Pianos Exchanged.



BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

Digitized by Google

Cheerful Winter Evenings.

CAMPBELL'S MELODEONS.

Gold Medal.

They have Organ and Celestial Tone, and Charming Bell Accompaniments. NO HOME SHOULD BE WITHOUT ONE. The Solemn Psalm, the Soul-stirring Hymn, the Cheerful Song, and the Merry Dance, all can be played on these charming Instruments. NO KNOWLEDGE OF MUSIC IS REQUIRED.

Special offer to the readers of "Short Stories."
CAMPBELL'S "GEM" MELODEON price only 6/6
CAMPBELL'S "MINIATURE" MELODEON „ 10/6
CAMPBELL'S "PARAGON" MELODEON „ 14/-
CAMPBELL'S "FAVURITE" MELODEON „ 16/6
Either of the above sent Carriage Paid to any Address in Great Britain and Ireland.
Cut out this, and mention "Short Stories," when ordering. Worth double the money.

NO DECEPTION HERE.
100,000 TESTIMONIALS.
Important Testimonial from Professor Brown, the Champion Melodeon Player of Great Britain, Ireland, and Wales:—"CAMPBELL'S Patent Melodeons are the finest instruments that have ever come under my touch, and only require a trial to advertise themselves."

Campbell's Patent Melodeons are the only Genuine Melodeons in the Market.
BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.
N.B.—All lovers of music should at once send for our New Illustrated Privilege Price List for Season 1895, now ready 150,000 of these valuable Lists sent out yearly. Send 1d. stamp to

CAMPBELL & Co., Musical Instrument Makers, 116, Trongate, Glasgow. (Established 50 years.)

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.
For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

SWEET WEDDING BELLS.

THE MOST FASCINATING PARLOUR GAME.

1/-

Patent No. 5482.

Obtainable of all Stationery and Fancy Dealers.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. S.," 87, Strand, London. Mention SHORT STORIES.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—
THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment. Total destruction guaranteed. This marvellous remedy has never yet failed. Pamphlet, giving full particulars, sent on receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

BLUSHING

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London. (Mention this paper.)

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 43, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Exema

and all Skin Eruptions are cured by a Healing Cream widely known as

"Antexema."

"Antexema" is sold by all Chemists and Stores and may be had post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d. and 4s. 9d., of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.
Little Book Free. NAME THIS PAPER.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades.
ESTIMATES FREE.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.
Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.
AGENTS WANTED
Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, & Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.
S. S. Ireton & Co., Ltd., 92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES.

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars, (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS
will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, free from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.
To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.
S. HARVEY, 12, Gaskarth Road, Balham Hill, London, SW. Beware of injurious imitations.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
OBSTINATE CASES,
NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,
GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.
No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—
"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.
A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.
Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.
Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker.
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms.

Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

TO ADVERTISERS

Wishing to reach families, a Test Advertisement in SHORT STORIES will bring profitable results. Scale of charges as follows:—

Front Page, £12 10s. per Insertion.
Back or Inside, £10 per insertion.
Per Inch, 5s. per insertion.
Less 5 per cent. for 13 times.
„ 10 per cent. for 26 times.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 314.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JANUARY 5, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

SHE was beautiful, and she was rich. Beyond that, nobody knew anything about her, and what was more, although the whole community was convulsed to its very foundations with curiosity and with excitement, nobody was able to find out anything about her than these two patent facts of her wealth and of her beauty.

A Rights Reserved.

Where she came from, why she came, who were her belongings, what was her origin—all these things were unfathomable mysteries. Whether, indeed, she was wife, widow, or maid, was absolutely an unknown problem to the good people of Llancarthy.

She called herself Princess Petrusky; but then, as Mrs. Thomas Evans, the doctor's wife, shrewdly remarked, these foreign princes and princesses don't go for much. In fact, according to Mrs. Tom Evans and her cronies, the aristocratic name had a flavour of something that was almost disreputable about it when you come to thrust it violently in the faces of the commonplace inhabitants of the quietest of little Welsh villages.

She was splendidly, regally handsome; tall, with the figure of a goddess; golden hair that rippled crisply away from her brow; eyes that shone forth blue as the summer skies; a profile that was almost Grecian in its perfection. It was a face born to command and to rule—scarcely, perhaps, to be much loved.

Exactly opposite Hill Side, as the house which the Princess had hired, was called, there stood, lower down along the valley, an unpretentious but commodious house, belonging to a gentleman of the name of Hallett. This house, which was built of red brick, and was low and rambling, went by the name of the Beeches, and had belonged to the Halletts for some generations.

They were of good family, but were poor. Mr. Hallett, a wife, four daughters, and one son; they were a most affectionate and united family, and ever since the memory of man there was not a member of the family who had failed to marry well, to conduct himself or herself with decorum and respectability, and, in short, to lead a virtuous and godly life from their cradles to their graves.

At the time when this story begins, the Princess Petrusky had been about a month at Hill Side, and Lionel Hallett had just returned from completing his education at Oxford, where he had, of course, done remarkably well; and equally, of course, an uncle of his mother's had promised him a diplomatic appointment, into which he was expected to walk, without any further trouble, in about a month's time. That was the way with the Halletts; they all fell on their feet and turned out well and creditably, and never gave their relations cause to be anything but proud of them.

When Lionel came home the excitement about the foreign princess was at its height, and two days later a wonderful thing happened. Lionel had gone out by himself for a solitary ramble over the hills, and with him went Wolf, his collie dog, who rushed about hither and thither with joyful barkings of delight.

Presently the stillness of the summer afternoon was broken by harsh and discordant noises, as of dogs barking angrily at each other—Wolf's gruff voice bellowing forth defiance, and

Digitized by Google

The princess herself reclined upon an ottoman in the centre of the room.

shriller yappings answering back in accents of irritated fury. Above the clamour and the din came the tones of a woman's voice, clear yet authoritative:

"Monton! Bebe!"

Lionel Hallett swung round with a curious flush upon his handsome face. A sort of instinct told him who it was.

At a little distance from him stood a lady—Princess Petrusky. She was simply clad in a close-fitting dark cloth dress, and wore a small crimson silk hat upon her bright locks. She appeared to be quite alone, and struggling vainly to induce her two poodles to relinquish the somewhat bellicose attack they had made upon Wolf, whom they evidently considered in the light of an intruder on their premises.

Wolf, on his part, albeit a good-natured creature upon the whole, was beginning to resent the pertinacity with which Monton and Bebe attacked him, one in the flank and one in the rear. His temper was evidently rising fast, and he was beginning to show his teeth to his tormentors in rather a dangerous manner. The Princess called off her dogs in vain. She seemed distressed by the situation of her pets, and fearful lest Wolf, in his superior strength, should turn round on them in downright earnest.

No sooner, however, did Lionel Hallett reach the spot than the canine battle assumed an altered appearance. He strode rapidly down the hill toward the belligerents and laid a forcible hand upon Wolf's collar.

"Come here, sir—lie down," he said to the collie, who obediently crouched beneath his hand, while with the other Lionel politely raised his hat.

"I am very much obliged to you, sir, for calling off your dog," said the Princess, in very good English; "there certainly would have been bloodshed in a few minutes! Ah, Monton and Bebe, how naughty you both are!"

She bestowed a little tap with her parasol to her two poodles, who slunk shamefacedly behind her, then she looked up at the young Welshman with a bright, winning smile.

"You are young Mr. Hallett, are you not?" she asked.

Lionel, with a look of surprise, assented.

"You wonder, I dare say, how I know that. I met you in the village two days ago—do you remember? Yours was a new face to me, so I inquired who you were."

"I feel much flattered that you should have taken the trouble to inquire about me," said Lionel, with a flush, but the Princess interrupted him laughingly:

"Oh, there is nothing in that; I like to know all about my neighbours."

"Your neighbours know very little about you, Princess."

"That is true," she replied with a smile. "Will you walk down the hill with me, Mr. Hallett? That is to say, if you think we can make our dogs keep the peace."

Lionel assented joyfully. He felt almost bewildered by the condescension and kindness of her manner towards him; how gracious she was, and how fascinating was her smile, and, above all, how beautiful she was! He felt almost too happy and elated to utter a word.

He was wondering what he should say to her, when the Princess turned to him again with that delicious smile of hers.

"You are in the diplomatic service?"

"I hope to be shortly. I have been promised an appointment," said Lionel, wondering where she got that piece of information.

"Ah! you're to be made a Queen's Messenger, and you'll be sent to St. Petersburg?" said the princess.

This time Lionel stopped short and stared at her.

"How in the world——"

The Princess laughed outright.

"I see, you think I am a magician! Well, it is wonderful how I know so much about you, is it not? Cease to look so surprised! Do not speculate about what I say to you—think only of why I take so much interest in you," she said with her rare smile.

It was like the gracious intimation which a sovereign gives to a favoured subject when she grants him permission to woo her—how else could Lionel interpret that smile, at once so confiding and so tender!

They were nearing the garden of the house where she lived. Emboldened by her words of encouragement, the young man stopped short.

"May I come and see you?" he asked eagerly.

"Assuredly you may. Come soon—to lunch to-morrow. Ah, no, not then; so many are with me then. Come later—at five o'clock. You will find me in, and alone."

"How good you are!" murmured Lionel. "Why are you so kind to me?"

"I suppose it is because I like you," she replied with a smile, holding out her hand.

It was with the action of a queen rather than of an equal that she did so, and Lionel, bewildered, dazzled, confused, scarce knowing whether he was awake or asleep, bent over the long white hand that she held out to him, and pressed it fervently to his lips.

When he looked at her there was a deep flush on her beautiful face—a flush that he could not quite make out. It was a flush of annoyance, almost of indignation—certainly not of bashfulness. She smiled again, however, upon him, and, murmuring "Good-bye," passed through the garden gate, and vanished from his sight.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER II.

THERE was a dim and mysterious radiance in the Princess's boudoir at Hill Side. Lace curtains, festooned across the windows, lined with soft amber-coloured muslin, kept out the too glaring light of day; tall palms and feathery ferns were grouped in rich luxuriance about the room; and in the tiny conservatory, where a fountain splashed coolly and freshly in the hot, breezeless afternoon, there were masses of thick, white blossoms, gardenias and stephanotis, which filled the atmosphere with delicious and subtle odours.

The room was furnished chiefly with low divans, and deep, slumberous looking armchairs. A few little tables, covered with feminine knicknacks, all of a costly and curious nature, were arranged among them; whilst tall mirrors from the ceiling to the floor reflected back again and again the lovely figure of the Princess herself, who reclined upon an ottoman almost in the centre of the room.

She half rose from her seat as Lionel Hallett, an evidently expected guest, was ushered in, and welcomed him only with a smile, and a mute gesture to seat himself by her side. Had the Princess Petrusky been preparing herself for the conquest of the Tsar of all the Russias himself, she could hardly have been more distractingly beautiful. Her dress was of creamy white silk, covered with rare lace, and fastened by knots of amber silk at her throat and waist.

"How glad I am that you remembered to come," she murmured.

"Do you think I could forget it, Princess Petrusky?"

"Ah! do not call me by that formal name. I have so few friends in the world—but they call me by my name. Will you not be one of them?"

She held out her lovely hand to him and he—small blame to him—took it and retained it, murmuring passionately:

"I would be more than your friend! By what name shall I call you, oh, my queen?"

"Foolish boy!" she said with a tender little smile, and gently pressing the hand that held her own. "My name is Olga Petrusky—call me Olga."

"You are not married?" he asked, with a sudden painful anxiety.

"Married!" she repeated, raising her eyebrows in surprise; "what can make you think so? Am I so old to look at, then?"

"Oh, no—no; only I feared you might; but of course you are not—that would be too horrible!" he cried

"Yes, would it not?" she murmured with a smile which, had he had the eyes to see it with, might possibly have struck him as peculiar.

But he had no eyes to see anything save her beauty. Every moment he was falling more deeply in love with her; his heart, and at the same time his vanity, was becoming more deeply impressed by her evident liking for him and the strangely marked encouragement she gave to his advances.

What could it be, Lionel asked himself, with a mingling of surprise and almost of delirious delight, that made this regal beauty stoop to such dangerous tenderness toward himself? Flattering—almost too flattering—as the idea was, there could be but one deduction to be drawn from her manner to him. The Princess Olga Petrusky had seen something in him which other women had failed to perceive, and had fallen desperately in love with him at first sight. For more than an hour he remained in that enchanted boudoir, their conversation becoming at last mere broken words, and, on his side, half-smothered sighs.

At length she gave the signal for him to go by rising from her chair.

"And the appointment—has not come yet?" she asked, as he reluctantly prepared to take his leave.

"Not yet; but I do not want it—— now!" he said meaningly.

"Ah! you will be glad enough when it comes. Let me be the prophet of your fortunes. It will come to-morrow morning—you will hear that you are to be a Queen's Messenger. By the way," she added, changing the subject, and looking full into the young man's flushed face, "is it that you are short, or that I am tall? see how nearly of a height we are?"

She pointed to one of the long mirrors; and, in fact, there was but a trifling difference between them.

"You are 'as high as my heart,'" quoted Lionel sentimentally.

"We are not unlike either," continued the Princess playfully, still looking into the glass. "See, your hair is as fair as mine, and curls, and your eyes are blue; your skin is almost as pink and white. We might be brother and sister."

"Heaven forbid!" ejaculated Lionel fervently. "Do not flatter me too much—you are beautiful as a goddess, while I am only a very ordinary mortal!"

"Still, we are not unlike," persisted the Princess; "and now you must go. Remember me at post time to-morrow, and come and see me again if I turn out to be a true prophetess."

Sure enough, the next morning, at breakfast, there lay a large official document by Lionel's plate. He was appointed a Queen's Messenger, and was ordered to be in readiness to start for St. Petersburg in a week's time; he was to be in town and call at the Foreign Office for his orders and for his despatches before he started.

There was general rejoicing in the Hallett family at this news.

"Lord A—— has been as good as his word. You really are a lucky fellow, Lionel!" said his father gleefully.

And then his mother and sisters kissed him and made much of him. And Lionel was alone depressed and unhappy. To go to St. Petersburg in a week meant to him that he must leave his beautiful Princess Olga. The thought filled him with utter despair.

As soon as he could shake himself free from the affectionate congratulations of his family, he took his hat and went out, bending his steps towards the house among the hills.

The Princess was at home. Again he found her alone in the magic boudoir, and this time she was attired in a simple white muslin dress, in which she looked as innocent as any English maiden.

"Did I not tell you the truth?" she cried gaily to him as he entered. "You have got your appointment?"

"Alas! yes," replied this ungrateful young man, with a groan.

"Come, come! Why are you sighing over it? Surely you are a lucky man!"

"Lucky, when

She pointed one of the long mirrors.

Digitized by Google

"Good-bye, my dear boy."

I shall leave what I love in less than a week! To-day is already Tuesday, and Sunday night I shall have to go up to town, and leave you!"

"Is that so terrible a grief?" she asked softly.

And then she turned away and gathered a blossom from the white stephanotis that garlanded the shining walls of the little conservatory.

He made no answer. It seemed to him that in leaving her he was indeed leaving all that he loved on earth.

"But you will get over it, will you not?" she said presently, turning her bright face towards him once more, with an alluring softness in her lovely eyes.

And then Lionel Hallett lost his head and his self-control. He caught the hand that held the stephanotis flower to his heart, and covered it with kisses. He knelt at her feet—he poured forth incoherent vows of love and admiration, mingled with self-accusations concerning his own presumption and folly—he intreated her to forgive him, to permit him at least to bask in her presence, since he dared not to hope anything further from her—to allow him for this one short week to be her slave, her worshipper, and then to let him go a maimed and wounded thing for ever, banished by the hand of fate from her presence.

Then she began to question him—strangely and oddly, had he had the sense to perceive it, only his infatuation blinded him.

Did Lord A—— know him? No, he had never seen him. He was only a great friend of his father's. Was he to go to the Foreign Office himself? Would they give him a passport? Oh, yes; of course they would do that. How would they describe him—fair, curly hair, blue eyes, pink and white skin? And then she glanced again at the mirror in which their two images were reflected, and smiled.

"They won't make any mention of your moustache, Lionel—it is too small," she laughingly remarked.

Then she pinned the stephanotis blossom on his coat with her own fair hands, and sent him away half delirious with joy, telling him to come again to-morrow.

Day after day this poor deluded youth returned, like the moth to the candle, to the presence of his beautiful syren; day after day their interviews became more prolonged, more dangerously sweet. Only once would Olga Petrusky permit him to kiss her face.

He exhausted himself in kissing her hands, her rounded wrists, the flowers she gave him; but no sweeter caress was vouchsafed to him. Only, as the week wore away, Princess Olga seemed to grow sad as the time for his departure drew near. Often she sighed and was silent when he spoke, or let her eyes rest with melancholy regret upon his face, or her voice quivered when she spoke of what she would do when he was gone. What wonder, then, that Lionel began to believe in very truth that she loved him in return?

At last the Saturday—the last day of this enchanted week—came round. Olga and Lionel were walking in the garden among the bright beds of scarlet geraniums, and backwards and forwards across the smooth-shaven lawn.

All at once Lionel burst forth impetuously:

"To-morrow I shall have to leave you. All this happiness will be over—I shall have only the hollow, empty dream to look back upon. Every mile that I travel will carry me further from you—every moment will separate me more completely from the woman I love so devotedly."

Olga smiled.

"My dear boy, I think you are talking very foolishly," she said gently.

"What do you mean?" he asked quickly.

She stopped, laid her hand on his arm, and looked full into his eyes.

"Lionel," she said, "am I not rich and independent and wilful? Do you think there is anything on earth that I could not do if I wished? Could anybody stop me?"

"No, I suppose not."

"Well, then, foolish boy, why do you talk as if I were fixed and fastened, and rooted for ever in your dull Llancarthy? If I chose, could I not leave it, too?"

He caught her hands. He trembled and his heart beat tumultuously.

"What do you mean?" he asked again, breathlessly.

"That—I might come with you, Lionel," she answered softly.

"Olga, my queen, my goddess! Can you mean it? Will you marry me? Ah, do not deceive me—do not be so cruel as to play upon my feelings! Can you mean it?"

She looked at him and smiled again.

"Why not?" she asked, tapping his cheek with the flower she held.

And then for the space of five minutes she was forced to be silent, in order to listen to his rhapsodies over her goodness and her beauty, and the love, absolutely unparalleled in the history of the world, which he felt towards her.

When his eloquence had nearly spent itself for lack of breath, she spoke again, seriously and gravely:

"I will marry you under certain conditions, to which you must agree. Hush! Do not make any protestations; of course, you will agree to them. Now, listen to me. I do not wish you to give up your career in life for me. I should despise a husband who had no profession.

"You will go up to town on Sunday night, and I will go with you. You will deposit me at the hotel; and the first thing you will do on Monday morning will be to present yourself at the Foreign Office and get your despatches for St. Petersburg, and your passport. After that you will go to Doctors' Commons and get a marriage licence. We will be married quietly on Tuesday morning, and we will start for the Continent immediately afterwards. Will you do this?"

Needless to say that Lionel fell into the trap; he assented to every detail that she had proposed. He never thought of his parents, or what they would say to him, nor of the new career which was just opening out to him; nor did it even occur to him to make inquiries concerning this bride whom he had wooed and won so easily. He did not ask her a single question concerning her parentage, or her relations; he only looked at her beautiful face and felt that she was perfect and complete in her own wonderful self, and that he was the happiest man on earth.

CHAPTER III.

"GOOD-BYE, my dear boy, take care of yourself, and do us credit," said old Mr. Hallett, wringing his son's hand.

The whole family was assembled upon the platform to see the hopeful son depart on his journey; and amidst all the kisses and tears and hand-shakings, Lionel himself was distracted and absent-minded. He only paid a half attention to all these parting injunctions; his eyes were wandering restlessly all about the station in search of a tall figure which certainly was not there.

At last, just as the train came up, he caught sight of her, closely veiled and wrapped in a long cloak, followed by a maid bearing her wraps, and by a man bearing her dressing bag, and preceded by a porter laden with her luggage.

Digitized by Google

Lionel was slightly disconcerted by the sight of the man and maid; only for a moment, though, for he told himself instantly that a Princess could not be expected to make even a runaway marriage in the same fashion as would any ordinary mortal; still, he would, undoubtedly, rather have had his Olga to himself on this occasion.

As soon as he caught sight of her, he made a half step forward, as if to join her; but, by a scarcely perceptible movement of her hand, she waved him back, and got into a carriage in the front part of the train; and Lionel, in full view of his affectionate and respectable family, had the good sense to take the hint, and refrain from following her. He took his place in another carriage, and the train moved off.

At the first station, however, he changed carriages, and joined his Princess. But there, to his great disgust, was the maid in the farther corner! And a man may be in love as much as he likes, but to make love to the mistress under the very eyes of her maid is a thing which is not feasible even to the most devoted of lovers.

For the first time he experienced a distinct sense of annoyance with his divinity.

"You might have sent her to another carriage," he whispered, reproachfully.

"I thought it so much wiser, dear boy. Why should we create a scandal? I wish to keep my name pure and unsullied for your sake."

Of course, this was a delicate form of flattery, and Lionel was appeased. He looked unutterable things at her, and forgave her.

When they reached London, the Princess Olga expressed a desire to go to the Langham Hotel. Lionel, therefore, summoned a cab, and placed her and her servant and belongings in it.

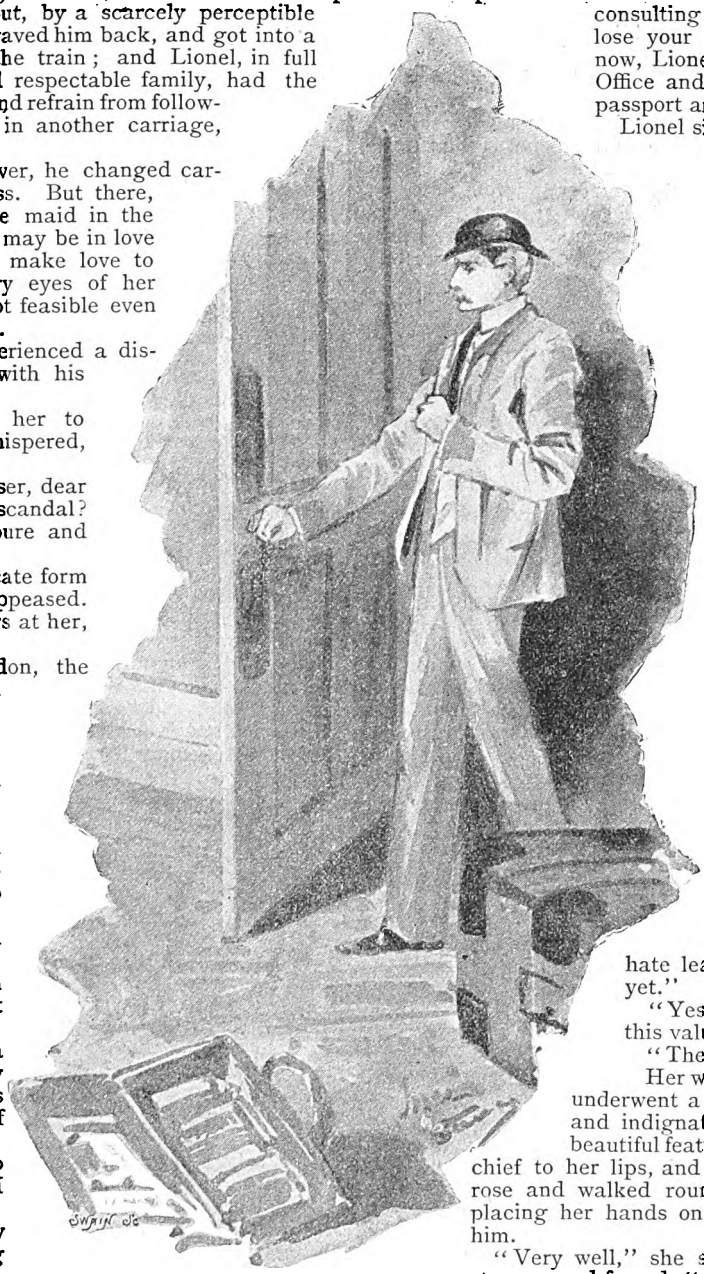
"You will come to the Langham Hotel, too, will you not?" she whispered, bending forward out of the cab window.

"Don't you think I had better go to another hotel?" observed Lionel, to whom this appeared an imprudent measure.

She looked at him with a world of reproach in her lovely eyes, and clasped her hands with a little tragic gesture of despair.

"Ah! do you desert me so soon? Think how lonely I shall be—how miserable!"

"Do you care so very much, then?" said the young man under his breath, looking at her with his soul in his eyes.



He went to his own room.

"Care! Oh, Lionel! There, I know you will be a dear, good boy, and do as I wish. Come, put your things in another cab, and follow me to the Langham."

In little more than an hour, they were comfortably housed in the Langham, and a substantial breakfast, laid out in the Princess's private sitting-room, was refreshing the runaway lovers after the fatigues and perils of the past night's journey.

How happy was Lionel Hallett at the breakfast! In after years, he often looked back to it with a strange pang of regret and pain. Olga was more charming and affectionate to him than she had ever been before. She waited upon him, pouring out his coffee, and helping him to toast. Frequently she rose from the table, and, coming round behind his chair, laid her hand playfully and lovingly on his shoulder, while she pressed him to eat what she brought him. It was past twelve o'clock before the delicious tête-à-tête was over.

"Now pleasure ends and duty begins," said the Princess, consulting her watch. "Sorry as I am to lose your society, I must send you away now, Lionel. You must go to the Foreign Office and see Lord A——, and get your passport and your despatches."

Lionel sighed heavily.

"I suppose I must," he said gloomily; "but, oh, how I hate going away! What shall you do, my Olga?"

"I will wait here for you," she said, smiling; "so that I can take charge of the despatch box when you come back. For you will have to go away again, you know, Lionel—to the city—on our business this time."

"To get our marriage licence? Ah! yes; I have not forgotten that! Why should I not get it first, and go to the Foreign Office later?"

"No, no; I cannot let you do that! You must go to the Foreign Office first, and then you must bring the papers here to me! You must not dream of going on to the city with such valuable things about you; fancy if you were to lose them! Your whole future career would be ruined! Promise me, Lionel, that you will bring them straight back here! Besides, I shall see you again sooner—I shall not be so long without you!"

"My angel!" he cried, rapturously. "Oh, how I hate leaving you—I really cannot go yet."

"Yes, you must go; do not waste this valuable time, dearest!"

"Then give me a kiss before I go!"

Her whole face, for one swift moment, underwent a change; an expression of rage and indignation flashed quickly across her beautiful features, but she raised her handkerchief to her lips, and he did not see it. Then she rose and walked round the table behind him, and, placing her hands on his shoulders, bent down over him.

"Very well," she said, and her voice was rather strange and forced, "if you will go at once I will kiss you."

Then she just touched his forehead with her lips. Fortunately for him there was no tell-tale mirror opposite to him, wherein he could have seen reflected the white, angry face of the woman who gave him what he deemed her first kiss of love.

After that, beside himself with happiness and delight, he left her, and took himself off to his interview with Lord A——.

Princess Petrusky waited for him with a patience that was truly admirable.

Digitized by Google

She sat just where he had left her, at the round table in the middle of the room, facing the clock, upon which her eyes were fixed with an anxiety that was almost painful. The waiter came and cleared the breakfast things away from before her, but still Princess Olga sat there, motionless, staring at the clock.

Sometimes a shiver passed over her; once she trembled from head to foot and a few words escaped her pale lips.

"Suppose he should not return—suppose he should suspect—but no, it is impossible, I have deceived him too well. Patience and courage! he will be back soon!"

He came at last.

As he opened the door the colour rushed in a flood to her face. She sprang to her feet, and certainly no truly loving woman ever greeted a man's return with a greater joy shining in her face than did the Princess Olga as Lionel Hallett came into the room with his box of despatches in his hand.

She was full of delight at his return and of eager questionings.

What had Lord A—— said to him? What had he told him to do? Had he received all his instructions? And, above all, had he obtained the passport?

Yes, it was there safe enough.

"But you!" said Lionel, with a sudden thought. "How can you travel without one? I ought to have got one for you too."

Olga laughed.

"Oh, women don't need passports nowadays; besides, I am going to my own country, you know. I shall not even be asked for such a thing."

Lionel believed her, and said no more.

"Now, you dear boy, you must go to the city, and I will order a charming little dinner, which we will eat together. Then you shall take me to the theatre this evening."

As soon as the door was shut behind him, the Princess jumped up and rang the bell.

Her maid entered hurriedly.

"Is all in readiness, Catherine?"

"Yes, my lady."

"Then make haste, for we have not a moment to spare."

Two hours later, Lionel Hallett ran lightly up the hotel steps on his return from Doctors' Commons with his marriage licence in his pocket, and found the Princess's sitting-room empty.

"Where is the Princess Petrusky?" he asked the waiter.

The man looked at him in surprise.

"The lady has left, sir."

"Has gone out, I suppose you mean?" said Lionel, still unsuspicious.

"No, sir, she has left altogether, with her lady's maid and man servant. She sent for her bill directly you left, and her luggage was taken downstairs. Did you not know it, sir? Do you feel ill, sir?"

Lionel had staggered back against the wall, white and weak.

"It is impossible!" he gasped at length. "You must be dreaming! She cannot have gone! I will not believe it!"

But he had to believe it. Her rooms were empty—cleared of every single thing that had belonged to her. Not a trace of her was left.

In his despair, he went to his own room. That was all in disorder. His portmanteau was unlocked, his things were strewn about the floor; and, more singular still, one whole suit of clothes, and a long travelling ulster he had just purchased, together with a new "pot" hat, were altogether missing! On the table lay the despatch box—empty! By the box was a note addressed to him. He tore it open and read as follows:

"DEAR MR. HALLETT,—I have stolen a whole suit of your clothes! Will you ever forgive me? I think they will fit me charmingly! You know we are not unlike. I venture to think your passport also will be of some use to me. You will not, I am sure, grudge me the use of it when I tell you that my husband is in St. Petersburg, and that I, being a Pole, am for some trifling political offence an exile from Russia; but now, thanks to you, I am able to join him. Forgive me for having made you believe other things, and hope for what I could not give you.

"Your friend,

"OLGA PETRUSKY."

* * * * *

There was a scandal in high quarters, and Mr. Hallett senior had a great many startling revelations made to him concerning his hopeful son. But, thanks to Lord A——'s influence, matters were eventually hushed up; and within a year Lionel gratefully accepted a humble clerkship in one of the public offices. Very certainly, after the episode of the romantic and successful flight of the Princess Petrusky into Russia, no one ever again proposed to make Lionel Hallett a Queen's Messenger!

"O, I can't go to sleep with one in the room. And yet a clock once saved my life—after it had made me nearly lose it"

As he spoke, Lieut. Halford lifted a dainty little timepiece from its position in the centre of the mantel, and carried it off to the cupboard, where he deposited it very carefully on one of the shelves.

"Nonsense, Frank!" rejoined his friend, Grant Young. "You're the last man I would ever accuse of being fussy."

"Not having heard my clock story, you are, of course, ignorant of the fact that I was once tried for murder."

"Look here, Frank, don't trifle with a fellow's nerves on a night like this."

Then, seeing that his friend's face was deeply serious, Young added, "Go on, then."

"It was shortly before I joined the army and when I was out in America prospecting with a party from Denver, Arizona. We had struck a good thing near the little town with the most inappropriate name of Bluebell. It was a newly-settled place, and settled with some pretty poor material too. A vein of silver had been struck in the hill close by, and the town sprang up like a skyrocket. The vein proved a very short one, and Bluebell's soaring soon came down like a stick, and now I doubt if there are a dozen families left there.

"At the time of which I speak, however, Bluebell was a city of considerable pretensions—for its kind. It boasted a hotel with two rooms, a shaving saloon with a regular barber's chair, and a small tailoring establishment, as the sign had it, which we fellows of the Baby Mine found a great improvement on amateur darns and button fastenings.

"This tailor shop was kept by a German named Bilsing, one of the most repulsive-looking men I have ever seen.

One afternoon I had gone to his place to have a rent in my coat lining sewed up. While he was at work on it, I asked him how much it would be, and on his answering, took the money from my pocket and laid it on the table in front of him. When the job was finished I put on my coat and was about to hurry off when Bilsing called after me: 'Say, you go off mitout leaving me somedings. It cost denpence."

Digitized by Google

"'I paid you once,' I retorted.

"'No, you did not,' he insisted, and then, rather than have a fuss with the man, I paid him over again, and took occasion at the same time to tell him plainly that I knew he was cheating me.

"Jack Darling and Nate Gray, two miners from Bluebell, happened to drop in while Bilsing and I were in the thick of it, for the impudent fellow answered back, and I considered myself lucky to get out of the place without having to resort to my muscles to defend myself. As I walked back to our claim I vowed never to go to the shop again; you can imagine, then, how annoyed I was when I discovered that I had lost a locket from my watch-chain.

"It contained the picture of my mother, which I prized most highly. I had noticed that the ring by which it had been attached to my chain was wearing perilously thin, and had determined to file it through, take the locket off, and put it away safely till I had an opportunity of having it fastened on by a jeweller. But I had delayed to do this, and now the thing was gone.

"Could I have lost it at Bilsing's shop? I asked myself. I remembered that I had been leaning against the worktable, the edge of which would come just about where the locket had been. I resolved to return at once and make a search, deeply as I disliked the idea of interviewing the man again.

"I turned and retraced my steps, walking slowly, with my eyes on the ground. But I saw no sign of my locket on the way. Just before I reached Bilsing's place I looked at my watch to see how much time I had before supper, and saw that it was twenty minutes to six.

"The irascible German was seated cross-legged on his table, busily at work, when I entered.

"'Vell, vat you vant now?' he grunted out when he saw me.

"'I think I dropped a locket on the floor here,' I answered, and began to search among the litter under the table. 'You didn't see it, did you?' I added, when a three minutes' hunt proved barren of results.

"'You dink I steal him, eh?' he snarled, dropping his work, and beginning to glare at me.

"'No; I didn't say so!' I returned. I might have added that I thought so, but he scarcely gave me time to do any thinking, for all at once he burst out with a torrent of brutal invective.

"He sprang down from the table, and I thought he was going to strike me. I squared off and made ready to defend myself, and at that instant the door opened and a man entered the shop. He was quite a young fellow and had a pair of trousers over his arm, which he flung down on the counter, raging something in German, and then got out as quickly as possible.

"Bilsing's attention was momentarily diverted from me by this episode, and I seized the opportunity to take myself off, satisfied that I could get nothing out of the man in his present mood.

"'Perhaps I did not lose the locket there, after all,' I reflected, and spent twice the usual amount of time it took me to reach our camp by making a thorough inspection of the path. But I did not find the locket. I said nothing to the fellows about my afternoon's experience, but quietly made up my mind to make another visit to the tailoring establishment later on, in the hope that I might find its owner in a more reasonable frame of mind.

"The next morning we had heard that Bilsing was dead, and before noon I was charged with having murdered him. He had been found in a heap on the floor of his shop by John Draper, who had stepped in to order a pair of trousers at twenty minutes past six. He had a bruise on the side of his head, and my locket was found by his side.

"An investigation was made by a committee of citizens—there was no law to speak of in Bluebell. Darling and Gray were very reluctantly obliged to testify that they had seen me quarrelling with him that very afternoon, and, to crown all, they had unearthed that fellow who had rushed in with a pair of trousers to be repaired, who turned out to be one Hermann Olgreich, and who swore that he had seen me standing up before Bilsing in a threatening attitude at a quarter-past six.

"'But I had left the shop a good half-hour before that,' I insisted, when I heard this. 'I remember that fellow coming in, and I am sure that it couldn't have been more than ten minutes to six at the very latest.'

"But even as I spoke I remembered with a shudder that I would find it difficult to prove my assertion, for on account of my search by the way for the locket, I had taken, as I have said, twice the usual length of time to get back to our camp, so that the testimony of my mates there as to the time of my arrival would avail me nothing. Jack Dingman, my chum, did all that mortal man could do, and the rest of the fellows in our claim scoured Bluebell in search of witnesses who might be able to prove that I was not in Bilsing's shop at a quarter-past six. But it was no use. The only thing gained by it was the discovery of a trampish fellow who said he had stepped in at the tailor's establishment about six o'clock to get a light for his pipe and found Bilsing alone, and apparently all right.

"'Now if you could only prove that that Olgreich fellow is wrong, and that you are right about the time of your being with Bilsing, we could get you clear in a jiffy,' Jack assured me.

"There was no gaol in the place, of course, so I was detained in a well-guarded room at the hotel. My friends were allowed to come in and see me at intervals, but, as you can imagine, these interviews were anything but cheerful ones.

"At last the day of the so-called formal trial came, and all my worst fears were realised as the case progressed. All the little flaws I had picked in the array of evidence against me, and charged the boys to bring up when the time came, were outweighed by the preponderating evidence on the other side. Suddenly Jack Dingman sprang to his feet, and I imagined he had thought of a new line of evidence. He said nothing, however, but hurried out of the room, carrying my last shred of hope with him.

"'He can't bear to stay and hear me convicted,' I told myself.

"But I was wrong. In five minutes Jack was back again, out of breath, but with a look in his eyes that set my heart throbbing.

"'Will you please call Hermann Olgreich back to the witness-box?' he said to the man who was acting the part of judge.

"Amid a good deal of wonderment about what might be coming, Jack turned to the German youth and asked:

"'How did you know that it was a quarter-past six when you saw the prisoner in Bilsing's shop? You have no watch, I believe.'

"'I looked at the clock,' was the reply.

"'What is Jack driving at?' I asked myself. 'Surely this has all been gone over before.'

"'Where were you standing when you looked at the clock?'

"'In the doorway. It was just as I was going in,' replied Olgreich.

"Jack brought his hands together with a smack. 'That settles it, I believe,' he exclaimed. 'But there is just one more question I should like to ask, How could you tell the time if you got no farther than the doorway, because the clock at Bilsing's is over it, on the inside?'

"'Why, sure enough,' answered the unsuspecting witness promptly. 'There is a looking-glass behind Bilsing's table, and I saw the clock reflected there.'

"'Which turned the hands round and made it seem to you a quarter-past six, when it was really a quarter-before six!' and Jack rushed towards me with hand outstretched.

"It was as if a bombshell had burst in that improvised courtroom. There was a complete revulsion of public sentiment in my favour, and it scarcely needed the testimony of the trampish individual who wanted a light for his pipe to clear me.

"Suspicion now being turned back upon itself, so to speak, a doctor was procured, and an autopsy held on the dead man, which established the fact that he had died of an apoplectic stroke.

"And now do you wonder, Grant, that I am a little sensitive to the ticking of a clock, even though, as I said, one did save my life?"

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," etc.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

Franz Hartog—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

Sir Harry Milton—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, in his yacht, the Calypso, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

Herbert Wyndham—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

Frederick Austen—the inventor of the air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

Frank Markham—the young captain of the Utopian yacht, Mermaid.

Violet Milton—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is fearfully injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

Lea Cassilis (alias Mme. Dail)—a member of Autonomie Group No. 7 with whom Renault is in Love.

Dora Merton—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

Lucy Summers—another fair Utopian.

Renault, after levying blackmail with Hartog on the high seas, returns to Utopia with the object of destroying the colony, but finds it deserted. After a time he goes to Europe in the air-ship Vengeur, and, together with Lea Cassilis, visits the Criterion Theatre in London, where he is recognised by Sir Harry and Lieutenant Wyndham, who effect his capture. He is tried, and condemned to death, but is rescued on his way to the scaffold by his confederates in the air-ship.

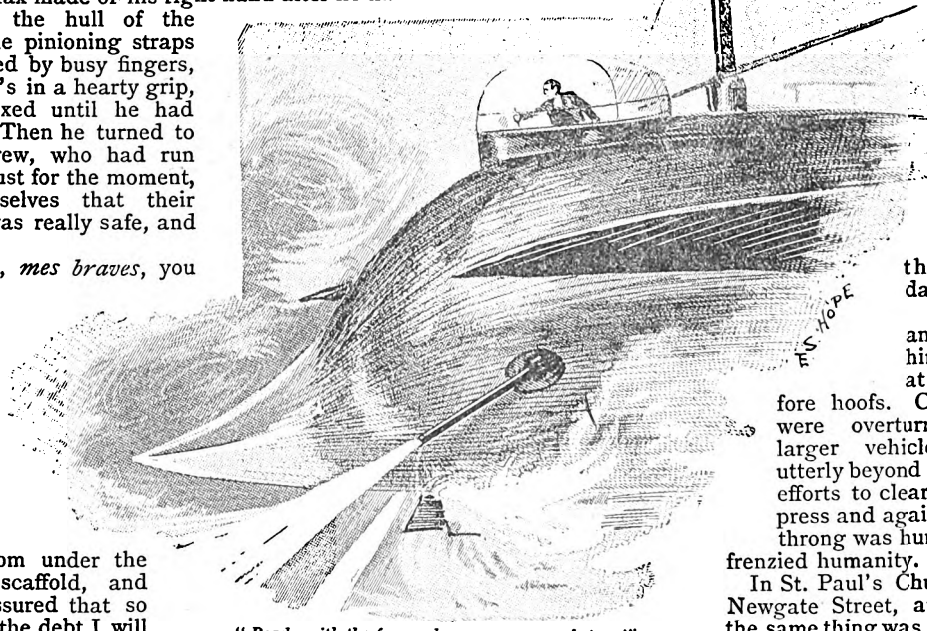
CHAPTER XXXIII.

Revenge!

"Bravo, Raoul, that was the neatest thing you ever did in your life, mon brave, and you'll live to be pretty old before you do anything smarter! Tonnerre! How that canaille yelled when they saw me go up instead of the black flag. I can be as good a friend as I can an enemy, and you shall never want a friend now as long as I'm alive."

The first use Max made of his right hand after he had been hauled up into the hull of the Vengeur and the pinioning straps had been removed by busy fingers, was to take Taxil's in a hearty grip, which never relaxed until he had done speaking. Then he turned to the air-ship's crew, who had run into the saloon just for the moment, to satisfy themselves that their rescued leader was really safe, and said heartily:

"And you too, mes braves, you have done splendidly! Henceforth you and I will not only be captain and crew of the Vengeur. We shall be comrades and friends. I owe you my life, for you have snatched me from under the shadow of the scaffold, and you can rest assured that so far as I can pay the debt I will pay it. We will have a feast together to-night to celebrate such a rescue as never was made on earth before, but just now we have some other amusement on hand, so be off to your posts and let us show the canaille down yonder that what we threaten we can do."



"Ready with the forward guns. . . . Let go!"

Max, like all born leaders of men, knew when to surround himself with reserve and when to unbend into cordiality. His simple speech went straight to the hearts of his men, who from that moment forward were his, body and soul, for now they looked upon him as their own in another sense than that of command.

By their skill and boldness, they had saved his life and snatched him from the shameful death of a felon; so he was theirs and they were his, and they left the saloon with cries of "Vive l'Anarchie! Vive Monsieur Max! Death to the bourgeois canaille!"—words of terrible import to the panic-stricken throngs below them.

Max, after swallowing a half bottle of champagne in a couple of gulps, asked Taxil for a cigar, and, when he had lit it, went to take his old place in the conning-tower, to direct the work of revenge, while Taxil went to see that the men were at their guns, and then betook himself to the engine-room to await orders.

The scene over which the Vengeur floated was even now terrible enough to have shaken the nerves of any but an Anarchist or a professional soldier. The vast throngs packed into the streets about Newgate were swaying too and fro in great masses, struggling to force their way out, and, after the manner of crowds possessed by panic, doing everything to frustrate their own object. Everyone wanted to get out of the streets at once, and the result was that hundreds were flung down and trampled under foot.

The crowd that surged out of the Old Bailey was forced back by the throng that was pressing down Ludgate Hill, while at the bottom of the hill under the railway arch a mass of vehicles, omnibuses, cabs, private carriages and tradesmen's carts, which had been waiting for the street to clear, so that they could drive through, formed a barrier against which the crowd blindly dashed itself.

Horses took fright and reared up on their hind legs, lashing out at the crowd with their fore hoofs. Cabs and light carts were overturned, jamming the larger vehicles, whose horses, utterly beyond control, made frantic efforts to clear themselves from the press and against all the maddened throng was hurling itself in a sea of frenzied humanity.

In St. Paul's Churchyard, Cheapside, Newgate Street, and Holborn, almost the same thing was happening. Streams of traffic, converging from half-a-dozen quarters of the Metropolis, all met at the junction of the great arteries, and the streets which were almost congested under ordinary circumstances, and with the most careful management, were now impassable. The police had made heroic efforts to restore something like order, and to get at least a portion of the crowd out of the narrow ways. But they were thrown aside and tossed about by the screaming, struggling throngs, until the universal panic attacked them too and they joined, almost involuntarily, in the general but hopeless struggle for release.

Digitized by Google

For fully ten minutes the Vengeur circled slowly round over the agonised thousands, as though her captain and crew were enjoying in anticipation the horrors that they were about to add to the frightful scene beneath them. Then Max stopped her a couple of hundred feet over the cross of St. Paul's, with her bow pointing westward, and called down one of the tubes:

"Ready with the forward guns—one on the end and one on the middle of the street. Let go!"

There was a sharp hissing sound as the pent-up air in the breech-chambers forced the projectiles out. Then two bright masses of flame blazed out, followed by the mingled roar of the explosions and the crash of glass as the neighbouring shop windows were blown in.

Two great ragged gaps were torn in the densely packed masses amidst which the shells fell as though the earth had burst open beneath their feet, and bodies of men and women were hurled up into the air, mingled with limbs and torn fragments of other bodies, and fell back upon the heads of those who thronged the pavements. Then, in the midst of such a cry of agony and terror as had never reached human ears before, Max took up another tube, and said:

"Ready with the port stern gun! Send a shell into that lot where the four streets meet!"

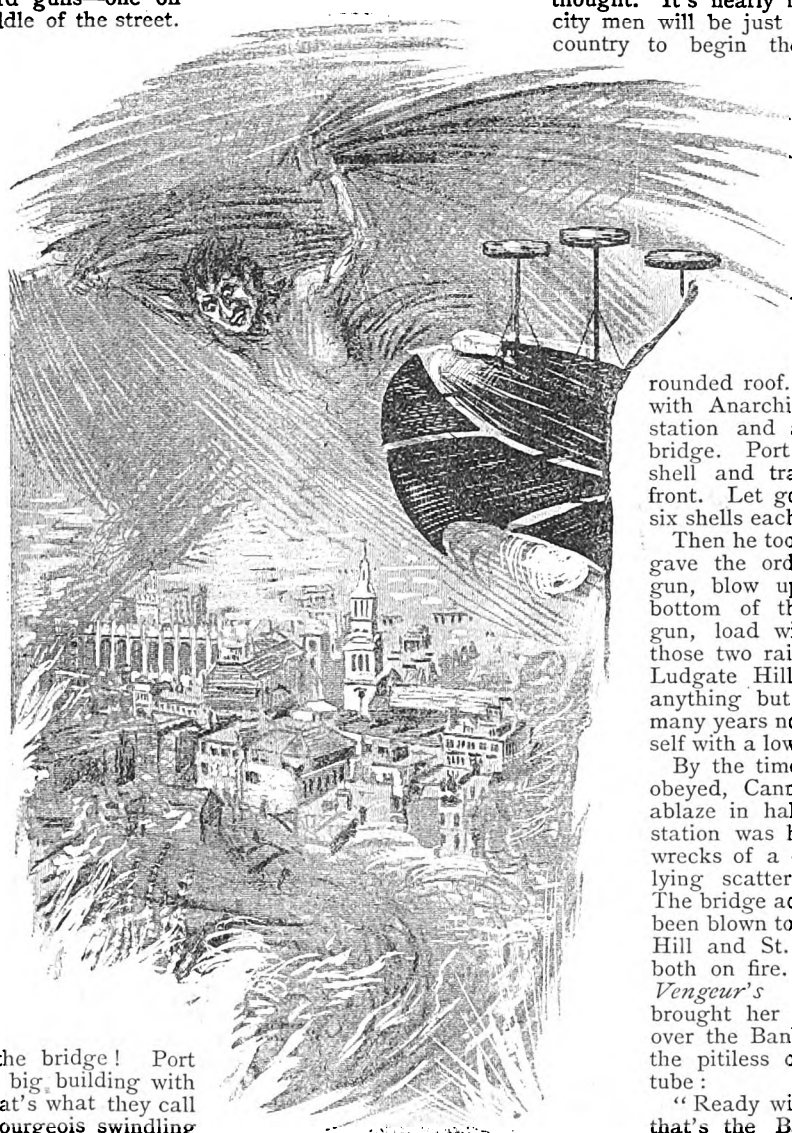
Again the hissing sound came and the shell burst in the midst of the throng that was packed into the junction of Cheapside and Newgate Street with the same hideous effects.

"Starboard bow gun—a couple of shells in the crowd by the church there. Port bow, another under the bridge! Port stern, send a shell at that big building with the pillars in front of it—that's what they call their Royal Exchange—a bourgeois swindling den!"

His orders were obeyed almost as soon as they were given, and, as each shell struck and burst, the scene of wholesale murder became more and more hideous, for the fearful effects of the projectiles seemed to strike the helpless throngs with paralysis, and all they could do was to sway to and fro and scream and moan with terror as though they intuitively knew that they were at the mercy of an enemy from whom there was no escape.

Some made wild rushes into the shops and houses, and as soon as he saw this Max ordered the guns to play upon them loaded with fire-shell, and a few minutes later unquenchable fires were blazing furiously in a score of houses and shops all round the area of slaughter and destruction. Then, like the incarnation of an evil spirit brooding above the scene of indescribable horror, the Vengeur passed slowly over the streets, dropping bombs charged with fire-mixture as she went, and when she had completed the circuit a ring of flame and smoke encircled the black frowning walls of the prison in which everyone had believed by this time Max Renault would have been hanging by the neck.

"I think that will do for this part of London," he said to himself, as the Vengeur once more floated over the Cross of St. Paul's, "and as we have a good many visits to pay to-day, we may as well be off. Ah, yes! that's a happy thought. It's nearly nine o'clock, and the city men will be just coming up from the country to begin their day's swindling. We'll smash up the railway stations first, and begin with Cannon Street. I've owed the South-Eastern a personal grudge for some time."



Like the incarnation of an evil spirit . . . the "Vengeur" passed slowly over the streets.

He took up the mouth-piece of a tube and called into it:

"Stern guns there, train on that railway station with the rounded roof. Starboard gun, load with Anarchite and fire into the station and at the trains on the bridge. Port gun, load with fire-shell and train on the hotel in front. Let go when you're ready—six shells each."

Then he took up another tube and gave the order: "Starboard bow gun, blow up that bridge at the bottom of the street. Port bow gun, load with fire-shell and set those two railway stations on fire. Ludgate Hill hasn't been fit for anything but burning for a good many years now," he added to himself with a low malicious laugh.

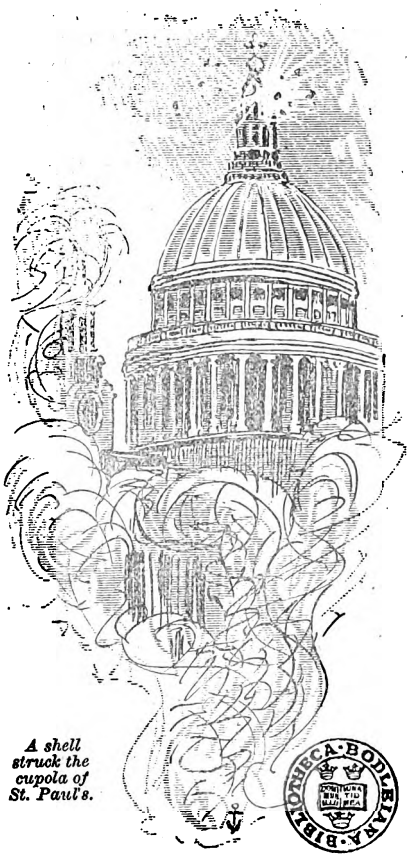
By the time his orders had been obeyed, Cannon Street Hotel was ablaze in half-a-dozen places, the station was half wrecked and the wrecks of a couple of trains were lying scattered over the bridge. The bridge across Ludgate Hill had been blown to pieces, and Ludgate Hill and St. Paul's stations were both on fire. He now turned the Vengeur's prow eastward and brought her to a standstill again over the Bank of England. Then the pitiless order went down the tube:

"Ready with the bomb tubes!—that's the Bank of England. I don't think they'll do much business to-day. Let go half-a-dozen pills for the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street to digest, if she can. Ah, that's a sort of run on the Bank they haven't had since the Old Lady started in business! Money will be a trifle tight to-day, I fancy, in the City."

He kept the Vengeur moving very slowly as the bombs were dropped, so that they might fall in different places. As they crashed down through the roof and burst, jets of flame and smoke rose through the holes they made, showing how terribly they had done their work, and in a few minutes the interior of the treasure-house of England was blazing like a furnace.

After this came the turn of the General Post Office and soon

Digitized by Google



A shell struck the cupola of St. Paul's.

the bombs were crashing through the roofs of the great buildings in St. Martin's-le-Grand, setting floor after floor on fire as they burst and scattered their fearful contents through the rooms and passages. Then a shell struck the cupola of St Paul's and wrecked it at a blow. The great golden cross tottered for a moment and then crashed downwards, smashing a great hole in the dome, and shivering to fragments on the marble pavement of the cathedral.

Meanwhile, the indescribable horrors of the scene in the streets and the buildings about them were multiplying a hundredfold as shell after shell and bomb after bomb found its mark, and building after building burst into a blaze. At first the fire-engines from the surrounding districts came pouring in from all sides to do battle with the flames, but the moment that they got into action a shell exploded on them or under them, burst their boilers and reduced them to wrecks strewn with the mangled remains of the brave fellows who had come, heedless of danger, to do their duty.

By ten o'clock a dense pall of smoke overspread the whole surroundings of Newgate for half a mile on every side. The under surface of it was lighted up by the flames that rolled upwards from more than a hundred burning buildings and high above it floated the Vengeur, her captain and crew laughing in fiendish delight at the frightful ruin and destruction that they had achieved in so short a time.

All over London business was suspended and panic reigned supreme. The very heart and financial centre of the great city was already paralysed. The Bank of England was vomiting forth flames like a volcano, the Royal Exchange and the Stock Exchange were half ruined, and three of the most important city stations were wrecked and in flames.

The military authorities, taken wholly unawares, had, of course, made no preparations to cope with an attack which the War Office had pronounced beforehand to be impossible. But as soon as it became a dreadful reality, batteries of field pieces and machine-guns were hurriedly mounted on the roofs of Buckingham Palace, the National Gallery, the Tower, and three or four other buildings, that afforded standing room for the guns, and presently Max, seeing a shell burst in the air, a couple of hundred yards away from him, awoke to the fact that London was about to make an effort in its own defence.

"You're wasting your powder, Messieurs!" he laughed to himself as he gave the signal for the air-ship to rise a thousand feet. "That sort of thing is no good; but if you want a little artillery practice you can have it and welcome."

The Vengeur soared upwards and then took a short flight westward. Over the West End the clouds were much thinner and broken in places into patches between which he could see the long rows of mansions and the public buildings of Kensington.

"I don't see why we should confer all our favours on the City," he said to himself as he looked down and caught a glimpse of the Albert Memorial through the clouds. "I think we might just try the effect of a shell on that bit of gilded gingerbread down yonder. London won't be any the less artistic for its destruction, certainly.

"Starboard bow gun, there!" he called down the tube, "let me see if you can send a shell into that thing standing down there in the park. I believe a couple of hundred thousand pounds of good money was spent on it. Just show me how much of the gilding you can knock off at a shot."

The Vengeur was brought to a standstill, and the gun carefully trained on its glittering mark. The shell struck with a flash and a roar and a cloud of smoke, and when the smoke cleared away the canopy was seen to shiver for a moment and then come down with a run, collapsing into a heap of ruins, from the midst of which half the gilded figure protruded.

"Bravo!" cried Max. "A capital shot! Now let us see if you can knock His Royal Highness's gilded head off."

It was no sooner said than done, for the second shell buried itself in the midst of the heap of ruins, exploded, and shot half the gilded figure bodily into the air.

"So much for that little bit of vainglory," said Max. "Now I think we'll drop a bomb or two into the Albert Hall and then go for more important game."

CHAPTER XXXIV

THE END OF "DEATH TUESDAY."

A FEW minutes later, leaving the Albert Hall in flames behind her, the Vengeur winged her way towards the river at an elevation of three thousand feet. The land batteries, which had been firing at random up into the air over the City in the hope of crippling or blowing up the air-ship by a chance shot, were speedily silenced by the news of the destruction of the Albert Memorial and the Albert Hall in Kensington.

But meanwhile another battery had been got to work in Hyde Park near to the Magazine, and another one had been hurriedly mounted on the roof of the Knightsbridge Barracks. As soon as a glimpse was caught of the Vengeur floating above the clouds, every gun that could be brought to bear upon her was fired, but the elevation was nothing like great enough, and the shells whistled harmlessly beneath the air-ship and burst far away in front of her.

Max's knowledge of London was quite exact enough to tell him where they came from, and those at the batteries, to their disgust and disquiet, saw her swing slowly round and head back for the Park. Then the terrible mistake they had committed dawned upon them. The Anarchists had forgotten the powder magazine, and they had reminded them of it. Instantly there was a stampede, the guns were limbered up and hurried away across the Park, and every man got out of the magazine as fast as he could.

The air-ship, as everyone had expected, stationed herself exactly over the low, red brick building, and Max gave the order to try the direction with a fire-shell. It was let go, and struck the turf about twenty yards wide of the mark. A tall jet of brilliant flame burst up from the ground in the midst of a volume of smoke, and then fell to the earth, running in streams of fire over the turf. The second one struck the angle of the building, knocked the brickwork away, and enveloped the corner in flames. A third one struck the roof almost in the centre.

A long tongue of flame leapt upwards and then, with a roar and a shock that was heard and felt over half London, a couple of tons of powder and cartridges exploded, and from the midst of the quaking earth a vast volume of flame and smoke burst up as though it would rend the firmament itself.

Every window within a radius of a mile was shattered to fragments, and thousands of chimney-pots came clattering down over the roofs of the surrounding houses and smashed to fragments in the streets, killing and maiming hundreds of the panic-stricken wretches who were wandering aimlessly about wondering where the next blow would fall and whether they were more likely to be killed in the streets or burnt or crushed to death in the burning or falling houses.

Digitized by Google

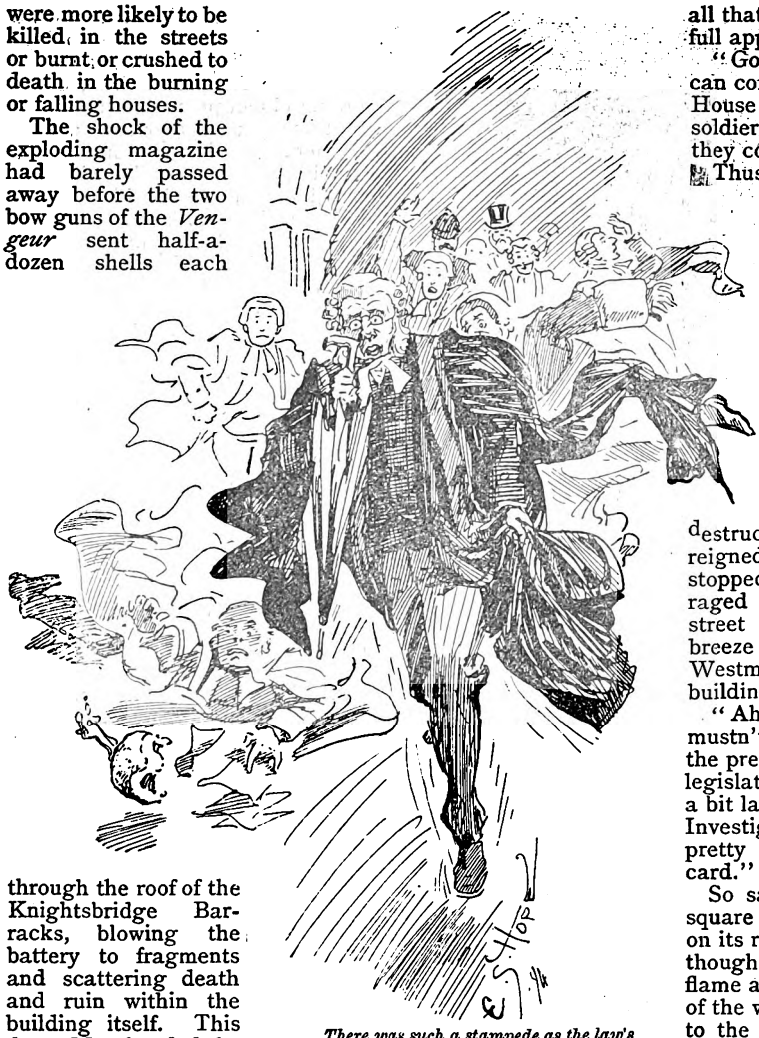
The shock of the exploding magazine had barely passed away before the two bow guns of the Vengeur sent half-a-dozen shells each through the roof of the Knightsbridge Barracks, blowing the battery to fragments and scattering death and ruin within the building itself. This done, Max headed the air-ship a second time towards the river, which he crossed in the neighbourhood of Chelsea.



There was such a stampede as the law's delay had never known before.

As he looked down upon the little green garden in front of Cheyne Walk he said to himself with a sardonic smile :—

"Ah, my wise old sage of Chelsea, I wonder if it ever crossed your mind that such doings as these might one day be possible, and if so I wonder what string of vitriolic adjectives you would have ascribed to your humble admirer and sometime disciple, and yet I verily believe that in the inmost depths of your soul you would have found some excuse for the enemy of the Society whose cant and brutal stupidity you cursed so bitterly and so justly.

"I wonder what you would say now if you could see the terror and the panic of those swarming millions down yonder, with their miserable souls turning to water for fear of the man that they tried to hang like a dog in a corner. What's the good of all their wealth and their pride and their snobbery now? About as much good as it would be at the Day of Judgment; and yet, if they had only listened to you, and recognised the prophet when he was in their midst, it's just likely that there would have been no such thing as anarchy to-day, and therefore no Vengeur floating over burning London, and no Max Renault laughing at it.

"Well, well, I have that much respect for your memory that if ever I lay all London in ruins, as I may do some day, I'll take care that no shell falls in the spot that you made sacred in my eyes with your presence. I don't suppose you would take me for a disciple if you knew me, but I am one for all that, and after all, I don't suppose you ever understood the full application of your own doctrine.

"Good-bye, old sage! If your ghost is anywhere about it can come and watch me pay a visit to the National Palaver House that you once wanted cleared out with a regiment of soldiers. I'll clear it out a good deal more effectually than they could."

Thus soliloquising, Max steered the Vengeur at easy speed along the course of the Thames towards Westminster, still keeping his elevation of three thousand feet and sending an occasional shell from his guns at random over London to north and south, in sheer wantonness of destruction for the mere sake of keeping up the panic he had created. It was then nearly one o'clock, and according to the usual arrangements the Houses of Parliament would not be sitting for another hour or two, if, indeed, the members ventured within the precincts of Westminster at all.

By this time, the clouds had mostly drifted away to the eastward, and a warm April sun was shining down over the western half of the great city. In the City itself, the fires, kindled by the shells and bombs of the Vengeur, were still burning furiously, for the destruction of the fire-engines, and the panic which now reigned supreme among the terrified millions of London had stopped all organised effort to extinguish them, and so they raged on unchecked, spreading from house to house, and street to street, under the influence of the strong westerly breeze that was blowing. As the Vengeur passed over Westminster, Max caught sight of the square, red turreted building which he recognised as New Scotland Yard

"Ah," he said, looking down at it through his glasses. "I mustn't forget that. I'll let the national windmill alone for the present, for I may be able to catch some of the hereditary legislators and misrepresentatives of the Sovereign People in it a bit later on, but our friends of the police and the Criminal Investigation Department will probably be at home, and pretty busy too, so I'll just stop a minute and leave my card."

So saying, he stopped the air-ship high above the great square building, and then half-a-dozen fire-bombs descended on its roof in quick succession. They crashed through it as though it had been made of glass, and presently tongues of flame and wreaths of smoke began shooting and creeping out of the windows. As soon as he saw this, he ran half a mile to the southward and sent a dozen Anarchite shells through the windows to help on the conflagration that his fire-bombs had started.

"That'll do for you, my friends, I think. Scotland Yard was always a pretty warm corner, but I don't think it was ever quite as hot as it is now. There are a good many fellows in there who'll never hunt down any more poor devils of Anarchists and hand them over to the tender mercies of M. de Paris. Now where shall we pay the next call? Ah, of course, I have it. It would never do to forget that. We'll go and scare the rooks out of the legal dovecots.

"Those sleek-looking scoundrels, they're the cause of half the injustice and the oppression that has made Anarchy what it is, and me what I am. Here goes for the Temple and what the canting hypocrites are pleased to call the Royal Courts of Justice. I hope the Courts are sitting. I'll go and serve a Sent bomb after bomb through the roofs of the House of Parliament.

Digitized by Google

notice of ejectment on them and decline to stay execution, as they say in their pompous jargon."

With that he sent the Vengeur across the Embankment and the Strand, and placed her over the Law Courts. Then bomb after bomb crashed in quick succession through different parts of the gabled roof of the great building until it was on fire in a dozen places at once, and there was such a stampede and haste to get out as the law's delay had never known before. Judges in their wigs and ermine and scarlet; barristers, also bewigged, and with their long robes fluttering behind them, made one general rush for the doors, followed by plaintiffs and defendants, witnesses and jurymen, all breathless sharers in the universal panic.

Max leant back in his seat in the conning-tower and uttered a shout of laughter, which was taken up throughout the ship as he and her crew saw the bewigged and berobed figures tumbling over each other in their hurry to escape from the burning building into the street.

The Strand, from St. Martin's Church to Temple Bar, was crowded in a few moments, and as soon as he saw this, he gave orders for a couple of the broadside Maxim guns to play upon it, and as the storm of bullets descended into the crowded space, the unhappy throngs were literally mown down in swathes, as corn falls before a reaping machine. Meanwhile a few shells were being sent from the bow guns into the different buildings of the Outer, Inner, and Middle Temple, and these of course had the immediate effect of sending barristers, lawyers, and clerks hurrying in crowds into the gardens, falling over each other down the staircases in their desperate haste to escape from the explosions which kept crashing through the building.

But no sooner had they reached the open air than the Maxims were turned on them and the hail of bullets struck them down by dozens. Then a few fire-bombs were dropped through the roofs: "Just to smoke the rest of the rats out," as Max put it to himself, and then a brief visit was paid to Lincoln's Inn with the same results reproduced on a smaller scale.

That afternoon and evening neither flag was hoisted nor light kindled on the clock tower of Westminster, for the universal panic had now spread to all ranks of society, and neither Lords nor Commons felt inclined to run the risk of a sitting in a building whose conspicuous position and character marked it out for almost certain destruction at the hands of the enemy of mankind who, for the time being, held London at his mercy.

Max waited in vain for the signal that Parliament was sitting, still keeping up the terrorism by circling hither and thither high over the vast wilderness of houses, and dropping a bomb or sending a shell here and there as the fancy took him, or any tempting object presented itself. He kept this up until about six o'clock, and then, as his ammunition was beginning to run rather low, he decided to put the finishing touches to his horrible work, and then get away and join Hartog again.

Sending the long tongue of flame far up into the sky.

Going to work with almost diabolical deliberation, he first ran up and down over the river and destroyed the floating fire engines. Then, hovering over Westminster, he sent bomb after bomb through the roofs of the Houses of Parliament, the Government Offices, the Horse Guards, the Admiralty, and Whitehall. For a moment the thought of destroying Westminster Abbey as well crossed his mind, but a glance at the venerable pile brought back to his well-stored mind all its ancient and splendid traditions, and instead of giving the order he said to himself:

"No, I won't do that. It would do no good, and it would take a thousand years to repair the damage. I'll let the old church alone. Who knows but some day we may preach the new Gospel of Man in it. Sacré diable, how the abodes of red tape are burning! It seems to make splendid fuel. I wonder what there is in that fire-mixture of Hartog's? It burns as if it came from the lake of Tophet itself. Fine bonfires those for anarchy to light its pipe at! Ah, they're lighting the street-lamps out yonder to the north. It's time to go and pay the gasworks a visit. I think I've provided London with quite light enough for to-night. It's a waste to burn gas under the circumstances."

Then the Vengeur ran across to Vauxhall, and a few moments later the shells began bursting among the gas-holders, tearing great ragged holes in them, and as the gas came rushing out fire-bombs were dropped to ignite it, and huge tongues of roaring flame shot up into the air, until one after another the gasometers burst like huge shells. Then came the turn of the Old Kent Road works, and the southern half of London shook to its foundation as the enormous quantities of gas stored up in the holders took fire and then blew up, hurling fragments of iron plate, bricks and coal, and fragments of human bodies far and wide over the surrounding streets.

Every gas light in South London went out within a few minutes, and then the Vengeur headed away north-westward to the works of the Gas Light and Coke Company at Kensal Town. The great "Jumbo," the largest gas-holder in the world, was full, and the huge iron reservoir had been raised to the tops of the iron pillars with which it was surrounded.

Digitized by Google

Max turned his attention to the smaller ones first, and sent a shell through the roof of each of them in rapid succession. Then he poised the air-ship exactly above the giant and dropped first a solid piece of iron weighing about ten pounds on to its roof and then sent a fire-bomb immediately after this. The piece of iron bored a clean hole, and as the gas came rushing up out of this the fire-bomb fell and ignited it.

The next instant a long stream of intensely brilliant flame almost like the ray of a search-light leapt up into the darkening sky hundreds of feet above the gas-holder. Then the volumes of gas escaping from the others caught fire in the air, with which, of course, they made a highly explosive mixture, and exploded with a concussion, the force of which was felt even by the Vengeur, floating nearly three thousand feet above. The great reservoir soon began to subside; its enormous weight driving the gas out with terrific force, sending the long tongue of flame far up into the sky, and casting a parting gleam on the hull and aeroplanes of the Vengeur as she soared away to the westward.

"Ah," said Max, as he looked back out of the conning-tower at the dark gulf of London, still lighted up by huge patches of flame covered by enormous canopies of rolling smoke, "the next time you try to hang an Anarchist, perhaps you will think twice about it. I hope that will teach you that the centre of power has shifted. The rule of nations is at an end, for I can paralyse those who rule them with a single stroke. What I have done to London to-day it would have taken a beseiging army weeks to do. The rule of the world has shifted from the earth to the air, and woe betide the earth as long as I rule the air! How mad Franz will be when he finds he has missed all this fun!"

So saying, he sent a signal for full speed to the engine-room, and in few minutes the conflagrations of London were only little points of light on the horizon.

(To be continued.)

Was It Wrong?

ONE fine summer evening I met on the boulevard one of my friends who had made his own way up in the world, and who, in his upward progress, had encountered so many different kinds of men that he had learned to take everything quietly, but who had retained for the enjoyment of his friends all his original freshness and goodness of heart.

We were chatting on our usual topics when a man of middle age, having his button-hole adorned with the ribbon of some foreign order, stopped in front of us, and, putting out his hand to my friend, who, not seeming to notice this, raised his hand quickly to his hat, said in a tone of voice that seemed to me somewhat ironical:

"What! what! Always happy? Yes, yes. Well, well, so much the better. Good-bye."

"Who is this gentleman?" said I, when we were some steps away.

"What, don't you know him? Then I'll tell you his history. In fact, he will furnish for us a practical illustration of the question we have been discussing. Is he a swindler or is he a genius? You shall decide the question for yourself.

"I made his acquaintance in 1878. He was then employed in a large commercial house. He was rather a remarkable orator in the clubs. Property, capital, bequests, had no more ferocious or more eloquent adversary than he. Every evening he turned all social questions inside out like a glove, amid the applause of the disappointed, the envious, and the sluggards who formed the mass of his audiences.

"In 1882 he thought it prudent to take a change of air, and took refuge in London to wait for events. As time went on his resources were exhausted, and he was obliged to take his watch to a pawnbroker. It was a gold watch, and he noticed that the man, after a quick, keen look at it, tried the knob with an acid, and immediately gave him the money that he asked for and his ticket. This method of testing the gold watch set him thinking. Having found the means of redeeming his watch. He took it to another office. There was the same quick look and the same mode of testing. He saw that this was the custom.

"Just at this time an old aunt, who had brought him up, died, and left him 15,000 francs. Then this ferocious enemy of all property and all bequests hastened to turn his inheritance into cash, and has known how to make it so fruitful that he has an income of 10,000 francs, a country villa, has bought that foreign order, the ribbon, which you saw at his button-hole, and lives comfortably with all sorts of small enjoyments."

"Did he make his fortune in trade?"

"No."

"In manufactures?"

"No. It was a plan of his own. Taking with him a sufficient sum of money, he went to Geneva, and, entering a watch factory, ordered two hundred watches of a certain pattern. The cases were to be of copper, heavily gilt, but the knobs of pure gold. Taking these with him to London, he pawned these two hundred watches in a few days to different pawnbrokers. All were tested at the knob. They cost him 40 francs each. The pawnbrokers advanced him 70 francs on each. So you see the affair paid very well."

"Certainly; but then he is a swindler."

"You think so?"

"And you also, I have no doubt."

"Well, perhaps. In the first place, his plan has never been found out, and he was able to realise a fortune from it; in fact, he could have carried it on up to the present moment without any inconvenience, but his tastes are simple, and he is naturally indolent, so that when he had enough he retired modestly, and thus left room for others."

"But the pawnbrokers must have suffered considerably."

"No. They did not lose one penny, for all these watches were withdrawn within the time allowed, and the money advanced on each of them was repaid."

"How long did he continue this business?"

"For five years."

"And he was never refused?"

"Never. To pawn one watch, ten watches, a hundred watches in London, is a very simple operation; but to pawn thousands of them for five years, to gain thirty francs on each one, and to cause them to be redeemed each one regularly by the payment of the sum advanced on each, that is the miracle—that is the stroke of genius."

"That must have been very difficult."

"Not at all. It was as simple as the egg of Columbus. This was his plan. When the weather was clear and the pavements dry, he walked quietly about through different streets and squares, dropping from time to time one of his pawn-tickets. When he had thus emptied his pockets, he went home with a clear conscience. The next day all these watches were redeemed by those who had picked up the pawn-tickets, and he could recommence his operations without any difficulty."

"Why, then, did you decline to shake hands with him?"

"Well, I have not yet quite made up my mind whether he was not a swindler after all."

Every Lady should buy

THE HOME DRESSMAKER.

Edited by "ISOBEL," of "Home Notes" and "Pearson's Weekly."

PUBLISHED MONTHLY. PRICE 1½d.

This useful paper is profusely and beautifully Illustrated by the best Fashion Artists of the day.

With every copy of THE HOME DRESSMAKER a Paper Pattern is given away.

Digitized by Google

MRS. GREGORY'S DIAMONDS.

"GEORGE GREGORY, Solicitor," was on the brass plate on the door, and everyone always called my employer George Gregory, because there were seven brothers of the name, all in the law, in London. I was Frank Forrest, aged twenty-two, and I was articled clerk to Mr. George Gregory. He was the best friend I ever had, and the best husband and father I ever knew. At home he had a good, merry little wife, and a dozen children, some of them so exactly alike that strangers could never tell them apart. I would have worked very hard for Mr. Gregory, and have sacrificed my best gloves for the children, but I would have died outright for Mrs. Gregory.

George Gregory was well off, and his business was rapidly increasing, but Mrs. Gregory dressed plainly of her own choice, as she so often told me. It was not more than twice a year that she fastened in her ears, and at her throat, the diamond rings and pin which were all her little fortune when George Gregory married her. They were not very valuable and the setting was old-fashioned; but they were, after all, actually diamonds and solid gold, and very precious to the owner.

"I wore them on my wedding-day," she used to say, "and if ever I have a girl"—Mrs. Gregory's tribe were all boys—"she shall wear them on hers."

The rings were pendants—the shape of the setting, in outline, very like some drawings of Egyptian vases which I have seen. In each were five diamonds. The pin had but four; the central diamond had been lost and a pearl set in its stead.

Mrs. Gregory kept them in a purple leathern casket, shaped like a knapsack. She was fond of opening this to give the children a peep at her treasure. It gave her unqualified gratification; but somehow, believe me or not as you choose, they always made my blood run cold.

Still, I had no presentiments whatever, when, one bright August day, Mrs. George Gregory announced the fact that she was about to take the children into the country.

"They want fresh air," she said, "and I've found the nicest place. Only I hate so to leave George alone. You'll look after him a little, won't you, Frank?"

And I promised faithfully. That afternoon Mrs. Gregory started for Loughfield, stopping at the office to put her diamonds in the safe. Mr. Gregory went with his wife to the station, and returned looking a little blue, I thought. That night he slept on a lounge in the office and announced his intention of doing so, and of taking his meals at a restaurant, until his wife's return.

I copied his example as to meals, but I slept in my usual place; there was no accommodation for me at the office. And so we kept on for a week and a half, quietly and regularly, nothing happening in particular, except that Mr. Gregory negotiated for a certain piece of property which he had had in his eye for a long time, and which Mrs. Gregory thought the finest in the suburbs.

It was to be a surprise to her on her coming home. And one afternoon, all else being settled, Mr. Gregory went to the bank and drew thence the money which he was to pay to the present owner. Something stood on mortgage, I forget what; but the cash was £3,000. At ten next day it was to be paid over. I saw Mr. Gregory count it, and lock it up in his safe before he went to tea, and thought, I remember very well, that I should like to have so much money. I was spending it, in imagination, when the office door opened and a woman came in; a very pretty woman, all I could see of her face for her veil. She had yellow curls, and black eyes, and bright cheeks, and a very pretty chin, with a dimple in it. She was dressed in black, with a good deal of lace about her.

She came close to me and looked down into my eyes, and smiled, and said, "Will Mr. Gregory be in again to-night, do you think?"

I told her that he would be in soon, I supposed, and offered her a chair, which she took with another smile. Then she looked skyward through the window, and remarked that it wa raining.

"It will rain all night, I'm sure," she said. "How foolish of me to walk! I'm so delicate that a soaking would be my death. If you would only do me a favour—a great one to ask of a stranger; but—you will, I know."

"If it is possible," I remarked.

"If you would only go to No. 40, Avenue Place, and ask them to send Mrs. Contille's carriage," she said. "You can ride back in it, you know. It's impertinent of me to ask it but I'm an old friend of Mrs. Gregory, and you'll oblige me, I know."

I thought the lady rather cool, I confess, and I thought, too, of what Mr. Gregory would say. But the lady seemed to read my thoughts, and settled the question by saying, "I'll mind the office and explain to Mr. Gregory," and once more gave me a smile. That smile settled the affair.

I seized my hat and departed. The shower was almost over already, and I laughed to myself at the lady's fears of a wetting; but I made my way to Avenue Place at once. The way was easy enough to find, but I searched for the number in vain. I stood at the corner in perplexity, when a rough, unpleasant-looking fellow put a hand upon my shoulder and cried, "Hallo who are you lookin' for?"

"Mrs. Contille's house," I said. "No. 40, Avenue Place."

"Ain't no No. 40," he said. "You mistook—it's 30. I'm he coachman. What's the matter?"

"She wants you and her carriage," I said shortly, "at Mr. George Gregory's."

"Yes," said the man, "she's always wanting something. Ladies always are, sir. I'll have the carriage out in no time. You ride back in her."

I had not had my tea yet, and time was of importance. "I'll go with you," I said. He became more polite still.

"She's a lady that has as fine a stable as any lady I know," he said. "I can see by your eye that you are a judge of horses. You take a look at them. This way, sir, if you please."

This, as it appeared to me, was a high compliment. I nodded and followed the man. He led the way down an alley to a building of some sort and opened the door.

"After you, sir," he said.

I took a step forward; felt rude hands upon my shoulders; was flung forward some paces; heard a door locked, and was alone in a perfectly empty outbuilding. There, despite all my calls for aid, I remained until the dawn broke, when, by its light, I espied a loose board in the side of the building, pushed it away, and squeezed through it into some poor man's back-yard, where I made a dash straight through the passage, and so into the street.

Thence I sped, as fast as my feet would carry me, towards the office; but before I reached it I saw a sight which made my blood run cold. The street was full of people, half-dressed, and horror-stricken.

Policemen guarded the door. Something horrible had happened. I rushed forward. Those who knew me made way for me to pass; and I saw, stretched on his back, in a pool of blood in the middle of the office, Mr. George Gregory, as ghastly a spectacle as human eyes might ever rest on, cold and dead beyond a doubt; and, further on, the safe wide open, with its papers scattered on the floor. Then I fainted, or had a fit, and came into gaol.

Digitized by Google

They set me free in a little while; perhaps no one ever really suspected me. The wretched widow, so broken down with woe that I hardly knew her, attested to my fidelity to her husband.

My story was told over and over again, and it seemed certain that the ruffian who locked me up in the stable was the murderer. But nothing was heard of him. He had made his escape in safety with £3,000, and the case containing Mrs. Gregory's diamonds.

I grew worn and ill with anxiety and trouble. And at last I could bear it no more, but bade them good-bye and left town. As I parted from Mrs. Gregory she put both her wan hands on my shoulders.

"I shan't live to see you again," she said, "but promise me that if ever you meet the man who killed my husband, you will do all you can to bring him to justice. Don't forget his face—don't forget his voice. Hang him, if you see him. Hang him, Frank Forrest, or I'll curse you!"

"I need no bidding to do that," I said. But she made me swear it on the Bible, and then kissed and blessed me as a mother might.

I went to America, and the gold fever fell upon me, and I worked for a fortune in the diggings for five good years. I had nothing to complain of as to luck; and, at last, with plenty of nuggets in my pockets, and health and heart enough for anything, I went up to San Francisco to enjoy myself.

Only one who had lived as I had for so many years can tell what pleasure it was to me to come into society again, to see the people at places of amusement, to talk with those to whom I became known. No man on earth is so ready to fall in love at first sight as one who has dwelt apart with his own sex for any length of time.

And I think that it would have been hard for anyone not to admire the Señora Maria. They said she was Spanish by birth, and her beautiful eyes were the eyes of sunny Spain. A man from "the diggings" is not apt to think too much of what will be said of him, or of what is said of other people. I never asked the Donna's antecedents.

I loved her, I wooed her, and I won her heart. Yes, I believed she loved me. I believe it now. She was a wild thing, reckless and passionate. No maiden nurtured in a peaceful home could have been what she was.

I also had grown wild and reckless. I think I loved her better for it.

We were to be married very soon. The world was now divided by that lover's rule—"Where she was and where she was not." We went to the theatre, where, in a blaze of light, her beauty drew all eyes towards her. I loaded her with presents; she gave me rich payment in that sweet promise that she should belong to me soon—should be mine at least for life. Once I said, "In Heaven also." Then she turned to me with a wild, strange gaze.

"Hush, Frank!" she said. "I don't want to think of death or of Heaven! I may not have absolution—I——Let this world suffice us!"

Our wedding-day was close at hand, when one day I called to see her. She was packing certain of her possessions in a little trunk. Warm as it was, a fire burnt on the hearth. Into it, as I entered, she was casting handfuls of flaxen hair, snipped from a curling wig which lay upon her lap. She gave a little scream as she saw me. Then she said, "Ah, I did not hear you, Frank! I am burning a relic of a masquerade ball, at which I made myself a blonde."

But she was so pale as she spoke that she frightened me.

"Are you ill?" I asked.

"The smell of burning hair has made me faint," she said.

"I will have no more of it," I cried. "Give the thing to a servant to make away with." And I rose to find her smelling salts. As I lifted it my eye lighted upon a little casket—a casket I had seen before, of tarnished purple velvet, shaped like a miniature knapsack. I seized it and tore it open. Within lay a pin and earrings, in outline like an old Egyptian vase, the central diamond of the pin replaced by a pearl; in three words—Mrs. Gregory's diamonds!

This is what I cried aloud. This is what she heard as she rushed towards me.

"Frank," she said; "Frank, what is it? Love, tell me!" And she shook like an aspen as she spoke.

I looked at the curled flaxen wig upon the ground. I looked at the beautiful dimple in the chin I had so often kissed, and I staggered back against the wall. I knew her now. I remembered her perfectly. She was the woman whom I had left in George Gregory's office on that awful day, six years before. She had come thither in disguise. For what?

"Señora Maria," I said, and my own voice sounded strange to me, "have you forgotten me? Do you remember the young man of whom you rid yourself in Mr. Gregory's office years ago, when you wore that wig, and——"

But she had thrown herself at my feet.

"Frank," she said, "Frank, my beloved! I never meant to kill him—only to open the safe. But he caught me at it. He seized upon me, and I used my knife. Frank, Frank, have mercy! I will go away. I—oh, Frank, remember that I love you!"

I remembered it too well. I was agonised. I was tortured.

But she had made confession, and I remembered my oath. I remembered the widow in her anguish. I remembered the children who were fatherless on that awful night. I remembered George Gregory lying in his blood upon the floor. It may be his avenging spirit gave me power to do what I did.

I opened the door. I passed down into the street.

There, by some strange chance, the first person I met was a detective from London, with whom I had a few days before talked over the mystery of George Gregory's murder.

I seized him by the arm.

"The woman who murdered George Gregory is in that room," I said. "I have every proof and her confession."

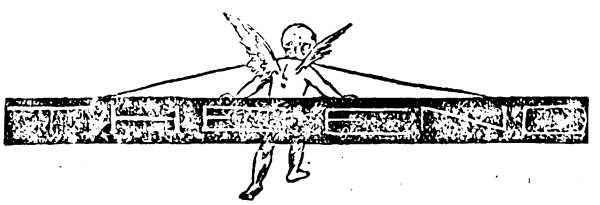
"Have you gone mad?" he asked. "That is Señora Maria's apartment!"

"Señora Maria is the murderess, and I shall be mad very soon," I replied; and there followed for me merciful darkness and oblivion as I sank senseless upon the ground.

She died. I cannot tell you more. They proved her guilt. Nay, she never strove to hide it.

She had been one of a gang of robbers. She had never been a good woman, or in any way a worthy one—vile from her childhood; so they proved her. But once I loved her. I have never forgotten that, or that she loved me. It haunts me as I wander through the gold land, careless of its gold, seeking only to shun the very sight of woman. It will haunt me through my life, until I lie down in some far solitude to die.

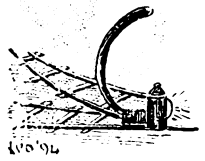
I shall never forget that I gave the only woman I ever loved to death, though she was that wretched creature—the lost, degraded murderess, Señora Maria!



Digitized by Google

THE CROSSING,

A Story with two Morals



GLOOMY and dismal from dawn, the slight drizzle of the rain and the oppressive sultriness of the air seem to carry with them a pervading melancholy. Towards evening the wind begins to rise, the rain to descend more rapidly, until as I stand in my engine—I am taking out the express to-night—it looks as if it would increase to a heavy storm.

My thoughts have been anything but cheerful throughout the day, but now, seeming to grow with the violence of the storm, they begin to take on such forbidding shapes, that I start each time the wind surges against us.

I have been going over in memory the last few months of my life, the part which should have been the brightest and happiest.

I seem to see an old barn filled with merry-makers at a dance—but all fades to the dimmest memory, compared with the thought of one face. Shall I ever be able to forget her, I wonder? And yet it is not altogether her beauty, it is her winning manner that none can resist.

I became one of her lovers, the favoured one, and was at last accepted. How happy were those days, the sweet days of spring! The brilliant freshness of the foliage; the singing of the birds; the universal joy of nature chimed in so well with mine.

Then amidst the sunshine and the brightness came the person who was to throw such a shadow on my life. An artist spending the summer in the village, not working for fame but for amusement. A man of outwardly pleasing appearance, but one who lived entirely for himself. I don't know when or where he first met her. She never told me, always evading the question. He, it was easy to see, was attracted by her beauty.

I began to notice a change in her, almost imperceptible at first; but as time went on it increased until my presence seemed almost distasteful. She did not offer to break her engagement to me, and I was too selfish to release her of my own accord. Yet it was not altogether selfishness, for it was the only way to keep her from him. If she were to have been the gainer I could have borne it, but it was evident he meant her no good. What was a country girl to him? A passing amusement, nothing more.

I gaze back along the lighted platform. How misty are the faces of the hurrying throng! There is a father bidding his son good-bye, and, nearer me, a girl is bidding good-bye to her lover.

Would they part so easily if they knew how nearly mad I am? And yet what right have I to feel, when I am expected to be a part of the machine, to carry them to their destinations in safety?

I look ahead and try to calm myself. Before me is the obscurity of night, lit by the signal lanterns that look like the eyes of fiends.

A desire comes to me to see once more her father's cottage; it is only two stations beyond. To see the light in her window, to know that she is safe for at least one night. To-morrow I will unmask him. But even as I plan, the wind sobs against the cab, seeming to say, "Too late! too late!"

How long they are getting on the train! Will the starting signal ever come?

At last I see it. I open the throttle, and we start into the night. One thought has taken possession of me; I am speeding towards her, perhaps to save her, to gain her gratitude if not her love.

I increase the speed; under me the engine works like a thing of life, its feelings in sympathy with mine.

It hurls its fiery breath in the darkness with less and less intermission, while behind me I hear the heavy rumble of the train.

It soothes me to be thus speeding towards her on the wings of the wind, with all this life and power; surely I must be her protection.

As we enter the woods, and I lean out, the storm beats against me with increased fury, angry at our disregard for it; the trees fly by in dim, ghostly outlines, standing so spectral in the night that it is a relief to be out once more between the fields and meadows.

The first station is passed. Soon the line takes a long curve, and as we dash out upon it, going faster than we should, I gaze back for a moment at the train bending round it so gracefully. As I see the carriages containing so much life, my conscience smites me and I slacken the speed.

We pass farm after farm, the lights in their windows looking so cosy through the storm, that again I think what might have been; again the desire to see her home overmasters me. We are nearing it now; a long down grade, a crossing, and we shall be there. The wind, increasing in fury, beats against us, striving to beat us back and crying in a low whistling wail as it rushes past in the vain attempt. By the vivid flashes of lightning, I see the tall trees of the forest bend as if in torture beneath its fury, but we speed on under the jagged masses of cloud in the lowering darkness.

Almost unconsciously I open the throttle a little more. The engine hurls itself down the grade; it throbs and trembles under its mighty pulsations, straining every fibre like a thing of life to do its best, while behind me I hear the heavy rumble of the carriages.

There comes a flash of lightning so vivid that for a moment it is as day. What is that black object to the right so near the line ahead?

In a moment I have shut off steam, and with my hand on the vacuum brakes am trying to reduce our speed. The flare of the furnace falls upon the different objects passing with fearful rapidity; now a tree, a stump, then a boulder, at last it falls upon a whistling notice. The thunder, dying away, mutters hoarsely.

I turn the whistle cock and the shrill sound leaps into the night.

Suddenly I feel a great dread; ahead is the crossing; a moment more and the light falls upon it.

In a cart, directly across the line, the horse so frightened that it cannot move, she sits, and by her side sits the man who has come between us.

Clinging to him with mortal fear, her face set in its terror, she watches the approach of the iron monster of vengeance driven by the man she had so wronged.

I reverse the engine and put the brakes full on. The train fairly groans under the shock. I hear the grinding and pounding of the carriage wheels, but it is too late. The engine touches the cart and I hear a rending sound.

. . . . .

Never again shall I run a train; never again shall I look upon the rails; but even here, in this quiet place, I shall feel the rocking motion of an engine beneath my feet and live over again, as I have just now done, the night of her death.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A POSITIVE REMEDY FOR CORPULENCE

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is a cheap issue (only 4d.) published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes:—"Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for, in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner, he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more, if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid:—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos—i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes:—'So far (six weeks from commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes:—'I am just half the size.' A fourth:—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes:—'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes:—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again a lady says:—'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says:—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Should Stout Persons STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever, which was, perhaps, indirectly responsible for the untimely end, in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeed only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic troubles which will be difficult to overcome.

The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite is appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, takes a different course. He says, "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2 lb. to 12 lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr. Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning, but on the contrary he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get his book, the price of which is only 4d. It is entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pp., and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It can be had direct, or through any bookseller.—Extract from The Million.

Digitized by Google

DOMES, BUBBLES, AND EGGSHELLS.

SEEN from a distance on a fine day the dome of St. Paul's looks as light as a soap bubble; and if it could talk, it would tell you it feels as light, for the mighty strength of the great church carries it as a man carries a baby on his shoulder. Yet it weighs—how much, do you fancy?

A woman stood in the doorway awaiting the return of her husband. He had left home with a heavy load of anxiety on his mind. Presently she saw him coming. Matters had been satisfactorily adjusted; she knew it by his face. Walking quickly up to her, he said—not loudly, but gently, with pauses between his words: "Wife,-if-you-should-heap-a-bushel-of-eggs-in-that-door-I-feel-I-could-run-over-them-and-not-break-one."

This is in the line of universal experience. Weight—so far as it concerns the human body at least—is not determined by the scales, but by sensation.

We beg to introduce Mr. John Stafford, who says, "I felt as if a heavy load had been lifted off me."

"For over twenty years," he adds, "I had suffered from obstinate indigestion and constipation. For more than a week at a time I would never have my bowels moved."

The reader is an intelligent person, doubtless. Consider Mr. Stafford's statement, then, for a moment; let us put the fact in plain English. His intestines were full of festering rottenness; they were like a stagnant morass, breeding disease and death. The poisons engendered by so vile an accumulation are absorbed by the tissues, pass into the blood, and infest every organ and part of the system. If not relieved, the victim will die—poisoned by the products of his own machinery. It is as horrible as the Black Hole of Calcutta, and common as weeds in a neglected garden.

We are, therefore, prepared to hear him say, "I always had a bad taste in the mouth, my tongue and teeth being covered with a sticky, slimy matter. I was constantly belching up foul gas or fluid that tasted sour as vinegar. After eating I had great pain and tightness in the chest, back, and between the shoulders, with a choking feeling in the throat. As time went on I grew weaker and weaker, through loss of appetite and lack of nourishment, until I could hardly follow my work. I tried all sorts of medicines I could hear tell of, but none of them did me any good.

"In June (1893) I was so run down and feeble I feared I should have to give up altogether. I was under a doctor for several weeks, but his medicines did me no good; I kept getting worse and worse. At last, in July of the same year, my mates at the Marsh Iron Works, where I was employed, told me about Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, and urged me to give it a trial. I got a bottle, and after I had taken it a few days I felt a great improvement. My bowels acted naturally, as they had not previously done for twenty years, my food agreed with me, and I felt as if a heavy load had been lifted off me. Continuing to take the Syrup, I gained strength rapidly, and have been in the best of health ever since. You will believe me when I say that I now recommend this remedy to everybody who suffers from the same complaint. You are welcome to publish my statement. Yours truly, (Signed) John Stafford, 15, Spa Terrace, Marsh Lane, Preston, October 11th, 1893."

Indigestion is primarily a disease of the stomach, and constipation is one of its results. On account of the torpidity of the liver (an accompaniment of indigestion), little or no bile is poured into the bowels, and the fluids of the intestines being dried up by the feverish action there, the partly digested stuff from the lower stomach becomes hard and solid in the lower bowel and clogs it. Then it putrefies, producing all the evils from which our friend suffered. Seigel's Syrup cured him by setting things right at the source of the trouble. We congratulate Mr. Stafford on his escape; it was narrow enough for the strongest and boldest.

The scales will tell him he weighs more than he has in twenty years; his feelings tell him that he could stand on an egg and not break it.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 315.] FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 12, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

YOUNG. FRESH. INVIGORATING.

The Queen says:—"DULCEMONA TEA is excellent, most delicate in flavour and refreshing to a degree."

The Lady says of DULCEMONA:—"A new and most delicious blend of Tea, with a soft and delicate flavour."

1/6, 1/10, 2/-, 2/4 per lb. In Lead Packets, and 3lbs. and 5lbs. Tins Only.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE—FIRST-CLASS GROCERS.

WHOLESALE ONLY:

11 & 11a, UPPER THAMES STREET, LONDON, E.C.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S, LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

THE SOAP FOR HARD WATER

THE SOAP FOR SOFT WATER

LATHERS FREELY in the HARDEST WATER

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

A HOUSEHOLD REQUISITE

LARGEST SALE of 1lb TABLETS in the WORLD.

THE SOAP FOR HOT WATER

THE SOAP FOR COLD WATER

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY.

BRONCHONIA

A MARVELLOUS REMEDY for all COUGHS whether arising from CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, or THROAT IRRITATIONS Its marvellous effects are testified to by eminent physicians.

2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle of all Chemists; post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.

J. HOWARD, 21, QUEENHITHE, LONDON, E.C.

One trial will prove its efficacy.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 236, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free.

Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,

8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL PILLS FOR FEMALES

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker, E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM. Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.

For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 223), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

Exema

and all Skin Eruptions are cured by a Healing Cream widely known as

"Antexema."

"Antexema" is sold by all Chemists and Stores and may be had post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d. and 4s. 9d., of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.

Little Book Free. NAME THIS PAPER.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

IMPORTANT ☞ TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

DO YOU WANT TO WIN A PRIZE?

Just to advertise our Special Tea we will give prizes value £3, £2, and 20 at 5s., for the first opened solutions of the following names of three great countries, viz., . NG . . . D, dots represent missing letters, . M . . . . A, AUS . . . . A.

Send P.O. for 2s. 6d. along with your solutions and you will receive by parcel post 1 lb of the finest Ceylon Tea in the world This is an honest way of advertising our Tea, which is the finest grown, and worth 3s. 6d. per lb. This is no swindle, as those who don't win get value for money.—Address: COLOMBO TEA Co., 15, Abbey Terrace, Gateshead-on-Tyne.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES
TO Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
TO OBSTINATE CASES, TO NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD TO RELIEF,
TO GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.
TO No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—
TO "By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.
TO A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.
TO Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.
TO Write privately to—
TO Mrs. P. S. S.,
O 145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.
LADIES

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY, 12, Gaskarth Road, Balham Hill, London, SW., Beware of injurious imitations.

FAMILY ARMS.

Search for Arms, Crest and Motto, 7/6,
Crest and Motto only, 3/6.

Coloured Sketch supplied free.

Send name and county with P.O. to

The "HERALDIC" Office, Ludlow

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS

For Tradesmen's Windows, Fascias, Signs, or Tablets.

The durability, elegance, and striking brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the Most Effective Medium of all kinds of indoor and outdoor advertisements. Enamelled Iron Plates. Swinging Signs in great variety.

Call and see our stock, or send for price lists. Near the Farringdon Road Station.

Inventors and Manufacturers. Agents wanted.

Only Address—61, FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn. London. Pianos Exchanged.

TO ADVERTISERS

Wishing to reach families, a Test Advertisement in SHORT STORIES will bring profitable results. Scale of charges as follows:—

Front Page, £12 10s. per insertion
Back or Inside, £10 per insertion
Per Inch, 5s. per insertion ...
} Less 5 per cent. for 13 times.
,, 10 per cent. for 26 times.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 315.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JANUARY 12, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

OKADA,

the fickle one.

A story of the Chino-Japanese war.

IN the evening, when the bright sunlight had faded into gloaming, I, Okada Shikoku, went abroad out of my father's dwelling place under the shade of the blossoming cherry trees on the Ten San road, which leads from Fukuokal to Nagasaki, and sauntered toward the villa of my chosen one, the fair Liu, whose voice was the voice of the cooing dove, whose form swayed as she moved like the tall sycamore that waves in the breeze from the south.

Only once had I seen her, as she stood in the garden of her parent's villa, with its hills and rocks, its pond and moss-covered stones and bowering trees. But I loved. I loved with the fierce burning love of youth, and thus, after the toil of the day was at an end, and the cool evening winds fanned my hot brow, I went out along the road to watch for a glimpse of her form again before I laid my neck on its pillow.

As I approached the hedge fence, all glowing in the sunlight with its pink clustered blossoms, I heard a voice sighing on the wind, as of one who yearns for a love that it knows not, and I recognised it as the voice of my loved one, my Liu. I craned my neck and looked over the hedge into the landscape garden on the other side, and there I saw her sitting by a spraying fountain, while the cool waters flowed over her pearly feet.

A crimson flush tinged my face as I drank in the charms of her person. My heart rapped against my breast, and my knees trembled lest she should observe my rudeness and hate me for it. But she did not look up from the rippling waters; she sang the sighing song till the gathering gloom roused her from her reverie, and she prepared to go into the house.

As I took the road again, still more deeply in love than ever, I was accosted by a young man who, by his similarity to my Liu, I rightly guessed to be her brother, whose name was Yaita.

"Health to you, Okada Shikoku; I greet you!" he said smiling pleasantly. "I know you by repute as a great wrestler. I am about to give up my pastime of two-handed sword fencing, and wish to become an adept at wrestling. You will give me lessons, will you not? My father has given his consent."

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

Such an unexpected stroke of good fortune staggered me, who only a minute before was reviling the lot that had given me no opportunity of improving my acquaintance with the lovely Liu. I bowed slightly in reply to his compliments, and answered as calmly as I was able:

"Okada Shikoku will have the greatest pleasure in instructing the young man in the noble art of wrestling."

"It is dark now," he answered, moving off; "if you will visit me at my father's villa to-morrow, we will arrange matters to our mutual convenience."

We parted, each going his way. I was in a delirium of delight, not knowing where I went, nor caring, for was it not manifest the gods had ordained that Liu should love me in return? Was it not manifest that this desire to secure me as a tutor in wrestling was created in the young man's mind that I might have an opportunity of confessing my devotion to his lovely sister?

The next morning I made my way to the villa of Yaita's father, the wealthy farmer, who was well pleased with my appearance and manners, and agreed to take me into his household and feed and clothe me in return for educating his son in the art of wrestling. Wherein I was overjoyed, and expressed my gratitude for his generosity, although I should never have accepted so lowly an occupation had it not been for the love I bore my Liu, the divine one.

The opportunities I enjoyed for talking with Liu were manifold, and her chaperon, who was as ugly as the falcon and as cunning as the snake, found ways of leaving us together for some time when I gave her little presents, and flattered her. It was not long before I learned from Liu's own lips that the love I bore her was reciprocated; but, alas! our social positions debarred us from wedlock, for to such a union her father would never consent, even were he ever so pleased with me in my capacity as wrestler; for was I not a peasant's son, and she the daughter of a rich and powerful landowner?

I was in despair; yet I did not show it. I knew that it would cause her pain if she believed I was wretched and miserable.

Yaita, the young man, developed into a skilful athlete under my tuition, and was well pleased with me, for we were like brothers, though he was many years my junior, being but seventeen. We were in the habit of going out to many of the contests that were given by the townspeople, and in them all my young pupil overthrew his assailants and was pronounced the winner, except when I took part.

One warm day, there was a great cry in the road that stretches in front of my master's villa, and a runner carrying despatches came up shouting that we were at war with China, and that every man capable of bearing arms should journey at once to Nagasaki, where they would be enrolled in the Imperial forces for transport to Corea.

I myself did not like the idea, for it signified parting with my loved one; nor did my young pupil, Yaita, either, enjoy the news, for he, too, was in love with a damsel of high degree. But we were Japanese, and the country called us to arms.

I made hurried preparations for my departure, receiving from my master sufficient coin to keep me in comfort when I reached Nagasaki until I took up arms and joined one of the army corps that were to be convoyed to Seoul for the purpose of marching on Ping Yang.

In a secluded nook by the fountain where I had first let my raptured gaze fall on her, did I bid farewell to my lovely Liu. She lay in my arms, breathing soft words of everlasting and undying affection, until the ruddy glow of the setting sun fell from the rich cherry blossoms that hung in fragrance about our heads, and left the world in darkness.

At sunrise next morning, I joined a party of townsmen going southwards, having agreed to meet my young pupil at that time and place. But he did not arrive, and we started without him, hearing from one of the servants that he would follow in a few hours and catch us up, but that he was at that moment bidding adieu to his lady love.

There were many parties on the same mission as ourselves, whose destination was the barracks, at Nagasaki, and at each halt by the wayside I eagerly scanned the faces of those who followed, hoping to see my young friend, only to meet with disappointment, until we found ourselves within sight of the city, when he came after us, pale and worn-out with forced marching, but resolute, and ready to fight for the gods and the Emperor.

He handed me a short note on which Liu had charged me with the care of her brother.

"Be kind to him and love him as you would me," said the little missive, and the very words breathed of her devotion to me, so that I hugged it to my breast and cried aloud that I would love and cherish her till I came back covered with glory and honour, unless the Chinese warriors found a resting place for their swords in my bosom. Whereat Yaita grew pale; for he, too, loved.

The love I bore her was reciprocated.

At the barracks, teeming with soldiers and recruits from the countryside, we received our uniforms and equipments, and carried them back to the place where we were stopping, and donned them. Yaita looked grand in his dress, and I was proud to be his comrade.

After a week of hard drilling, of marching and countermarching with hundreds of others in the barrack yard, we embarked on one of the transports in the harbour and turned our backs upon our native land and our faces towards Corea, where our noble brothers had gone before and secured a footing.

The voyage was uneventful. We drilled on board nearly all day long, and fired our rifles at the gulls and at targets lashed to the bowsprit, and talked boldly of the fighting we would each do, filling ourselves with a mad desire to drive our bayonets into the breasts of the Black Flags.

As for Yaita, he seemed to have no stomach for fighting, and I found him at night, when the rest of the men slept below, resting with his elbows on the bulwarks, watching the horizon with dreamy tear-dimmed eyes, and I knew that his heart, like mine, was bursting with grief, and that the agony of parted love was gnawing like a worm at his heart strings. I found solace in reading and re-reading my missive. Yaita had no such love-token, or, if he had, he never showed it to me.

Digitized by Google

But when I was near him, and spoke kindly to him, taking his soft hand in mine, his eyes kindled afresh, and he agreed with me, that to mourn for a love from whom he would be parted for only a few months, was folly.

Yaita was at my side in a moment.

I will not relate in detail how we landed and were marched to the front, nor the hardships of those long forced marches. I come now, however, to speak of the crisis in this my story. And even before I have put my brush to paper, I feel my cheeks burning with a shame of which I am too fearfully cognisant, and my hand trembles so that I am tempted to throw down my writing tool and let what I shall say remain unwritten.

While we were yet many miles from the Chinese fortifications at Ping Yang, the company in which both I and Yaita served was ordered out to skirmish forward and dislodge an outpost of the enemy. It was the first glimpse we had had of the Black Flags, and, as we broke off from the main body and advanced cautiously, rifles at the ready, a strange feeling of anxiety for my comrade filled my soul, for I remembered sweet Liu's epistle, and felt myself responsible for the life of her brother.

As we crept forward under cover of the low bushes, disturbing the little birds that flew crying upwards, thereby disclosing our presence, we saw that the enemy were slowly retreating, and feared that we were getting drawn into an ambush. Our young lieutenant was looking anxiously about him, and the men did not gain much encouragement from the expression on his face.

Suddenly, a badly-fired volley burst upon us from the right, and three men dropped in the dust. We returned the fire, aiming low, and a hot fusillade was kept up—we slowly advancing, and driving the enemy before us.

A hundred yards away, almost in front of me, I caught sight of a Chinaman, whose rifle was levelled straight at me. In a second I dropped on my knee, and fired; but he was quicker, and I rolled over with a bullet in my shoulder, crying aloud with pain. Yaita was by my side in a moment. He tore open my tunic, and examined the wound. It was not mortal, but severe.

A sickening sensation crept over me, and, as I closed my eyes, I saw, or fancied I saw, Yaita deliberately thrust his bayonet into his arm, and fall by my side.

They took us back, five of us, to Seoul, and we lay in the hospital there—Yaita by my side, his arm bandaged up. Around us, on mattings, lay a score of men from other regiments than our own, whose flesh was torn by Chinese bullets and Chinese steel. Two of our surgeons bandaged us up in turn, while four women tended to the wants that were whispered now and again.

One of them came to me. Her large soft eyes were filled with compassion as she gazed upon my pain-racked face, and in them I saw a tinge of admiration at so fine a fellow; for, having been a wrestler against whom few could stand, I was of fine physique, such as women admire. A thrill of delight passed through my body as she bent down and put her face so near to mine to ask if I was in need of food or drink.

I could have raised my arms and placed them round her neck and kissed her. I forgot the girl Liu who lived in the villa on the broad Ten San road that leads from Fukuokal to Nagasaki, and, even had I thought of her, the great beauty and intoxicating presence of the woman who was kneeling by my side would have killed the thought before it had time to mature.

"Great warrior," she spoke, in a rich, low tone, "thou has suffered much, but thou wilt suffer more."

There was a strange expression in her almond eyes, as she smiled and rose and visited the other men, whom I hated with all my strength, for did I not look upon them as rivals in my love?

And then, as I turned my head, I saw Yaita watching me with a sad face, and I remembered that he was the brother of the girl Liu whom I had thought I loved, and, knowing that he could read my feelings, I was sorry for him, for I liked him much. But we did not speak, and I closed my eyes and the pain of my wound was annulled by the exquisite emotions that pervaded my soul.

I was vain and pleased enough to believe that the lovely woman who nursed us gave me more of her time than she accorded to the others, and the sweetest of her smiles; and, in the evening, when the balmy breezes floated down from the hills and fanned my love-burning cheeks, she would sit awhile with me and talk of her home in Mukimaki, which she had left heart-whole and self-denying to nurse the wounded for her beloved Japan.

Then I told her much concerning my reputation as a wrestler, and gave her to believe that I was great in the land, and that I had a good name, and her large eyes sparkled and her lips trembled with the love that I saw was being conceived within her soul.

"I am Liu."

Of Liu I gave little thought. Had she been of noble mind she would have come across the sea and taken her place in the hospitals. Of her brother I thought much, for I knew that he loved nis sister devotedly, and that he would protest against my actions when they became more pronounced. But I had already determined my plans, and was waiting for him to speak.

Digitized by Google

Poor boy! He too, was in love, and the sight of my blissful happiness stirred up thoughts within him that the gods had mercifully caused to lie dormant for long.

One day the fair woman, whose name I learnt was Miyo, came and sat by my side and talked of many things in a low, sweet voice, every note of which sent the blood tingling through my veins. We spoke of many things, and then my love burst forth, and in the dim twilight, unseen by the shadowing forms that lay stretched about us, I seized her hand and covered it with kisses.

I felt her tremble, but she did not withdraw her hand. I drew her head down on my breast, and whispered of my love.

Then there came a low cry close at hand, and, turning, I saw Yaita, who had knelt up on the floor, fall forward and strike his head against the wall. Miyo rose quickly and administered restoratives, while I alone knew the reason of his weakness, for he had seen us, and his misery was great, for he yearned in his heart after the lady-love who lived for him alone in fair Japan.

Presently Miyo turned to me:

"Dear one, he wishes to speak to thee!" she said.

My wound had almost healed, and I was able to move with ease. I crawled over to my poor friend.

His face was very white, whiter even than when he had first come there, and I had never seen it so sunken, for the self-inflicted wound, though petty, seemed to have been sapping his young life.

"Okada," he whispered. "Forgive me! I am Liu. I die that you may be happy."

Then the poor emaciated form fell back and grew cold.

With the knowledge of this life of self-denial, of the pure unwavering love of my Liu, came the bitter hatred of the woman who had trodden and defiled the sacred ground between us. How many weary hours of terrible heart-burning had my darling suffered! She had watched my faithlessness with unmurmuring eyes, and I covered my face in shame and wept aloud.

My wound is healed now. I go to the front. I have not spoken another word to Miyo. I hate her. I am fickle in my love, but I shall not be so for long. Chinese lead or steel shall find me out, and by its agency I shall go to the gods who ordain all things, to meet my love, my Liu.

A BOX ON THE EAR

I.

HIS head protected by a broad-brimmed straw hat, his feet clothed in elegant shoes of natural leather, Lieutenant Blanc-Minot sat upon the Kursaal terrace of a fashionable Spa, gazing dreamily at his glass of absinthe, into which he was dropping every now and then water from an iced carafon.

"Do you see that wretch?" whispered Jacques, at the same time giving me a dig with his elbow. "That fellow robbed me of at least a million. Through him my marriage with the only daughter of a millionaire was knocked on the head."

While Blanc-Minot, with a smile of satisfaction raised the glass of absinthe to his mouth, smacking his lips when the liquor was over, as if to show how little remorse he felt for my friend's baffled expectation, the melancholy Jacques drew me into a corner and continued:

"Where did I first see Fraulein Elodie Van der Veysse, Dutch on her father's side, a Parisian through her mother and her own inclinations? I don't know. I fancy it must have been at Countess Monchat's ball, where I danced a waltz with her.

"There is no question, at all events, that the young lady, who was of romantic inclinations, fell head over ears in love with me without the slightest effort on my part to fan the flame. She was very beautiful, and, in her wealth of golden hair, looked as if she had stepped from the frame of a picture by Rubens. She belonged to a family so immensely rich as to stifle in the bud any hope of her hand.

"Her father was at that time in Amsterdam, engaged in 'rounding off' his affairs, as if thirty-five millions had not been 'round' enough. However, I was by no means sorry that I could not be presented to him, for, from all accounts, he was an excessively vain person, horribly sensitive, and with very nasty habits.

"I learned further that he was very quarrelsome, and subject to attacks of violent temper—altogether one of those people with whom I could not easily have pulled. I kept repeating all those little items to myself, by way of comfort, under the conviction that I could not become his son-in-law.

"But Fraulein Elodie had so faithfully preserved her recollection of me that one day my mother said to me, with a beaming countenance:

"'I have just received a letter from Countess Monchat, dear Jacques. As I gather from it, the young lady with whom you waltzed at the Countess' ball has declared to her parents that she will give her hand at the altar to no other man than yourself. Her parents are furious about it, but that is neither here nor there. She is the only daughter of this millionaire. What a future for you, my dear Jacques! I expect more information from the Countess on the matter.'

"And my mother embraced me tenderly as if I had just returned home after many years' absence. All this happened at Carcassonne, where I was spending my holiday, in my mother's house."

II.

"Without requiring a more substantial guarantee of the certainty of this distinguished marriage, I resolved, to some extent, for safety's sake, to bury my bachelor existence. Funeral solemnities of this description, as you know, are usually of a very lively character, but I wished that mine should be extravagantly gay. Blanc-Minot, who was at that time with his regiment in garrison at Carcassonne, confirmed my resolution, and our days and nights were spent in devising entertainments that plunged the whole town into wild uproar.

"After we had exhausted all the joy of existence we began to play. I frankly confess that I played to win, for I was very hard up, and was anxious in this way to defray the expenses of future entertainments. But I lost—lost from the very first.

"That infernal rascal Blanc-Minot had incredible luck, and cleared me out with marvellous celerity. One evening I had already lost to Blanc-Minot my ready cash, my gold watch, and even the magnificent braces which my dear mother had embroidered with her own hands, yet I betrayed an indomitable desire to continue playing. Certainly at that moment I was mad—I had lost my head—the demon of play had got possession of me.

Digitized by Google

"'Look here,' I cried, to Blanc-Minot, 'let's play for a box on the ear.'

"Blanc-Minot recoiled in dismay, and looked at me inquiringly.

"'The loser,' I continued, 'will bestow a box on the ear upon the first person he fancies, provided he does not know him; if the smitten stranger be not satisfied, so much the worse.

"'In that case, and should the gentleman resent the blow, then the one who gave it has lost a second time. But if the stranger pockets the insult, his insulter has won.'

"'Done, I accept,' exclaimed Blanc-Minot.

"It is quite needless to say that I lost. There was no course open for me now except to find a stranger whom I might buffet without risk of encountering reprisals. A delightful undertaking, wasn't it? But I might add, by way of justification, that we were both rather jolly. While I was considering how I might best secure my object, a bright idea suddenly dawned upon me.

"'When does the Paris express pass?' I asked of Blanc-Minot in an excited tone.

"'In a quarter of an hour.'

"'Quick, then, let us make for the station as fast as our legs will carry us.'

"Blanc-Minot followed me without the remotest suspicion of my intention."

III.

"The heavy train rolled groaning into the station. There was a stoppage of five minutes at Carcassonne. Since I was on intimate terms with the station-master, we were allowed to walk the platform unchallenged. A stout gentleman with a red, bloated, unpleasant face, after concluding a violent altercation with a porter, had got into a compartment, and was now leaning the upper portion of his body over the window, panting for breath. I did not lose sight of him.

"The bell rang, the engine whistled, and, to the clanking of chains and grating of wheels, the train slowly got into motion. Favoured by the uncertain light I slipped unnoticed on to the carriage step, hit the stout gentleman a sharp blow upon his bloated visage, and leaped back again upon the platform. He burst into a howl of rage, doubled his fist, and yelled after me, while the train bore him swiftly onwards:

"'I will know you again, you scoundrel.'

"'You have won,' said Blanc-Minot, in a tone of indifference. 'Without doubt he will pocket your blow.'

"We left the station unobserved by anyone.

"When I got home it had just struck eight. My mother was already in the breakfast-room. I was not much inclined to encounter her, as I had spent all the previous day and night out of the house, without having so much as mentioned where I might be found. In spite of this, my mother received me in the friendliest way possible, and uttered not a word of reproach.

"'Good news for you, my child,' was her greeting.

"'Ah! a letter from the Countess?'

"'Far better, my son. M. Van der Veysse, Elodie's father, has waited upon me personally, and asked your hand for her. This seems to be the custom in Holland. He arrived last night, and resumed his journey to Paris this morning. To excuse your absence, I told him you had gone to one of our farms. Indeed, I was very glad you were not present, for I am quite sure your thoughtlessness would have brought you into mischief, if it did not spoil the whole thing.'

"And my mother embraced me passionately as if she had not seen me for seven years.

"In the bottom of my heart I was as happy as she. For, as I have already told you, Fraulein Elodie was very beautiful, and possessed attractions which, conjoined with a million of dot, were absolutely inestimable."

IV.

'My mother had invited Cousin Enselm, at that time a commissioner of police, to dine with us next day, in order to inform him of my impending happiness. But no sooner had she mentioned the name of M. Van der Veysse than my cousin interrupted her:

"'Van der Veysse? Van der Veysse? Did the gentleman leave yesterday morning by the 7.5 express?'

"'Exactly!' exclaimed my mother, while a vague unrest took possession of me.

"'He has just lodged a complaint with us. It appears that just when his train was moving off some blackguard hit him a a box on the ear. But he swears he will return and recognise his villainous assailant at the first glance.'

"My complexion during my cousin's statement assumed the colour of apple-green

"Without bestowing any particular attention upon my piteous aspect, my cousin continued:

"'We will soon discover the scoundrel. Such insolence and rudeness is perfectly unheard of. To strike a respectable man—at a moment, too, when he was helpless to defend himself. Jacques, your step-father is the party here aggrieved, and you owe it to yourself, to him, to all of us, to assist in searching for this rogue, and to run your sword through him.'

"'Ah! mon Dieu,' exclaimed my mother, 'that will not prevent justice taking its course, and it will and shall offer you an opportunity of giving to your bride a proof of your affection in a chivalrous and thoroughly French fashion.'

"My face was now the colour of scarlet. I reeled from my chair, and hurriedly left the room, not so hurriedly, however, but that I caught my mother's remark:

"'Poor boy, he is quite beside himself with rage!'

. . . . . .

"Two days later I left Carcassonne. I explained to my mother that, after mature reflection, I had become convinced that my happiness was only to be found in celibacy.

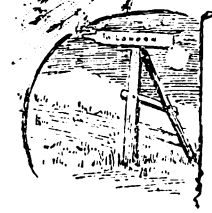
"As I afterwards learned, the affair of the luckless Van der Veysse had taken a very lamentable course for a cause so just. My cousin had met his impetuous complaints and accusations with the fact that they could not punish his aggressor so long as they did not know him.

"Finally the authorities, through my cousin, pronounced the following interlocutor: 'There can be no doubt that the box on the ear was meant for someone else. We advise you in future not to meddle with other people's business, and also to molest us no further. This is evidently a case of mistaken identity, and so basta!'"

Jacques had concluded his harrowing tale, and the disturber of his happiness, Blanc-Minot, carried the glass of absinthe to his lips with a kindly smile. The sun broke upon the crystal, which sparkled like a gem.

Digitized by Google

A TRAMP IN THREE STAGES



STAGE THE FIRST.

RT tired, Lisette?"

"Just a little bit. Couldn't we take a rest now? Then you will see how well I shall walk."

"Presently, Lisette. But give me Gaston for a little. You have carried him long enough. He will tire you out."

"Long enough," laughed Lisette. "Listen to him—this dear, stupid husband of mine! It is not five minutes since I took him, the precious little bundle that he is."

"Now, I knew you were jealous. Don't, you see that my hands are free. The pack on my back! Pouf. That is nothing; give me Gaston."

"Very well, tyrant," said the little wife, sighing wearily as she handed her sleeping infant to him. Her arms ached, even in that short time, with him. Would she never be any stronger?

"Now, courage, my dear Lisette. Do you see that building on the roadside yonder?"

"The white house in the meadow with the poplars? Yes, Pierre."

"Well, that is where we shall stop. I know the place. The people who live there are good people; they will be kind to us. Many a rosy-cheeked apple I got from old Madame Sulpice when I used to go with father in the cart. Poor father! what would he have said if he had known I was to lose the little farm where his forefathers lived so long?"

"But it wasn't your fault, Pierre," said little Lisette eagerly. "You could not help it. And so many misfortunes falling all at once on your poor head, my husband; first my illness, and then the cow dying, and that wicked Notaire seizing the furniture for the rent. I am sure if M. le Comte had been at home he would not have dared, Pierre. If only we could have written to him. Oh, Pierre, how I detest that little M. Duval!"

"And how he loved you, Lisette! How could you prefer a poor simpleton like Pierre to M. le Notaire, with his eye-glass and his riding-horse, and his nice little income? Wasn't that how he put it, chérie?"

"Don't speak of him, Pierre, and you know why I preferred you, you old tease."

"No, indeed; I profess I can't understand it. Say, Lisette, how was it?"

"Because I loved you, Pierre. I knew your heart was brave, although everything was so difficult. And I was not afraid to trust myself to you. I think a true heart like yours, Pierre, worth all the millions in the Bank of France. I say to myself, here is something you will never lose—something which will never fail you, whatever happens. And I think that is a splendid prize for a poor weak girl like me. Promise me once more, Pierre, there's a good boy, that you will always be true to me and to Gaston here, whatever happens."

"Whatever happens!" repeated Pierre reverently, as if he were in the little church at Dinan at early mass, with the morning light streaming in through the halo over the Christ-child and the soft notes of the organ stealing through it.

To Pierre, the one was as much of a sacrament as the other.

Then they plodded on in silence together for a little while longer, till they came to the cosy farmhouse. There they were welcomed with kindly hospitality by Pierre's old friends, and there was much talking and joking and questioning in the great farm kitchen over their plans. Pierre, with his little all, was going to try afresh his fortune in Paris—that far-off land of bliss to the poor provincial.

"So the world has not been using you well, Monsieur Pierrot," said Madame Sulpice, bustling about her guests and dividing her attentions between Lisette and the baby.

Pierre's face was lost in a jug of cider, but Lisette spoke for him:

"Oh, so badly, madame, you cannot guess. First I was ill, then the plague came, and we had no money and they were cruel—at least one man was, and he took everything away from us."

"And all because the foolish child gave him up for a stupid old Pierre, who is the best and dearest of husbands, though he is wicked sometimes."

"And so you are going to Paris to make your fortunes?"

"Yes, if I can make a home for Lisette and Gaston, it is all I ask of the great city. We are not ambitious, are we, Lisette?"

"The poor children," said madame, furtively wiping away a tear as she watched them shortly afterwards trudging along the white dusty road towards Paris, "they little know what awaits them there. God help them."

But Pierre and Lisette had, as yet, no dismal forebodings.

"Shall we see Paris soon, Pierre?" asked Lisette, as dusk was falling, and the tall poplars grew shadowy and mysterious overhead.

"Wait," said Pierre. They went a little further. Their footsteps fell softly in the white March dust. The breeze swayed the poplars gently to and fro, the leaves whispered softly. Suddenly, at a bend of the road, Pierre stopped and caught hold of his wife.

"Lisette, dost see that yellow glow over there!"

"Yes, Pierre. Is that Paris?" in a tone of awe.

"It is Paris, ma chérie. We shall soon be there now. Come."

And Lisette looked at the distant city, lighting up with a lurid glare the dark shades of the evening, with a feeling of dread.

STAGE THE SECOND.

"Art tired, Gaston?"

"No, mon père."

"And your coat keeps you nice and dry, doesn't it?"

"Yes, father. But you—you will be soaked before we get to the theatre. Why didn't you buy a coat, too, father?"

"The little droll! As if your father needed a coat to keep him dry with a splendid big umbrella. Hark, how the raindrops patter on it. Isn't it pleasant to think that none are coming through, except one on the point of my nose now and then."

"But the rain is beating in our faces, and you can't keep that off you. Father, did you get me a coat and yourself an umbrella because you weren't able to get a coat for yourself too?"

"Hold your tongue, you little chatterbox. Can't father mind his own business, eh? Do you know your part to-night, little one?"

"Oh, yes," said the boy, forgetting in a moment his father's condition in the excitement of the prospect of his début that evening in the little theatre at Porte Maillot, where they were engaged. They were trudging along the Champs Elysées, too poor to afford even a cheap drive in the 'bus, in the teeth of a cold driving wind and rain.

Poor little Lisette was lying in the cemetery at Montmartre with a wreath of immortelles on her grave. Pierre and Gaston were alone now. The father fought for his child against poverty and misfortune with unabated vigour. Gaston's pretty face and slim figure had taken the fancy of the public who frequented the theatre of Porte Maillot, and he was always chosen to fill any small parts where no speaking was required. To-night, however, he had a few lines to say, and he was very proud of the fact. His father was still morose.

Digitized by Google

"If Lisette could only see," he thought sadly. A small knot of people had gathered at the theatre door when Gaston and his father got there. They were greeted with a smile here and a nod there.

Pierre's heart swelled with triumph as they made their way through to the wicket.

How proud Lisette would have been if she had lived to see that day!

"Just see how they love you," he said, kissing the little upturned face, all aglow with excitement and the battle with wind and rain. "You will be a great actor one of these days, and there will be no one handsomer or more beloved in the Allee des Acacias; and at night all Paris will go to hear you, and there will be a great stillness in the theatre when you are on the stage, and we shall hold our breaths till you are finished, and then—won't there be a triumph—an ovation!"

"But, papa, you are coming on, aren't you?"

"No, my boy, not to-night. Unless you want me very much," he added anxiously.

The boy's face clouded a little with disappointment, then cleared. He flung his arms round his father's neck, and clung to him for a minute.

"You are afraid you will cry, papa. And you are all shaking and shivering, as if with cold. And it is all because you love me so. No; you will wait for me here by the fire! And as soon as I have done I shall come back to you, and tell you what they did. Warm yourself well, father. Good-bye."

"Adieu, my little angel!" murmured his father.

Then, into the silence of the little dressing-room, there came the noise of applause, loud and prolonged. Gaston was on.

Oh, if Lisette had only been there!

Then Pierre thought of his dead wife, of all she had gone through so bravely with him from first to last; how, when his heart sickened, hoping against hope from day to day, and still the heart of the gay city seemed as hard as its very stones, she always kept up and made it easier for him in every way she could. Although she must have known, too, that she would not have long to stay with them. Dear little Lisette!

Then he thought of his old home in Dinan, and the farm-yard with its cocks and hens, and his mother clanking across the court with her wooden sabots, and the lowing from the stables. And through it all the never-ceasing murmur of the great ocean outside.

And as he thought he fell asleep, weary with excitement and overpowered by the heat of the fire. When he awoke it was with a sense of suffocation. The room was quite dark and full of smoke. Gasping for breath, he listened and heard what made his heart stand still for a moment—shouts of men, screams of women and children, all fighting with the fury of beasts to get out of the burning building—fighting, alas! with one another. Not a moment was to be lost. Gaston must be saved, whoever perished, and at any cost. Making his way out of the room as best he could, he dashed down the stairs half choked by the volumes of smoke and flame which met him, but holding on his way with firm determination. At the foot he passed a fireman.

"Stop! You can't get past there. Hold! The madman; where has he gone?"

Pierre heeded him not, but made his way through the burning debris, escaping by a miracle almost unhurt to the green room, which he found deserted. The actors had had sufficient warning, it appeared, to enable them to quit the place in time. But had Gaston gone with them? The distracted father ran hither and thither, calling on him, hoping he was in safety, and yet dreading that he was still in the building. Would he not have come to him? At last he caught sight of him, standing above him on the landing of the room which he had left.

Pierre did not hesitate. He did not hear the child's agonised cry, "Father, father!" The roar of the flames was too loud for that. He did not even see the little hands stretched out to him in mute appeal. He only was conscious that Gaston was there, and that Gaston must be saved.

"Lisette, help me," he muttered; then with clenched teeth he dashed up the blazing staircase.

The fireman, who was still at his post, looked after him in amazement.

"Sac-r-r-é!" he said, "that man must be mad!"

His chief appeared and took in at a glance what was happening.

"Keep plying the platform where the boy is standing, you booby," he shouted. "He may save him yet."

It was difficult to make them out for the smoke, but the fireman did as he was bid and turned his hose on the spot where Gaston was standing. Fiercely the flames hissed as the stream of water rose over them. Clouds of steam were now mingled with the smoke. But the crashing of falling beams, and the crackling of the blazing timber continued unabated.

There was a moment of suspense—a terrific crash, a shower of sparks, and Gaston, wrapped in his father's clothes from head to foot, rolled at their feet. Pierre, half-dressed, lay a little way off. They were both immediately carried out and restoratives applied. Gaston was insensible, but soon recovered, and was otherwise unhurt. But his father was too terribly burned ever to recover.

STAGE THE THIRD.

And so our tramp has reached the third and last stage of his weary journey. "Art tired, Lisette?" he whispers softly to Gaston, whom he cannot see. And when Gaston can only answer with his sobs, he whispers again—"Courage, dear one, we have only a little way to go now—just a little."

. . . . . .

And, indeed, it was not far.

What are you in need of?

A REALLY GOOD NOVEL, PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Then Purchase No. 4 of

PEARSON'S LIBRARY.

entitled—

"The Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler."

NOW ON SALE. PRICE SIXPENCE.

A JOURNAL OF HIGH-CLASS LITERATURE OF GENERAL INTEREST.

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

Will suit you.

ONE PENNY. EVERY SATURDAY.

A FIRST-RATE LADIES' PAPER FOR THE HOME.

Buy

HOME NOTES.

ONE PENNY. EVERY THURSDAY.

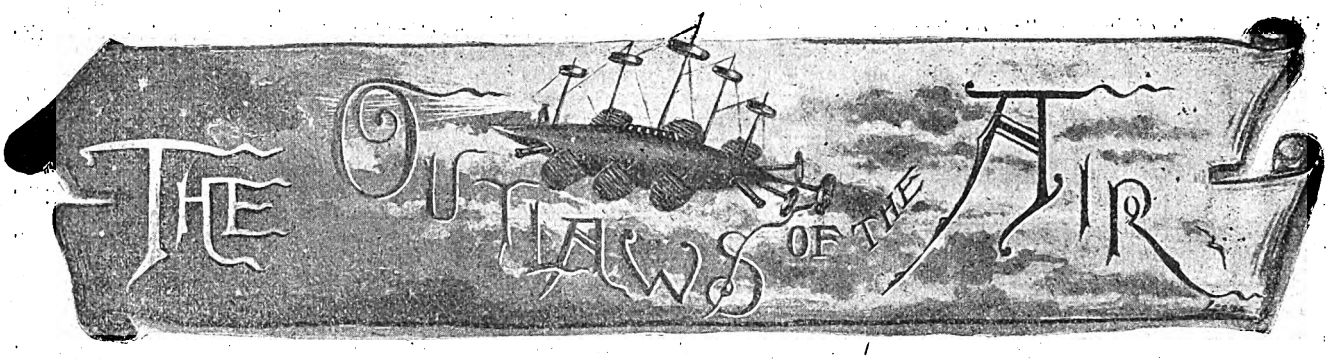
AN ARTISTIC PORTFOLIO OF CHARMING PHOTOGRAPHS

SIXPENCE expended on

PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO OF FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES

Will meet your requirements.

Digitized by Google



By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

MAX RENAULT—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.
FRANZ HARTOG—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.
SIR HARRY MILTON—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia in his yacht, the Calypso, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.
HERBERT WYNDHAM—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.
FREDERICK AUSTEN—the inventor of the air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.
FRANK MARKHAM—the young captain of the Utopian yacht, Mermaid.
VIOLET MILTON—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is fearfully injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.
LEA CASSILIS (alias Mme. DAIL)—a member of Autonomie Group No. 7, with whom Renault is in love.
DORA MERTON—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.
LUCY SUMMERS—another fair Utopian.

Renault, after levying blackmail with Hartog on the high seas, returns to Utopia with the object of destroying the colony, but finds it deserted. After a time he goes to Europe in the air-ship Vengeur, and, together with Lea Cassilis, visits the Criterion Theatre in London, where he is recognised by Sir Harry and Lieutenant Wyndham, who effect his capture. He is tried, and condemned to death, but is rescued while on the way to the scaffold by his confederates in the air-ship. London is then bombarded by the Vengeur.

CHAPTER XXXV.

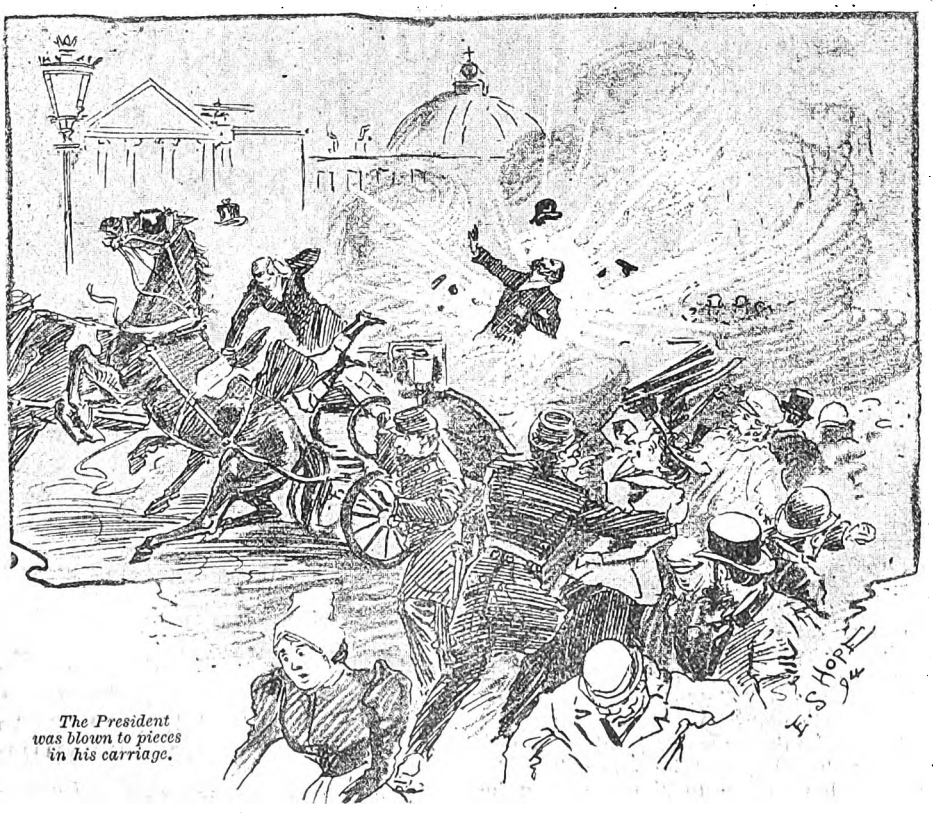
A Reign of Terror.

THE excitement produced by the terrible events of Death Tuesday, as the fatal day of the Anarchists' revenge had been promptly and permanently named, was completely indescribable. Not only England but the Continent—indeed, it might almost be said the whole civilised world—was convulsed by it.

Nothing like this had ever happened in the history of the world before. The ocean terrorism maintained by the Destroyer on the Atlantic was as nothing to it. From under the very shadow of the scaffold, in the centre of the most populous city in the world, a notorious criminal had been snatched from the grasp of Justice by means so unheard of and marvellous, that only the awful reality of what had followed made it impossible to doubt the fact that it had occurred.

This man, arraigned at the bar of English justice to answer for the most terrible of crimes, had calmly admitted them, and then, snapping his fingers at the majesty of the law, he had threatened to take a tremendous vengeance even for the indignity of having sentence of death passed upon him—and he had kept his monstrous threat to the letter.

There could be no doubt about that. The blackened and smoking ruins of the most important buildings in London, of the very seat of Government itself, the darkened and wreck-strewn streets, the thousands of human bodies, torn and mangled almost beyond recognition, and the mutilated remains of men, women, and children who had perished in the burning houses or been crushed to death by the panic-stricken throngs in the streets—all these were evidence, too fearfully unmistakeable, of the fact that the enemy of Society had, for the time being at least, armed himself with a power superior to anything that the forces of law and order could bring against him.



The President was blown to pieces in his carriage.

In what had been to him merely the pastime of a spring day, this one man with half-a-dozen followers had done what it would have taken the leagued armies and fleets of the Continent weeks of the most appalling strife and bloodshed to do. He had bombarded London, and the amount of damage he had done had been limited only by his inclination or the failure of his ammunition. What had happened to London might happen to Paris the next day, to Berlin the next, to St. Petersburg the next, and so on. It was only a question of time and ammunition. From the monarch in his palace to the peasant in his cottage, no one was safe, and no one had the remotest idea where the next blow would fall.

Digitized by Google

To say that a reign of terror, a condition of almost universal panic, had been established at one stroke by the Anarchists, would be simply to state the bare facts of the case. Men were afraid to meet anywhere in large numbers lest, as in London, destruction swift and inevitable should be hurled upon them from the sky.

The Parliaments of the world met in scanty numbers, and in fear and trembling. They passed their resolutions hurriedly, and separated as soon as possible, for politics had suddenly become invested with an actual personal danger, and, as politicians and heroes are seldom made of the same stuff, legislators mostly preferred the safer obscurity of their own homes to the perilous prominence of their official positions.

Suppose the British Houses of Parliament had been sitting when the Vengeur made her attack on the Palace of Westminster, how many members of either House would have escaped death or mutilation? What was there to prevent a similar assault being made at any moment on any other of the Parliament houses of the world, from the Chamber of Deputies in Paris to the House of Representatives in Washington? There was nothing, and so it came to pass that the Parliamentary Governments of the world were half paralysed by the terrorism of Anarchy in its most frightful form.

But, although this was primarily due to the assault of the air-ship on London, it was not wholly caused by it. While Renault had been at work in the air, Lea had been no less active on land. Through her agency all the Anarchist groups in the world had been prepared beforehand for the startling events of Death Tuesday, and they had unanimously resolved to celebrate the rescue of the man they now looked up to as their leader and chief, in spite of their rigidly individualistic principles, in a fashion worthy of themselves and their horrible creed.

The result had been that there was hardly a great centre of population in the civilised world that had not been the scene of some explosion, assassination, or other outrage, and, worse than all, as the events of the immediate future showed, President Casimir-Périer, the one man whose wisdom and strength of character had prevented the French Republic from throwing in its lot with Russia, was blown to pieces in his carriage on the evening of Death Tuesday by an infernal machine, which had been placed under the seat by one of his own servants, an Anarchist, who had literally bribed his way into the position with money furnished by Lea.

Within a week, the war party in France was in the ascendant, and before another week had passed, France had joined hands with Russia, and declared war on Britain, as the harbourer of Anarchists, and the enemy of the peace of Europe. By this time, too, the Baltic was clear of ice, and the Russian northern fleet was only waiting for the co-operation of the French channel squadron to force the British blockade of the Sound, and carry the war to the shores of Britain.

Such was the general position of affairs on the 12th of May, when a meeting of the directors of the Aerial Navigation Syndicate took place at the offices of the Maxim-Nordenfeldt Company in Victoria Street, Westminster. Mr. Maxim himself was in the chair, and the others present were Mr. Austen, Sir Harry, Edward Adams, Lieutenant Wyndham, Captain Maxwell, and Lieutenant Pelham, both of whom had put the greater part of their private fortunes into the Syndicate. Captain Maxwell had been cashiered, as has already been said, by the Admiralty for losing the Devon; but as soon as the really terrible powers of the Vengeur had become known, and it was seen that the cruiser had been practically helpless under her assault, the Admiralty, being badly in want of such officers as he was, had offered to set aside the verdict of the court-martial and reinstate him; but, after careful consideration and consultation with his friend Wyndham, through whom he had made the acquaintance of Sir Harry and the rest, he had declined the offer, so as to be able to have a free hand in the work that was before him.

Aerial Navigation.

Pelham had resigned his commission just before the outbreak of the war, in order to take command of the Britannia, and was only waiting for the completion of the Aries to hoist the flag of the Syndicate on board her and take her to sea as a privateer, while Wyndham had received permission from the Admiralty to retain command of the Nautilus on condition that he acted in concert with the Channel Squadron. The proceedings had opened with a terse comprehensive view of the position of the Syndicate by the Chairman, and, in concluding this, he said:—

"Now, gentlemen, from what I have said and you already know, I think you will agree with me that it won't be very long now before the old order of things is completely done away with and all the fighting of the future, if there is to be any, will have to be done either by semi-submarine craft of the type of the Nautilus and the Aries, or else by means of air-ships.

"That scoundrel Renault has proved that against a properly managed air-ship, carrying guns and a fair amount of ammunition, there is practically no defence. Now, he and ourselves are the only people in the world who possess these ships. We don't know how many he's got by this time, because he hasn't given any sign of his existence since his attack on London. But, however many or few he has, we know how he'll use them.

"We have two, the Volante and the War-Hawk, ready to take the air to-morrow. I fancy they're swifter and more powerful as fighting machines than his, and I don't know that any of us will have any reason to wish any alteration in the original plan, that they should be devoted to hunting this scoundrel down, and, if possible, destroying him. It is also agreed, I think, that the Volante shall be commanded by Mr. Adams, and the War-Hawk by Mr. Austen, and that each of these gentlemen will choose their own officers and crew."

A general nod of assent went round the table as Mr. Maxim paused for a moment, and then he went on:

"With regard to the rest of the fleet, I am happy to say we have so far repaired the damage caused by those rascals with their bombs that we shall have twenty more ships ready for work in a fortnight from now, and this will bring us face to face with a question, if possible more important than Anarchist hunting, and that is our attitude with regard to the war.

Digitized by Google

"As you no doubt know, we have received some very tempting offers for the use of our ships not only from the British Government, but from France and Russia as well. But I think you'll agree with me that the services in warfare of such an engine of destruction as our air-ships will undoubtedly be, are not to be measured by a few thousand pounds a month that a government would pay for the hire of them."

"Most assuredly!" said Mr. Austen, as the chairman paused as if awaiting a reply. "I think, at any rate, speaking for myself and my immediate friends, that the very worst policy would be to place the air-ships at the disposal of any government. To do so would be to give them the means of tyrannising over other Powers and subjecting them to an almost irresistible temptation to embark upon a career of indiscriminate conquest, which might end in enslaving the liberties of the world.

"For my own part, I don't believe that any government, whether despotic or democratic, is sufficiently civilised to be intrusted with such a power as that. The world is not ready or aerial navigation yet, and I have never ceased to regret, since Renault stole the air-ship from Utopia, that I did not keep my son's secret and let it die with me."

"You'd have been something more than mortal if you had done that, Mr. Austen," said Mr. Maxim drily. "Besides, you know, if your air-ships hadn't been built my aeroplanes would have been nearly as dangerous to the peace of the world; and as it was then just a matter of business with me, I should have sold them or hired them out to anyone who'd have paid for them, and left them to fight it out amongst themselves, just as they do with the Maxim gun."

"But as a matter of business," chimed in Sir Harry, "and humanity as well, I certainly think that our original plan will be by far the best so far as the war is concerned. What do you think, Mr. Adams?"

"Oh, undoubtedly," replied Adams. "Once we have driven the Anarchists from the air and given that blackguard, Renault, his deserts, I hope we shall carry it out as quickly as possible; but I am certainly of opinion that we ought to use every effort to hunt Renault and his accomplices down first. We really have nothing to do with the quarrel with France and Russia, and it is of very little moment to us which is in the right or the wrong.

"Of course, these gentlemen," he continued with a glance and a smile towards the naval officers, "will do their duty by their country as far as the Aries and the Nautilus are concerned. They are perfectly free to do as they please, but our business is rather with Society at large than with two or three nations; and, therefore, my voice will certainly be for hunting the Anarchists down first with every ship that we can get afloat, and then carrying out the original plan on the basis of which this Syndicate was formed."

"And that is my view, too," said Sir Harry, as Adams ceased speaking. "On both public and private grounds I think we are bound to put a stop to the terrorism which this Renault, unfortunately, has it in his power to exercise. I think that if England, France, and Russia are foolish enough to go to war about matters which they could settle in a few hours with a little common sense and fair-play, we may as well leave them to fight it out for the present.

"But even if the whole of Europe were at war, it would be of less importance than exterminating Renault and his accomplices, because it stands to reason that if we give them time to build a large fleet of air-ships, they will simply take advantage of the war to increase its horrors a hundredfold and spread their terrorism round the whole world, and, in that case, civilisation will simply come to an end, and the Anarchists will soon gain command of the world—and a very nice prospect that would be."

"Very well, then," said the chairman. "We will consider that as settled, and so this will be the last meeting of the Syndicate for the present. We have done our talking and our thinking, and now we shall go to work. You gentlemen will go on active service, and I shall remain here to superintend building operations and business in general. I hope our next meeting will be to arrange terms of peace, and put international matters on a little more satisfactory basis than they are now. I think that is everything, isn't it?"

"No," said Mr. Austen, taking a sealed envelope from his breast pocket. "There is one thing more. Mr. Adams and I start to-morrow upon what may be a very perilous undertaking. All warfare is uncertain, and this warfare will probably be the most uncertain of all; and, therefore, Mr. Maxim, we have decided to leave with you the formula for the preparation of the motor-fuel, so that you may have it prepared in proper quantities, and, of course, with due regard for secrecy, for the supply of the fleet.

"All we shall ask in return will be your word of honour that you will learn the formula by heart, and at once destroy this paper, that you will never disclose it to anyone, and that you will supply none of the fuel on any conditions to anyone outside the Syndicate."

"You have my word on all those points, I can assure you," replied the chairman, as he took the priceless envelope. "If ever I let it out you are at liberty to blow me to smithereens with one of my own guns."

After this, a few more minor details of business were arranged, and the meeting broke up. That evening the members of the Aerial Navigation Syndicate dined together at the Hotel Victoria, in company with several old friends from Utopia, and not the least hearty of their toasts was that in which they drank success to the cruise of the Volante and the War-Hawk.

Drank success to the cruise of the "Volante" and the "War-Hawk."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE "WAR-HAWK'S" FIRST FLIGHT.

THE most elaborate precautions had been taken by the Syndicate to prevent the Anarchists and their spies from doing anything to hinder the building of the Volante and the War-Hawk, the first two vessels of their fleet that were to take the air, and also to keep secret the manner and place of their building.

As has already been said, the various parts of the ships and their engines and armament had been made by different firms and these, when completed, were despatched by rail to two different points. The Syndicate had acquired, privately of course, and in names unknown to the world, Lundy Island, off the coast of Devon, and one of the Farne Islands, off the coast of Northumberland, for the purpose of putting the vessels together and equipping them under circumstances which made it possible to keep all strangers and possible traitors away from the spot.

Digitized by Google

Thus everything that was necessary for the building and equipment of the Volante had been conveyed by rail to Bristol, and there shipped on board the Irene and taken to Lundy Island, while the materials of the War-Hawk had been sent by rail to North Shields and conveyed thence by another steamer to the Farne Island. No one was allowed on either of the steamers save those who had been members of the colony of Utopia, and were personally known to the directors; while on the islands the strictest possible watch was kept in order to make sure that no strangers or suspicious persons landed upon them.

All the building operations had been carried out on both vessels simultaneously, and the day after the last meeting of the Syndicate, Edward Adams and Mr. Austen, with their chosen lieutenants, went, the one west and the other north, to see everything in order, and, as it were, put their respective ships into commission. Adams took with him Tom Harris and Ralf Smith—late of the Mermaid—as lieutenant and engineer, and Dr. Edwards as surgeon. His crew he would find waiting for him on board the Irene, or else on the island.

The War-Hawk, with whose fortunes the reader will be more particularly concerned, was in a certain sense Sir Harry Milton's own ship, although, at his particular request, Mr. Austen had consented to take command of her. He had spent nearly a hundred thousand pounds out of his own pocket on her and had spared no expense to make her the most perfect and the most powerful aerial cruiser in existence, and therefore the most certain instrument of his vengeance on the man who had wronged him so wantonly and so deeply.

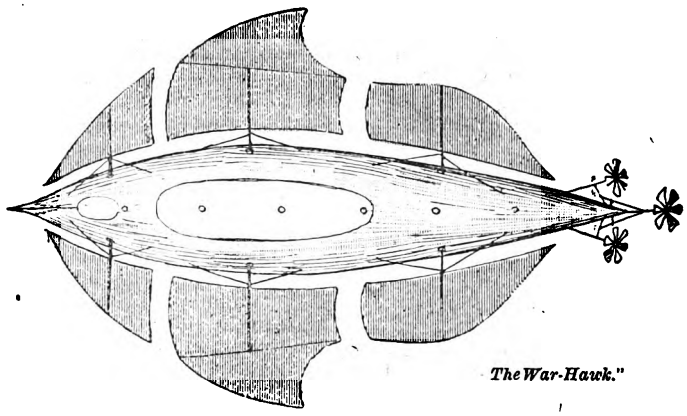
From point to point the elongated cylinder which formed the War-Hawk's hull measured two hundred and twenty feet with an amidships diameter of thirty-five feet. Her triple engines were capable of exerting nine thousand horse-power, six thousand of which could be concentrated on her six lifting fans, which, under these conditions, were capable of lifting a dead weight of four tons in addition to the hull and engines.

The engines and gearing were so constructed that while either three or six thousand horse-power could be applied to the lifting fans, leaving three thousand for the driving propellors, the whole nine thousand could be concentrated on the latter, and then the aeroplanes, driven forward at a speed of more than three miles a minute, would more than support the whole weight of the vessel and her cargo.

For armament she carried two pneumatic shell-guns forward and two aft, which had been specially designed for the vessels of the Syndicate by Mr. Maxim and Mr. Austen, and which would throw a shell carrying twenty pounds weight of high explosives to a distance of seven miles when fired from an elevation of two thousand feet. On each broadside were four machine-guns of the Maxim type, effective at a range of three miles, and with a firing capacity of seven hundred and fifty shots a minute. She was also fitted with six vertical bomb-tubes, each furnished with a releasing apparatus which automatically despatched the projectile the moment that the tube was exactly vertical to the object aimed at.

Sir Harry had had two objects in view in making the War-Hawk, as he hoped he had made her, the most formidable engine of destruction in existence. First and foremost, of course, was his settled purpose of hunting Max Renault from the world, and taking due vengeance on him for the crimes that he had committed, but hardly second to this came the fact that he had determined to confide the safety of all that was dearest to him on earth to the speed and strength of the splendid craft upon which he had lavished money without stint.

Violet, who had of course been brought away from France as soon as it was known that there was any danger of war being declared, was now quite convalescent, although the great nerve specialist under whose care she had been in Paris, had been unable to hold out any hope that, without the intervention of a miracle, she would ever be able to walk again. As Dr. Roberts had feared, the injury to her spine had proved to be the most serious of all.



The War-Hawk."

Her vigorous constitution had triumphed over all her other injuries, severe as they had been. Her general health, and even her spirits were fast coming back to her, but her lower limbs were almost useless, and so she was a prisoner to the invalid chair in which it was only too probable she was condemned to pass the remainder of her waking life.

As soon as she had learnt that her brother was building the War-Hawk and intended to take the air himself in pursuit of Renault, she had begged and pleaded so hard to be taken with him, that at last, acting on Dr. Roberts's advice, he had yielded.

"Don't you see my dear fellow," the late surgeon of the Calypso had said to him when he expressed his surprise at his advice, "that, after all, this air-ship of yours will probably be the safest place that she can be in? You'll always be on the look out for the enemy. You will know where he is, or at any rate where he is not, and if you meet him you'll only attack him under favourable circumstances; but if you leave your sister on land you will never know when some of these blackguardly Anarchist spies might find her out and kill her just out of pure spite, or when Renault himself might find out where she was, and blow up the building she was living in out of revenge for his former failure.

"Added to that, in these nervous complaints the all-important thing is to guard against mental worry. If you leave her at home and go careering through the air yourself she will be in a constant state of anxiety about you—sleepless nights and all that sort of thing—and instead of getting stronger and better she'll simply get weaker and worse out of sheer anxiety for you. Take my advice and take her with you, and take me, too, to look after her. You know I can make myself useful in other ways than as a sawbones."

After this there was nothing for it but to let Violet have her way and make one of the company of the War-Hawk. But this decision speedily opened another question, which was settled in a way that gave Sir Harry not a little secret satisfaction.

It was quite impossible that, in her helpless condition, Violet could go on board the War-Hawk without one of her own sex as attendant and companion, and for this office Dora Merton volunteered in such decisive terms that she speedily overcame what little opposition she met with. Thus it came to pass that when the air-ship lay on the island on the evening of the 14th of May, ready to take her first flight into the air, her company consisted of Mr. Austen and Sir Harry as joint commanders, Frank Markham as chief engineer, and a crew of eight Utopians who had been specially trained to the work, Dr. Roberts as ship's surgeon and general utility man, as he described himself, Violet Milton and Dora Merton—whom Violet had ever increasingly strong reasons for regarding as a sister in fact as well as in fancy as every day of their intercourse went by.

Digitized by Google

The central portion of the War-Hawk's hull had been flattened so as to form a promenade deck about seventy-five feet long by twenty broad, and on this Sir Harry, Mr. Austen, the doctor, and Dora were standing round Violet's chair, waiting for the sinking disc of the sun to disappear over the hills of Northumbria and so give the signal for the voyage to begin.

It was an exciting moment for all of them, for it was virtually the beginning of a new existence. Henceforward, they were to be no longer citizens of the earth only. They were about to conquer a new realm and become citizens of the air as well. Mr. Austen, Markham, and about half of the crew had made ascents from Utopia in the stolen Vengeur, but to all the others the experience was absolutely novel.

"Just imagine!" said Dora, pointing up to a few white fleecy clouds that dotted the darkening blue of the sky. "In a few minutes we shall be sailing up yonder among those clouds with all the land and sea spread out below us like some great huge map. Isn't it almost too wonderful to believe?"

"Hardly among the clouds, Miss Dora," said the doctor, shaking his head. "As scientific adviser to the expedition it is my duty to tell you that those clouds are between six and seven miles from the earth, and that they are floating in an atmosphere that you would find it decidedly unpleasant, if not impossible, to breathe, even if it were possible for the War-Hawk to fly up there."

"Oh," said Dora with a pretty little pout. "That's disappointment number one. For weeks past I have been living in the hope of seeing what was on the other side of the clouds, and now you tell me we can't get there. You scientific people have a most unpleasant way of taking the romance out of everything."

"Oh, it isn't quite so bad as that," chimed in Mr. Austen. "You'll see the other side of plenty of clouds before you've been very long on board the War-Hawk. For instance, you see that dark bank away to the westward. I don't suppose that's much more than two thousand feet from the earth, if that, and if you wrap yourself up very warmly later on, we'll take a leap over it for your special benefit before we go south to join Adams at Lundy. But now we must be getting afloat, so keep all your eyes open and you'll see what you've never seen in your lives before."

So saying, he went to the rail which surrounded the deck, and, leaning over, said to those who were standing about the ship on the land:

"Is everything clear?"

"Yes," came the reply; "all clear."

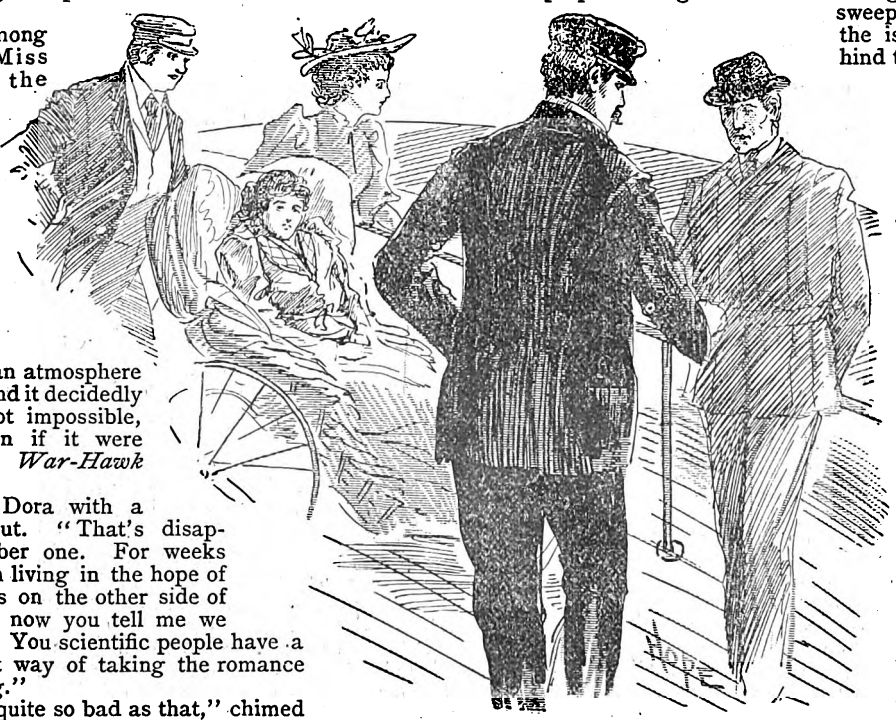
"Very well, then," said Mr. Austen, going to the top of the companion-way which led down to the engine-room. "Are you ready with the lifting fans, Markham? You can go ahead when you like. I'm going to take the wheel in the conning-tower now."

"All ready," came the reply, in Markham's voice, from the engine-room; and then came the click of a lever, the blades of the lifting fans sprang out horizontally from the masts, and began to spin round with ever-increasing speed, and a sound that gradually rose from a soft whirr to a shrill whistle.

"It doesn't look as though those wheels just turning round in the air like that could lift this great ship and everything on board from the earth, does it?" said Violet, leaning back in her chair and looking up at the revolving fans.

"The air is a solid, if you only hit it hard enough," said the doctor, quoting from an American authority on aeronautics. "Wait till those fans hit it hard enough, and we shall rise like a fish in the water, or more properly, perhaps, a bird on the wing."

The whistle of the fans, revolving with ever-increasing rapidity as Markham brought more and more of the engine-power to bear upon them, now rose almost to a scream. A hurricane of wind seemed to beat down upon the steep, sloping awning over the deck for a moment, and then they felt the deck lift and sway beneath their feet. They looked over the side, and saw that the land was sinking away from beneath them, then a bell sounded in the engine-room, and the propellers began to revolve. A gentle breeze seemed to sweep along the deck, and the island slipped away behind them.



Waiting the signal for the aerial voyage to begin.

"Look, we are off at last!" cried Dora, clapping her hands in sheer delight. "There's the sea below us now and the islands—look at them, they are like so many little dots on the water already. What a speed we must be going at, and fancy we are flying, actually flying! Isn't it glorious—no more obstacles for us now, either on sea or land, no hills to climb, no rough seas to go pitching over or plunging under. We can fly over everything."

"There's no doubt about that," said Sir Harry, "and I suppose this is actually the first time on record that an angel has flown without wings."

"Bravo, Harry!" laughed Violet, looking up at Dora's now rosy face. "That's very nice."

While this conversation had been going on, the War-Hawk had swung round and was running at about forty miles an hour to the south-westward. Before Violet could make any retort to Dora's last piece of banter, Sir Harry, who had been sweeping the clear seaward horizon with his field-glasses, leant forward suddenly as though something had caught his attention. He looked hard through the glasses for a moment and then, taking them from his eyes, said:

"Violet, you must go below at once. Come along, I'll carry you. Miss Dora, will you get one of the boys to bring the chair down."

And before they had time to ask any questions, he had picked his sister up in his arms and was carrying her below to her cabin, followed by Dora. He laid her upon her couch, kissed her, and ran upon deck again without a word. Then, calling the crew up and telling them to prepare the ship for action, he went into the conning-tower and said to Mr. Austen:

"There are three air-ships coming up yonder from the southward. We have only just left the island in the nick of time."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE SCHOOL TEACHER'S STORY.

I HAVE kept a school for forty-four years. Now I have delivered up the keys, I have packed away on the top shelf of my cupboard a row of primers, geographies, spelling-books, and arithmetics, and I have stopped work for the rest of my life.

Through all these forty-four years I have squeezed resolutely all the sweets out of existence, and stored them up to make a kind of tasteless but life-sustaining honey for old age. I have never spent one penny, unless on the barest necessaries. I have added, term by term, to the sum in my bank-book until I have been able to build this house, and have a sufficient sum at interest to live upon. I need little—very little—to eat, and I wear my clothes carefully and long.

I was never extravagant in clothes except once. That was twenty-five years ago, when I was thirty-five, and expected to be married in the spring. I had a green silk dress then—a bright green; but I had it dyed black, and, after all, got considerable wear out of it, although it was flimsy. Coloured silk is apt to be. I had a blue woollen gown, too—a colour I should never have bought if I had not expected to be married—and that faded. I also had a black velvet cloak—something that was very costly—and I should not have bought it under any circumstances, but I was foolish. However, that has made my winter bonnets ever since; it was a good piece, and not cut up much.

Looking backward forty-four years, I cannot remember any other extravagance than this outlay of clothes when I expected to be married at thirty-five. I never have bought any sweets except a few cough drops when I had a cold. I have never bought a ribbon even, or a brooch.

My mother died when I was fourteen, my father when I was sixteen. Then I began to teach. My father left me nothing. Mother was an invalid nearly all her life, and he could not lay by a farthing. However, there was enough to pay his funeral expenses, and I was thankful for that. I sometimes wonder what my father would say if he could see me now, and know how I am situated. I wonder if he would think I had done pretty well.

I don't know how it can make any difference to him now. He is past all such earthly vanities, even if he knows about them; but I do sometimes feel glad I have done so well, on his account. Everybody has to have some interest besides their own, even if it is somebody's who's dead.

I have built this house, with six rooms in it, and a woodshed. I have a little land too. I keep hens, and I am going to have a vegetable garden behind the house, and a flower garden in front. I have good carpets all over the house, except the kitchen. I have stuffed parlour furniture, and a marble-topped table, and a marble shelf with worked plush on it. I shouldn't be ashamed to ask anybody to go over my house. And I keep it nice too; you could not find a speck of dust anywhere. Of course, I have nobody to put it out of order, and that makes a difference.

It has always been my habit to look at all the advantages there are in life, and I have found there is a pleasant side to almost everything. I can keep my house a great deal nicer than I could if I were not all alone in the world. I sometimes wonder what I should do, if I had a man coming in with muddy boots, or children kicking the paint off my new doors.

To tell the truth I have never cared much about children, though I have been teaching them forty-four years. I never dared to say so before, but it is true.

Once in a while I saw a child that I thought a great deal of; but, taking them altogether, I have often wondered how their own mothers could stand them. I would have worked my fingers to the bone for the few I did take a fancy to. I fairly grudged them to their folks, but the others!—and I had to hide it too; it would never have done for the children to think I was partial. They had all the meanness of grown-up people, without knowing enough to hide it. Grabbing each other's apples and taking each other's sweets, and the big ones plaguing the little ones; throwing paper balls, and drawing on the walls, and everything else. I know, for one, that there's something in the doctrine of original sin. I expect most women who have kept a school forty-four years do.

I have never been sure, either, that they learned anything so as to remember it, and do them any good. I have always been afraid that, however hard I tried to do my duty by them, it was never quite done, and that I was teaching myself more than anybody else, just as I always seemed to hit my hands harder than a scholar's when I had to spank one.

I could travel all over the world, on the map, and never lose my way, but I wonder if my scholars could. I can spell through the spelling book without missing a word, but I know that not one of my scholars can do it. I can do every sum in the arithmetic, measure the depths of all the wells, calculate the speed of all the dogs and foxes, and say the multiplication tables by heart, but I am quite sure that no boy or girl ever left my school who could. It seems to me sometimes that I have gone to school to my scholars, instead of my scholars going to school to me, and that I have never been of any benefit to any one of them.

Still, I have sometimes thought that I was, once, and in a strange way, to the strangest scholar I ever had. Before thinking even of this scholar, and this story, I have to review my face, and my whole character in my mental vision, as before a glass, to establish, as it were, my own reliability to myself. Is it likely that anybody, who looks like that, should tell herself that she saw what she did not see, or heard what she did not hear? Is it likely that anybody who is like that should?

It was just twenty-five years ago to-day that I went to Marshbrook to teach in what was commonly called the Dame School. It was in the middle of spring. I had given up my old school, because I expected to be married that May. But when I found out he'd changed his mind towards me, I felt as if I ought to go to work again. I'd laid out a good deal of money on my clothes, and I knew I'd have to make it up some way, as long as I was always going to have nobody but myself to depend on as I always had.

Marie Rogers had taken my old school. She came when I gave it up, and it wasn't more than three weeks before he began to pay attention to her. She was good-looking, always smiling, although it seemed to me it was a silly smile. I was always sober and stiff-looking, and I couldn't smile naturally even if I felt like it. Her hair curled too. I tried to curl mine, but it wouldn't look like hers. I wouldn't believe it at first when people came and told me he was going with her, and they thought I ought to know; but after a while I saw enough myself to satisfy me.

I wrote him a letter and told him I'd found out he had changed his mind, and he had my best wishes for his welfare and prosperity, and then I began to look out for another school. He didn't marry Marie Rogers until after the Easter term was over. She wanted the money for her wedding clothes. I don't know that I should have gone to work again until the autumn, if the teacher at the Dame School at Marshbrook had not left suddenly. One of the managers came for me the next day and asked me to take her place. I asked him why the other teacher had left, and he said she wasn't very well. He was an old man and a doctor. I looked him straight in the face when he spoke, and I knew there was something behind all he said, and he knew I did.

Digitized by Google

"I'll give you five shillings a week more than we usually offer, as you come to oblige," said he.

"Very well," answered I. I knew what it all meant. I had heard about the Dame School at Marshbrook ever since I could remember. They could never keep a teacher there through the Easter term. There was no trouble autumn and winter, but the teacher would leave in the spring term. They always tried to hush it up, and nobody ever knew exactly what they left for. I rather fancy they bound the teachers over not to tell, or perhaps paid them a little extra. At all events, nobody ever knew exactly what it was, but it got whispered round there was something wrong about the Dame School at Marshbrook.

Only a stranger or somebody aged and pretty courageous could be found to go there and teach in the spring. The chances were that old Doctor Emmons couldn't get another soul besides me for love or money, and if I wouldn't go, the school would have to be shut up. But I cared nothing for the stories. I never was one of the kind that listen and screech, and I had enough real things to think about and worry over. Then I had a kind of feeling then—I suppose it was wicked—that it didn't matter much what happened—after what had happened.

So I just packed up my trunk, while Doctor Emmons waited, and then he put it in behind in his dogcart, and carried me over to Marshbrook. It was about six miles away.

Marshbrook was named after the brook there that runs through marshy land, and gets soaked up in it some seasons of the year. That spring it was quite high, and the land all round it was all golden with cowslips. The doctor didn't say a word about the school, until he set me down at the house where I was going to board. Then he said I looked as if I had no nonsense about me, and he had an idea I should get along well and like the school. Then he said, almost as if he hated to, that I might just as well make up my mind not to stay much after school at night time, and not to keep the scholars. The school was in rather a lonesome place, and then, too, it was rather damp there, near the brook, after the dew fell, and he did not think it was very healthy.

I said, "Very well." I began school next morning, and managed well enough. The school was quite a large one, with about forty in it, and none of them very old. They behaved well, however, and I taught them as well as I knew how.

I did not stay late for the first two weeks, not because I was afraid of anything, for I wasn't, but there was no occasion to. I didn't mind what Doctor Emmons had said at all, as far as I was concerned, but I thought it would be wiser not to keep the children.

I went to church the next Sunday after my move to Marshbrook. I suppose some folks thought I would get somebody to drive me home, as it was only six miles, but I felt as if I would rather see some new faces.

I had a pleasant home, just Mr. Simonds and his wife, and she was as neat as wax and a good cook. She was reserved, and did not talk much, and, as I didn't feel much like talking, I liked her. She used to have supper early, about as soon as I got home from school, and then I used to go upstairs to my room, and sit by myself. Mrs. Simonds was not of a sociable disposition, but after I came folks looked in more. I could hear them talking downstairs; I expect they wanted to find out how I was getting along at the Dame School.

Once Mrs. Simonds said if she was in my place she would not stay after school. I said I hadn't any occasion to stay, and I hadn't. I didn't really have any occasion the night I did stay, but I felt rather downcast, and I didn't want any supper, and I just sat there on the platform behind my desk after the children marched out of the room.

I don't know how long I sat there—quite a long time, I suppose, for it began to grow dusk. The frogs croaked as if they were in the room, and a damp wind blew through the window.

Suddenly, as I sat there, I had a queer feeling, as if there was somebody in the room, and I looked up. I saw down in the middle of the room a little white arm raised in the dusk. It was the way the children did when they wanted to ask anything, and I thought for a second that one had stayed or come back, unbeknown to me, and was raising an arm. Of course that was queer, but it was the only reason I could think of, and it flashed through my head.

"What is it?" said I, and then I heard a little girl's voice pipe up, "Please, teacher, find my doll for me, and hear my next lesson in the primer."

"What?" said I, for it seemed to me I could not have heard rightly. And then the voice said it over again, and that little white arm crooked out of the gloom.

I got up and went down the aisles between the desks, and when I came close enough I saw a little girl, in a queer, straight, white dress, like a night dress, sitting there. Her little face was so white in the gloom that it made me creep, and her features were set, even her mouth did not move when she spoke. It was open a little, and the words just seemed to flow out between her lips.

"Please, teacher, find my doll for me, and hear me say my next lesson in the primer," she said again.

I put my hand on her shoulder, and then I jumped back and snatched it away, for I never felt anything so cold as her little shoulder was. It seemed as if the cold struck to my heart from it, and I had to catch my breath.

"What is your name?"

"Mary Williams, aged six years, three months, and five days," says she.

Then my blood ran cold, but I tried to reason with myself again. She was some child whom I hadn't seen who had run in there, and maybe was not quite right in her mind.

"Well," says I, "you had better run home now. If you want to come to school, you can come at nine o'clock tomorrow morning, if your mother is willing. Then I will hear your lesson, and maybe you will find your doll, but you mustn't bring it to school; I can't have any dolls brought to school."

With that she rose up, dropped a queer little curtsey, that made a puff of icy-cold wind in my face, and was out of the room very fast, as if she slid or floated, without taking any steps at all.

I put on my bonnet, and locked up the school and went home then. Looking back I can't say that I felt scared or nervous. I know I did not walk a bit faster when I went past the old churchyard. There was an old graveyard there near the school, and the children used to play there during recreation.

When I reached the house, Mrs. Simonds asked why I had been delayed, and if I didn't want any supper, but she did not appear surprised or curious. She never seemed surprised or curious at anything.

I went upstairs to my room, and sat down and thought it over. It seemed to me there must be some natural explanation forthcoming. As I thought it over, I remembered that there had been a strange faint choking smell about the child, and immediately I put my own skirt up to my face, and I smelled it again. I hung my dress out of window in the air, when I took it off.

The next morning when the scholars filed in to school, I tried to think that strange little girl might be amongst them, but she was not, and she did not come in the afternoon.

That night I stayed after school again. I had made up my mind I would. I waited, and after a while that little white arm showed out of the desk, but I had not seen the child come into the room.

I asked again what she wanted and she said, just as she had before, "Please, teacher, find my doll for me, and hear me say the next lesson in the primer."

I got up and went to her just as I did before, and three she was just the same, and the faint smell came in my face.

"When did you lose your doll?" says I.

Digitized by Google

But she wouldn't answer.

"Please, teacher, find my doll for me, and hear me say my next lesson in the primer," says she, with a kind of a wail. I never heard anything so pitiful as it was. It seemed to me somehow as if all the wants I had ever known myself sounded in that child's voice, and as if she was begging for something I had lost myself.

But I spoke firmly. It was always my way with children. I found it worked best. "Now you run home," says I, "and you come to-morrow, and I'll give you your doll, and hear your lesson in the primer."

And then she rose up and curtsied, just as she had before, and was gone.

I did not try to follow her.

That evening I went round to old Dr. Emmons' and asked Mrs. Emmons if I could see the doctor for a few minutes.

She suspected what had happened, for she looked at me closely, and said she hoped I wasn't getting nervous, and overwrought with school teaching. I said "No." I just wanted to see the doctor about a new scholar; and she left me in the sitting-room and called him in.

I asked him, point blank, if anything had ever happened there at Marshbrook, and he wouldn't tell me at first.

"I suppose you want to give the school up. I thought you were old enough to behave yourself," says he. He was pretty short sometimes, but he meant well.

"I've done the best I could by the school," says I.

"Why couldn't you come home when school was done, as you were told to, instead of staying there in that lonesome place, and getting hysterical?" says he. "I don't know that I can get another teacher this term. The school will have to be shut up. It's a pity all the lady teachers in creation could not be ducked a few times, to get the nonsense out of them. I'll get a man for the place next time. I've had enough of women."

"I don't want to give up the school," says I.

"What are you talking about then?" says he.

"I want to know if anything has ever happened here in Marshbrook," says I. "I don't want to give up the school if anything has happened."

He finally told me how a little girl had been murdered, some fifty or sixty years ago, on her way to school, on the Brook Road. They found her lying dead beside a clump of furze, with a great bruise on the back of her neck, as if she'd been hit by a stone, and her doll and her primer were laying in the road, where she'd dropped them when she ran from whoever killed her. They never found him.

"Was her name Mary Williams?" says I.

"How did you know it?"

"She told me," says I.

The old doctor turned as white as a sheet.

"You haven't got any nonsense about you," says he.

When he found out I wasn't frightened, and didn't want to give up the school, he wanted to know what I'd seen, and asked a good many questions. I told him as short as I could, and then I went home.

The next morning before school, I got some linen rags from Mrs. Simonds, and a piece of bright blue flannelette, and I made a pretty little rag-doll. I'd never made one before, but I couldn't see why my work wasn't as good as anybody's. I ravelled out a little of an old blue stocking I had for its hair, and I coloured its cheeks and mouth with paint, and its eyes with blue ink. I found, too, an old primer, that Mrs. Simonds said her mother had studied, for I thought that might have been like the one the child was carrying to school when she was killed.

That night I stayed after school again, and waited until I saw the little white arm raised out of the desk. She did not wait for me to speak that time. She said in a shrill voice, "Please, teacher, find my doll for me, and hear me say my next lesson in the primer."

"Put your arm down and be quiet," says I, "and I will hear your lesson." I put the rag-doll in my pocket, and took the old primer, I had found, and went to her.

"Find the place and go on with your lesson," says I, and I gave her the book. She turned over the leaves, as if she were quite accustomed to it, and I saw at once that I had the right book. It was a queer little primer, that had been written by an old clergyman in Marshbrook, and used in the school there for some time. She found the place soon, and began to read, speaking up quite loudly. You could have heard her out of doors; the windows were open. The piece was called, "The Character of a Good Child." She read it very well. I only made her spell out a few of the words.

"You know your lesson very well," says I. Then I took the doll out of my pocket, and gave it to her. She snatched at it with her little white gleaming hands and they touched mine, and I felt the cold strike to my heart again.

She hugged the doll tight, and kissed it with her stiff parted lips. Then she held it at an arm's length and looked at it.

"Please, teacher, find my doll for me," says she, with a great wail, and I saw she knew it wasn't her own old doll.

"Hush," says I, "I can't find a doll that's been lost fifty years. This doll is just as good. Now, you'd better take it, and run home."

But she just gave that pitiful cry again, "Please, teacher, find my doll for me."

"You are not behaving nicely at all," says I. "That doll is just as good. Now, you'd better take it, and run home."

But she gave that pitiful cry again, "Please, teacher, find my doll for me."

"You are not behaving nicely at all," says I. "That doll is just as good." Then, I don't know what possessed me to say it, but I said, "She hasn't got any mother, either."

How tightly she hugged the doll, and kissed it again and again, and did not say another word against it!

"Now you'd better run home," says I.

She rose up and curtsied, and I was all ready to spring. I followed her. Ididn't know if I could keep her in sight, but I did, and she went into the graveyard. I saw a gleam of white in there a minute; then it was gone.

That evening I went to Doctor Emmons, and told him what had happened. "Now," says I, "I want to know where that child was buried."

Then I asked him to take a lantern, and go to the graveyard with me, and look in that tomb. I scarcely thought I could make him at first. He said the Williams family had all died out and gone away. There wasn't one of them left. He didn't exactly know who had the key of the tomb, and he kept looking at me closely. I suppose he was afraid I was getting off my balance. He kept looking at me and then he felt my pulse, and counted it by his watch.

"You don't want to give the school up?" inquired he.

"No, I don't," says I.

He went out after a while, and presently he came back with a lighted lantern and a key. I don't know where he got it. Then we went down the road to the graveyard. It was a dark night, and it was raining a little. He went along in front with the lantern, and I followed behind. He did not speak a word the whole way.

When we came to the old graveyard he opened the gate and we went in. His lantern lit up all the old headstones, and trees, and scraggy bushes, as we went across to the Williams tomb. It was not very far from the gate. A lot of little bushes were growing out of the humped-up roof, and I read "Williams" in the stonework over the iron door. The doctor fitted the key in the lock, while I held the lantern. I felt as I used to when I was a child, in the dark, but I held the lantern as steadily as if my hand had been an iron hook.

It was hard to turn the key in the rusty padlock, and the door worked quite a long time, but finally it snapped back, and he pulled off the padlock, and slipped the hasp. But even then he could not open the door until he had cleared away some stones and pulled up some little plants that had grown over the threshold by the roots.

After he had done this, he opened the door, and a puff of the same strange odour which I had noticed about the child, came in my face. He took the lantern and stepped down and into the tomb, and I after him. All of a sudden he stopped short, and caught hold of my arm. There, on the floor of the tomb, in the lantern light, right before us, lay the doll and the primer.

Digitized by Google

A BURGLAR'S STORY.

SUPPOSE Christmas has its bright side for some people, though I don't think much of it myself. All this precious nonsense about Santa Claus depresses me. The fact is, I did the Santa Clause trick only last week, and I didn't like it. Since then it hurts my feelings if anyone mentions Christmas in my presence. Though I am of a sensitive disposition, I have achieved prominence in my calling. I am prepared to affirm with becoming modesty that I was a first-class journeyman burglar when I met with a painful adventure on Christmas Eve of 1894.

I had been taking life easily for some time, merely doing a quiet job of housebreaking now and then to keep my hand in. So it happened that the day before Christmas I found my pockets nearly empty. Though I dislike to devote myself to professional duties on Christmas Eve, there appeared to be no help for it.

On the night of which I have been speaking, I removed a pane of glass from the kitchen window of a mansion in a fashionable square. Then I scrambled through the opening without taking the trouble to send up my card. There in the darkness I adjusted my mask and lighted my lantern. Then I started to make a tour of the premises. I was not long in finding a quantity of things which I desired to possess.

I immediately began gathering them up, preparatory to carting them away. While I was standing on tiptoe in order to reach the top shelf of the china cupboard, something remarkable happened. Somebody behind me spoke. It was a man. He said, "George, here's Santa Claus." I turned about, and reached for my revolver. The next moment the ugly muzzle of a gun was poked in my face.

"Merry Christmas, Santa Claus," said the young man who held the gun at my head, "delighted to see you. May I be so bold as to ask what you are doing in that cupboard?"

"It was an—an accident," I stammered, "you see I—I made a mistake——"

"Well, don't feel annoyed about it," said the man with the gun. "It's all right, Santa Claus; make yourself at home."

"Invite your friend to step this way, Bob," said another young man, who had been leaning negligently on a big poker near by. As he spoke he turned towards a door leading to an adjoining room.

"With pleasure, George. My dear Santa Claus, will you be so good as to come with us?" The muzzle of Bob's gun silently repeated the polite invitation, and I had no hesitation in accepting it. On reaching the next room, the young man with the poker turned to me and said, with a sweeping gesture in the direction of a big Christmas tree which towered at his side, "Behold, Santa Claus, what you were doubtless looking for when we intruded upon you. Let me suggest that any little tokens of affection which you choose to leave for the occupants of this house might very well be tied on the branches of this tree as we very carelessly neglected to hang up our stockings. We shall be happy to render you any little assistance that we can."

"Gents," said I, "if you'll let me explain——"

"Now," exclaimed Bob, "I insist, my dear Santa Claus, that no explanation is necessary. This being Christmas Eve, nothing is more natural than that you should give us a call. I assure you that you are welcome; your appearance is not precisely what I should have expected, but that is a mere trifle. Now, shall we proceed to business?"

"Anything that suits you, gents," I muttered. The two were such cool hands that I was ready to drop with amazement. "George," said the chap with the gun, "be good enough to assist our distinguished friend to arrange his presents on the Christmas tree."

"With pleasure, Bob. Santa Claus, if you will keep your hands above your head in that graceful position a little longer, I will attend to all the minor details of the ceremony." With that he dived into my pocket and fished out my revolver.

"What a pretty toy!" exclaimed George, as he turned it about in his hands. "That will have a charming effect when hung properly." He mounted a step-ladder, and tied my revolver on the topmost bough of the tree. After that he strung up my dark lantern. Then, in turn, he pulled off my mask, robbed me of my jemmy, a bottle of chloroform, a bunch of skeleton keys, and several little instruments peculiar to my line of business. He also pulled my boots out of my pocket, where I had placed them before entering the house for safe keeping until I should be ready to depart. All these articles he gravely tied on the branches of the Christmas tree.

When George had swung my boots across a bough, and had trotted down the step-ladder for the last time, he struck an attitude and said, "I am charmed, my dear Santa Claus, to have the privilege of returning thanks for these beautiful presents. Your taste is excellent. I trust you will give us permission to distribute them as we choose among the other members of our family. Ah, thanks; I see you consent. And now, Santa Claus, I and my emotional friend at your side have a confession to make. For some years past we have been sceptical regarding your existence."

I made no attempt to reply to this rubbish. After a painful pause I said, "Gents, with your permission, I'll be going."

"So soon!" remarked Bob, getting a better grip of his gun. "This is hard," and he pretended to weep.

I started for the door. "The chimney's over yonder, Santa Claus," said Bob, wagging his head in the direction of the fireplace. It took me a full minute to catch his meaning.

"I—I think I'll go by the door," I stammered. I hoped he was only joking.

"What! Don't you always come and go by way of the chimney?"

"Not always."

"Can it be possible that the story books are mistaken on this important point? It is cruel to rob us of our childhood's fancies. I think," and Bob held the muzzle of his gun close to my ear, "I think, Santa Claus, we'll cling to the old custom. Oblige us by gliding up the chimney in your own airy fashion."

I hesitated. Another glance at the muzzle of the gun decided me. I said:

"All right, gents; I'll not make much trouble about a little thing like that."

I drew off my coat. George caught it up, and tossed it into the branches of the Christmas tree. I stuck my head into the chimney. It was a tight fit when it came to my shoulders, and I started to draw back. I instantly felt the muzzle of Bob's gun prodding me. I set my teeth together and squirmed my way into the horrible black tunnel.

It was a full hour before I dragged myself out of the top of the chimney, and stood on the frosty roof in my stockinged feet. I was as black as a cinder, and was nearly tired to death. When I had pulled myself together, after a fashion, I slid down the rain-spout and limped home.

Luckily I met no policeman. If I had, the chances were about even that either I should have frightened him to death or that he would have taken me in charge for an escaped gorilla. This experience weighed upon my mind so heavily that I reformed and gave up burglary.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" ings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Delicate Children become Bonny, Chubby, and Strong.

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children from two to fifteen years of age than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Recent Testimonials.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states: "Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

"Gentlemen,—I consider Infantina's Syrup a most satisfactory medicine for children. Mine are so fond of it that I have to lock the bottle away from them. There certainly is no trouble in getting them to take it. I have given it to three children—three, seven, and twelve years of age—and I can truthfully say it has made new children of them.—Yours sincerely, Caroline Cross."

"Gentlemen,—I can speak most highly of Infantina's Syrup for delicate children. My daughter, I fear, inherited a delicate chest from her grandfather, who died of Consumption. Your Syrup has quite stopped her cough, and she has really commenced to get fat. No other medicine seemed to do her any lasting good. She finds it so pleasant to take that she looks forward to each dose.—Faithfully yours, Mary Knight."

"Dear Sirs,—"I have found Infantina's Syrup a wonderfully strengthening medicine for children. I had no idea that a tonic would do so much for a delicate child. My little child has picked up marvellously since taking it.—Sincerely yours, Eveline Hodge."

"Gentlemen,—Infantina's Syrup has been a blessing to me. I was quite alarmed about my youngest boy's health; he seemed to eat less and grow weaker every day. I have only given him two bottles, and it has quite changed the child; you would scarcely know it is the same boy.—Yours truly, Mrs. Jane Field."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the Infantina Company, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

TITULAR EVIDENCE AND ADVICE.

"The Anchor's Weighed" in the "Bay of Biscay" with a supply of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Skipper" and "The Midshipmite" would be "Anchored" but for ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Simon the Cellarer," after "Drinking," takes ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Annie Laurie" felt annoyed "When Other Lips" consumed her ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Village Blacksmith" advised "Daisy Bell" to use ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Old English Gentleman" gave each of "The Hundred Pipers" a box of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"All's Well" when you have a supply of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"I know a Bank" whereon "My Pretty Jane" sat and took two ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Old Folks at Home" have "Golden Days," thanks to ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"In Happy Moments," "After the Ball," do not forget to take ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Maggie Murphy's Home," "On the Banks of Allan Water," always possesses a box of ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Last Rose of Summer" will fade from your cheeks without ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"John Peel" was made "Ruddier than the Cherry" by using ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Vicar of Bray" and "Father O'Flynn" could do, could do with ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"A Boy's best Friend is his Mother" when she doses him with ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"We may be happy yet" by simply taking a few of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Should he upbraid," then give him ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Holy Friar" and "The Monks of Old" all chant the praises of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Children's Home" is not "Home, sweet Home" without ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Life let us cherish," and this can best be done by using ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Minstrel Boy" sang "Come into the Garden, Maud," and take ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"There's nae luck about the hoose" without ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Robin Adair" was completely "Stranded" until he took ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Has Sorrow thy young days shaded?" then have recourse to ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Miner" and "The Four Jolly Smiths" swear by ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"Oh! Willie brewed a peck o' Maut," but in the morning he required ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"The Old Brigade" are made as "Trusty as Steel" by the use of ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.
"She wandered down the mountain side" to buy ... ... BEECHAM'S PILLS.

BEECHAM'S MUSIC PORTFOLIO.

"NO HOME MERRY WITHOUT IT."

Just Published, Volume 7, containing—

"After the Ball," "Distant Voices o'er the Sea," "The Cat came Back," "McSorley's Twins," "The Ivy Green," "Bridal March" (from Lohengrin), "As Pants the Hart," "The Lost Chord," "The Hazel Dell," "Oh, Dem Golden Slippers," "Isle of Beauty," "Banks o' Loch Lomond," "Sweet Genevieve," "Washington Post March," "Two Little Girls in Blue," "Jessie, the Flower o' Dunblane," "Starlight," "Weep no More," "Pretty Birdie," "Little Blue Eyes Waltz," "Not Yet," "The Dear Old Home," "Molly Brown," "Marguerite," "The Moon Behind the Hill," "Only a Sweet Little Letter," "Heavenwards," "Heavenward March," "Sweet Marie," March from Tannhauser.

Price (below Cost) 2d. per Volume; per Post, 3d. Vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 are also on Sale.

Order through your Local Chemist, Stores, or Newsagent, or send remittance for the Volumes you require to—

THOMAS BEECHAM (Proprietor of BEECHAM'S PILLS), ST. HELEN'S, LANCASHIRE.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 167, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 316.] FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 19, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

YOUNG. FRESH. INVIGORATING.

The Queen says:—"DULCEMONA TEA is excellent, most delicate in flavour and refreshing to a degree."

The Lady says of DULCEMONA:—"A new and most delicious blend of Tea, with a soft and delicate flavour."

1/6, 1/10, 2/-, 2/4 per lb. In Lead Packets, and 3lbs. and 5lbs. Tins Only.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE—FIRST-CLASS GROCERS.

WHOLESALE ONLY:

11 & 11a, UPPER THAMES STREET, LONDON, E.C.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

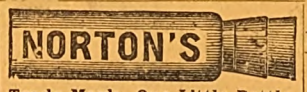
The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S, LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.



Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

THE SOAP FOR HARD WATER

THE SOAP FOR SOFT WATER

LATHERS FREELY in the HARDEST WATER

WATSON'S

MATCHLESS CLEANSER

A HOUSEHOLD REQUISITE

LARGEST SALE of 1lb TABLETS in the WORLD.

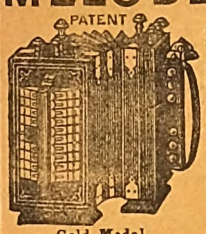
THE SOAP FOR HOT WATER

THE SOAP FOR COLD WATER

Digitized by Google

Cheerful Winter Evenings.

CAMPBELL'S MELODEONS.



Gold Medal.

They have Organ and Celestial Tone, and Charming Bell Accompaniments. NO HOME SHOULD BE WITHOUT ONE. The Solemn Psalm, the Soul-stirring Hymn, the Cheerful Song, and the Merry Dance, all can be played on these charming Instruments. NO KNOWLEDGE OF MUSIC IS REQUIRED.

Special offer to the readers of "Short Stories."
CAMPBELL'S "GEM" MELODEON price only 6/6
CAMPBELL'S "MINIATURE" MELODEON ,, 10/6
CAMPBELL'S "PARAGON" MELODEON ,, 14/-
CAMPBELL'S "FAVOURITE" MELODEON ,, 16/6
Either of the above sent Carriage Paid to any Address in Great Britain and Ireland.
Cut out this, and mention "Short Stories," when ordering. Worth double the money.

NO DECEPTION HERE.
100,000 TESTIMONIALS.
Important Testimonial from Professor BROWN, the Champion Melodeon Player of Great Britain, Ireland, and Wales:—"CAMPBELL'S Patent Melodeons are the finest instruments that have ever come under my touch, and only require a trial to advertise themselves."
Campbell's Patent Melodeons are the only Genuine Melodeons in the Market.
BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.
N.B.—All lovers of music should at once send for our New Illustrated Privilege Price List for Season 1895, now ready. 150,000 of these valuable Lists sent out yearly. Send 1d. stamp to
CAMPBELL & Co., Musical Instrument Makers, 116, Trongate, Glasgow. (Established 50 years.)

£2 WEEKLY UPWARDS may be HONESTLY REALISED by persons of EITHER SEX, without hindrance to present occupation.
For Samples (returnable), &c., enclose addressed envelope to EVANS, WATTS & Co. (P 228), Merchants, Birmingham.—This is genuine.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)
A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED
HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS
will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness. Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.
To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.
S. HARVEY, 12, Gaskarth Road, Balham Hill, London, S.W. Beware of injurious imitations.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.
OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions, arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—
THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.
EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BOILING WATER OR MILK.

BORD'S PIANOS
ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL
KNITTER
Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Exema
and all Skin Eruptions are cured by a Healing Cream widely known as
"Antexema."
"Antexema" is sold by all Chemists and Stores and may be had post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d. and 4s. 9d., of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.
Little Book Free. NAME THIS PAPER.

PLUCKY ADVERTISING.
NEW CUSTOMERS ONLY sending a Shilling for Three Ounces of our exquisite "MOSQUE" SMOKING MIXTURE, will be presented free with a Pipe, Rubber Tobacco-Pouch, and a Turkish Amulet. The whole sent in parcel per post on receipt of Twelve Stamps or P.O. Address—
P 15, Eureka Manufacturing Co., Clapton, London, N.E.

To Tobacconists Commencing.
£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 185, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. ESTIMATES FREE.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms, two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.
Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.
JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

TO LADIES.
English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."
BEECHAM'S PILLS
FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
SUCH AS
Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.
ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.
In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.
Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.
Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

A Real Boon to Ladies.
TO LADIES
Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
OBSTINATE CASES,
NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF,
GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.
No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—
"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise.
A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.
Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.
Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.
QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker.
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES
Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.
Mr. COLLINS (who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England), will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies, he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MADAME FRAIN'S
FAMOUS
FEMALE MIXTURE.
The most powerful and effective on earth.
For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.
Sold also by all Chemists.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

TO WOMEN. IRREGULARITIES, OBSTRUCTIONS, &c., removed by an ABSOLUTELY CERTAIN Method WITHOUT MEDICINE. No Pills, Mixtures, or Useless Injections. Greatest Discovery of Modern Medical Science. Send stamped envelope for particulars, testimonials, &c., to Mrs. SHAFFER-BENNYON, 328, High Holborn, London, W.C.

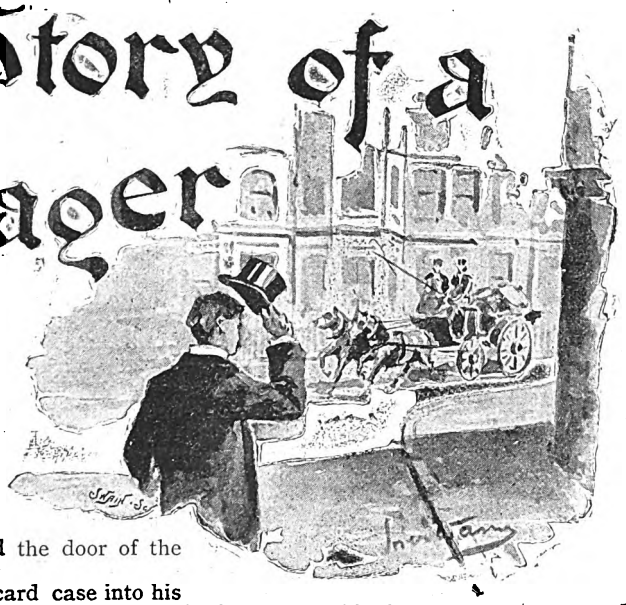
Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 316.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JANUARY 19, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

The Story of a Wager



I.

"Is Mrs. Featherstonhaugh at home?"

"No, sir."

Mr. Adonais fumbled in his card case.

"Is she quite well again?"

The man opened his eyes.

"No, sir; but the day was so fine, she thought a drive might do her good."

A card exchanged hands, and the door of the dainty residence closed softly.

Oliver Adonais put back his card case into his pocket, much relieved, and walked with a long, swinging step down the parched thoroughfare.

The sun was shining on Adonais. It played on his sleek black hat, glared searchingly at the seams of his coat, lit up his reddish brown hair and moustache, and would have done the same for his eyes had it been possible But Adonais was walking with his head in the air, and his brows knit, and his keen, splendid hazel eyes cast to the ground—for he was thinking.

"I'm glad they were out," he was saying to himself, "very glad. I don't like them. The men one meets there are fools or fast, and the women—loud. I spent that evening with them, and I had to call to-day, of course. But there's an end of it. As for Mrs. Featherstonhaugh herself, I don't believe in her illness—simply don't believe in it; she's just as well as I am. Pretty woman enough, but unprincipled and cruel. I don't like her."

Adonais turned sharp round a corner, and flicked a bit of straw viciously off the pavement with the end of his walking stick.

"Hilloa! there is the Featherstonhaugh carriage, if I'm not mistaken—yes." Here he performed the manual labour of taking off his hat. "Thought a drive might do her good," and he smiled an amused smile to himself; "hope it has. That must be the sister she spoke about with her—very beautiful, but hard as a statue, I should say. Wonder who that fellow on the seat opposite was. I'm sure I know his face, and he looked as if he knew me."

Meanwhile the open barouche, with its C springs and high-stepping horses, swept round the corner of the street. The younger of the ladies stifled a yawn.

"Who was that?" she asked lazily.

"Mr. Adonais," promptly replied Mrs. Featherstonhaugh.

She opened her languid eyes slightly.

"Who?"

All Rights Reserved.

The dark-complexioned man sitting opposite answered her this time:

"Oliver Adonais."

"Adonais! What a strange name!"

He leaned back in his seat.

"A good name; and they are the oldest family in——"

She moved impatiently.

"Oh, if you please—enough! If one sets you off once on the subject of pedigree, there's absolutely no stopping you."

He laughed.

"The pedigree of Oliver Adonais might be physiologically interesting; he has no heart."

Gabrielle Ryan smiled a little sarcastically.

"No heart! But neither have a good many other people. Neither have I, for instance."

The bold blue eyes opposite studied her calmly for a moment.

"Possibly not; sometimes I think I have none myself. But pardon me, Gabrielle; I wasn't thinking of such as you or I; few people would suspect us as having hearts; we don't look like it. The strange and wonderful thing is to know that a genial, amiable, happy-go-lucky individual like Adonais—and Oliver Adonais is all that—the strange and wonderful thing is that verily indeed he—has—no—heart."

Miss Ryan coloured slightly.

"In the first place, your politeness excels itself to-day," she returned. "And, secondly, how can you answer for Mr. Adonais's want of heart? How should you know anything about it?"

His eyes flashed mischievously.

"I will tell you. Ten years ago Oliver Adonais had just joined the bar; to-day he is perhaps the most rising barrister in England. Then he was wealthy and—an Adonais; to-day he is still an Adonais, of course, and—wealthier. Now, during these ten years—and this is the most important part—during these ten years the mothers and daughters of this London world have thought, planned, toiled and schemed to find out the heart of Adonais. And with what result? Total defeat; ergo, Adonais has no heart."

Mrs. Featherstonhaugh interposed now impatiently.

"Mr. Vaughan," she exclaimed, "listen to this. I was out at dinner the other evening, and in the drawing-room afterwards Mr. Adonais formed the topic of conversation. His abilities and prospects were eulogised by everybody, and one old, white-haired gentleman added—what do you think?"

"Well, what?"

"This: 'He has better than all that,' he said; 'he has the truest heart in the world.'"

Roland Vaughan arched his eyebrows incredulously.

"Where does he keep it then?"

"Not on his sleeve evidently, as some do," said Miss Ryan,

Digitized by Google

"to have it played with, and tossed lightly aside at will, at the fancy of every passing breeze."

"Thank you, Miss Gabrielle," he returned, bending his head slightly. "I recognise myself to a nicety. However, if Mrs. Featherstonhaugh will excuse me, I must keep to my opinion: Adonais has no heart."

Mrs. Featherstonhaugh shook her head with the irritability of a woman who cannot brook contradiction.

"He has a heart, of course," she remarked in a short tone.

Mr. Vaughan raised his hand quickly to his dark moustache, as though to conceal a smile of amusement.

"Well, Mrs. Featherstonhaugh, suppose we ask your sister to find it out? We might settle the dispute in that way. Gabrielle, does your pride need humiliation? Defeat means humiliation to you, does it not? I can promise you defeat."

"Mr. Vaughan, you are positively rude! And if," continued Gabrielle, her proud lips curling scornfully, "if I succeeded, whose, pray, would be the humiliation then?"

"Why, mine and his," laughed Mr. Vaughan.

"Yours alone," she retorted, beginning to take the matter seriously.

"Ah, well, perhaps so. But I do not fear; you will stand no chance with Oliver Adonais."

Now fairly roused, Gabrielle raised herself with sudden energy.

"It is a challenge," she cried. "Before long I will have him at my feet."

Mr. Vaughan glanced at her with a mocking smile.

"Pardon me," he said, "I am far from underrating your powers, but you never will. Or if you do, I promise to own myself most grievously mistaken in my knowledge of men and human nature."

"And what else?"

"What else? I will present you with a pair of gloves."

"Very well; it is a bet. I shall accept them, but on condition that you own yourself mistaken, and more than that—humiliated."

He laughed again.

"To the dust, Miss Gabrielle," and a gleam of open admiration came into his bold eyes, as they rested on the pale, scornful, most lovely face opposite to him.

Mrs. Featherstonhaugh, who had listened to the conversation in surprise, flushed angrily.

"Mr. Vaughan," she said, "as Gabrielle's future husband, how can you for a moment encourage anything so unprincipled and cruel?"

He leaned forward and arranged the thin rug carefully over her.

"My dear lady," he laughed, "pray don't excite yourself; you forget that thereby hangs the whole kernel of dispute. I hold that Adonais has no heart; if this is so, where is the cruelty? There can be nothing wrong in the experiment."

"And Gabrielle has really your sanction to do this?"

"Gabrielle and I understand each other perfectly. Do we not, Gabrielle?"

"Why, Claire, it is only a little amusement," said the young lady with a smile.

Mrs. Featherstonhaugh stifled a sigh.

"Only a little amusement! And what about the cost?"

Roland Vaughan crossed his arms, and looked at her.

"The cost of Gabrielle's humiliation?"

He leans back on the dusty cushions.

Gabrielle drew herself up.

"At the cost of yours, you mean," she returned; "and a pair of gloves."

"Ah, no," he said, for something in the word, as applied to himself, displeased him. "We can leave humiliation out of the question, then. No; all for a pair of gloves, Gabrielle." And he held his own suddenly in the air as the carriage drew up at the doorway.

She hesitated and laughed.

"Very well; all for a pair of gloves."

II.

"QUEER thing altogether; queer of Vaughan to call on me. We were college friends, it's true; but—after so many years!"

Mr. Adonais, as he speaks, is in evening dress, with the street lamps flickering in on him through the rain-bespattered windows, and the wheels of his hansom rattling a noisy accompaniment. His well-cut face wears an expression half-puzzled, half-vexed, and he leans back on the dusty cushions and gives himself up to his musings.

"And I had made up my mind to have nothing more to do with the Featherstonhaughs. They may be very nice, of course; but the thing is, I don't like them, nor the people one meets there. Roland Vaughan is certainly not a fool like most of their male acquaintances, but he is hardly the man a steady-going fellow can have much in common with, now at least. At college it was different. I suppose he is related to the Featherstonhaughs."

Here Adonais seemed to fall into deep and rather sad thoughts.

The hansom stopped at the well-known door, and he went up the wet steps and into the brilliant drawing-room. The footman opened it and announced him. A rustle of satin, and Mrs. Featherstonhaugh's pale face—a little paler than usual—was turned towards him, and a limp hand was held out.

"How do you do, Mr. Adonais?" she asked in a feeble voice.

"How do you do?" rang out the genial voice of Adonais. "Are you—ah—better?"

"I am always weak," and she moved slightly to make room for the outstretched hand of her husband; and then turning abruptly towards a figure on an adjoining couch, "Mr. Adonais, this is my sister Gabrielle."

An involuntary flash of surprise and admiration came into his eyes, but he dropped them quickly, and bowed to the beautiful girl before him.

"How are you, Mr. Adonais? Terrible weather, isn't it?" And in this commonplace way Gabrielle Ryan opened hostilities on the heart of Oliver Adonais.

He looked down at her comically.

"I think we've had about one fine day this season."

She raised her long, dark lashes.

"Yes, one," she answered. "I know we've had one; the first day I saw you was a fine day. We were driving, and I asked your name, and I thought it such a strange name—Adonais."

She said the word slowly, pronouncing each syllable by itself, and if Adonais did not notice that it was like the changing tones of a bell, he might have done so. But Adonais was a man of the world; he recognised at once, just as he had done many and many a time before, and just with the same inward amusement, the opening attack of an enemy. He did not know, of course, that his great heart lay in one side of the balance, and a little pair of gloves in the other; but this he did know, that Miss Gabrielle Ryan, belle and beauty, condescended to flirt with him.

"I have rather an objection to the name," he laughed; "it is too ambitious. It is the most ambitious name I know, and you see it is apt to make its bearer ridiculous."

"How d'ye do, Adonais?"

Roland Vaughan had come slowly into the room, with that half-lounge, familiar to everyone who knew him, and—a curious look in his face—was standing beside them.

Adonais turned.

Digitized by Google

"Well, Vaughan, how are you? Do you know I fell into a reverie upon olden days on my way up here."

"Not a very pleasant one for you, I should say, eh?" laughed Mr. Vaughan; but there was something of a sneer in his laugh.

Adonais drew himself up slightly.

"It was not wholly pleasant. Miss Ryan, I fear we used to be scapegoats."

Vaughan leaned back on the mantelpiece.

"I expect we were," he cried. "I have seen very little of you lately, Adonais. The fact is," he added suddenly, "I went on in the same old path and you struck out another. I think that's just about the way of it."

Adonais smiled kindly on him.

"Ah, well, the paths may meet again some day—who knows? May they not, Miss Ryan?"

She lifted her eyes, and looked from one to the other of them.

"Yes, the two may run together for awhile."

There was a meaning in her tone; Vaughan laughed shortly and turned suddenly away. Adonais bent gracefully towards her.

"The general election approaches, and hints are dangerous. Now, Miss Ryan, do you mean that I've designs on Vaughan's borough—Oh, dinner!" and he stopped abruptly as the door was thrown open. "I believe I take you in."

When they were seated, Gabrielle Ryan turned to him.

"Speaking of Mr. Vaughan's borough—has he any chance of getting in again, do you think?"

Adonais evaded the question.

"The general election is at hand and—Vaughan's eyes are upon us."

She smiled slightly.

"But seriously, Mr. Adonais, has he any chance at all?"

He bent his head over his plate.

"Seriously, Miss Ryan, I cannot say. One hears such conflicting reports about things, that it is not safe to believe any of them."

The diamonds round her beautiful neck flashed in the lamplight.

"That is true," she answered thoughtfully. "One does hear conflicting reports about things and about people. It is so distracting."

Adonais looked down at her.

"People exaggerate about things and about other people," he said; "some the good, some the evil. It is that which causes the confliction."

Gabrielle turned and raised her steady, long-lashed eyes to his.

"I do not know. What can you think of this? It is a case in point. At the same place, at the same hour, I heard first, Mr. Adonais, that you had no heart, and again that yours was the truest heart in the world."

Adonais, man of the world though he was, was taken by surprise. The colour deepened on his forehead; for once in his life he racked his brains in vain to find a suitable answer. After a minute he laughed.

"Well, Miss Ryan," he said, slowly, "that is, as you say, an example of what I was telling you; some have exaggerated the good, and some the bad." Then, with a short quiet clearance of the throat, which acted as a full stop to that part of the conversation, "May I pass you the salt?" he added, rather coldly.

"I heard . . . . that yours was the truest heart in the world."

For, to tell the truth, beside being surprised, he was just a little disappointed and shocked that a pretty, well-bred woman should have done anything so singular and startling as to repeat these personalities to him.

This stately, dark-eyed beauty was no ingenuous school girl, he knew; but she was an American, and American women, let them be charming as they may—American women do, and ever will do, odd things sometimes. If that were all, he could afford to be genial over it; but if she had deliberate designs of attracting him to her, why, he objected to any such bold hostilities.

At any rate it was rather amusing, and with a half smile he turned his eyes drolly upon her. A strange look came into them as he noted the downcast lip and the colour coming and going on her round cheek; for never had Gabrielle looked or felt more crestfallen. She had failed ignominiously, and she knew it. He bent kindly towards her.

"And so there was a dispute about my heart?" he said.

She hesitated. The man seemed to read her through and through.

"Yes."

"And may I ask how it was decided?"

"Mr. Adonais, it was not decided."

"Ah! and was the matter really allowed to rest on such frightful uncertainty? What folly!"

She laughed feebly.

"The decision was deferred, Mr. Adonais."

He shot a keen look at her again.

"Ah, meantime the mystery would have to be solved."

"Oh, yes, of course," she stammered, playing with her bracelet uncomfortably.

He laughed, now really amused.

"And who was to solve it, I wonder?" he asked, turning his face to her.

"Perhaps you."

This time it was Gabrielle who flushed to the eyes; all self-possession utterly forsook her. What could she do? Where should she look? How should she answer? Her thoughts were whirling in mad confusion. To be convicted; she, proud Gabrielle, to be convicted, in indirect language, it is true, but still convicted, of having designs upon a heart. And that by the man whose heart she had undertaken to capture. And this in the presence of a London dinner party. Roland Vaughan had prophesied humiliation, surely this was something worse.

She turned suddenly towards him, the most abject intreaty plainly written upon every feature of her face.

"Mr. Adonais," she said, "Mr. Adonais, please let us talk of something else."

He bowed politely.

"Certainly. I think we began this evening with the weather; can you suggest another subject, or may I? Do you know I have to make a speech at a flower show to-morrow, this said weather permitting, and I had just made up my mind to ask if you would tell me the names of a few of these flowers on the table, that I may not appear so totally ignorant as I am, when you startled me. Perhaps you will help me now?"

Gabrielle slowly turned her face once again to him.

"Oh, yes!" and her voice struggled for calmness. "That beside you is a pelargonium."

"And opposite?"

"Hydrangea."

Digitized by Google

"Ah! By the way, what sort of flowers have you in Florida? That might come in very usefully."

"In Florida?" she repeated mechanically, and for one instant there was a beautiful look in her eyes which neither Adonais nor his heart nor the flowers brought there. "Yes, Florida is a lovely place. Oh, and the flowers! There are many flowers. I remember one, long-shaped and blue as a Florida sky. It grew by thousands about the banks of the river at the foot of our garden, and in the summer evenings my sisters and I used to stray up and down and sit among its blossoms to revel in the sweetness of its perfume."

So the dinner passed on. Many voices talked and laughed; attendants' footsteps hurried softly to and fro; the glasses and the plates chinked, and the flowers drooped just a little in the heat and light, and Gabrielle spoke and Adonais listened. When Mrs. Featherstonhaugh rose, Adonais would have fain gone on listening, for Gabrielle had spoken as she seldom did—from her heart. She was away among the orange groves and the citrons, the sweet memories of the past. She had forgotten all about Adonais' heart, and the pair of gloves; almost about Adonais himself.

He smiled more and more over his wine and walnuts at the thought of what she had revealed to him about that heart of his. So this was what the world said of him. Well, was it true, any part of it? Had he no heart? Had he the truest heart in the world? Roland Vaughan asked his opinion on some political question, and he gave it, and cracked another walnut, and went on with what he was thinking about. Had he the truest heart in the world?

A little child asked for a penny.

Of course, Adonais did not ask himself such a question seriously; but he found it pleasant to wonder in a half joking, half dreamy way, and to go over his own surprise again in his mind—his surprise when Gabrielle said the words, and looked so fixedly and steadily out of her grave dark eyes into the depths of his.

The guests were gone. Adonais trod the wet pavement, for the rain had ceased, and it pleased him to walk and indulge his thoughts. And Gabrielle on her way up to her bed-room was stopped on the staircase; stopped twice.

Once a woman with a cold white face just touched the girl's brow with her lips.

"Good night, Gabrielle. Have you—have you no mercy, child?"

She opened her eyes.

"Mercy, Claire?"

"Yes, mercy on Mr. Adonais. Wait a minute; I am so weak and tired. If you have no mercy for his sake, have a little for mine."

Gabrielle hesitated for a moment and then hastily passed on.

"Claire, how can you be so ridiculous?"

A little further on she was stopped again. A hand was laid upon her shoulder.

"Well, Gabrielle, are you tired? I saw you were doing your best for the pair of gloves, but you did not make much of it. It will end as I said it would."

Then he kissed her and said good night, for she was to be his wife; and she passed on again, shaking her head half in scorn, half laughingly.

III.

THE carriages roll along, the people hurry to and fro on the pavement, the church clocks chime in the distant steeples, and the afternoon sun glares down on all the toil and turmoil, and plays with the reddish-brown hair and moustache of Mr. Adonais. He is in Oxford Street—walking with long swinging steps, and thinking as usual.

What were his thoughts like, and where was the heart of Adonais? The heart was gone. He had unconsciously given it up to a girl with grave, dark eyes, and a beautiful face: a girl with whom he had latterly spent a great deal of his time. It was gone for ever.

"She loves you," he was saying to himself. "Adonais, she loves you; Gabrielle loves you. The roll of the carriage wheels echoes it, the footsteps of the people repeat it to you, and the clocks and the bells chime it out to you. Oliver Adonais, Gabrielle loves you. Each house you pass takes life and says it to you—always the same; and every street you turn into breaks out anew, but always with the same—Gabrielle loves you. They must know—you must know; they cannot be wrong—you cannot be wrong. She does love you, Adonais; you cannot both be wrong—she does love you."

A little child asked him for a penny, and he gave her half-a-crown. A broken-down friend stopped him timidly for the loan of a pound, and he promised him ten. Well, it was all for the sake of Gabrielle. A painter's boy brushed roughly past him, and stained his coat sleeve a brilliant red, but Adonais walked on with a smile, thinking that here was something for Gabrielle to laugh at.

Meanwhile a carriage stood at a doorway. Inside sat a girl with a beautiful face and grave dark eyes that saw—yet without seeing—what was passing around her. She was there herself, but her thoughts were not there. They were with Mr. Adonais. Gabrielle Ryan in dreamland; dreaming of Adonais. And her dreams ran thus:

"I love him. This is your punishment, Gabrielle Ryan—you love him. This is the end of your boasting intrigue. And he has given you his heart; the truest heart in the world. He loves you. It is your heart now, and what must you do with it? Not crush it? This is the end of it all; you have promised yourself to Roland Vaughan, and you must keep to your promise. Oh, misery! is there no hope—even yet is there not any hope? None; you must keep to your plighted word.

"You know Roland Vaughan; you know what he has done for your father and mother and sisters, all for your sake—with a sneer on his lips—still all for your sake. And, besides, listen; you dare not give him up; you dare not, Gabrielle Ryan. Oh, misery, misery! and I love you, Oliver, as man was never loved."

Ever hurrying nearer, at last he is close. She sees him, and bends suddenly and eagerly forward.

"Mr. Adonais!"

"Gabri—Miss Gabrielle, how are you?"

"I am quite well."

Then comes a pause, and they look at each other; the words take long to rise sometimes when hearts are full. Gabrielle seizes on the first thing which strikes her.

"Mr. Adonais! Look at your coat!"

"Yes; somebody has been painting it for me."

"But how? What a pity!"

"Oh, no, I rather liked it; it brought things to my mind."

She looked at him wonderingly.

"What things?"

He smiled.

"Well, I can't tell you exactly. Perhaps the pale-blue flowers that grew by thousands about the river at the foot of your garden; the flowers amongst which you and your sisters used to sit in the summer evenings to revel in the sweetness of their perfume."

She laughed and coloured slightly.

"Now, that is absurd, Mr. Adonais," and glancing hastily round. "My sister is in one of these shops. Where are you going? Can we drive you anywhere?"

The sunshine laughed in his eyes.

"Thank you, but I don't know where I am going exactly.'

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Featherstonhaugh was coming out; Gabrielle turned to her.

"Claire, here is Mr. Adonais. He was hurrying along rapidly, although he doesn't know where he is going, he says."

All of a sudden, because her heart was beating wildly, and she was struggling for calmness, struggling to quell the misery which was ever there, and to still the flash of joy now illuminating it—suddenly, because these things oppressed her and would have an outlet, Gabrielle Ryan burst into a rippling peal of laughter. And he, knowing not what had caused it, laughed too. Mrs. Featherstonhaugh stood, pale and cold as an icicle, between them.

"The fact is," remarked Adonais, "the fact is, I was going to call upon you, Mrs. Featherstonhaugh."

What could she do?

"Will you drive home with us now, then?"

"I should like to," and he smiled at Gabrielle. "Are you better?" he inquired as he helped her in.

"I am always weak," she answered; and she leaned back in the carriage and looked coldly and haughtily at him.

Mrs. Featherstonhaugh did not like him, Adonais fancied, but Gabrielle did. The keen hazel eyes of Oliver Adonais blazed and burned with love and admiration, as they rested on the beautiful face opposite him.

Adonais sat down to tea with them in the sombre drawing-room, rich colouring round him, glittering Dresden and Sevres china brightening the gloom up here and there. The end was coming near. Gabrielle knew it and trembled; talking the while of the weather, and the last race, and the newest book, and the pictures of the year, and drinking tea out of the dainty tea cups, just as usual, until at last there was a pause in the conversation, and Adonais deliberately faced Mrs. Featherstonhaugh.

"Your sister promised last night to show me that collection of coins in the library," he said, and turning himself slightly, "and you forgot to do so, Miss Gabrielle. May I ask to see them now?"

Mrs. Featherstonhaugh's face paled, but Gabrielle rose, calm and self-possessed. The end had come at last. Well, it was better that it had—she would bear it.

Side by side through the broad hall, the stained glass of the windows throwing beams of coloured light upon them, they passed into the library. Mr. Adonais shut the door and turned to her.

"Gabrielle!" he said.

The sharp snap of a glass door beyond, opening quickly, was heard. A moment's hesitation, and Roland Vaughan, darkness on his face, came forward from the conservatory and stood beside them.

"How d'ye do, Adonais? Sorry to interrupt you, I'm sure, but I thought it was a good opportunity to ask you for your congratulations. You never have given me them, you know."

Bowing low to the girl's still figure.

Mr. Adonais stared at him.

"My congratulations!"

"Yes. You know, don't you, that Gabrielle is to marry me? Gabrielle has told you of that, of course."

Adonais leaned back against the bookcase behind him.

"What do you mean?" he said abruptly, and his face had grown so white, white to the lips, that even the cruel eyes looking at him softened in mercy.

"Why, Adonais, I mean that Gabrielle is engaged to me; has been engaged to me for ages. We shall shortly be married. And you did not know it!"

The walls of the library, and Vaughan, and Gabrielle—Gabrielle with her marble face and motionless figure—swam round Oliver Adonais. He sat down suddenly, and, raising his hand with a quick motion covered his eyes.

"Are you joking, Vaughan?" he quietly questioned.

"Joking! not I. Gabrielle," and he turned to her almost fiercely, "say whether I am joking or not; speak the truth."

"It is the truth, Mr. Adonais," she answered without moving or looking towards him; and her voice was quite hard in its forced calmness.

Adonais rose. There was a dazed look in his eyes; his brows were knit together as those of a man in bodily agony, but he held up his head, and his voice was calm, harder than Gabrielle's had been.

"Yes, I congratulate you, Vaughan, of course. It was strange that I never heard of this before, wasn't it?"

Then, without another word, bowing low to the girl's still figure, Mr Adonais passed out of the room, out at the doorway—for ever, and so on down the sun-parched thoroughfare.

* * * * *

A gentleman paced the deck with long, swinging strides.

"Who is he, I wonder?" whispered one passenger to another, as he paused for a moment beside the head of the cabin stairs.

"Hush! don't you know? A sad thing, very, and strange. No one understands it. Of course something must have happened, or he never would spoil his life in this way. A rising man he was, sir, the man of the future, but he threw it all up to go a voyage to the Antipodes; and here he is, you see. I thought everybody knew him—Adonais, Q.C."

So a life was spoiled, and a heart was lost, and a heart was won, and the truest heart in the world was broken.

And all for a pair of gloves!

A Really Good Novel Profusely Illustrated.

No. 4 of

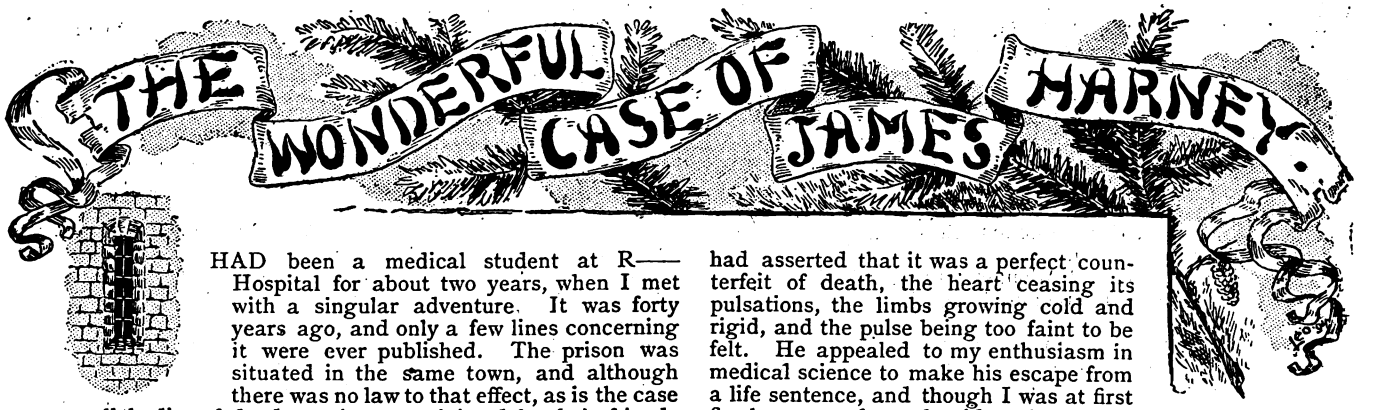
PEARSON'S LIBRARY

ENTITLED—

THE STRANGE WOOING OF MARY BOWLER.

NOW ON SALE. PRICE SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google



I HAD been a medical student at R—— Hospital for about two years, when I met with a singular adventure. It was forty years ago, and only a few lines concerning it were ever published. The prison was situated in the same town, and although there was no law to that effect, as is the case now, all bodies of dead convicts not claimed by their friends were turned over to our college for subjects. It sometimes happened, however, that we did not want them, as we drew from other sources, and the classes were much fewer in number than now. At the time I speak of we had three or four subjects, and would not want any more for weeks.

One day—it was in June—I received a note requesting me to call on a convict at the prison named James Harney. He was a man only twenty-eight years of age, and had escaped the gallows by a scratch to be sentenced to solitary confinement for life. Judges still sentence men to solitary confinement, but it is well-known that the sentence is not carried out. After a brief period in a dark cell the convict is set to work with the other prisoners, and treated just the same.

At the time, however, solitary confinement was a dungeon darker than midnight, with leave to walk in a corridor lighted by lamps for half an hour every third day. Harney was a stout, robust fellow, with a constitution like iron, and had been in prison over two years when he sent for me.

Some influential friends of his had interceded for him, and Harney had himself saved a keeper from being killed by an insane convict, and in consequence the terms of his sentence had been modified.

He was permitted to have the run of a corridor, an ordinary cell was allotted to him, and a part of the time he carried the meals to the men still in the dungeons. There was no possible chance for him to escape, and as he had apparently resigned himself to his fate, no one suspected him of such an intention.

He had got a note to me on the excuse that he had some important matters to reveal regarding a robbery perpetrated on my father, then dead. I went to the prison supposing that was the convict's sole object. I was permitted to talk with an iron grating between us, and a keeper sitting a few feet away to see that I did not pass in any article.

Harney's boldness filled me with astonishment. He began by stating that he had heard I was an enthusiastic student of anatomy, and that I had written two or three articles for a medical magazine on the subject of suspended animation and trances.

This was a fact; but as they had been written and published after Harney's imprisonment, and as he was supposed to be dead to the world, I could not understand how he had become acquainted with the fact.

He put his proposition entirely on the ground of medical science, and it was no more nor less than that he should die and his body should be handed over to the hospital. He stipulated that his body should not go into the vat where the subjects are kept for twenty-four hours after being received, and that I should personally watch over it for that length of time.

It was only after a second visit that I was enabled to fully comprehend his plans. He had discovered that he could feign death at will and return to life at any hour not over a day and a night distant. He said that he had tried it successfully up to ten hours on several occasions, and felt sure that he could make the time twice or three times as long.

A fellow-prisoner who had observed him while in this state had asserted that it was a perfect counterfeit of death, the heart ceasing its pulsations, the limbs growing cold and rigid, and the pulse being too faint to be felt. He appealed to my enthusiasm in medical science to make his escape from a life sentence, and though I was at first firmly opposed to the idea, he brought forward so many arguments, and put them to me so keenly, that I was won over.

"Medical science must have dead bodies to secure benefits for the living," he argued. "I am a practical demonstration of a medical theory you hold. You believe that human life can be temporarily suspended, and you have been ridiculed for your assertions. Here is the opportunity to prove your theory. I will die. All the doctors will pronounce me dead. You shall restore me to life. The case will make you famous."

"But your object is to escape from prison," I protested.

"Granted. I killed an old man, who had only two or three years to live at the most. I have been shut up two years for it. It was my first and only crime, and I have bitterly repented it. Let me go into the world and I shall be a good man under another name. The law will suppose me dead and be satisfied."

In the end he overcame my fears and scruples, and I agreed to his plans, but we were baffled at the very outset by the fact that vacation was coming on, while the medical college had more subjects than it needed.

This was June, and it would be near October before Harney's plan could be carried out. We could safely depend on certain matters in this case exactly as in all others. The prison doctor was an old quack, who had secured his place through politics. It was well-known among the medical fraternity that he was stupid and ignorant, and that the patients who took his doses were as likely to die as to mend.

When a convict died, the case was nearly always reported as typhoid fever. The old fellow appeared to reason that this was a virulent disease, which he could not be expected to cure, and consumption, lung fever, and nearly everything else went down in his report as "typhoid fever—bad case." It was his rule to get the body out of the way as soon as possible. If a convict died early in the morning, he was buried in the afternoon, or his body sent to the hospital in the evening. If he died at about dusk, his body was disposed of before midnight.

"Convicts are useless creatures after the breath leaves them," he said to me on one occasion, "and keeping a corpse round here discourages the living."

When I informed Harney that it would be three months before our plans could be attempted, he grew desperate. He felt certain in his own mind that we should achieve success, and the idea of delay made him reckless.

The prison graveyard was then a part of the town cemetery or at least separated only by a wall. A dead convict was lifted into a pine coffin, the lid screwed down, and two men with a cart drove into the graveyard and dumped the box into a three-foot pit, and filled the hole up. There was no ceremony and no feeling. I knew all these facts, for I had seen several burials, but how Harney could know them was a puzzle to me until I learned that he got them while in gaol awaiting sentence.

He now proposed that he should die and be buried, and that I should dig him up and carry him off, and wait for life to come. This called for far more nerve than the other plan, and

Digitized by Google

I would not give an answer until I had found a fellow enthusiast who entered into the plot with great alacrity. We rented a room, arranged for a horse and cart, provided ourselves with an electric battery, various restoratives, wine and food, and on the afternoon of the 21st day of June I promised Harney that we would be ready on the following night.

He was greatly elated, and assured me that if there was any hitch in the programme it would not be his fault. When I left him I went to the doctor's office in the prison, and, after a few general remarks, observed:

"Well, doctor, is there much illness?"

"No, not much."

"We shan't want any more bodies before October."

"No, I suppose not. Well, it isn't much of a job to bury them."

"I was just talking with Harney—No. 310. He's looking bad; won't live a month."

"Harney! Oh, yes. I was noticing him the other day. He has got all the points of typhoid, and may drop off any day."

"Well, give him a decent burial, doctor. Good day."

I had scored a point for my man. The doctor was prepared for his death, and would make the usual record. This is what happened at the prison soon after I left. The doctor was informed that Harney was ill, and he went in to see him and found him feverish and flighty, with his pulse high.

"Sorry for you, Harney," said the old quack, after making a brief examination, "but I'm afraid you are going to be a very ill man."

"Yes, I think so, doctor."

"You've got all the symptoms of typhoid; and if the disease gets a good hold on you, it will be a hard job to pull pull you through."

"Doctor, it's no use," whispered Harney. "If anybody can save me, you can; but I feel that I have only a short time to live. I've had trouble with my heart for a long time, and I feel as if I was gradually going to pieces."

"Well, we'll send you some powders, and perhaps you'll brace up; but, to be honest with you, I think your hours are numbered."

The next morning Harney was much worse, and the doctor gave up all hopes, and sent the chaplain to console the dying man. Harney was very penitent, and when the good man left him it was with the firm conviction that the dying convict had truly repented of all his sins. At three o'clock in the afternoon the gaoler reported to the doctor:

"No. 310 is dead in his cell, sir."

"Oh, is he? Well, those that can't live must die. We will all have to go the same way. Have the body put in a coffin, and it had better be buried as soon as night comes."

"Isn't it to go to the hospital?"

"No. They don't want any more just now."

A plain wood coffin was taken into the corridor, and the body of 310, which was already growing rigid, was placed in it, and the burden was then carried to a shed in the yard, which was used as a mortuary. A convict named Saunders screwed down the coffin lid, but before he had finished his work he dropped his tools and ran to the doctor, and exclaimed:

"I believe Harney is in a trance, or something of the sort, for as true as I live I saw his chest heave and his eyelids flutter as I put the cover on."

"Bosh!" shouted the doctor.

"But I did, sir."

"Look here, Saunders, I shall report to the warden that you had better be returned to the blacksmith shop. When a convict has the audacity to stand up and tell the prison doctor that he doesn't know his business, one or the other should go."

"But I meant no disrespect, sir."

"Perhaps not; but when I pronounce a man dead of typhoid fever—aye, when I have already made my report to that effect—he is either dead or I'm a fool."

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I'll overlook it this time. Have him buried as soon as it is dark. I don't like the idea of keeping dead bodies round here."

Soon after dark the cart drove out of the prison yard with its burden of death, and the burial party consisted of the sexton employed for the purpose and a trusty convict. They had the grave to dig, and they had not yet completed it when we arrived on the ground and carefully crept into a position within earshot. They were in a hurry to have the job off their hands, and they had not gone down over two feet when the sexton said to the convict:

"That's deep enough for him or any other dead man. Nobody's to know whether he's two or seven feet down."

They made only ten minutes' work of filling up the grave, and they had scarcely reached the cart when the two of us were throwing out the dirt. When we came to the coffin we lifted it out, removed the lid, took out the body, and then the coffin was returned to the grave, and the dirt shovelled back. In three quarters of an hour from Harney's first burial we had him in our room, and had escaped any chance for suspicion of body-snatching.

During our last interview in prison he had exacted of me the promise that I would make no efforts at resuscitation until twenty-four hours had passed. He intended to die for that period of time, and he firmly believed his will could control events. After twenty-four hours had passed I was at liberty to use any means I thought best.

We undressed the body, wrapped it in woollen blankets, and laid it on a bed. On a stand beside the bed we placed water, wine, and food, and then left the room and turned the key in the door. This was at eleven o'clock at night, and Harney had been dead eight hours. The twenty-four hours would not expire until three o'clock in the afternoon of the next day.

We did not go near the room until half an hour before the expected time, and the moment we looked on the dead man's face we realised that reaction had set in. The pallor was disappearing, colour was returning to the lips, and there was a moisture which felt warm to the touch.

We drew up our chairs without a word, and paid the keenest attention to what was to outrival any experience in any doctor's career. At a quarter to three there was a fluttering of the eyelids, and I put my hand to his heart and could detect a faint pulsation. The colour continued to come to his face, signs of life were multiplied each moment, and at five minutes to three Harney opened his eyes and looked full at us. We saw at once that he was conscious and in full possession of all his senses, and I bent over him and whispered:

"We have kept our promise. You died in prison, were buried by the officials, and we dug you up and brought you here. It is just twenty-four hours. Remain quiet until your strength returns."

I fed him with wine and food, and five minutes later he dropped off into a natural and healthy sleep, which lasted four hours. When he awoke he was ready to sit up and talk, and, after eating and drinking very heartily, he was able to walk across the room. When asked for his experience, he replied:

"The only way I can describe it is to say that I lay down on my back on the floor, held my breath, closed my eyes, and gradually became unconscious. It was perhaps ten minutes before I lost my senses. It was like falling asleep, only it seemed as if I was melting away to nothing. I kept repeating to myself: 'You must awake at three o'clock to-morrow,' and that was the very last thing I can remember. My coming back to life was like awakening from sleep, but I feel weak and tremble as if I had just got up from a fit of sickness."

Well, Harney was out of prison, and I had such facts and points on the subject of suspended animation as would make the public believe me a liar and a fraud if I wrote the solemn truth.

Was he ever suspected? No, but the convict Saunders, whose time soon expired, told how Harney had been buried alive, and the story created so much feeling that the grave was opened. They found the body gone, but the theory was that it had been stolen for the medical college. I was the doctor called to attend Harney in his last illness, which, strangely enough, was typhoid fever, and not half an hour before he died he whispered to me with a smile on his face:

"It will be for good this time, doctor."

And so it was.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

MAX RENAULT—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

FRANZ HARTOG—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

SIR HARRY MILTON—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia, in his yacht, the Calypso, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

HERBERT WYNDHAM—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

FREDERICK AUSTEN—the inventor of the air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

FRANK MARKHAM—the young captain of the Utopian yacht, Mermaid.

VIOLET MILTON—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is fearfully injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

LEA CASSILIS (alias MME. DAIL)—a member of Autonomie Group No. 7 with whom Renault is in love.

DORA MERTON—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

LUCY SUMMERS—another fair Utopian.

Renault, after levying blackmail with Hartog on the high seas, returns to Utopia with the object of destroying the colony, but finds it deserted. After a time he goes to Europe in the air-ship Vengeur, and, together with Lea Cassilis, visits the Criterion Theatre in London, where he is recognised by Sir Harry and Lieutenant Wyndham, who effect his capture. He is tried, and condemned to death, but is rescued while on the way to the scaffold by his confederates in the air-ship. London is then bombarded by the Vengeur. The Utopians in England have built an air-ship, and just as Sir Harry and his friends have started on a voyage, three other air-ships appear on the scene.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

A FLYING FIGHT.

MR. AUSTEN followed the direction of Sir Harry's finger with his field-glasses, after locking the steering-wheel for the moment.

"I'm afraid there is no doubt about it," he said, putting the glass down and releasing the wheel again. "As you say, there are three of them, and they are coming up very fast. Of course, they can't be anything but a portion of the Anarchist fleet."

"That's quite certain," said Sir Harry. "Simply because they can't be ours. Evidently their spies have managed to find out where we were building the War-Hawk, and those three ships have been sent to smash her up before she could get into the air. If they'd been half an hour sooner they'd have blown us and the War-Hawk into little pieces—and with Violet and Dora on board too! Phew! It gives one the shivers to think of it. However, thank God, we are all right now. The question is, what shall we do—fight, or run away?"

"Run away, by all means," replied Mr. Austen, with a grim sort of smile and a meaning twinkle in his eye. "I don't know whether it has ever struck you, but the fact is, that in aerial warfare to run away will not only be to fight, but to fight under the most favourable circumstances. The first and in fact the only axiom in aerial tactics will be: Get your enemy behind you and below you. Then smash him up."

"I see, I see. Of course it will be!" exclaimed Sir Harry. "An air-ship flying at a hundred miles an hour can't use her bow guns with any effect, while her stern guns will be even more effective than if she was stationary. What a fool I was not to think of that before! Well then, we shall have a trial of heels first, and then a little gun practice at long range, I suppose?"

"Just so," said Mr. Austen. "Always supposing that those fellows are foolish enough to follow us. Now, as I have had more practice than you have, I'll stop here and manage the ship, and you go aft and fight the two stern guns. You can tell me through the speaking-tube what you want in the way of speed or elevation."

"Yes, that's the plan," said Sir Harry turning to leave the conning-tower. "They've got the awning down and everything snug by this time, so we're ready for full-speed whenever you like."

"Very good," said Mr. Austen sending a signal to the engine-room as he spoke. "We'll go up to four thousand feet first. As soon as your range-finder tells you that they are within five miles you can open fire. Don't be afraid of the ammunition. Our gunners want practice, and we can get plenty more at Lundy. If we can get those fellows to follow us we'll work round there and join forces with the Volante."

"All right," said Sir Harry. "I won't spare the shells, I can tell you. I only hope that blackguard Renault is on board one of them, and that I get a shell squarely into her."

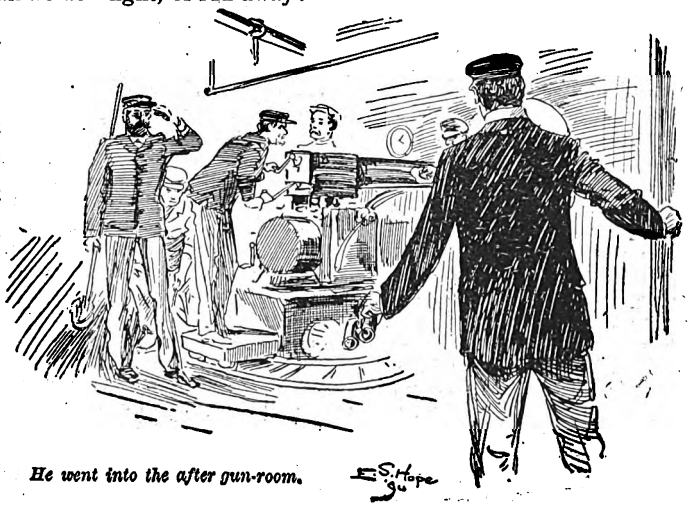
So saying, he closed the door of the conning-tower and descended into the hull of the ship, which was now rising rapidly into the upper strata of the air. He paid a visit first to his sister's cabin and briefly explained the position of affairs to her and Dora, assuring them that there was no danger—as there really was not as long as they could keep the enemy behind them—and then he went into the after gun-room where he found the crews standing by the two long guns, which had already been loaded.

The three Anarchist vessels were now about six miles astern, and nearly two thousand feet below the War-Hawk. Of course, at that distance they were mere specks floating in the ocean of atmosphere, and to hit them with a point-blank aim was quite out of the question. Still, as the War-Hawk was only moving at a speed of about sixty miles an hour, while they were travelling nearly a hundred, the distance rapidly decreased, and every moment they became more and more distinct.

"What are you loaded with, Martin?" said Sir Harry to the captain of the starboard gun.

"Twenty pound mélinite in both guns," was the reply.

"I'm afraid that won't do for these fellows," said Sir Harry. "But still, you can try the range with them. I think they've sighted us, for they are evidently rising. Take the two outside ones and try your luck."



He went into the after gun-room.

The two gun captains took a careful sight through the range-finders mounted on the breeches of the guns, and then came a long and a sharp whistling hiss as the air pent up in the breech-chambers under the pressure of a hundred atmospheres rushed out, driving the projectiles before it. Sir Harry, with his glasses, had no difficulty in following the two shells, flying as they did in a line with the flight of the War-Hawk, until they vanished into the distance.

Digitized by Google

No result visible to the naked eye followed, but as he took his glasses down from his eyes he said:

"Bravo! Capital shots both of them. You got the direction excellently, and I don't think they can have been fifty yards out, either of them. Now we'll try a couple of gelatine time-shells."

These were shells containing blasting-gelatine and a tube filled with liquid oxygen. As the guns were being loaded again Sir Harry said:

"What do your range-finders say now?"

"Coming down to nine thousand yards and fifteen hundred feet elevation."

"Then set the shells for six seconds, and let go as soon as you are ready."

Almost as soon as the words were out of his mouth the compressed air hissed through the barrels again, and Sir Harry began counting.

"One—two—three—four—five—six. Ah! there they go. Elevation perfect, but about a hundred yards astern of them. Still, it has shaken them up considerably. Ah! I thought so, they're scattering."

The moment after the two transient specks of light had appeared in the distance against the now darkening background of the sky, telling of the bursting of the two shells, the two outer Anarchist vessels swerved sharply to right and left, and, still mounting upwards and travelling at the utmost speed of which they were capable, swung round in two wide curves as though they were striving to head the War-Hawk off.

Saw a brilliant spout of flame burst up out of the dark, heather-clad hills.

Watching them closely through his glasses, Sir Harry allowed them to come within three miles of the War-Hawk's quarters, and then asked Mr. Austen to quicken up until the War-Hawk was relatively stationary to them. At the same time he had the two bow guns swung round until they bore on the Anarchist vessels on either side.

"Now," he said to the crews as soon as the guns were in position. "Your range is three miles. Time your shells for that and blaze away. Ah, they've opened fire too. Well, they won't do much harm at this speed, I think."

His last exclamation was called forth by the bursting of a couple of shells about a mile on either side of the War-Hawk, and some three hundred feet below her. What Mr. Austen had said was borne out to the letter. The four vessels were now moving at a speed of a hundred and twenty miles an hour through the air, and therefore the wind was rushing past them with a force half as great again as that of a hurricane. Consequently, as the Anarchist gunners very soon found, it was impossible to take any effective aim with guns into the muzzles of which the air was being forced at this enormous pressure.

But with the War-Hawk's artillery the conditions were reversed. Her guns being trained aft at a very acute angle, the wind swept harmlessly past their muzzles, and her projectiles, hurled forward with an initial velocity of three thousand feet a second, sped undisturbed on their way. Her gunners now settled down steadily to their work, and every shell burst nearer than the one before it to one or other of the Anarchist vessels. At length one from the starboard forward gun burst fairly under the air-planes of the nearest of them.

"Bravo!" cried Sir Harry, who had watched the explosion through his glasses. "That's crippled him at last."

And so it had done; for like a bird with a broken wing, the stricken ship stopped, turned over, and vanished in the distance as the others sped onwards. By this time they were travelling over the Cheviot Hills in a south-westerly direction. Those on board the War-Hawk, looking back into the gloom behind and beneath them, saw a brilliant spout of flame burst up out of the midst of the dark heather-clad hills far away in the distance astern.

"What was that, Sir Harry?" asked Dora, with a tremor of awe in her voice. She had come from Violet's cabin with a message, and was standing by his side watching the effects of the shot through the open slide through which the barrel of the gun projected.

"That was an Anarchist air-ship loaded with explosives falling on to the earth from a height of about three thousand feet," replied Sir Harry gravely. "That is what it means to be crippled in an aerial engagement. Horrible, isn't it?"

"Horrible!" cried Dora with a shudder. "There is no word that would describe it. It seems too awful even to think about. Is that what would happen to us if they hit us?"

"Most probably," he said, still more gravely. "And that is why we are keeping them behind us. Ha! there goes another. Well aimed, Martin. That appears to have shaken him considerably. It burst right under his stern, didn't it?"

"Yes, and crippled his propellers, I think," said the captain of the starboard after-gun, flushing with pleasure at the result of his shot. "She is dropping out of sight fast, and there's the other one turning round to go and help her I suppose."

"So she is," cried Sir Harry. "Now, Miss Dora, you go back to Violet and tell her we have had it all our own way so far. Don't I only wish old Wyndham was here. I think this sort of fighting would open his eyes considerably."

"You are not the only one on board who wishes that, Sir Harry," said Dora with a laugh as she walked towards the companion-way that led up from the gun-room—which was placed in the lowest part of the hull so that the guns could be fired clear of the air-planes and the propellers.

As the third of the Anarchist air-ships had gone back to her crippled consort, who was now beyond range, Sir Harry also left the gun-room and went to discuss the situation with Mr. Austen in the conning-tower.

"We've done very well," said the engineer; "very well indeed, considering this is the first bit of gunnery practice our gunners have had. I hope that one we sent down didn't fall on a town or a village. We can't be very far from some of the towns on the North Tyne. Good heavens! Why, an explosion like that would be enough to lay a whole town in ruins. I'm afraid this aerial warfare is going to be something much more horrible than the old-fashioned sort, and goodness knows that's bad enough."

"I'm afraid so," replied Sir Harry; "but I don't think that fellow fell anywhere but on the moors, and he wouldn't do much harm there except to himself. I'd give something to know that that blackguard Renault had been on board of her. But what do you think we had better do now? Shall we go back and see what those fellows are up to? There is a good moon getting up now, and we shall have plenty of light to see what they are doing."

"Yes," replied Mr. Austen, "I think we may as well. I'll tell Markham to go up another thousand feet, and then we'll try if we can get over them. Just see that there are no lights showing anywhere about the ship when you go back to the gun-room, will you? We mustn't let them see us coming if we can help it. Tell me when you want to use the guns again.

Digitized by Google

We'll go back at sixty miles, and then you'll be able to pick them up easily."

As Sir Harry left the conning-tower the blades of the lifting-fans sprang out from the masts and began to revolve faster and faster as the speed of the air-ship decreased. At the same time Mr. Austen inclined the planes, and the War-Hawk, swinging around, mounted on an upward curve in an easterly direction.

As she did so a scene of strange and almost indescribable beauty opened out under the wondering eyes of Dora and Violet as they sat at the window of their cabin, quite oblivious for the time being of any danger, and wholly absorbed in amazed admiration of the marvels of their first aerial voyage. They were far above the clouds now, and the great bank of cumulus to the westward which had looked so dark from the earth was now a fairyland of snow and opal, stretching away into the infinite distance in endless ranges of hills of the most fantastic outline, bathed in the mingled silver of the moonlight and the crimson afterglow of the sun that had set behind them.

To the eastward there were only a few isolated masses of cloud floating like islands of snow in the ocean of air, and below these, thousands of feet beneath them, lay the dark outline of the land and the shimmer of the moonlight on the water beyond it. As the War-Hawk swept round, two little grey patches close together appeared far below and in front of them. One was the crippled air-ship and the other her consort lying about fifty yards away from her.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

AN ESCAPE AND A CAPTURE.

"WHAT are we to do with those fellows?" said Sir Harry to Mr. Austen as the War-Hawk slowed up and hung suspended in the air some fifteen hundred feet above the two Anarchist air-ships. "It doesn't seem quite the thing to blow them to pieces in cold blood, and yet——"

"My dear sir," replied Mr. Austen almost sharply, "please remember whom we're fighting. These people are not honourable adversaries; they are only vermin, and as vermin we must destroy them. There, look at that! Do you think any human being with a soul to call his own would do a thing like that—leave his consort helpless under his enemies' guns! Wilson, Vincent, get your guns to bear on that scoundrel and see if you can't wing him before he gets out of range."

The latter part of Mr. Austen's speech went down the speaking-tube communicating with the forward part of the gun-room, and almost instantly the bang of the two mingled reports sounded through the ship, and the two shells went screaming after the uninjured air-ship, which had literally sprung away from the side of her helpless consort the instant that the War-Hawk had been discovered hovering over them.

Unfortunately the order had been given a moment too late, and the shells passed astern of the rapidly moving vessel and struck the earth far below, expending their energy harmlessly on the heather. Before the guns could be re-charged the Anarchist craft, with her planes inclined downwards, had passed like a flash underneath a light bank of clouds and vanished.

"That's my fault," said Sir Harry bluntly. "I don't think I understand this kind of warfare yet. Kill or be killed seem the only alternatives. That fellow may do untold mischief before we can catch him again."

"Exactly," said Mr. Austen drily. "But it was my mistake, as well as yours. We ought to have fired on them both the moment we came to rest. However, we won't let that one escape."

"Not if I can help it," added Sir Harry. "I'd like to take the beggar prisoner and hang the crew in due form; but while we were doing that I suppose that other fellow would come back and blow us to pieces."

"Stop a minute—I don't see why we shouldn't if we only take proper precautions," interrupted Mr. Austen. "I think that other fellow has had quite enough of fighting for the present, and this one is absolutely helpless; if he hadn't been held have followed the other. As far as I can see he's only able to use his lifting fans to stop himself falling on to the earth. We'll leave him there, and see what has become of the other. Full speed ahead, please, Markham. Now," he continued as he put the speaking-tube back on its hook, "we'll try what the War-Hawk can do in the way of speed."

They were far above the clouds now.

As he spoke, the blades of the lifting fans fell down beside the masts and were caught in the clips which held them in position. The wind began to whistle, and then to sing, and then to scream past the masts and stays as the air-ship gathered way, and, with the whole 9,000 horse-power of her engines concentrated on the propellers, went rushing through the cloven atmosphere at a speed of three miles a minute, or a hundred and eighty miles an hour. Keeping her air-planes slightly inclined, Mr. Austen sent her on an upward path to the eastward, the direction which the Anarchist craft had taken.

"We won't give him any chance to get above us," he said to Sir Harry, "and if we can get over him and in front of him we may get a chance of another shot at him. Yes, there he is. Look! You can just see his outline in the moonlight against the background of that moor down yonder."

Sir Harry looked downwards and saw what looked like a grey shadow in the bright moonlight hanging between them and the land. He brought his glasses up to his eyes for a moment and then said:

"Yes, and what's more, we have the heels of him. We are overhauling him hand over fist."

"So we are," said Mr. Austen, "thanks to the lavishness of your expenditure on the War-Hawk. I think I can congratulate you on having the fastest air-ship afloat, and of course that means the most formidable one. I should say he was making about thirty miles an hour less than we are, and of course if he means to run for it he is doing his best."

"Well," laughed Sir Harry, "I'm thankful my money has been of some good at any rate, for I am exasperatingly conscious of the fact that I haven't distinguished myself very much since we got afloat."

"All in good time, my dear sir," said Mr. Austen good-humouredly. "Remember this is your first aerial voyage, to say nothing of your first battle in the air, and, added to that, you must remember that I've studied aerial navigation and tactics in theory for more years than you have thought about them for months. I don't suppose it will be very long before you'll be able to take the War-Hawk into action without my assistance, and make her the terror to her enemies that she ought to be."

"Well, however that may be, I am lucky in having some one who can teach me," laughed Sir Harry in reply. "And I've certainly learnt the most valuable lesson of all to-night, for I know now that I know nothing at all about it. So, for the present at least, you will please consider yourself in supreme command. You take entire charge of the ship, and tell me what to do and I'll do it."

"Very well, that's practical, to say the very least of it," said Mr. Austen, looking at him approvingly out of his keen grey eyes. "And now, if you'll just take a look round and see the guns are all ready and the men in their places, and then come back here, I'll give you your first lesson in aerial navigation. Meanwhile, we shall have overtaken that fellow I think, and then perhaps we shall see some fun."

Digitized by Google

Sir Harry, feeling a little out of sorts with himself, but still satisfied that he had taken the most sensible course in reducing himself for the time being to the condition of a pupil, made his round of inspection, and by the time he got back to the conning-tower he found, as Mr. Austen had said, that they had already overtaken the fugitive, which was now floating, a grey speck, nearly two thousand feet below them.

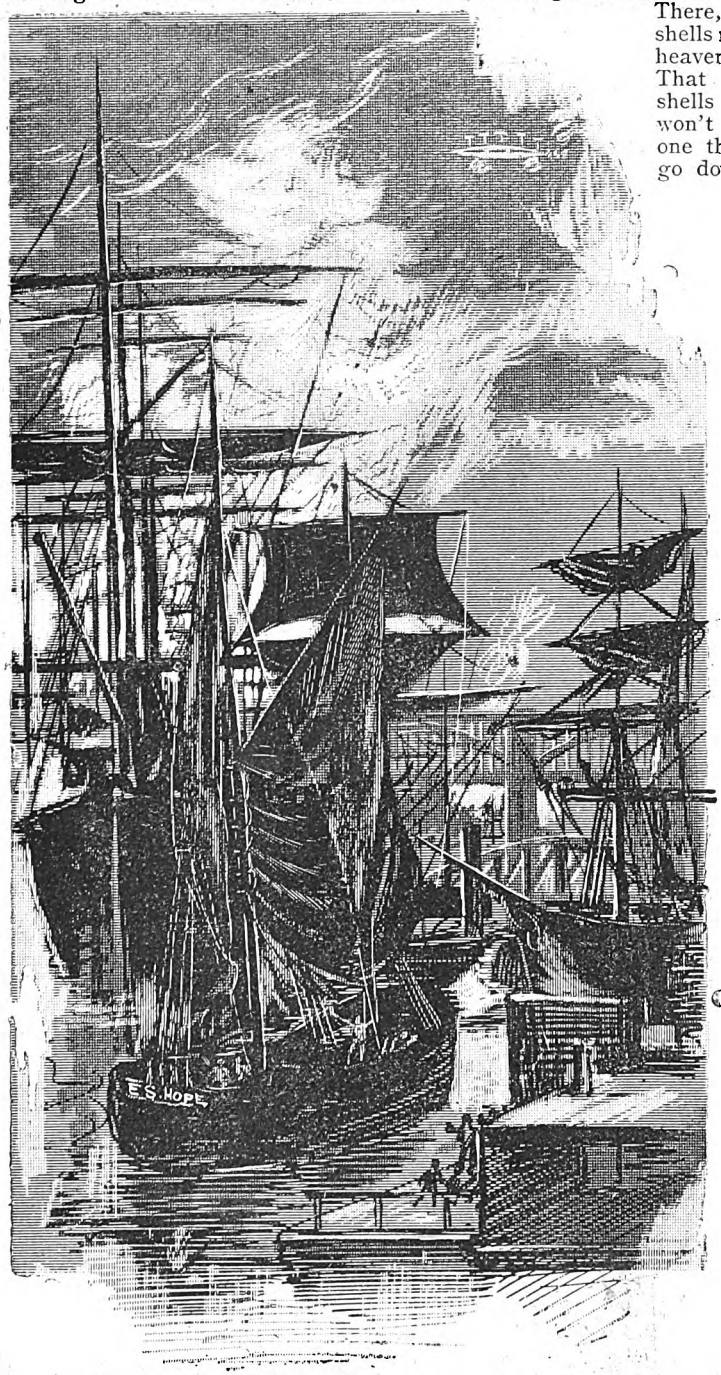
"We'll get a little further ahead," said Mr. Austen, "and then we can open fire on him with the stern guns. But I don't want to do that yet, because we must be passing over the borders of Northumberland and Durham now, and that's crowded with towns, so if we did happen to send him to the earth we might kill hundreds of people below in doing it. We'll wait till we get out to sea, and then it won't matter.

"Eh? What? Hang the fellow, he knows his business a great deal better than those others did! Do you see that crowd of lights down there. Well, that's Newcastle and Gateshead, and those yonder to the eastward are the towns along the Tyne to South Shields and Tynemouth. There he goes—he's dropping down towards them. He knows we daren't fire at him because, if we miss him, our shells will strike in the town, and if we hit him he'll just drop like a huge bomb-shell into Newcastle and lay half the town in ruins. Confound him, what are we to do?"

"And look!" almost shouted Sir Harry, grasping him by the arm and pointing downwards to where myriads of lights indicated the position of Newcastle and Gateshead. "He's bombarding the towns himself out of pure spite and revenge for our having destroyed his two consorts!"

It was only too true. Although the Anarchist air-ship apparently lay at the mercy of the War-Hawk, in reality she commanded the situation. True, she offered a comparatively easy mark to her guns, but then if a shell struck her anywhere but in the magazine she would be crippled and drop like a stone with all her cargo of explosives upon the town, while every shot that missed her—and in the deceptive half-light of the moon the aim was anything but a certain one—would strike some part of the town below and do just as much damage as her own shells.

"What the deuce are we to do?" exclaimed Mr. Austen angrily, as he saw the Anarchist's shells bursting, apparently in half a dozen parts of the town at once. "Who on earth would have thought of the brute trying a move like that! There, see, he is dropping fire-shells now into the shipping. Great heavens, look how it's blazing! That must be awful stuff those shells are loaded with. Oh, this won't do at all! There is only one thing to be done. We must go down and get about a couple of miles away from him and then fire horizontally at him over the town."



"Dropping fire-shells into the shipping."

"And expose ourselves to his shells while we are doing it," interjected Sir Harry. "I'm afraid that would hardly be prudent, would it?"

"No, no; you're right, that won't do," said Mr. Austen. "If we lose our elevation we give away our advantage, and we can't get him within range of our guns without bringing ourselves within range of his, and the worst of it is that the first shell that hits settles the matter. Confound the clouds! Look at them coming up there from the sea, and a sea-mist, too, by all that's unfortunate! Was there ever such a miserable climate as this? Ah, there he goes—I thought so. That's what the blackguard's been waiting for. We've lost him!"

Before the last word had left his lips the Anarchist air-ship had executed a daring but perfectly successful manœuvre. A dense bank of cloud had drifted rapidly in from the sea, followed by the rolling masses of a veritable sea-mist which swept up like a vast cloud of white smoke, mingling with the darker smoke of the fires and the explosions and the thousands of chimneys of the two towns.

Through this he dropped suddenly like a stone towards the earth, and, once enveloped in it, he set his propellers to work at their utmost speed and went skimming away out to sea at fully a hundred and fifty miles an hour only a few hundred feet above the house-tops, leaving a dozen fires blazing furiously behind them in the town and on the river.

"Outwitted after all! And just as we had him at our mercy if it hadn't been for the town," exclaimed Mr. Austen. "And yet, what could we have done?"

Digitized by Google

"Nothing," said Sir Harry. "There was no help for it. We couldn't have fired on him while he was between us and all those thousands of helpless people down yonder. I suppose it's no use chasing him any further?"

"Oh, no, not the slightest," said Mr. Austen angrily. "He's given us the slip completely this time. A needle in a hay-stack is nothing to an air-ship flying a hundred and fifty miles through a fog. Confound the weather!—and he was no fool either who was in command of that ship."

"Suppose it was Renault himself," said Sir Harry. "By heavens, if I thought that I'd have blown her up if it had wrecked half Newcastle! Why the deuce didn't that strike me before."

"Well, we can't do anything now," said Mr. Austen. "Whether it was Renault or not he has outwitted us this time, and there is an end of it. Still, the War-Hawk hasn't done very badly for her first two or three hours in the air. We've destroyed one of the enemy and crippled another—and that reminds me, we may as well go back and see what has happened to that other one."

"And if we can only collar the crew we may find out whether Renault was in command of the expedition," said Sir Harry. "I shall never forgive myself if I hear that he was on board that brute that escaped."

Mr. Austen had carefully noted the course steered by compass in pursuit of the third air-ship as well as the time occupied, consequently he was able to run the War-Hawk back from Newcastle almost to the very spot where the disabled Anarchist had been left. Then, from a height of four thousand feet, her two search-lights were brought into play ahead and astern, and before long one of them fell on the object of their search, still hanging almost motionless in mid-air, supported by her rapidly revolving fans.

Her three propellers had been so shattered and twisted, and her stern had been so much damaged by the explosion of the shell that it was impossible for her to move a yard horizontally by her own power, and hence she was drifting to the westward at a rate of about twelve miles an hour before the breeze that had brought the unlucky mist, under cover of which her consort had escaped.

The War-Hawk with her two search-lights had, of course, been sighted by the Anarchists before she sighted them. It is hardly necessary to say that she was as absolutely at her mercy as a balloon would have been—more so, in fact; for an uninjured balloon would probably have, by this time, outsoared the War-Hawk and sought safety in the upper regions of the air. As it was, all the available force of her partially injured engines just sufficed to keep her afloat, and that was all.

"Jah, ve surrender!"

The War-Hawk's head-light flashed straight down upon her, and, half-blinded by the rays, her crew looked up and saw the two forward guns with their muzzles depressed and converging upon them. Then they looked down at the dark earth lying below them, as it were, at the bottom of a gulf more than three thousand feet deep. A shot that crippled their lifting fans would send them headlong to death and destruction. A shell bursting in the hull of their ship would explode their magazine and scatter them and their craft in fragments through the air. It was no wonder that, under the circumstances, the courage which was equal to the destruction of defenceless towns or the blowing up of ocean liners swiftly degenerated into panic. There was one chance left, and that was surrender, and they took it. A white flag fluttered from a flag-staff astern.

"Ah!" said Mr. Austen as soon as he made it out. "They seem to think discretion is the better part of valour."

"Which means," said Sir Harry, "that they prefer hanging to being blown to bits. Of course, we can't give them any other terms."

"Certainly not," said Mr. Austen. "Still, I would much rather hand them over to the proper authorities if we can do so safely, than kill them ourselves in cold blood. And, besides, the moral effect would be very much greater. We'll go down and see what they have to say. I don't think they'll try any treachery with these two guns trained on them. It wouldn't pay."

Then he sent a message to the engine-room, and the War-Hawk sank slowly down, still keeping her guns trained on the Anarchists, until only a hundred yards separated the two vessels.

"Will you do the shouting, please? Your lungs are a good deal better than mine."

"Oh, yes, with pleasure," replied Sir Harry. "Though it's the first time I've been on speaking terms with these gentry."

So saying, he threw open a slide in the forward part of the conning-tower, and sang out as though he had been hailing a ship from the deck of his yacht:

"Air-ship, ahoy! Who are you, and does that white flag mean surrender?"

A little thick-set man, standing on the hull and holding on to the after-mast with one hand, made an expressive gesture with the other, and replied in a high, shrill voice and a strong German accent:

"Dis is de air-ship Vengeur, and ve are vat you call Anarchists. Jah, ve surrender! By tam, dere is noding else to do!"

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

AT CLIPPER GAP.

A STORY OF THE AMERICAN WAR.

"THOSE hounds must be driven out," said the general, lowering his field-glasses and turning a pair of cold grey eyes upon a staff officer who was standing near.

"If we could get a battery into Clipper Gap," responded the officer addressed, "the question might be soon settled, and at close range. The configuration of the land and the bore of our guns combine, it seems to me, to make any other solution impossible."

"Clipper Gap," echoed the general, rising visibly in his saddle, and then settling back with a sarcastic smile. "Clipper Gap, did you say, Colonel White? You are talking at random. Surely your suggestion is not feasible. You ought to know that a battery could not live to unlimber there, but even if it got into action—why, good Heavens, man, you must be dreaming!"

"Colonel White looked hurt, and instead of meeting the sharp glance of his commander he allowed his eyes to wander down to the left and in the direction of an old plantation dwelling, where a masked mortar battery had an hour before opened on the Federal lines with terrible effect.

"I only mentioned the matter, general," replied the staff officer, after a few moments of silence. "I shall be glad to execute any orders that you may have in the consummation of a better plan."

"But, my good man," returned the general, "a gunner could not live five minutes at the Gap. It would be downright murder to order a battery in there. Colonel White, would you lead a battery into Clipper Gap?"

"What a question!" replied the other. "What a question for a soldier! To be sure, I would lead a battery into the Gap, or anywhere else, if ordered to do so. By the way, general, this would be a great opportunity for your brave Captain Langhorne."

General Colby laughed heartily.

"Can't you forgive me, White, for saying Langhorne is the bravest man in the Third corps? You grow sarcastic every time you refer to the conversation of last evening. Langhorne is brave, brave as a lion. I know him under fire. Southerner, is he not? Colonel Williams told me that he had two brothers in the rebel army. Did you know him before the war?"

"Yes," answered the other, looking in the direction of the house. "I knew him very well. We were in the same class at the University of Virginia. Rivals first for honours in the schools, and later for the hand of the fairest woman in America.

"Langhorne got the girl, who, by the way, was of northern birth. Perhaps that accounts for his fighting sympathies. His people are all on the other side. He lives in this part somewhere, I believe. As to his bravery, I never considered him brave at all. You will say at once, general, that this is a prejudice arising from our early relations. Not so, I am not inclined to depreciate Langhorne's war record, which we all admit is splendid. I say simply that he is not a man of great physical courage."

During the brief recital the general's face wore a smile of innocent raillery, but as White concluded a stern expression stole over his countenance. He thrust his field-glass into a silver-bound case, and almost fiercely beat the long legs of his cavalry boots with a pair of heavy gauntlets, which he had taken off a few moments before. He was a man of imperious disposition and violent temper, with little liking for opposition from any source. White was a distant relative and trusted adviser, but it was evident he had gone too far. When the first flush of his wrath had been beaten out upon his boot, he was enabled to speak, with some degree of moderation, the thoughts that had sent a wicked expression to his face.

"Colonel White," he began deliberately, "you impugn the courage of one of the bravest men in the service—a man whom I have learned to love and respect. I tell you he is as brave as a lion. His courage is always tempered with the coolest judgment, the very highest form of courage. Do you remember the day at——"

Here the general broke off abruptly, and drawing out the field-glass, fixed his sight on the house that stood on a long stretch of level ground below, whence rose, at frequent intervals, white puffs of smoke, telling of the cannonade still furiously waged from the mortars of the rebel battery. In a moment he broke off his inspection, and turning to Colonel White, said:

"Perhaps your suggestion of the gap as a point of action is not bad. I really do not see any way out of it, and just to prove that I am right I shall order Captain Langhorne in there. Some one has to go, and I am convinced that Langhorne has the right kind of stuff in him. He can wipe away the arrogant conceit of military prowess in three or four hundred rebel hearts, and at the same time wipe away the arrogant conceit of snap judgment in the heart of a brother officer," and General Colby again smiled good-naturedly upon his staff-officer.

Whether this opinion came from an honest conviction of military necessity or from the motive of vindicating an insolent judgment that was wont to consider itself infallible, we are not to judge. Men have been slaughtered before and will be again without apparent motive of any kind. Calling his orderly, and pointing to a group of mounted officers that rested on a little knoll three hundred or four hundred yards away, he said, "Tell Captain Langhorne to come here at once." The orderly saluted and withdrew.

General Colby looked at his watch, nervously slapping the neck of his black mare with the bridle rein. "We shall now see," he muttered half aloud, "who is qualified to weigh the qualities of a soldier."

Colonel White, who turned deadly pale, did not move a muscle or make reply.

Presently there was a clatter of hoofs in the rear, and Captain Langhorne reined up a big chestnut colt before his commander and saluted. His light brown hair framed a face of delicate refinement, which was lighted up by blue eyes that might have belonged to a woman. He wore his soiled forage cap a little on one side, and his tunic was open for a space of three buttons at the top, exposing a white shirt front.

General Colby looked first at Colonel White, then frigidly returned the salute of the young captain.

"Captain Langhorne," he began, and his voice trembled slightly, "it is necessary that those devils at yonder house should be dislodged. Take your battery to the gorge directly in their front, known as Clipper Gap. It is narrow, and you will be able to use only one gun at a time. In getting your position follow the ravine where we were this morning as far as possible. It will afford some cover."

The captain looked straight at his commander. The commander looked straight at his captain, Colonel White looked straight into his soul. Captain Langhorne broke the silence:

"Pardon me, general, did you say Clipper Gap? Did I understand the order to open fire on the house opposite the gorge?"

"Captain Langhorne, is not my order clear?"

"Yes, sir, quite clear, but I wanted to ask if—if—it is absolutely necessary—if—er—er——"

Digitized by Google

"Yes," thundered the general, "the order is imperative. Are you a coward? Have you——" But in the midst of this furious tirade Captain Langhorne again respectfully saluted, and then galloped away to execute the order of his chief.

Soon the notes of a bugle floated over from the rear and right, and the two officers turned to see Langhorne's battery sweep at full gallop across a gentle depression directly in the rear and then disappear behind the high hills that skirted the ravine.

Once more they come into sight as they leave the ravine; and, debouching in the open, plunge full in the face of the enemy's guns, into the mouth of the gorge, unlimber, and go into action.

Then from the house, now less than 1,000 yards away, twelve hitherto silent pieces opened their brazen mouths, carrying death and desolation into the ranks of the Federal battery. In twenty minutes the horses had all been killed or disabled.

Then the guns were run up by hand, discharged, and by the same method returned for loading. The slaughter was fearful, and in this vortex of fire and blood and death all order was soon forgotten. There were only two things to do—load and fire. And they did that well, many dying in the doing, but all believing, no doubt, that it was very glorious to die for one's flag and country.

The fire of Langhorne's men was rapid and accurate, as attested by frequent changes in position of some of the rebels' guns, and by the silence of others. About sunset the fire of the opposing forces ceased altogether, and ten minutes later six men—all that were left of the Federal battery—dragged their weary and wounded limbs into the heavy undergrowth that covered the slopes of the gorge on either side. Some went to rest with the hopes of recovery and others to die. It was victory dearly bought.

Two hours later, having dined comfortably at his headquarters, after sending a detachment over to the gap with the purpose of looking for the dead and wounded, General Colby, with Colonel White and another member of his staff, rode down to the house which had borne the brunt of the Federal fire, and from which the rebels had hastily retreated simultaneously with the discharge of the last gun.

There was ruin everywhere about the house, which was apparently deserted. Only the shell of what a few hours before had been a fine old residence of colonial architecture now remained to tell of the cruel ravages of war. All about were evidences of easy living, marking the dismantled habitation as the home of a wealthy planter. After a walk about the place for nearly half an hour some one mentioned the cellar, and the general, who was not half a bad commander in exploring wrecked southern houses, nodded assent.

The orderly made a torch, and, lighting it, led the way down to the cellar, which the visitors were much surprised to find already lighted. An oil lamp burned brightly from the top of a barrel, and in a far corner of the room, upon a heap of débris, a tallow candle threw its unsteady rays upon the dead and mangled bodies of two female figures that lay upon the floor. Close to them a man was seated upon a low camp stool. His face was black, save where a stream of blood, trickling down from an ugly gash over the temple, had washed the darker stains away. As the officers approached, General Colby asked: "Who are you, and what the dickins are you doing here?"

"I have a perfect right to be here, sir," answered the blood-stained man. "I own the property about here. This is my house."

"And these bodies?" questioned the commander.

"My mother and my wife, general. I am Captain Langhorne."

A LOCOMOTIVE HERO

WELL, gentlemen, if you wish it, I'll tell you the story. When I was a youth of nineteen and lived with my parents in America, I had a boyish ambition to become an engine-driver, although I had been educated for loftier pursuits.

During my college vacation, I constantly lounged about the station, making friends with the officials, and especially with a driver named Silas Markley. I became much attached to this man, although he was forty years of age and by no means a sociable fellow.

He was my ideal of a brave, skilful, thorough-bred driver, and I looked up to him as something of a hero. He was not a married man, but lived alone with his old mother. I was a frequent visitor at their house, and I think they both took quite a fancy to me in their quiet, undemonstrative way.

When Markley's fireman left him, I induced him to let me take his place during the remainder of my vacation. He hesitated for some time before he consented to humour my boyish whim; but he finally yielded, and I was in great glee.

The fact was that, in my idleness and the overworked state of my brain, I craved for the excitement as a confirmed drunkard does for liquor, and, besides, I had such longing dreams of the fiery ride through the hills, mounted literally on the iron horse. So I became an expert fireman, and liked it exceedingly; for the excitement more than compensated for the rough work I was required to do.

But there came a time when I got my fill of excitement. Mrs. Markley one day formed a plan which seemed to give her a good deal of happiness. It was her son's birthday, and she wanted to go down to Philadelphia in the train without letting him know anything about it, and there purchase a present for him. She took me into her confidence, and asked me to assist her. I arranged the preliminaries, and got her into the train without being noticed by Markley, who, of course, was busy with his engine.

The old lady was in high glee over the bit of innocent deception she was practising on her son. She enjoined me again not to tell Silas, and then I left her and took my place.

It was a midsummer day, and the weather was delightful.

The train was one which stopped at the principal stations on the route. On this occasion, as there were two specials on the line it was run by telegraph—that is, the driver has simply to obey the instructions which he receives at each station, so that he is put as a machine in the hands of one controller, who directs all trains from a central point and thus has the whole line under his eye. If the driver does not obey to the least tittle his orders, it is destruction to the whole.

Well, we started without mishap, and up to time, and easily reached the first station in the time allotted to us. As we stopped there, a boy ran alongside with the telegram, which he handed to the driver. The next moment I heard a smothered exclamation from Markley.

"Go back," he said to the boy; "tell Williams to have the message repeated; there's a mistake."

The boy dashed off; in a few minutes he came flying back.

"Had it repeated," he panted. "Williams is storming at you; says there's no mistake, and you'd best get on."

He thrust the second message up as he spoke.

Markley read it and stood hesitating for half a minute.

Digitized by Google

There was dismay and utter perplexity in the expression of his face as he looked at the telegram and the long train behind him. His lips moved as if he were calculating chances, and his eyes suddenly quailed as if he saw death at the end of the calculation. I was watching him with considerable curiosity. I ventured to ask him what was the matter, and what he was going to do.

"I'm going to obey," he said curtly.

The engine gave a long shriek of horror that made me start as if it were Markley's own voice. The next instant we slipped out of the station and dashed through low lying farms at a speed which seemed dangerous to me.

"Put in more coal," said Markley.

I shovelled in more, but took time.

"We are going very fast, Markley."

He did not answer. His eyes were fixed on the steam-gauge, his lips close shut.

"More coal," he said.

I threw it in. The fields and houses began to fly past half seen. We were nearing Dufreme, the next station. Markley's eye went from the gauge to the face of the time-piece and back. He moved like an automaton. There was little more meaning in his face.

"More!" he said, without turning his eye.

I took up the shovel—hesitated.

"Markley, do you know you are going at the rate of sixty miles an hour?"

"Coal!"

I was alarmed at the stern, cold rigidity of the man. His pallor was becoming frightful. I threw in the coal. At least we must stop at Dufreme. That was the next halt. The little town was approaching. As the first house came into view the engine sent its shrieks of warning; it grew louder—still louder.

We dashed over the points, up to the station, where a group of passengers waited, and passed it without the halt of an instant, catching a glimpse of the appalled faces and the waiting crowd. Then we were in the fields again. The speed now became literally breathless, the furnace glared red hot. The heat, the velocity, the terrible nervous strain of the man beside me seemed to weight the air. I found myself drawing long, stertorous breaths like one drowning.

I heaped in the coal at intervals as he bade me. I did it because I was oppressed by an odd sense of duty which I never had in my ordinary brain work. Since then I have understood how it is that dull, ignorant men, without a spark of enthusiasm, show such heroism as soldiers, firemen, and captains of wrecked vessels.

It is this overpowering sense of routine duty. It's a finer thing than sheer bravery, in my idea. However, I began to think that Markley was mad—labouring under some frenzy from drink, though I had never seen him touch liquor.

He did not move hand or foot, except in the mechanical control of his engine, his eyes going from the gauge to the time-piece with a steadiness that was more terrible and threatening than any gleam of insanity would have been. Once he glared back at the long train sweeping after the engine with a headlong speed that rocked it from side to side.

One could imagine he saw a hundred men and women in the carriages, talking, reading, smoking, unconscious that their lives were all in the hold of one man whom I now strongly suspected to be mad. I knew by his look that he remembered that their lives were in his hand. He glanced at the clock.

"Twenty miles," he muttered. "Throw on more coal, Jack; the fire is going out."

I did it. Yes, I did it. There was something in the face of that man I could not resist. Then I climbed forward and shook him roughly by the shoulder.

"Markley," I shouted, "you are running this train into the jaws of death."

"I know it," he replied quietly.

"Your mother is on board."

"Heavens!"

He staggered to his feet But even then he did not remove his eyes from the gauge.

"Make up the fire," he commanded, and pushed in the throttle valve.

"I will not."

"Make up the fire, Jack," very quietly.

"I will not. You may kill yourself and your mother, but you shall not murder me."

He looked at me. His kindly grey eyes glared like those of a wild beast, but he controlled himself in a moment.

"I could throw you off this engine, and make short work of you," he said. "But look here, do you see the station yonder?"

I saw a faint streak against the sky, about five miles ahead.

"I was told to reach that station by six o'clock," he continued. "The express train meeting us is due now. I ought to have laid by for it at Dufreme. I was told to come on. The track is a single one. Unless I can make the siding at the station in three minutes, we shall meet it in yonder hollow."

"Somebody's blunder?" I said.

"Yes, I think so."

I said nothing. I threw on coal. If I had had petroleum, I should have thrown it on; but I never was calmer in my life. When death actually stares a man in the face, it often frightens him into the most perfect composure. Markley pushed the valve still further. The engine began to give a strange panting sound. Far off to the south I could see the dense black smoke of a train. I looked at Markley inquiringly. He nodded. It was the express. I stooped to the fire.

"No more," he said.

I looked across the clear summer sky at the grey smoke of the peaceful little village, and beyond that at a black line coming closer, closer, across the sky. Then I turned to the watch. In one minute more—well, I confess I sat down and buried my face in my hands. I don't think I tried to pray. I had a confused thought of mangled, dying men and women—mothers and their babies.

There was a terrible shriek from the engine against which I leaned, another in my face. A hot, hissing tempest swept past me. I looked up. We were on the siding, and the express had gone by. It grazed our end carriage in passing. In a sort of delirious joy, I sprang up and shouted to Markley. He did not speak. He sat there immovable and cold as a stone. I went to the train and brought his mother to him, and, when he opened his eyes and took the old lady's hand in his, I turned hastily away.

Yes, gentlemen, I have been in many a railway accident, but I have always considered that the closest shave I ever had.

What was the blunder?

I don't know. Markley made light of it ever afterwards, and kept it a secret; but no man on the line stood so high in the confidence of the company after that as he. By his coolness and nerve he had saved a hundred lives.

PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO

OF

FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES.

Second Edition of Part II. Now Ready.

WHEN EXHAUSTED NO MORE COPIES CAN BE PRODUCED.

It can be no trouble to ask your newsagent to show you a copy, and if you think it is not honestly worth the Sixpence asked for it, we can only say you are hard to please.

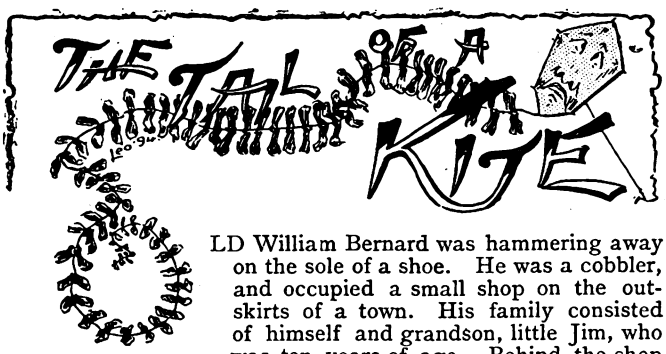
No. 3 will be Ready on FRIDAY, JANUARY 18th, and will contain a double-page picture of exceptional beauty.

Digitized by Google



OLD William Bernard was hammering away on the sole of a shoe. He was a cobbler, and occupied a small shop on the outskirts of a town. His family consisted of himself and grandson, little Jim, who was ten years of age. Behind the shop was a room which served as a parlour, bedroom and kitchen. The cooking was done by Bernard himself, who possessed some knowledge of the culinary art.

Old William's reputation was not of the best; though he had never been detected in a really dishonest act, he was known to be tricky. But he had a genial manner, was always ready to talk, and his shop became a rendezvous for male gossips who liked to talk about the affairs of the day. On this particular morning two of the fraternity sauntered in.

"Good morning, William," said Peter Gibson. "How's business?"

"Bad," answered Bernard, shaking his head. "I can't compete with store prices, and it's a hard matter to keep body and soul together."

"Body and sole, eh?" said Peter, chuckling at his own attempt to be witty. "You must see that the sole keeps the body while it lasts."

Bernard laughed as he gave the shoe a resounding blow with his hammer. He always laughed at other men's jokes, however poor they might be; this was one of the secrets of his popularity. Presently Silas Parker remarked:

"Odd about the robbery, isn't it?"

"What robbery?"

"Haven't you read of it in the paper?" Silas asked in surprise.

"I have no time to read papers."

"Well, it happened last night up at the Hall. Mrs. Benton's pearl necklace was stolen. They say it was very valuable, and so long that it could be wound several times about her neck. The detectives are working up the case."

"Have they any clue to the thief?" Bernard asked, carelessly.

"Well, a slight one. They found a bit of cloth—— What is the matter?" he broke off in alarm, as a cry escaped Bernard.

"Oh, I pounded my finger a little, that's all"

"You must have hurt it badly, you are quite pale."

"No, no!" Bernard answered quickly. "It is nothing. Go on with your story. You were saying that they found a bit of cloth."

"Yes; a small zig-zag piece, evidently torn from a coat. It was hanging on a nail."

"Well," said Bernard, deliberately, "I hope the robber will escape."

"Why," exclaimed Silas, in amazement. "For my part I hope he will be brought to justice."

"Justice!" said Bernard, testily. "Is there such a thing?" But Bernard was so evidently out of humour that Peter and Silas left him alone.

That night he took a bundle from his cupboard and went stealthily into his small garden. Digging a hole in the yielding ground he deposited the bundle in it, then filled it up, packing the earth tightly down so that it was impossible to discover it had been recently disturbed. Little Jim lay sleeping in the inner room, but, some noise awakening him, he crept from his bed and peeped into the shop just as his grandfather returned.

"I thought I heard a noise," said the child.

"So did I, and I went to see what caused it. It was nothing. Go to bed again and I will make you a kite—a marvellous kite, which you may fly to-morrow."

"Oh, will you, grandfather? Jolly! Now I'll go at once!" cried the delighted boy.

A smile curved Bernard's lips as he gathered together the materials for the kite. It took several hours to complete it, but when finished it was indeed a thing of beauty. It was four feet in height, and there were many coloured papers used in its construction. A fringe adorned the outer edge. But the tail was the most wonderful of all. A long string formed the foundation, and upon it were fastened pieces of cloth of graduating lengths, the longest being at the top and tapering down to a mere shred at the end. Each was twisted in the centre, the ends being allowed to fly, but so closely were they put on the string that scarcely any part of it was visible.

Little Jim rose early the next morning. His impatience was so great that he could scarcely contain himself until his grandfather should give him the kite; but he dare not express his wish, as Bernard seemed excited and nervous—an unusual thing with him. The boy wondered why he stood at the door so long, gazing anxiously about, returning to his work only to repeat the performance a few minutes later. At last he turned to the expectant child:

"Come," he said, "you shall fly the kite."

"Oh, is it not beautiful!" Jim cried, clasping his hands in admiration when the wonderful thing was held up for his inspection.

He was wild to touch it, but Bernard would not permit him to do so, and bade him hold the cord while he held the kite aloft himself. Soon it floated upward, the tail resembling a flock of birds as it straightened in the breeze.

"You are William Bernard, I believe," said someone.

As Bernard moved quickly he came face to face with two men.

"That is my name," he answered. "What is your business with me?"

One of the detectives, for such they were, eyed him sharply as he said:

"We are looking for a necklace which was stolen from Mrs. Benton."

"And do you suppose I have it?" demanded Bernard, with a great show of anger. "How dare you accuse me of stealing? But go—search the house—and if you find it——."

He finished with a harsh laugh. The men went to work.

Meanwhile Bernard was apparently absorbed in the kite, and laughed loudly as it rose higher and higher, the long tail curving and twitching like a snake. Presently it began to descend, and a shade of excitement was visible in his face, while little Jim cried out in dismay:

"Oh, grandfather, it is coming down, and will get caught in those trees."

"We will prevent that," said Bernard, with a furtive glance toward the house; and he loosened the cord.

But the kite steadily descended. It hovered over a tree for a few seconds then fell, the tail becoming entangled in the branches. Bernard gave the cord a sharp pull, and the kite dropped at his feet. Little Jim ran and picked it up.

"The tail is broken, grandfather," he exclaimed. "Oh, why did you hide these pretty beads? See——"

He spoke no further, for Bernard with an oath sprang forward and snatched the kite from his hand. At the same time one of the detectives, who had approached unnoticed, tore it from him.

"Ah! We are not mistaken, after all," he said, holding up the tail for his companion's inspection. Beneath each of the twisted rags was a small cluster of pearls.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Should Stout Persons STARVE THEMSELVES?

We are afraid that semi-starvation as a cure for corpulency prevails very much to a dangerous degree. Mr. Archer, the late well-known prominent jockey, was in the habit of going without food for a long stretch in order that he could ride a certain horse at its weight, and there is not much doubt that the debility resulting from this habit of abstemiousness was certainly not conducive to combating the dire attack of fever, which was, perhaps, indirectly responsible for the untimely end, in the zenith of his fame, of this unfortunate but accomplished horseman. Even Mary Jane in the kitchen will eat sparingly of the food allowed her, while she will seek to reduce her fat by copious draughts from the vinegar cruet, and succeed only in injuring the coats of her stomach—the forerunner of dyspeptic trouble which will be difficult to overcome.

The Continental medicos seem to advocate this great reduction of ordinary foods, but one of these savants suggests that the stout person should eat considerably of fatty meats, in order that the appetite is appeased, and consequently less food required, so that practically this is indirectly advocating semi-starvation. On the other hand, Mr. Russell, the British specialist, takes a different course. He says, "Eat as much as you like," and as it is an acknowledged fact that under his treatment persons lose from 2 lb. to 12 lb. per week, it beyond doubt stands out pre-eminent against those so-called starvation cures "made in Germany." Some claim that Mr. Russell has to insist upon his patients drinking hot water every morning, but on the contrary he avers that it is dangerous to do so, and has, of course, never advised it. No; the success of Mr. Russell's treatment is incomparably beyond other specialists, for he resorts to no stringent dietary, and simply prescribes a harmless vegetable tonic combination which is the outcome of years of study and botanical research. We advise all those interested in this question to get his book, the price of which is only 4d. It is entitled, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pp., and is published by him at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It can be had direct, or through any bookseller.—The Million.

A POSITIVE REMEDY

FOR

CORPULENCE

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pages, and is a cheap issue (only 4d.) published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes:—"Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for, in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner, he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more, if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid:—'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos—i.e., 34 lbs.' Another writes:—'So far (six weeks from commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes:—'I am just half the size.' A fourth:—'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8 lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes:—'A reduction of 18 lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes:—'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again a lady says:—'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says:—'Step on a weighing machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee you have lost 2 lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 167, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Delicate Children become Bonny, Chubby, and Strong.

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children from two to fifteen years of age than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Recent Testimonials.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states: "Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

"Gentlemen,—I consider Infantina's Syrup a most satisfactory medicine for children. Mine are so fond of it that I have to lock the bottle away from them. There certainly is no trouble in getting them to take it. I have given it to three children—three, seven, and twelve years of age—and I can truthfully say it has made new children of them.—Yours sincerely, Caroline Cross."

"Gentlemen,—I can speak most highly of Infantina's Syrup for delicate children. My daughter, I fear, inherited a delicate chest from her grandfather, who died of Consumption. Your Syrup has quite stopped her cough, and she has really commenced to get fat. No other medicine seemed to do her any lasting good. She finds it so pleasant to take that she looks forward to each dose.—Faithfully yours, Mary Knight."

"Dear Sirs,—I have found Infantina's Syrup a wonderfully strengthening medicine for children. I had no idea that a tonic would do so much for a delicate child. My little child has picked up marvellously since taking it.—Sincerely yours, Eveline Hodge."

"Gentlemen,—Infantina's Syrup has been a blessing to me. I was quite alarmed about my youngest boy's health; he seemed to eat less and grow weaker every day. I have only given him two bottles, and it has quite changed the child; you would scarcely know it is the same boy.—Yours truly, Mrs. Jane Field."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors, at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the Infantina Company, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 317. FOR WEEK ENDING JANUARY 26, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

1 RISING SUN STOVE POLISH. EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD.

N In HALF the TIME with HALF the LABOUR you can produce MORE POLISH with TWO Penny Packets of RISING SUN than with HALF-DOZEN of ordinary Blacklead. B

Sold in ½d., 1d. & 2d. Packets

THREE GREAT BOONS

3 MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, &c. &c.

REQUIRES no addition or preparation. SAVES time, labour, and uncertainty. PRODUCES beautiful white glossy linen. Sold in 1d. Packets, or 3d. and 6d. Boxes.

Sample of any one post free 2 stamps C. Chancellor & Co., London, E.C.

2 RISIN' SUN METAL POLISH. GIVES TO ALL KINDS OF METALS A BEAUTIFUL SOFT BRILLIANT POLISH.

With the MINIMUM of LABOUR this LIQUID POLISH produces a MOST BRILLIANT APPEARANCE, which lasts much longer than that produced by any Paste Polish.

Sold in 1d, 3d, 6d, & 1/- Bottles

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S, LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY

BRONCHONIA

A MARVELLOUS REMEDY for all COUGHS, whether arising from CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, or THROAT IRRITATIONS.

ITS MARVELLOUS EFFECTS ARE TESTIFIED TO BY EMINENT PHYSICIANS.

2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., & 11s. per Bottle, of all Chemists; or Post Free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., & 11s. 6d., from J. HOWARD, 21, QUEENHITHE, LONDON, E.C.

ONE TRIAL WILL PROVE ITS EFFICACY.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 167, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

Adresse de M. SUEZ, 9, Rue de Prony, PARIS

VINAIGRE LACTÉ de SUEZ POUR LA TOILETTE

EAU de SUEZ

VACCINE for the MOUTH
Strengthens the Gums
Perfumes the Breath
The only Dentifrice securing
BEAUTIFUL TEETH

POUDRE et PATE DENTIFRICES DE SUEZ

London Agents: WILCOX & Co, 239, Oxford Street.

PLUCKY ADVERTISING.

NEW CUSTOMERS ONLY sending a Shilling for Three Ounces of our exquisite "MOSQUE" SMOKING MIXTURE, will be presented free with a Pipe, Rubber Tobacco-Pouch, and a Turkish Amulet. The whole sent in parcel per post on receipt of Twelve Stamps or P.O. Address—

P15, Eureka Manufacturing Co., Clapton, London, N.E.

TO WOMEN. IRREGULARITIES, OBSTRUCTIONS, &c., removed by an ABSOLUTELY CERTAIN Method WITHOUT MEDICINE. No Pills, Mixtures, or Useless Injections. Greatest Discovery of Modern Medical Science. Send stamped envelope for particulars, testimonials, &c., to Mrs. SHAFFER-BENNYON, 328, High Holborn, London, W.C.

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED
HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.
S. HARVEY, 12, Gaskarth Road, Balham Hill, London, S.W. Beware of injurious imitations.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—
THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair &c., with Advice Form for Treatment to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Exema

and all Skin Eruptions are cured by a Healing Cream widely known as

"Antexema."

"Antexema" is sold by all Chemists and Stores and may be had post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., and 4s 9d of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.

Little Book Free. NAME THIS PAPER.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "TOBACCONISTS' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades.
ESTIMATES FREE.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms two letters 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and OBSTINATE CASES, NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD RELIEF, GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise."

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET, LIVERPOOL.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

SEAMLESS

STOCKINET

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 317.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING JANUARY 26, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

The Incident of Rataplan

THE proverbially inconvenient third was Rataplan, the cat. He was worshipped by Mrs. Jack Vane, and—with a considerable discount—also by her husband. Perhaps it is more exact to say that Mr. Vane adored his wife, and for her sake tolerated the pampered and unlovely cat, named Rataplan, because of his long, loud, rather stertorous purr, like the roll of a drum.

They were at breakfast. Mrs. Vane was delicious in a gown of pale blue surah silk, rippling with laces. Mr. Vane was in partial eclipse behind a newspaper. Rataplan sat erect and decorous in his high chair, with his paw upon the table. He was a Persian cat, fantastically striped in shades of yellow, very corpulent, with distended cheeks. His round eyes had the colour of pale sherry. His countenance was babylike, with intermittent gleams of viciousness. He had eaten his saucer of cake and cream, and was not interested in the leading article which Mr. Vane read aloud.

"The Japanese are advancing——"

Just then Rataplan made a leap upon the table, seized a fowl from the dish before his master, and carried it, utilising Mr. Vane's knees on his way to the floor. A broiled bird does not, however, traverse a surface of cloth without leaving traces behind.

"Confound the cat!" Mr. Vane flapped with his napkin at Rataplan, who retreated under the sideboard with his booty.

"Oh, poor Rataplan, we didn't notice that he wanted something!"

"I tell you, Linda, that he ought not to be permitted to come to table. That cat is a nuisance; I wish he was in Siberia!"

She pressed a handkerchief to her eyes, rather ostentatiously. "You—you—promised that you would be fond of Rataplan!"

"I didn't vow to love, honour, and cherish that absurd cat. Only yourself, my dear Linda. But I have endeavoured to like him. Up to date I have managed to endure him—the scratching, biting, greedy animal. But I draw the line at his table manners of this morning!"

Rataplan, under the sideboard, was growling, as he crunched the bones of the fowl.

"If you will excuse me, Linda, I will leave you now, and get into some other clothes." He glanced at his watch. "I'm a little behind time already. That cat must go."

Mr. Vane went to his dressing-room. Linda remained a moment in resentful surprise, motionless. Then she went to fling herself dramatically on her knees in front of the sideboard. "My poor Rataplan, what a brute Jack is!"

She would have clasped the cat in her arms, to console him, misunderstood, maligned. But he had thoroughly anointed himself in devouring the bird; and she—even in that poignant moment—was restrained by the fear of ruining her silken dream of a gown. "Poor Rataplan!" she repeated.

Then she rose to her feet, and hastened to her "own dear little den," where she indulged in flattering misery as a martyred wife, a modern édition de luxe of Patient Griselda.

Reclothed and in his right mind—that is to say without rancour against the cat, who after all, had not meant to harm the trousers, only to help himself to more breakfast—Mr. Vane hurried to his office. The misadventure had lost him a quarter of an hour. In his haste, he omitted to look for his wife, to make their usual affectionate good-bye.

. . . . . .

An hour later, a stylish brougham with a pair of disdainful-stepping horses, driven by an elderly coachman, who resembled the benevolent uncle in a French comedy—drove into Broad Street and stopped at the office of Mr. Samuel W. Sands, banker and broker. From the carriage issued a young woman, dressed all in black, with here and there discreet glimmers of jet—the very costume of modish tragedy. The skirt, demi-train, sweeping sharply, like the wing of a swallow, defined her form, very slender and lithe. Having entered the door, with an agitated step she went straight past the admiring personnel of the banking house to the private office, where Mr. Sands held certain councils that affected the financial barometer of the nation. At the moment he was there alone. His fine grey head was bent over the morning's correspondence.

The young woman entered without knocking, and threw herself on the neck of the banker.

"Papa, dear, I've left Jack, and you must take me home to keep house for you?"

"Heaven forbid!" (The pious ejaculation may have concerned his daughter's proposed separation from her husband, or her assumption of the cares of the paternal household.) "What new caprice is this, Linda?"

For, during the intermediate years between Linda's graduation at boarding-school and her marriage day—those years were

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

few—Mr. Sands had often found her unaccountable. "If her mother could have lived," he would sigh, within himself.

"It is not all caprice," asserted Linda, with dignity. "My self-respect requires me to leave him, and to ask you to obtain for me a formal separation from him. He is just simply too hateful!"

"Let us judge. What has he done? Has he been flirting?"

"Oh, no. He is so absurdly devoted in public that he doesn't even leave me time to—talk with my old friends."

"Did he strike you, then?"

"What an idea! He couldn't. Jack is a perfect gentleman, always—at least—that is—except this morning."

"He threatened you, perhaps?"

"No—not precisely. That is, not me, but Rataplan, dear little Rataplan."

"The cat?"

"Don't call him just a cat, papa. To me Rataplan is a person like anybody else."

"Then, as I gather, Vane has been guilty of unparliamentary language to Monsieur Rataplan, whose eniment personality I am happy to recognise."

"You can laugh, of course, papa. But for me, it is all very serious. I've left Jack—do you hear? I've left Jack!" Her voice ran up into a little shriek.

"How long since?"

"About half an hour ago. After he went down to the office."

"Then he does not know it."

"Not yet."

"Listen to your old father, who counsels you never to let him know it! You are young; and imagine time to be endless, secure from misfortune. Disputes appear to you piquant little thorns upon a rose that otherwise might be too sweet. Linda, it was twenty years ago that your mother and I had a quarrel. It was about a trifle; it lasted only an hour. But that was an hour lost from the few years that we were together. I never could find that hour again."

"But this is quite different, papa. It is not a quarrel. It is only that I have discovered Jack as he really is—ill-tempered and cruel."

"What did he do?" repeated the father. In truth he was not anxious to hear, for he was sure that the grievance was of the slightest. But he needed a moment's time to replace a sad memory in a remote pigeon-hole of his mind, behind a great heap of financial cares.

"He said, 'Confound that cat!' I didn't mind that so much—of course it was dreadfully profane—but I hope that I can make allowance for his frightful state of excitement. But he also said, 'That cat must go.' And he meant it. To call darling Rataplan 'That cat!' It was worse than swearing."

"Aggravated treason, indeed! He ought to be fined for contempt of cat! Now let us hear both sides. What had M. Rataplan done to suggest—mind, I do not say to merit—such treatment?"

"Nothing at all. He had helped himself to a fowl from the able at breakfast. Dear, sweet little fellow! He sat there in n.s high chair, so good! And we—it was our fault—paid no attention to him. Jack was reading about the war in Corea. Poor Rataplan had eaten his cake and lapped the very last drop of cream. His saucer was perfectly empty. Then the darling leaped on the table—you know how gracefully he springs—and caught the bird in his dear little mouth, and—wasn't it sweet of him, when Jack was going to be so horrid about him?—he jumped down on Jack's knee, and then to the floor. And Jack was furious with Rataplan, only because the broiled bird left some marks on his trousers!"

"He ought to have blamed the fowl. But I admit that my condolences are for the trousers. Jack always wears admirable clothes."

"Papa, you do not try to understand me. You never did. It isn't altogether for Rataplan's sake—but, you see, I cannot possibly live with a man of Jack's violent temper. Why, it isn't safe. Some day he might say, 'Confound Linda! That woman must go.' Take me home with you, papa dear. I'll manage your house beautifully. We will dismiss Mrs. Lamb—you don't want that antiquated housekeeper when you can have me. I will do the marketing myself—I know what you like. And I won't be much expense to you for gowns and bonnets and jewels. Dear papa, let me go home with you."

"Of course there is always a place for you in my house, Linda," said Mr. Sands, temporising.

"And for Rataplan?"

"Well, yes, I think we might manage to make room for him—at any rate, there would be the cellar and the area."

"Papa!"

"We will discuss that later. At present I advise you to go to your house as if nothing had happened. You will merely have been shopping. In case you have not your purse with you, here are twenty pounds. You can, with that sum, buy enough gloves and handkerchiefs to justify your excursion in the eyes of your maid. Now go, make your little purchases, and be tranquil. Above all, do not chatter to your maid. I will come to take you ——"

They were at breakfast.

"And Rataplan?"

"And Rataplan, at five-thirty. Vane does not come home before six. We shall be in time. Meanwhile, amuse yourself in some way. For instance, you might write Jack a letter of farewell. Make it as tragic as you please—and then, if you are a sensible girl, you'll burn it. Dead letters tell no tales. Ashes are impressive and compromise nobody, even if they are left lying about loose. Or better still, pack up your belongings for removal. That will occupy you all day, and be safer than scribbling. That's all, is it? Well, good-bye, my dear." Mr. Sands received his daughter's kiss, and then turned again to his correspondence.

Linda went away. She wondered at herself—the heroine of a domestic drama—for the interest with which she began to plan her little expenditures. Still, there is not a little fun to be extracted from even twenty pounds, if one limits herself strictly to trifles. Among other things, she would buy a new collar for Rataplan.

When Mrs. Vane arrived at her house, Céline—a real pearl of a Frenchwoman—who had heard everything from the footman, displayed a manner exaggeratedly usual, as she carried the armful of little parcels upstairs.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile, ten minutes after Linda left her father's office, there was a tap at his door. "Come in!"

Enter Jack Vane.

"It fairly rains relatives this morning," thought Mr. Sands within himself.

"I ran in for a minute, sir, to talk with you——"

"Of course. Don't be disturbed, Jack. It will all come out right, I hope."

"Right, sir! More than right, I should say! Why, sugar preferred is just jumping up from point to point, and my only question is how soon to sell?"

"Oh, sugar preferred!"

"There's nothing else thought about, to-day, sir."

Here was a cheerful and oblivious culprit! Absolutely, he had not an idea beyond sugar quotations! Mr. Sands looked duly serious.

"I supposed that you had come to talk about your quarrel with Linda. I do not conceal from you that she has been here already."

"But I have no quarrel with Linda. What does this mean?"

"Does the name of Rataplan enlighten you?"

"That ridiculous cat to which she offers so much incense. Yes, I admit that when she calls him her precious angel, and kisses his puffy cheeks and his treacherous claws—he scratched her pretty upper lip yesterday, by way of appreciation—I am considerably disgusted with the pampered fraud. Certainly, I'm jealous of her devotion to the cat—and yet, I too, have my innings, I may say. By-the-way, did she tell you that the beast spoiled my trousers this morning by dragging a broiled bird over my knees."

"She said something of the sort. But she coloured the fact with the iris tints of affection—for the cat. I must warn you, indeed, that Linda came to insist on a separation from you, and an immediate return to my house."

"Good gracious, sir! I had no idea that she had taken serious offence. Of course she did not like to hear me blame Rataplan. But my language about the spoiled trousers was very moderate—compared with the tailor's charge for them!"

"I advised her to return to your house, not talk about the difficulty, but await my coming for her at five-thirty. Luckily, it occurred to me to give her a few pounds for ribbons and things. Probably she is in some shop now, feeling much better."

"But I am distressed beyond measure. What can I do?"

"Isn't there perhaps some delicate attention that you can pay ——"

"To her! I should say! A new bracelet ——"

"No, no. Not to her. To that hideous, ill-tempered, chuckle-headed, yellow Egyptian idol of a rival of yours."

Vane meditated for a moment.

"Rataplan, I am told, is always served with sponge-cake and cream at five o'clock. I shall have the honour to hand it to Monsieur."

"An inspiration! Only be punctual, for, as I said, I shall come to free my daughter from domestic tyranny at five-thirty sharp."

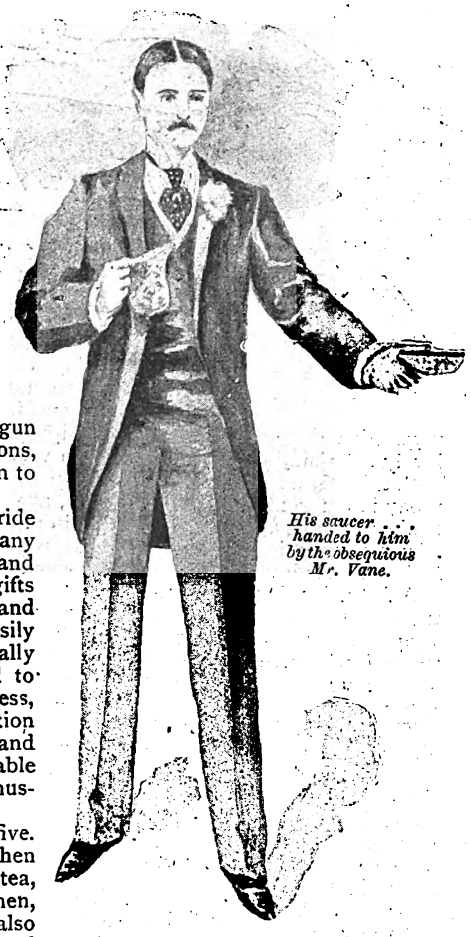
They shook hands.

"Don't sell under 112¼, Jack. Good luck to you, all along the line, my son."

In that little den of hers.

In that little den of hers, all pale green hangings embroidered with falling pink roses, furnished in rococo gold-and-white—Linda Vane began to feel the reaction of the dream of the morning. She had told Céline that she would receive no visits; she wished to be undisturbed, for she was tired with the early shopping. Left alone, she had begun to collect her possessions, in order to take them to her father's house.

But her fantastic pride forbade her to carry any gifts of that cruel husband of hers—and his gifts were quite too many and too beautiful to be easily left behind. Gradually the situation appeared to her in its seriousness, first as the renunciation of the costly signs, and then of the inestimable substance of her husband's affection.



His saucer handed to him by the obsequious Mr. Vane.

The clock struck five. That was the hour when she usually made tea, amid half a dozen women, her intimates. It was also the time for Rataplan to have his cream and cake. It appeared to Linda quite frightful, her apathy about five o'clock tea.

The door of the other room creaked very slightly. How tiresome of Céline, when she had been told that her mistress wished not to be disturbed. Rataplan awoke, aroused, stretched himself, uttered an epicurean mi'aoe. For he beheld his saucer, full of his favourite dainty, handed to him by the obsequious Mr. Vane, who knelt before the sofa.

Linda, with a flying swirl of the long gown—assumed as the appropriate decoration of her proud and tragic mood of the morning—ran towards her husband, and suddenly bending, encircled his neck with her arms. The cream was spilled on the carpet. Rataplan, not to be a loser, jumped down and began to lap at it greedily.

"Oh, Jack! You don't hate us!"

"I love you, and I offer an amnesty to Rataplan."

He seated her upon the sofa and placed himself beside her.

Just then Rataplan, having finished the cream, sprang up, reposing his sphinx-like form on Jack's knees, while his fore-paws lay on Linda's gown.

"You can't go away from me, my dear girl. 'Blest be the tie that binds'—even if it is Rataplan!"

The door opened. Mr. Sands entered the room.

His countenance had assumed an expression of père noble, which he hoped would suit his daughter's idea of the requirements of the situation.

Jack arose quickly to his feet. Rataplan deprived of support, clutched with his hooked claws in Linda's skirt.

"Now this is good of you, sir! You have invited yourself to dine with us this evening, I hope." Jack's pleasure was unmistakable.

Also Linda ran towards her father. "Dear papa, I am so glad to see you—Oh! look at my gown. All torn by those horrid paws! What a nuisance Rataplan is! Really Jack, that cat must go."

Digitized by Google

THE TREASURE OF THE TEMPLE

WHERE the waters of the Gulf of Mexico mingle with those of the Caribbean Sea, only a few miles from the headland of Yucatan, lies the island of Cozumel. It is a narrow, long strip of land, with white coral cliffs rising out of the transparent sea. Lofty cocoanut palms wave their feathery fronds over it, a luxurious tropical vegetation covers it, and as the ships pass by they see this lovely isle rising out of the waters, a very pearl.

But, lovely as Cozumel is, to-day man can find but little to repay him for making it his abode, and only a few scattered fishing villages show it to be inhabited. But, desolate as the island is now, it once boasted a large population in the days before Cortez invaded Mexico the lovely.

A few ruins, long decayed, show the hand of the builder of those days, and many are the tales that are current among the simple fishermen about these ruins and their days. One of these I will give you, as an old Santa Cruz Indian, whose guest I was during the few days I spent on Cozumel, related it to me.

The Spaniard had invaded Yucatan, and his settlements along the coast had flourished. Many were the merchant ships that anchored in the Bay of Campeche, carrying thence costly timber and valuable drugs and spices. But while they carried these things away, they brought many undesirable things, and worst among those were the adventurers and outcasts, who here sought to amass fortunes by whatsoever way was most convenient.

These were the days when rich and prosperous Yucatan was the scene of constant bloodshed, when the peaceful Indians were compelled to retreat further and further into the primeval forest, into which even the reckless and greedy Spaniards dare not follow them.

But while the Spaniard dared not the smallpox did, and many a district, once teeming with human life, became vast silent, impenetrable tombs. While these events were taking place on the western side, the eastern front of the Peninsula was comparatively little visited by the invaders, largely due to the fact that it possessed no harbours.

One day in September, 1672, there shot round the little headland of Yucatan a small canoe, in which were seated two men, who, the first glance showed, were Spaniards. The little boat rapidly rowed along, and evinced a skilful hand at the oars; gracefully it rode the waves, until, just as the sun was setting, a rapid stroke of the oar caused it to turn sharply, and another stroke sent it flying high and dry on the beach.

Both of the boat's occupants quickly sprang out and pulled the boat far up on the white sand of which the shore was composed. One of them was a tall, broad-shouldered young man, whose bronzed open face betokened resolution, tempered by good-natured honesty. The other was a dark, swarthy, evil-looking individual, whose size contrasted as much with that of the other as his treacherous, plotting countenance did with the manly frankness of his companion.

As soon as the boat was made fast, the smaller, with a hasty glance at the bushes which fringed the shore a short distance from where they were standing, turned to his companion.

"Where is that lazy Indian?" he exclaimed. "Here we are, just to time, and not a sign of him. I tell you, Rodrigo," here a fearfully malevolent look came into his eyes, "if he shows us that treasure, why,"—here he made a motion as if stabbing someone—"if not, I'll tear his heart out."

"You'll have to postpone your killing this time, Diego, as I see no need of it. While he's with me, I will give you two to deal with instead of one, so you had better take warning."

The one addressed as Diego cast the speaker a sidelong glance full of venom; then turning, muttered, "We'll see," and once more speaking to the bushes said, "Where's the Indian?" At that moment a small wiry figure stepped into the open space.

"Here, señor. Coatzli never fails to be in time," and in confirmation he pointed seaward, where the moon's pale disk was just showing a narrow rim above the horizon.

"Diego," laughingly added the one called Rodrigo, "he's right; there's Bella Luna just pushed her head out."

The two Spaniards pushed the boat off. While they were thus employed Coatzli prostrated himself and remained for a moment in the attitude of prayer; then, jumping up, he took his seat in the boat, and silently the three rowed across the fast receding waves towards the long dark line—Cozumel.

The Indian, who was seated in the stern of the boat, directed every stroke as they glided noiselessly along the shore, until they had gone nearly half the length of the island.

"Do you see those three palms?" he at last spoke up. "There is our destination."

A moment later the boat was moored to a huge cocoa-nut palm, whose white trunk leaned far across the waters, and the trio had landed.

In advance, with quick active strides, walked the Indian.

Not a word escaped from any of the three. They were traversing an old road, fringed on both sides by dense bush, lined at regular intervals with gigantic palms. Before them, half hidden among the fronds of innumerable palms, loomed up a massive pile.

"The trocalli (temple)," said the Indian, pointing at it.

While he was speaking, the narrow road, along which they had come so far, suddenly widened out and opened on a grove of palms, extending right and left, as far as the eye could reach. Before them was a truncated pyramid, up which, on all four sides, ran a broad stairway, occupying fully a third of each face.

At one time, this stairway must have been grand. Now it was in ruins. Whole blocks had fallen out and many were mutilated. Few had escaped the hand of time.

Up this stair opening before them ascended Coatzli, followed by the Spaniards. When he had nearly reached the summit, Coatzli halted. When the others had reached the place beside him, he stretched out his hand:

"Once this was the temple where my fathers worshipped. Yonder grove was planted by one of my ancestors. The road we have come was the work of another. From the waters of the east to those of the west they ruled—a peaceful, happy people. But one day the sun hid her face, and the sacrifices offered did not propitiate her. Anxiously the people waited fasting from the dawn to the setting of the sun. Still no sun.

"Then it was that Tepetlatl, the aged priest, cried out warningly: 'The day is at hand, the day so long told before, when the mighty shall fall and the strong shall be weakened! Lo! a fish shall come out of the sea, yet not a fish, and it shall seek to devour, for Tonatiuh, the mighty sun, is angry with his people.

"'They shall cry in vain, but he heareth them not. The destroyer shall be upon them, and he shall sorely press them down. They shall be oppressed night and day, but Tonatiuh shall not hear their cry; for a mightier shall be here and a stronger shall rule, and his people shall see his face no more.'

"Thus spoke Tepetlatl the Seer, and great was the sorrow of his people. Six times the moon rolled on, but no sign came, and the people began to hope. The seventh moon had gone when there came from the east a big black monster. It had a body like a fish, yet it was no fish; it had wings like a bird, yet no bird ever was like unto it. As it drew nearer it paused, and a small fish came out of its mouth and our god trembled and fell. And as he fell the little fish climbed the beach, all of his legs drawn in, and it had many men in it, and they were white. And then we saw that the little fish was a boat, many times larger than the canoes of our people.

Digitized by Google

"And thus it came that the white man took this land, and that this temple no longer holds our god; and time has dealt hard with the sacred hill. But when the white man came he found no treasure, for Tepetlatl the Seer had hidden it far down beneath the temple. It is mine, and soon it will be yours, for Coatzli, the last Cacique of Cozumel, needs it not. When he is gone there will be no Coatzlitos to carry the secret on down the generations to come, for Coatzli will be the last of his race."

Here he paused a moment, while his frame shook with suppressed emotion. A vague undefinable feeling of mingled awe and dread had taken possession of his hearers. As they listened to his wild pathetic tale, to the prophetic, sad, yet firm tone in which he recited it, they could not shake off a momentary fear that took possession of them. And while the palm fronds rustled in the night breeze, and seemed to whisper to each other tales that no man had yet heard, Coatzli continued: "The hour has come, and Tonatiuh calls. Let us go!"

He climbed the few remaining stairs to the top, and silently pointed to the east. They saw stretched out beyond the silvery mirror of the Caribbean Sea, that beautifully treacherous water. They were standing on a small platform long overgrown by weeds and creepers.

While they were still gazing at the panorama stretched out before them, Coatzli had scraped away the vegetation around one of the blocks composing the platform, disclosing a handle of stone seemingly chiselled right out of the solid rock. Kneeling a moment, with his hands stretched out to the moon, he seized the ring, gave it one wrench, and lifted a slab which covered a small opening. Looking into the aperture, they beheld a stone stair descending into the darkness.

Bidding the others to follow him closely, Coatzli descended. Before he had gone far, he paused for a moment. Drawing forth flint and steel, he struck fire and ignited a torch, which he held in his hand. By the light thus produced, the others saw a small shelf hewn out of the stone composing the roof, and stored away upon it a number of torches. Bidding each to light one, and take a few spare ones, he continued to descend.

Step after step they descended, on a stair seemingly without bend or waver—down, down. They had gone thus far when the stair suddenly took a sharp turn to the right, and continued, at a considerably lesser angle. A dull booming sound now became audible, increasing in volume each step they descended.

Rodrigo, who followed immediately after the Indian, felt a drop of water upon his hand. On inquiry he learnt that the sound was from the sea, which was rolling in breakers overhead. He could not suppress a shudder; the stairway beginning almost in the centre of the island, had continued under the sea.

But rapidly their guide pushed on, and soon the sound became fainter and fainter. But now another sound struck their ear. A faint, gurgling, swishing noise, as of a brook rushing over pebbles and tumbling over rocks.

Suddenly Coatzli spoke: "We are near the foot of the stair. From now watch closely every move I make, and instantly do the same. Obey every command that I give as a false step henceforward may be disastrous."

While he yet spoke they had emerged upon a platform, and now the sound was clearly audible. Enjoining perfect silence, Coatzli slowly advanced. A few steps and he paused on a narrow ledge. Before him rolled a mighty river, hissing and plunging with incredible velocity! "Rio muerto (the river of the dead)," said Coatzli, pointing to the waters before him. "When the white men oppressed Tepetlatl and his people, he and 200 of the nobles sought and found their death in its waters. Look yonder! there they found a resting place!" And the horror-struck Spaniards, following with their eyes where he pointed, saw the mighty underground river plunge headlong into an abyss, not twenty yards from where they were standing!

Turning sharply in the opposite direction Coatzli led the way along a ledge so narrow that two could scarcely walk abreast. Walking along thus, with the river plunging on at their side, they proceeded for some time in silence. Again Coatzli stopped. There, before them, a straight wall rose up, stopping further progress in that direction.

At their right was the rock wall, which they had followed so far; at their left the river. But already Coatzli has solved the riddle. Pointing to a plank which extended from the bank where they were standing into the darkness beyond, he briefly said: "We must cross this."

Before the Spaniards had grasped the full meaning of his word, he was already half way across! Nothing remained but to follow. Crossing on the narrow plank, scarcely wide enough to admit of both feet being planted on it side by side, swaying under the weight of the three men, the river plunging madly beneath, and the almost palpable darkness before, made only more dense by the lurid light cast by the torches, was indeed a task that tested the nerves.

When they had safely passed over they found themselves in a vaulted passage, whose sides were curiously honeycombed.

"The burying place of the Caciques," said Coatzli; "those openings are the tombs of my ancestors."

While he spoke a curious, horrifying, undefinable sound as of thousands of cords dragging through the dust, became audible. Louder and louder it grew; it seemed to come from all sides, and now there mingled with it a blood-curdling sound, a loud angry rattling.

The tombs were alive with rattlesnakes!

And as snake after snake glided into the path, Coatzli spoke: "Welcome, ye spirits of my ancestors; ye come to behold the last of your royal race, now soon no more."

And then he did a strange thing. While his companions stood petrified with horror, he stepped into the midst of the serpents, and drawing forth a small silver flute began to play! Sad, mournful were the notes—a wild, strange dirge; and while he played a strange commotion came over the snakes, and slowly they began untwisting the strange heap, and, coiling themselves with their heads and necks extended in the air, they swayed to and fro in unison with the music.

Quicker and quicker came the notes, sharp and piercing rang the wild melody through the hall, and quicker and quicker swayed the heads to and fro, to and fro. Long it had lost the character of a dirge, it became a march, then a battle song; now it seemed to portray the fierce conflict, man to man, hand to hand. Faster and faster came the music, fiercer and fiercer sounded the strain; and faster and faster swayed the heads, fiercer and fiercer came the rattle.

Suddenly, the player paused, and every head rigidly protruded from the coils. A moment, and every snake slowly uncoiled itself and by their motions accompaning the music, which had again commenced so sad, so mournful, they retreated to their dens. When the last had disappeared, Coatzli ceased, ending with what sounded like the piercing, heartrending cry of agony.

During the whole time both Spaniards stood unable to move, fear and horror held them motionless in their grasp, and when, at the conclusion of the strange, horrible, and awful performance Coatzli, turning to them, said, "Let us proceed," it was fully a minute ere they had regained sufficient control over themselves to comply.

Passing along over the ground so shortly before occupied by a horde of rattlesnakes, not without a shudder and a fearful glance at the openings at either side, they soon gained a turn, where the passage widened sufficiently to permit them to walk together. They had gone but a few steps when the passage ended before a rudely hewn wall of solid rock. Fixing his torch into a crevice of the rock Coatzli said:

"This is the place."

"How can we get into the treasure chamber?" inquired Rodrigo.

"Wait and see," was the answer.

While yet they were talking, the Indian prostrated himself in the attitude of prayer. Before he had concluded a portion of the wall disappeared.

Digitized by Google

And to their astonished gaze was presented a small circular niche or room, hewn out of the solid rock, and filled with silver and gold cups, plates, idols, and vases, all of solid silver and gold. On one side were several jars of stone, which proved to be filled with bars and nuggets of gold.

Rodrigo stood before the entrance, amazed and dazzled, half afraid to enter, but Diego rushed into the chamber, scarcely able to contain himself with joy. Then, when he had satisfied himself that these things were indeed silver and gold, he drew his stiletto and, before the astonished Rodrigo could interfere, or even comprehend his fiendish intention, plunged it to the hilt in Coatzli's back.

The Indian staggered against the portal. Rodrigo, who attempted to rush to his rescue, was motioned back by the Indian, who, supporting himself against the entrance, turned upon his assailant a look of such withering scorn as made the wretch before him tremble. Then, dragging himself across the portal, he seized in one hand a heavy gold idol, representing the sun, and flinging it out into the hallway beyond, with the other threw the silver flute to Rodrigo.

While he was thus employed, while the blood was streaming down his back, both Spaniards, the one within the other without, were, as if spellbound, unable to move. Then Coatzli, facing Diego, spoke: "The last Cacique is indeed dying—soon he will be with his fathers. When they ask who slew me the murderer will be there, too." And before either could comprehend his intention, Coatzli staggered along the wall, fell, and the huge block forming the entrance reappeared as mysteriously as it had departed, and Diego was buried alive!

Rodrigo, as soon as he could collect his confused thoughts, comprehending at last what it meant, rushed forward just as the ponderous block slid back, but a commanding gesture from Coatzli waved him back.

"Go, you cannot save him. He dug his own grave and ——"

His words became inaudible.

Rodrigo, casting one glance at the gold before him, fled horror-stricken. How he got out he could never tell, but when he returned to San Christoval his health was broken, and he died a few years later.

Long since the pyramid has been demolished, but the treasure, the Indians say, no man can find, as two spirits—Diego and Coatzli—watch over it, and contend with any mortal who dares to seek it.

THE RIVALS.

THE sun was setting. In the shadow of Mount Ophir, almost under its rugged summit, we made camp. We had steamed some forty miles up the river Muar that day, shooting crocodiles from one of the Sultan's river launches, and at twilight my companion, Inchi Mohammed, the Tuan Hakim or Chief Justice of Muar, proposed that we stop for the night, and have a grand pig-hunt in the morning.

The messenger that was sent by a tortuous jungle path to the nearest Malay campong or village, with orders for the punghulo, or chief, to send a hundred beaters on the morrow, returned, accompanied by an escort of Malays, who begged that their Excellencies, the Tuan Hakim and the Tuan Consul, would honour the punghulo by being present at the marriage feast of his daughter, which was to occur that night.

Only too glad of a little diversion, and of a chance to get a peep into the mysteries of a Malayan wedding ceremony, I accepted with profuse thanks, and we followed our guides along an old elephant track that led through a jungle impenetrable to the eye.

The glare of the torches lit up the dense, black network of rubber vines and rattans, and exposed clusters of great elk-horn ferns and hanging orchids. The interlacing trees on either side formed a perfect arch, and gave our course the appearance of a tunnel. We stumbled from pitfall to pitfall, made by the countless footsteps of elephants, and our ejaculations of annoyance set colonies of monkeys to chattering in the black obscurity of the branches.

Long before the lights of the fires reached us from the campong, our ears were saluted with the deep, sonorous boom of the great wooden gongs, and the shriller reverberations of smaller ones of crocodile hide, telling us that the festivities were in progress.

The old punghulo met us at the edge of the clearing with many deep salaams and a stream of complimentary Malay. He was dressed, as were all his followers, in a neat silken sarong, in honour of the occasion, red sandals, and a light silken baju, or jacket. He alone was distinguished by a rimless cap, in the front of which were the arms of Johore set in brilliants.

Our appearance created a sensation. A party of half-naked youngsters, who were engaged in cock-fighting, before a great fire, crowded close up to us, and exchanged a respectful "Tabek, Tuan Hakim" with the Chief Justice. The older men, who had been sagely discussing the doings of their little world, and the present rebellion of the redoubtable Panglima Muda in the neighbouring State of Pahang, essayed to shake our hands. Even the women, who were engaged in filing the bride elect's teeth, and painting the palms of her hands and the nails of her fingers and toes red, with henna, could not resist the opportunity of coming out and saluting the head of their Courts.

Among the last to come forward was the prospective bridegroom, a small, over-dressed young man, with a hard, cruel face. His features lacked the open, kindly expression which is the chief beauty of his race. I did not like his half-servile, half-arrogant air, and mentioned my dislike to my companion.

The Chief Justice shrugged his shoulders.

"Allah is allwise!"

The old punghulo seemed unusually proud of his son-in-law that was to be, and told us over and over again that he was a sergeant in His Highness's Artillery at Bander Maharani, and that he had paid him for his daughter's hand ten slabs of tin, a hundred piculs of rice, and a kris with a gold-covered sheath.

We followed the happy old man up the rickety ladder that led into his bungalow. Its open bamboo floor was covered with beautifully woven mats of wiry lallang grass, and its palm-thatched sides were hung with gaily coloured draperies of native manufacture.

At one end, seated on a low platform, surrounded by her women, was the bride, dressed in a silken sarong, which was held in place at the waist by a zone of silver. Her kabaya, of the finest material, was fastened down the front with golden brooches. Her lace head-scarf was thrown about her shoulders, leaving uncovered her luxuriant black hair, which was twisted up on her head, and stuck full of gold pins, and a spray of sweet smelling chumpaka flower.

She was comely, almost handsome, in spite of her swollen gums, blackened teeth, and syrah-stained lips. Her round, plump, sweet little face shone out from its barbaric surroundings with a piquant individuality that attracted us at once.

She smiled graciously when her father told her of the honour we were doing her, but I thought I detected a gesture of disgust when the bridegroom came forward, and, for the first time, claimed the privilege of tasting the betel nut that she was chewing. She handed it to him with an averted face, not deigning to notice his look of rapture as he placed it in his mouth.

Digitized by Google

Her women crowded about her, and whispered their wish that her lord might take his seat beside her while we were there to witness.

She inclined her head in assent, while an angry spot of red came into either brown cheek.

As he stepped up on the daïs, amid the cry of "Suka! suka!" ("We wish it! we wish it!"), a full-grown Malayan tiger, with a low, cat-like snarl, pushed out from behind her chair. I stood looking at the intruder with flashing eyes. His lithe, yellow body was drawn back as though to spring.

Instinctively I put my hand on the butt of my revolver in anticipation of an attack.

The cries of "Suka!" commenced again.

"Lepas, Murad," said the girl sternly, and the savage beast crouched softly at her feet and closed his treacherous eyes.

No one seemed to notice this strange pet, save the bridegroom. In spite of all his swagger and assumed indifference, his small black eyes shifted continually from the form on the floor to the face of the woman. The man was a coward at heart, and the curling of the bride's lips spoke her thoughts plainer than language.

After the Syrah-box had been passed, and we had each taken a lemon-leaf, smeared it with lime, placed in it some broken fragments of the betel nut, and put the mixture into our mouths, we went outside to partake of the "honourable feast" of the bride's father, of goat and buffalo meat, of rice curry with forty sambuls, of vile smelling durians and luscious papayas, leaving the husband and wife with the women.

The white sand beneath our feet, the silver boles of the tall cocoanuts, the dark green and yellow fronds above, all caught the reflection of the fires, and formed a plaza of almost ethereal beauty.

The queer palm-thatched houses, built up six feet from the ground, filled with the flickering cocoanut oil lamps and gaily dressed women, seemed fitly set in the tropical surroundings.

I turned to my companion and said:

"The bride is not happy."

He looked up at the shimmering lacework of leaves, shrugged his shoulders once more, and answered:

"Who knows!"

I did not pursue the inquiry, but turned to watch a party of youths, naked from the waist up, who were tossing the raga, or wicker ball, from one end to another, striving to keep it from falling to the ground, by dexterous movements of their hands, feet, shoulders, and all parts of their body.

A long, piercing, blood-curdling snarl, followed by a cry of pain. I had heard it once, when a man-eating tiger had struck down a Chinese coolie within a rod of me.

The punghulo sprang to his feet, and grasped his kris from the folds of his sarong,—the kris his son-in-law had given him an hour before. With the agility of a cat he sped across the little space and up the ladder of his home.

We followed. A crowd of frightened women filled the narrow opening, all trying to escape. The old man dashed them aside, and headlong on the sand below.

A fearful scene presented itself to our view. On the floor, with his face to the roof, lay the bridegroom, his breast crushed, one arm broken. On him crouched the tiger, his eyes shining like coals, his lips drawn back, and his tail lashing his sides in quick, whiplike movements. The top of his head and his jaws were dripping with blood.

Seated on the daïs in her chair as we had left her, was the bride, with one arm extended across the back of the man's chair. From her left hand was flowing a stream of blood. In her other hand she held a small native dagger. She had fainted.

The significance of the scene flashed over me.

The look of disdain and aversion that she had cast upon her husband, the shrinking from his touch, all suggested to me a solution to the tragedy.

The girl had intentionally cut her hand so that her blood would fall directly on the tiger's nose. In an instant all the savage instincts of the beast had returned. He had tasted blood, and, true to his mistress's reasoning, had sprung on the first person that met his eye. That person was the man she loathed.

Half crazed with grief and fear, the old punghulo rushed forward, armed only with his naked kris. Before he could accomplish his mad feat, the Chief Justice caught him by the shoulder and threw him back into the crowd, at the same moment emptying two chambers of his revolver at the ferocious brute. The tiger sprang into the air with a yell of pain, and fastened his claws into the frail roofing of the house. It gave way, and he fell into the midst of the terrified throng.

Before he could strike down a single person the old chief was on him, and had stabbed him again and again.

It was all done before I could fire.

The girl opened her eyes, shuddered, and fainted again. Her women gathered about her, and carried her, with loud groans and cries, to their apartments.

After it was all over, and the dead bridegroom had been washed, shrouded in a cotton cloth, and laid out for burial, we started back to our camp.

I turned to the Chief Justice as we at last struggled out of the murky blackness of the jungle, and said, with an affected carelessness:

"Rather odd how that pet tiger came to spring on the husband of his mistress. A case of jealousy, do you suppose?"

He scanned my face intently for a moment in the flare of the torches, then raised his expressive shoulders, and muttered:

"Allah alone is wise."

NOTICE.

In the issue of PEARSON'S WEEKLY,

PUBLISHED ON

SATURDAY, JANUARY 26th,

Commences a New Serial Story by

GEORGE GRIFFITH, Author of

"THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR," &c., &c.

PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO

OF

FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES.

No. 3 NOW ON SALE, PRICE SIXPENCE.

Nos. 1 & 2 were sold out immediately on publication, so purchase No. 3 at once.

Digitized by Google

By George Griffith,

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," &c.

SUMMARY.

Max Renault—leading spirit of Anarchist Autonomie Group No. 7, who has joined the Utopians (a Socialistic colony on an island in the South Pacific) in order to steal the air-ship they are building, which he succeeds in doing.

Franz Hartog—a German engineer, in league with Renault, who steals a very fast torpedo-boat destroyer from the Russian Government to levy blackmail on the Atlantic.

Sir Harry Milton—a wealthy young English nobleman, who by chance comes across the island of Utopia in his yacht, the Calypso, and subsequently devotes the whole of his fortune to hunting down Renault and Hartog.

Herbert Wyndham—a lieutenant in the British Navy who is travelling with Sir Harry for the benefit of his health, and who determines to resign his commission and couple his energies with those of Sir Harry in destroying the Anarchists, on account of the fact that he has been stabbed by Renault when the latter attempts to carry off Violet in the air-ship.

Frederick Austen—the inventor of the air-ship, who shares its secret with Edward Adams, Dr. Edwards, and Ambrose Millar, three other Utopians.

Frank Markham—the young captain of the Utopian yacht, Mermaid.

Violet Milton—Sir Harry's sister, and Lieutenant Wyndham's sweetheart, is fearfully injured by throwing herself out of the air-ship on which Renault has tried to carry her off.

Lea Cassilis (alias Mme. Dail)—a member of Autonomie Group No. 7, with whom Renault is in love.

Dora Merton—a fair Utopian, who has made an impression on Sir Harry.

Lucy Summers—another fair Utopian.

Renault, after levying blackmail with Hartog on the high seas, returns to Utopia with the object of destroying the colony, but finds it deserted. After a time he goes to Europe in the air-ship Vengeur, and together with Lea Cassilis visits the Criterion Theatre, in London, where he is recognised by Sir Harry, and Lieutenant Wyndham, who effect his capture. He is tried and condemned to death, but is rescued while on the way to the scaffold by his confederates in the air-ship. London is then bombarded by the Vengeur. The Utopians in England have built an air-ship, and just as Sir Harry and his friends have started, three other air-ships appear on the scene. An aerial battle ensues in which, of the three Anarchist ships, one is destroyed, another escapes, and the third is captured.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Prisoners of War.

"The irony of fate!" exclaimed Mr. Austen, as the reply floated up out of the depths. "To think that our first prize of war should be the poor old Volante, as we meant to call her—the ship that we all spent so much thought and labour over in Utopia, and which I so fondly fancied was going to enable us to compel all the nations of the world to keep the peace—and here we meet her in our first battle!"

"Yes, queer enough certainly," laughed Sir Harry somewhat bitterly. "That's just how the Fates seem to delight in making fools of us." Then he turned to the open slide and sang out again in reply to the Anarchists' hail: "I suppose you know that surrender means being taken to Newcastle and handed over to the police."

"Dat is vat I suppose it does mean," came the answer. "It's not likely you are going to be kind enough to gif us a free passage to some safe blace, and set us at liberty. Ve know dat you can blow us into blazes and little bits if you like, and so ve vould rader go and see de police."

If Sir Harry had been a good deal closer than he was, he would have heard Franz Hartog—whom the reader will already have recognised in the commander of the crippled air-ship—mutter to himself in conclusion: "Dere is some chance to get avay from de police, but by de beard of Gambrinus dere is none to get avay from dose guns!"

"All right," replied Sir Harry. "How many men have you got on board?"

"Dere are eight besides mineself."

He clambered slowly up the ladder.

"Send them all up on deck, and look sharp about it," said Sir Harry. "Now, Mr. Austen," he continued, "it won't do to give those chaps any chance of treachery, and if you'll leave this business to me I think I have a plan that will make it impossible."

"With pleasure," said Mr. Austen. "You do just as you think best, and I'll keep an eye on them from here in case they do attempt any tricks."

"Thanks; then will you bring the War-Hawk right over her, and lower her to about thirty feet above her?"

So saying, he left the conning-tower, called the crew together, leaving a man stationed at each of the forward guns, and briefly explained what he was going to do. Two long rope ladders were then dropped through two slides in the lower part of the gun-room of the War-Hawk, which sank slowly down until their ends touched the deck of the Vengeur, so that they hung clear between her after lifting fan and the one in front of it. The two forward guns were now useless, so Sir Harry called the men from them, and told them to load two of the vertical bomb-tubes. Then he went to one of the slides and called down to the Vengeur, whose crew were now standing by the masts on the narrow deck.

"Are you all on deck?"

Digitized by Google

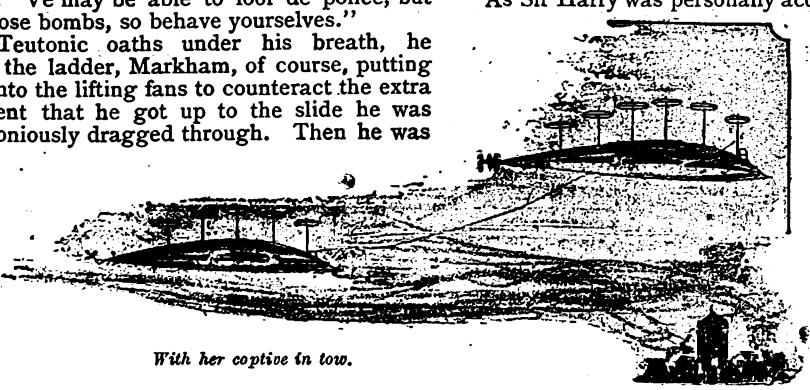
"Jah, ve are all here except de man at the engines. Do you vant us to come up de ladder?"

"Yes, but only one by one. If you're the captain, come up first by the starboard ladder. No nonsense, mind! Our bomb-tubes are loaded, and the moment I even think you are up to any tricks I'll blow you to pieces. Up you come, now!"

There was no choice save between obedience and destruction, and so Franz turned to his men and said:

"You hear dat, boys? De game is up for de present, so don't try any tricks. Ve may be able to fool de police, but ve can't argue mit dose bombs, so behave yourselves."

Then, growling Teutonic oaths under his breath, he clambered slowly up the ladder, Markham, of course, putting a little extra power into the lifting fans to counteract the extra weight. The moment that he got up to the slide he was seized, and unceremoniously dragged through. Then he was tied hand and foot, and meanwhile one of the War-Hawk's men climbed down the other ladder and took his place on the Vengeur's deck. The moment he got there he whipped a couple of revolvers out of his belt and covered the Anarchists. Then Sir Harry called out again:



With her captive in tow.

"Now then, next man, up you come!"

The second Anarchist at once commenced the ascent to captivity. As he went up, another War-Hawk went down, and so the two crews exchanged places until five of the Anarchists, including Hartog, were lying bound in the gun-room, and five of the War-Hawk's men were on board the Vengeur. These speedily tied up the remainder of her crew, and then took charge of her engines. Then a rope was passed down from the stern of the War-Hawk and made fast to the Vengeur's bow, and when all was ready Sir Harry went back to the conning-tower.

"Very neatly done indeed, Sir Harry," said Mr. Austen. "This will be a very pleasant little surprise to the good people in Newcastle. By the way, have you learnt whether or not Renault was on board any of the ships?"

"No, I haven't," laughed Sir Harry. "I tried to get it out of that little brute of a German, who—would you believe it?—is Franz Hartog, the man who stole the Russian torpedo boat, and turned her into the Destroyer, but he cursed me by all his gods and told me to find out for myself. Still, I believe he was on that one that escaped, because when I indulged in a little politic romance and told him we had blown her to pieces, he let out a gasp of genuine disgust which there was no mistaking."

"And so he's Franz Hartog, is he?" said Mr. Austen, lifting his eye-brows. "Then if that's so, whether Renault has got away or not, we can congratulate ourselves on having made the next important capture to him. I expect by this time Herr Franz is pretty sorry that he didn't stick to sea piracy instead of taking to the air."

"Yes," laughed Sir Harry. "He is about the most disgusted man I ever saw."

"All right for towing now, Mr. Austen," came a message from the engine-room, as Sir Harry ceased speaking.

"Very well," he replied down the tube. "Go slowly at first and quicken up gradually. Don't bring too much strain on the rope at once."

Then the War-Hawk's propellers began to revolve and she moved away to the eastward with her captive in tow at an increasing speed that gradually quickened up to fifty miles an hour. A little over an hour's towing brought the lights of Newcastle once more beneath them.

A long blur of darkness to the north-east marked the position of Jesmond Dene and Armstrong Park. Sir Harry knew the topography of Newcastle perfectly, and under his guidance the two air-ships crossed the town unseen, above the clouds of smoke that were rising from the conflagrations, and dropped like shadows on to the open space between the clump of trees and the old watch tower overlooking the now deserted valley of Armstrong Park.

It was now after ten o'clock at night, but the fire brigades were still working hard in extinguishing the fires which had been started by the Anarchist fire-shells, and nearly the whole population was out in the streets in a state of excitement bordering on panic, waiting for the air-ship to reappear in the skies and complete her work by bringing the doom of Central London upon Newcastle.

As Sir Harry was personally acquainted both with the Mayor and Captain Nicholls, the Chief of Police, he thought it would be better for him to go personally to explain the strange occurrences which had brought them with their prisoners to the town. As soon, therefore, as the air-ships touched ground he landed and went to the gate-lodge, where a brief explanation and a sovereign quickly secured his exit.

Crossing "Sir William's Bridge" he was lucky enough to be overtaken by an unoccupied cab, and in this he drove straight to the Police Station in Pilgrim Street, where he found the Mayor in consultation with the Chief Constable, discussing plans for obtaining protection for the town in case the panic in the streets should degenerate into riot. His card secured his immediate admission to the chief's private room, for his connection with the Aerial Navigation Syndicate was well known, and in addition to this his personal influence in the county, and his acquaintance with the Mayor, made him doubly welcome at such a moment.

"Good evening, Sir Harry!" said the Mayor, rising from his seat when he entered, and holding out his hand. "We were talking about you only a moment ago. I suppose you know we are in terrible trouble? The Anarchists have been bombarding the town from one of their air-ships. When is your Syndicate going to get its fleet afloat and hunt these scoundrels from the air? And where have you come from, by the way? Have you dropped from the clouds?"

"That is just exactly what I have done," laughed Sir Harry, as he shook hands with him and the Chief of Police. "I have just come down in one of those very ships, and what's more I've brought an Anarchist ship with me, and all her crew prisoners of war; so all you have got to do is to send out the prison-van to Armstrong Park, and bring them home and lock them up."

The Mayor and Captain Nicholls stared at him for a moment in blank astonishment. He had told his startling tidings in as matter-of-fact a voice as if he had been asking them to dinner, and it took some time for them to grasp the full meaning of what he said. Then the Mayor found his voice again, and exclaimed:

"What! You have captured the air-ship and brought the scoundrels on board her prisoners into Armstrong Park? I thought the age of miracles was past, but if you've done that it isn't, and the thanks of the two towns will be yours, for you have done them the greatest service that anyone could do them. As you can see for yourself, the scoundrels have set Newcastle and Gateshead on fire in about a dozen places, besides wrecking twenty or thirty buildings with their shells."

"Stop a moment," said Sir Harry; "I haven't fully explained myself yet. I am sorry to say we have not captured the particular air-ship that did the damage. You'll scarcely believe me, but she has got clear away, although we were floating over her at the very time she was firing on the town. We did not fire on her, because, you see, if we had done so, every shot that missed her would have struck you; while if we had hit her, she would have come down with about a ton of explosives on board and levelled half Newcastle with the ground."

Digitized by Google

"I see! I see!" said the Mayor. "Of course you couldn't. But which air-ship is it that you've captured?"

"There were three of them," replied Sir Harry. "They came to attack us this evening on one of the Farne Islands on which we built the ship I have come in, but we just managed to give them the slip. We have destroyed one, captured another, and, as I say, the one that fired on you has escaped. But I'll tell you something else we've done. We've caught Franz Hartog, that brute of a German engineer who stole the torpedo destroyer from Elbing, and committed all those horrors on the Atlantic. So you'll have quite a distinguished prisoner you see."

"That's glorious news, isn't it!" exclaimed the Mayor, turning to the Chief of Police. "I needn't say I hope you'll hold him tight when you get him."

"There's no fear of that," was the reply. "If walls and doors will hold them they won't slip through my fingers, I can tell you. But now, Sir Harry, I suppose you want them fetched at once?" continued the Captain. "So, with your Worship's permission, I'll get out the van and have a guard of mounted men ready to go with it."

"Very well," said the Mayor. "It will be better not to lose any time about it, for it will pacify the people wonderfully when they know we have got them under lock and key. And now, Sir Harry, while they're getting ready, sit down and tell me this wonderful story over again."

In a quarter of an hour the Chief returned to say that the van was ready, and that the Mayor's carriage was waiting to take him and Sir Harry to the Park. The two vehicles rattled away up Pilgrim Street towards Jesmond Road with their escort trotting on either side of them, to part the crowd that filled the great thoroughfare, and within an hour Franz Hartog and the crew of the Vengeur were safely stowed away in the compartments of the prison van, and on their way back to the cells.

The news of the capture spread like wildfire through the towns, and was immediately telegraphed all over the country, to be reproduced with unexpected effects, as events proved, in all the morning papers.

The good people of Newcastle would fain have lionised Sir Harry, and made a public spectacle of his marvellous craft, but as the War-Hawk was already over-due at Lundy he declined even the Mayor's invitation to sleep at his house, and, as soon as he had seen the Anarchists safely within the grim, black walls of the gaol in Carliol Square, he returned to the Park, and the War-Hawk, with the Vengeur still in tow, rose into the air amidst a mighty roar of cheers from the thousands who had gathered on the great viaduct and about the Park gates to catch a glimpse of the now famous vessel. She flashed farewell with her search-lights and sped away up into the clouds en route for Lundy Island.

She flashed farewell with her search-lights.

CHAPTER XL.

MAX TO THE RESCUE.

THE next morning the whole country was ringing with the fame of the War-Hawk and her exploits. The reaction from the horror and panic induced by the merciless revenge which Renault had taken upon London to the cheering certainty that, after all, the world was not to be given over unresisting to the fury of its worst enemies, and that at last the Syndicate had brought into existence a power capable of successfully disputing the empire of the air with them, sent the nation almost wild with delight.

Of course the newspapers published voluminous accounts, necessarily imaginative, of the aerial combats between the War-Hawk and the Anarchist vessels, and more reliable if no less highly coloured narratives of her coming with her prisoners of war to Newcastle. Once more Sir Harry's portrait appeared in all the illustrated periodicals, together with alleged pictures of his wonderful vessel, which represented her under a variety of forms, from that of a flying torpedo boat to that of a gigantic bird with screw propellers instead of a tail.

Once more the whole nation was talking about nothing but the Anarchists and the Syndicate, and the hostile fleets of air-ships which the popular imagination multiplied until they were numerous enough to have shaken the heavens and devastated the earth in their conflicts.

All this was perfectly natural and indeed inevitable, and yet, as events speedily proved, it was the very worst thing that could possibly have happened. Three days passed without any of the air-ships belonging to either side having made a sign of their existence. The Vengeur had been taken to Lundy Island, and placed for repairs on the slips on which the Volante had been put together, after which both the Volante and the War-Hawk had vanished to destinations unknown to any but the directors of the Syndicate.

Then, on the early morning of the fourth day after Hartog and his ship-mates had been placed in durance vile, Newcastle woke up to find itself placarded, just as London had been, with the ominous red posters which demanded the immediate and unconditional release of the prisoners under pain of aerial bombardment.

The message from the enemy was brief and to the point. By ten o'clock Hartog and his companions were to be put on board a steam launch and taken ten miles out to sea, where they would be picked up by an air-ship. If a white flag was not hoisted over the police-station to show that this had been done, the bombardment would begin at half-past ten.

Digitized by Google

There was no doubt this time as to whether the threats would be fulfilled or not. The experience of London conclusively showed what the fate of Newcastle would be if the order was disobeyed. The feeling of relief that had been enjoyed since the capture of the Vengeur instantly gave place to panic again.

The Mayor at once telegraphed to the offices of the Syndicate and to the Home Office, imploring assistance and the protection of the aerial fleet which was believed to be in existence. Of course, the Government could do nothing. It had no engine of warfare at its disposal that could cope for an instant with the Anarchist air-ships, and Mr. Maxim telegraphed back in the name of the Syndicate saying that the only two available vessels were beyond the reach of communications, and reminding the authorities that, having taken no precautions to insure secrecy, they could only expect the Anarchists would be informed of what had happened by the newspapers and would naturally do as they had done.

With this cold comfort Newcastle was obliged to be content. The authorities were confronted with what was in sober truth a very terrible dilemma. On the one hand, there was the dignity of the law to be vindicated; and on the other, there was a practically impossible penalty to be paid for doing so. To yield meant to confess before all the world that the forces of Anarchy were superior to those of civilisation and order, and so, to all intents and purposes, held the world for the time being at their mercy; while to resist meant to consign one of the wealthiest and most populous towns of the kingdom to destruction and carnage horrible beyond all description.

What had happened a few nights before, terrible and all as it had been, would be as nothing to what was now threatened, for the placard distinctly stated that the town would be bombarded by a fleet of twenty air-ships, that they would destroy friend with foe, and that if Hartog and his companions died their tomb would be the ruins of Newcastle and Gateshead.

What was to be done? At half-past eight the Mayor, in an agony of perplexity, telegraphed to the Home Office for precise instructions. He said that the prisoners had been before the magistrates two days previously, had been formally committed for trial, and were now lying in the town gaol, awaiting the assizes. In an hour the reply came back, to the effect that the law was to take its course at all hazards. The moment this decision became known, the population of the two towns revolted en masse, and turned out into the streets, vowing that the prisoners should be released if they pulled the gaol down with their own hands to do it.

The psychological moment had arrived, and the habit of respect for the law suddenly succumbed to the irresistible terror which affected everyone in precisely the same way. All had lives and homes to lose, most had families and property as well. The rich man feared for his mansion just as the artisan feared for his cottage. Rich and poor were, for the moment, united in the presence of an impending fate which would make no distinctions of class or fortune.

The elementary idea upon which all law is founded—the preservation of life, peace, and property—was suddenly inverted. To obey the law meant to lose everything that the law was supposed to safeguard. In other words, a power stronger than the law had sprung into existence and annulled it at a stroke.

There was no time for demonstrations or speech-making or discussion. The Watch Committee of the Town Council had been sitting since seven o'clock. The streets were full of angry and excited multitudes animated by a single purpose, and the town authorities were speedily made aware of what that purpose was.

Considering the terrible and unparalleled position in which he was placed, the Mayor acted with wonderful coolness and discretion. Staunch respecter of the law as he was, he clearly saw, as the moment for making a final decision grew rapidly nearer, that to obey the law was to defeat it. Half a dozen troops of lancers and as many companies of infantry, with the whole police force, had so far sufficed to keep the crowd clear of the police-station and the gaol; but he knew that the moment the first shell fell from the sky it would be the signal for panic, universal and ungovernable, in the midst of which the military and civil forces would be helpless, even if, by some miracle, they were not infected by it.

Sir Harry's portrait appeared in all the illustrated periodicals.

Therefore, after a brief discussion with his colleagues, he telegraphed back to the Home Office to say that the town was practically in revolt, and that, unless the Government could furnish him with the means of protecting life and property and upholding the authority of the law, he would be compelled to take the responsibility of releasing the prisoners.

This message was despatched at a quarter to ten, but the Mayor had determined not to obey the summons of the Anarchists until the very last moment—until, in fact, their air-ship appeared in the sky in fulfilment of their threat.

All but official telegraphic communication between Newcastle and London had been stopped. In five minutes the message was being read off to the Home Secretary. In ten more two other messages were being flashed back to Newcastle.

One was to the colonel commanding the troops in the town ordering him to bring the prisoners by special train to London at all hazards, and directing him to acquaint the Mayor with his instructions. The other was to the senior captain of the coast defence squadron stationed in the Tyne ordering him to close the river until the prisoners were on their way to London.

By a quarter past ten the town was practically under martial law. The Mayor bowed to circumstances, ended the sitting of the Town Council, and retired to his private room to await the issue of events he could not longer control. The colonel in command of the troops made his way with a strong guard to the gaol and requested the governor to have the prisoners at once removed to the station, where a special train was already being made up.

The excitement of the populace had now risen to the pitch of frenzy, but the knowledge that the magazine rifles of the Infantry and the carbines of the Cavalry were loaded with ball cartridge, prevented any actual outbreak for the time being. Just as the half hour sounded from the tower of St. Nicholas the gates of the gaol opened and the prison van came out from the deep archway under the first entrance tower.

The same moment a mighty roar of terror went up from the throats of the hundreds of thousands of people filling the Manors, Erick Street, Croft Street, and all the approaches to Carliol Square, save Worswick Street and the space in front of the gaol gateway, which were kept clear by the police and the soldiers, and thousands of hands were pointed upwards to the sky. From a score of points all round the town the dreaded air-ships were rapidly approaching.

Digitized by Google

They stopped at a height of about fifteen hundred feet, plainly in view of everyone against the clear sky. One of them, flying a plain blood-red flag from her flagstaff astern, swept down swiftly in the direction of the gaol, and stopped five hundred feet from the ground and about seven hundred yards in a straight line from the gates where the guard was drawn up round the prison van. The moment she came to a standstill, the colonel raised his sword and ordered his men to fire on her.

The rifles went up with mechanical precision, but before a trigger could be pulled three streams of fire spouted from the air-ship's broadside and a storm of Maxim bullets was poured into the broad open space in front of the gaol. Horses and men went down under it in huddled heaps to the ground. The colonel was almost the first man to fall, and before the withering hail had been raining down for five minutes there was neither man nor horse left alive within fifty yards of the prison van.

The crowds that had been watching for its departure surged back, screaming with terror, and treading its weaker members under foot in its mad rush for shelter from the bullets of the terrible machine guns. At the same moment, the other air-ships opened a converging fire of shells from twenty points upon the devoted town and the crowds who thronged the streets.

Instantly the prisoners were forgotten, and all control was at an end. Buildings were collapsing in every direction under the frightful energy of the explosives rained upon them, and hurricanes of bullets were sweeping along the streets. In the midst of the indescribable panic which now reigned supreme, the air-ship with the red flag ran forward and dropped to within fifty feet of the ground close by the prison van. She was the Revanche, Renault's new flagship, and the same craft which had so narrowly escaped destruction by the War-Hawk four days before.

Her fore and aft guns sent shell after shell down the Manors and into the ends of Worswick Street and Erick Street, until she floated over a solitude cumbered with ruins and strewn with hundreds of corpses. Then a rope ladder dropped to the ground from one of her ports, a couple of men descended, went to the van and took the keys from the corpse of a policeman lying by the step, rapidly opened the doors, and brought the handcuffed prisoners out.

They were all there, Hartog and the eight men who had been so ignominiously captured on board the Vengeur. Their handcuffs were speedily unlocked, and, as soon as his hands were free, Franz ran towards the air-ship crying:

"Ach, mein lieber Max! I knew you vould come for us. I tought you vere not de man to run avay and leave your friendt in trouble. How did you know dat ve vere in de van?"

"I guessed it, my friend," replied Max, who was leaning out of one of the port-holes laughing at the comical figure presented by the little German in his unwonted excitement. "My glasses showed me the soldiers round it, and I felt pretty sure that they wouldn't honour anyone but you with a military escort."

"Ah! jah, and vere is dat escort now?" chuckled Franz, looking round with an evil grin at the mangled and riddled corpses of the unhappy red-coats. "I vonder ven dese fools vill learn dat dey can only fight air-ships mit air-ships?"

"Well, you ought to be able to teach them," laughed Max in reply. "How the deuce did you let yourselves get taken prisoners like a lot of tame pigeons?"

"Mein friendt—if you had had one of dose shells bursting among your propellers, and blowing holes in your stern like ve had, I don't tink you vould have been able to run avay quite as fast as you did," snapped Franz, and the retort was so smartly turned that Max himself could not help joining in the laugh that it raised against him.

"I fought and ran away so as I could fight another day," he said, when the laugh had died away. "And it's a precious good job for you that I did. But come along, we can't stop here talking all day. Up you come, all of you! We are missing half the fun. Stand by, there, to put more power on to the fans," he continued, turning towards the interior of the ship, and as the released prisoners climbed one by one up the ladder the lifting fans revolved faster and faster, and as soon as the last had got on board the Revanche rose slowly into the air, her propellers spun round until she was moving at a speed of sixty miles an hour, and the added weight, supported by the air-planes, was no longer felt.

As soon as he was on a level with the other ships, Max visited them one after the other until he had distributed the late crew of the Vengeur among eight of them. Meanwhile the bombardment had been kept up by the whole fleet with pitiless vigour.

When he had transferred the last of the Vengeur's men, he said to Franz, whom he had kept on board the Revanche with him:

Franz ran towards the air-ship.

"I think that's lesson enough for them for the present. The next time we ask them to oblige us, perhaps they will be a little more civil about it. We've got a better use for our ammunition than this. François, hoist the signal to cease firing, and then the one for the fleet to collect."

"Vat for is dat?" asked Franz, with a look of undisguised disappointmont. "Vat better use could you have for your ammunition dan burning dose rats out down dere? Mein Gott, see vat blazes! Dere von't be half de town left by evening. I don't see how you can find a finer game dan dis."

"Can't I?" laughed Max. "You wait till we get on the other side of the North Sea, and you'll see. I had news last night that the French and Russian fleets are going to break the British blockade of the Sound to-night, and I don't see why we shouldn't have a share of the fun. You see, they'll be battering each other to pieces on the water, and as we love one of them just about as much as the other, well just get above them and——"

"And make a tree-cornered fight of it, and smash dem all up mit a fine and generous impartiality!" interrupted Franz, bringing his hands together with a sounding clap. "Friendt Max, you are a genius! Dat vill be something like sport. Dis is no better as burning haystacks beside it. Let us go at vonce, in case dey begin before ve come."

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE BLUE LETTER

"YOUR last evening in Russia, Charlie," said Ivan Zosemoff, my brother-in-law, as we strolled along the side of the quay at Dolganief in the cool of the evening. "Well, shall you be glad to get back to old England?"

I shook my head very energetically in reply. Ivan shrugged his shoulders with an air of comic despair.

"Well, I must say you are unpatriotic," he observed. "Here am I, in my own country, longing to be back in England, while you, an Englishman—I beg your pardon, an English boy——"

"Don't happen to have a wife in London, and am therefore less eager to get back," I interrupted.

"If Peter Petrovitch wasn't telling me lies," I went on, "I missed a good adventure this afternoon. He says there was a riot down by the Haymarket; the police pounced upon a meeting of the 'Red Fingers,' and fired upon them when they resisted. Didn't you hear about it? Two of the Nihilists were shot, but their companions got them clear away; and Peter Petrovitch says they are hidden in the city somewhere, and haven't been found yet. I wish I had been there."

Ivan had been glancing round rather uneasily all the while I was speaking. He stopped me now with a low "hush!"—and, looking behind me I saw a man apparently following us, his face muffled up closely and with his hat down over his eyes.

The stranger did not pass us, as I thought he was about to do by the way in which he came up. Instead, he turned and, taking off his hat with great politeness, addressed my brother-in-law.

"Ivan Zosemoff, I believe?"

"That is so," said Ivan, shortly, letting the match in his fingers burn itself out. As it flared up I saw that Ivan was suddenly looking quite pale.

"Perhaps you will come back and take a turn with me on the quay," said the stranger, in the same tone of studied politeness. "I am Nicholas Petrowsky, and I have a message from my brother——"

"Peter Petrowsky!" exclaimed Ivan; and as I struck another match to see Petrowsky's face, I noticed that Ivan was more disturbed than ever. "He quarrelled with me last night," he said.

"Yes—I think that is why he wishes to see you. He is dying."

Ivan turned, and said to me in English:

"Perhaps you had better go, Charlie. I will join you at the hotel some time to-night."

"And lose the chance of an adventure," I answered. "Well, I call it a thundering shame!"

My brother-in-law smiled faintly.

"I wish you could have had the adventure alone. Listen! Six years ago, when I was young and impetuous, I joined the Society of the Red Finger here at Dolganief. A week later, when I found in its midst more thirst for murder and revenge than for the welfare of the people, I was anxious to leave it. Fortunately I was allowed to retire, thanks mainly to the influence of this Peter Petrowsky who wishes to see me. I dare not neglect the summons. But you——."

"Will stick to you, old man, like a leech."

"You had better let our friend think you speak only English, then," replied Ivan; and he turned to Petrowsky and explained to him in Russian that I was English and that I wished to accompany him.

"Ah, the English are always friends of freedom!" said Petrowsky, with a bow of greater politeness than before; and I almost forgot to wait for Ivan to translate the remark before bowing in return and saying that I hoped so.

As we left the quay-side again, to turn down the dark, narrow thoroughfare where Petrowsky first accosted us, he proposed that we should walk slowly along smoking, so as not to attract attention.

It struck me then for the first time that the man we were about to see must be one of those about whom Peter Petrovitch, the hotel waiter, had told me—the "Red Fingers"—who had been wounded by the police and hidden away by friends.

"Before we go any further," said Petrowsky, when we had crossed the deserted square and turned into another dark, lonely street of dilapidated buildings, "I must extract a promise from you."

"And your condition?" inquired Ivan impatiently.

"My friends' condition is that you agree, before accompanying me to my brother's side, to remain there for twelve hours, which will place it out of your power to do us harm."

Ivan drew out his watch.

"It is nearly nine o'clock," he said. "My ship is to sail at eleven to-morrow. It is cutting it rather fine."

"Unfortunately, I am not allowed to alter the terms. It is hard to deny a dying man's request; but, of course, if you cannot keep the arrangement of my friends, we must part here."

"And Peter Petrowsky wants to ask me to forgive something?" said Ivan, almost to himself.

"And is more anxious than I can describe to see you," added Petrowsky. "Well—your decision, Mr. Zosemoff?"

"In return, will you pledge me your word that in twelve hours I shall be allowed to depart without further restriction?"

"Certainly."

"Then I pledge you my word as a gentleman, to remain," said Ivan.

A few minutes later we had turned up an almost pitch-dark alley; and Petrowsky, whispering to us to follow him, unlocked a door which we could not see in the obscurity. Then, after closing it behind him, he commenced to grope his way before us up a broken and uneven staircase. He did not pause till we were on the third landing, where we could see a faint light shining beneath the door of one of the rooms. Petrowsky gave a peculiar whistle, and the door was thrown open, showing a large room, which might have been used for a workshop or warehouse, and which at first sight, as one peered into it from the darkness, appeared to be full of people.

There were only five there, I noticed, as I stood within and looked around—three sitting beside a low smouldering fire, which, with two flaring candles, lighted the room, and two lying on some straw which was scattered over the floor.

The men by the fire stared at us as we entered. One with a big black beard spoke to Nicholas Petrowsky, our guide.

"He has promised?" he inquired.

Petrowsky nodded.

"And the youngster?"

"He is English, and does not count."

As Petrowsky spoke, he was bending over one of the figures on the floor.

"He is alive and knows you have come," he said, looking up and speaking to Ivan, who still stood in the doorway. Then my brother-in-law went over and knelt down in the straw by the dying man's side; but I hardly noticed their greeting, for I was fascinated.

The other man, who was reclining beside Peter Petrowsky appeared, like him, to be wounded, and as I entered the room he fixed his eyes upon me, and I could not keep mine from his face. It was deathly pale and bore traces of a recent encounter, and a linen bandage was bound round his temples. He lay in the straw with his head raised a little, his lips moving as though he were speaking to himself. His terrible eyes fascinated me, holding me spell-bound.

Digitized by Google

I wished to listen to what Peter Petrowsky had to say to my brother-in-law, but I could not tear myself away from that terrible face. I do not know how long I had been gazing at it—at the eyes that were glaring straight into mine—when suddenly the man half rose and raised his hand towards me.

"It is very cold this evening," he said quietly.

I was so utterly surprised at this commonplace remark from a man who seemed to me to be dying that I almost laughed; and, forgetful of Ivan's caution, I should have answered the remark in Russian if the man himself had not spoken again after a moment's pause.

"It is colder in the mines," he said; and then he fell back.

The men sitting round the fire had all risen at his first words, exchanging glances. One of them came over now and knelt down beside him.

"Poor Alexander Romanoff is dead," he said simply, as he looked at him.

In a little while Ivan came over to me. He looked ill, poor fellow, and his cheeks were as white as death.

"Come, Charlie—we must go at once," he said, putting his hand upon my shoulder.

"What is the matter?" I asked.

"Petrowsky has denounced me to the police and given an exaggerated account of my connection with the society. It is all up with me unless I can get out of Russia at once or stop Petrowsky's letter. The government have no mercy on 'Red Fingers.' Oh, why did I leave England, where I was in safety? Oh, Eleanor, Eleanor!"

"Stopping a letter. What letter?" I asked.

"One which Peter Petrowsky wrote this morning to the Head of the Police here at Dolganief. My poor friend is suffering terrible remorse now, and is as anxious as I am to have his letter stopped. But I am afraid it must have been delivered an hour ago."

"But may be still unread. Has he described it to you?"

"Yes, poor fellow; he has done all he could. It is large, he tells me, for it contains letters of mine. The envelope is blue, and there is a large seal on the back in green wax."

"Come," I said, "we must go at once and visit the Head of the Police, and invent some story to induce him to give it up."

"No," said Ivan. "That would be running into the lion's mouth. I must disguise myself and go to another port. They will be waiting to arrest me on the vessel to-morrow; not a moment is to be lost!"

As he spoke he took up his hat and stick and moved towards the door. Nicholas Petrowsky walked slowly across to it and put his back against it.

"You seem to be forgetting your promise, Mr. Zosemoff," he said quietly.

Ivan started. We had both of us entirely forgotten the promise he had made to remain twelve hours in Peter Petrowsky's hiding-place.

"But you hear," Ivan pleaded passionately, addressing himself to Nicholas Petrowsky and forgetting he had given me the news in English, "your brother has denounced me to the police. If I do not escape at once, I shall never see England again. I have a wife there waiting for me. You cannot keep me to my promise!"

"Why has he denounced you?" he asked.

"Six years ago I was in the society of the Red Finger——"

"And left it? Then you must look for no mercy from us," he said coldly.

Ivan's white forehead was covered with moisture. Suddenly he rushed to Peter Petrowsky's side.

"Your dying brother will speak for me," he said. "Good Heavens"—as he turned—"he is dead!"

Nicholas Petrowsky crossed over to where his brother lay; the other men all turned. I thought the opportunity too good to be lost, and, conquering an inclination to faint, slipped noiselessly out at the door. I had given no promise, and I was determined to get hold of that large blue letter with the green seal before it was opened by the Head of the Dolganief Police.

Once out in the street I was safe. The private house of General Vanrow, the Head of the Dolganief Police, was not far from our hotel; Peter Petrovitch, the waiter, had pointed it out to me. While I was making my way towards it through the narrow streets filled by people of the lowest class, a man suddenly ran out of a dark entry which I was passing, and before I knew what he was about, had snatched my watch out of my pocket and run away with it. I did not pursue him; the theft delighted me. I had been racking my brains to think of some pretext for getting into the house of the Chief of Police, and here Providence had furnished me with one.

It was not long before I had reached the place, passed the sentry at the gate, and was ringing at the door-bell, although I had only the most vague idea as to what I should do when it was answered.

The door was opened by a muscular-looking footman, to whom, in accordance with Russian etiquette, I presented a couple of kopecks before inquiring if his master were at home. The man looked at the money, pocketed it in a leisurely manner, and replied that his master was not at home. I had been fearing the two kopecks were not sufficient, so I presented the man with two more, and said it was really very important that I should see the Head of Police at once; to which the footman replied with more friendliness, after pocketing his fee, that General Vanrow was at the neighbouring town of Doushkin, and would be back possibly at midnight.

"Your master has not been at home all day?" I asked.

"He has been away since yesterday."

"And his letters—who has opened them?" I inquired, anxious to gain as much information as possible. "My business is about a letter," I explained.

"The letters have not been opened."

"Mr. Vanrow will open them to-night?"

"Yes, he is pretty certain to do so. He always glances at his letters the first thing on entering the house when he has been away."

The man was growing impatient and prepared to close the door, but I prevented him by putting my foot against it.

"My business is very important. I will wait your master's arrival," I said.

I tried to keep calm, even when the footman refused point-blank to allow me to wait, saying he would be dismissed at once if he allowed anybody to bother his master at such an unseasonable hour, when he would be worn out with his journey. I had five kopecks left in my pocket. I gave the man one to prolong his conversation; with the other four I was contemplating the purchase of the compromising letter. This promised, however, to be a ticklish matter.

"Among your master's letters," I said, rushing to the point before the effect of my douceur had passed off, "do you remember one in a blue envelope—a bulky one sealed with a green seal?"

"I remember it perfectly," the man said in a tone which encouraged me. "It arrived this afternoon."

"That letter was sent in a moment of passion," I went on. "The sender wished it unsent."

"Well," asked my listener in a tone which did not encourage me much—"well, what do you want me to do?"

"I have here four kopecks. To-morrow I can bring you much more, if you will allow me to take back that letter to the man who sent it, and who immediately afterwards wished it unsent."

I had misjudged the man. He made no reply, but the next moment had slammed the door in my face; and I found myself standing alone in the porch. However, I would not give up the case as hopeless, but stood there waiting, at intervals ringing the bell, till at last one of the sentinels in front of the house came and turned me away.

I wandered round and round the house and grounds, exciting the curiosity, I have no doubt, of the lazy-looking sentries who were placed at wide intervals round it. One of them standing outside a small door in the garden wall at the back, who seemed to eye me more curiously than the rest, startled me, as I was passing him for the third time, by saying, almost in a whisper:

Digitized by Google

"It is very cold this evening."

They were the very words which had been ringing in my ears ever since the wounded Nihilist fell dead immediately after uttering them. Almost mechanically I uttered the dying man's other remark:

"It is colder in the mines."

I was surprised at the effect of my words; instantly the man threw open the door before which he stood, and almost thrust me through into the dark garden.

"Quick!" he whispered. "There is a light in the supper-room; his library is below!"

The next moment I heard the door close behind me, and I was left alone to meditate on the strange fortune which had given me an entrance to Vanrow's premises.

Before me lay the dark house. On the first floor one window alone was illuminated, all the rest were in darkness. But, as I crouched there, shivering at every rustle of the trees around me, a light appeared in the room below.

It was the General's library, the sentry had told me; and as his words recurred to me, my heart seemed to stand still. For surely the General's letters would be waiting for him in that room, and the light might mean that the Head of the Police had returned and was about to open them. The thought brought back a little courage, and I nerved myself to creep along as noiselessly as I could towards the light.

The Chief of the Police must have trusted very implicitly to the watch of his drowsy sentries, for the window below which he sat was not even curtained, and, as he sat in the light of a small reading lamp at his desk, any one with a revolver could have shot him easily enough from the spot to which I had crawled.

One by one the letters lying on his table were torn open by the Head of the Police. The fatal missive, which I recognised at once, was the seventh.

The General took the letter in his hand and turned it over, examining the seal. Despair made me reckless. I rose from the spot where I had been crouching and advanced a step towards the window. One impulse alone possessed me—to prevent that compromising budget being read. A moment more and I should have done something desperate; but, as if under the influence of my will, the general yawned and threw the letter down on his desk unopened. I drew back to the sheltering shade; and as I did so, Vanrow rose and pushed back his chair. The next instant the room was in darkness; he had blown out the lamp.

After a few moments I crawled along to the window, crouching down beneath the sill and raising my arms to try to push up the sash. No sooner had I touched the woodwork than it moved, and I felt the window raised out of my grasp. I drew back my hands quickly, and crept close to the wall beneath the window, not daring to breathe.

It was well I could draw myself into a small space, for a man's leg came out of the room right over me, and I could just feel it touch me as he stepped out. It was almost a miracle that the man passed over me. His movements were so altogether noiseless that I had quite a superstitious dread of him. But the man's boot made no sound as he stole away from the house, and that reassured me a little.

He had left the window open. Now was the moment, I told myself, for me to enter the house and steal the letter. But I do not think I could have summoned up courage even then, with the window wide open for me, if it had not been that I was a little more afraid of the garden with the silent Nihilist creeping about it than of the house with only a matter-of-fact official inside.

With very little noise I got into the room, and, feeling my way to the desk, groped over the top of it, where I had seen the letters lying. They were all gone! I stood there completely at a loss, and then, unwilling to give up hope, groped once more over the green cloth which covered the surface of the desk. Yes—the letters were gone.

But upon the desk was something which I had not seen when I looked through the window—something square with metallic sides. I passed my hand over it, wonderingly. How silent the room was! I could hear my watch ticking quite loudly, I thought. And then it flashed into my mind that my watch had been stolen—that the low, steady ticking came from this metal box, over which my hand was wandering in its hopeless search for the letter. And with that thought I drew back my hand suddenly as if stung. But the next moment I was glad.

There was time for me to escape surely, and then the terrible, low-ticking would blow the blue letter into atoms—not a trace would be left—and with it, whether he had read it or not, the Head of the Dolganief Police.

But it seemed such a pity for General Vanrow to be blown up if he had not read the letter. With a sudden impulse, I rushed to the door of the library and threw it open.

"Vanrow! General Vanrow!" I shouted.

He met me at the top of the stairs with a revolver in his right hand, and a wine-glass, from which he had been drinking, still in his left.

"Quick—escape!" I screamed. "There is an infernal machine in your library! It is going off! We shall be blown to atoms!"

He had run past me in a moment, and came out of the library with the box in his hand. I stood on the stairs unable to move, petrified by my curiosity to see what he would do.

"Come," he said. "You may help me!"—as he ran into the supper room; and I followed just in time to see him wrench open the case with a carving fork and stop the clockwork with his fingers.

"As far as I can judge, we have won by two minutes," he remarked coolly. "Did you see the thing placed?"

"A man passed me leaving the library window," I answered.

The general turned to a speaking tube near him, and gave a few quickly-spoken orders through it.

"I will go and search the garden," he said to me. "The villains must not escape."

As he left the room, I glanced anxiously round. There was a desk under the window similar to one in the room below, and I searched every drawer of it; they were all empty, however. Then I crossed the room to where the thick curtains shut off a small inner room, and, as I drew them aside, I uttered an exclamation of joy, for lying on a table at the farther end were all the letters which I had seen on the desk in the library.

Vanrow had, as I suspected, carried them upstairs with him. I turned them over quickly with trembling fingers. Yes—there was the blue letter for which I had undergone so much! I seized it eagerly. As I did so the curtains were drawn aside, and, turning at the sound, I found myself, with the letter still in my hand, face to face with the Head of the Police.

"I am afraid he has escaped," he was saying as he entered. "There must be some treachery among my sentries;" and then, as he caught sight of the letter in my hand, he paused.

"That is so, or I should not be here," I said, frankly.

"And now I have to inquire," he began, in a slightly altered tone, "what you were doing so opportunely in my apartments, and how I can reward you for the service you have rendered me?"

He seemed a rather kind man. I saw there would be no good in attempting any but the real explanation of my presence.

"I came to steal this letter," I said, holding it up. "May I claim as my reward the right to burn it unread by you?"

Vanrow raised his eyebrows.

"I assure you on my honour as an English gentleman"—and I drew myself up to the full extent of my sixty-three inches—"that to burn it will harm nobody. The writer wished it unsent almost as soon as it left his hands."

"This is not a personal matter," replied the General, shrugging his shoulders. "My duty to the State——"

"Does not require you to read a letter which the writer wished unsent," I interrupted.

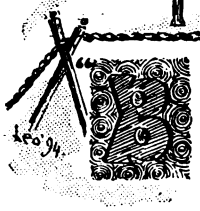
"It is a very hard thing you ask."

"Which gives you the greater pleasure in granting it."

The General smiled, and I held the letter in the flame of one of the candles which stood on the table.

Digitized by Google

A Tight-Rope Romance



"BRAVO! bravo!" shouted the vast assembly, as Saladin, the king of the tight-rope, appeared, graceful and smiling.

Saladin looked down from his giddy height through hazy space upon the mass of upturned faces and drank in the delicious incense of their applause. Then, as the band began to play the prelude of a popular waltz, he ostentatiously blew a kiss towards a box where a little woman, with a scared look in her eyes, sat watching him. She had forebodings—vague forebodings born of ominous dreams—that something terrible would befall that night. So she had told him, and now he blew her a kiss before that great multitude to reassure her.

And yet she was not reassured. Not that she doubted for an instant her lover's sureness of foot or steadiness of head. Only she had seen a face in the stalls and a pair of eyes that had met hers and frightened her. She clutched suddenly at the sleeve of her companion.

"Look," she cried hysterically.

"Yes, dear; what is it?"

"Lord Rider. He is sitting below there."

"Lord Rider?"

"Yes. I jilted him to run away with Saladin. Didn't you know? He'll do something dreadful, I know he will. I must run and tell Saladin. Let me go, Kitty."

The other tried to calm her.

"But I can't bear to look at it, Kitty."

"Then come outside, dear. There's no danger, really; but if you stay here you may scream and frighten him."

And so saying, she took her by the arm and led her gently into the ladies' cloak-room, and made her drink a little brandy.

The rope stretched from end to end of the hall, some eighty feet or so above the floor, and Saladin walked along it, as easily and safely as a man who crosses a plank bridge over a tiny brook. He stood on it on one foot, he knelt on it, he sat astride it. He even crossed it blindfold, with a sack over his head. The multitude gazed at him open-eyed and open-mouthed, and every time he got back to his little platform in mid-air roared tumultuous applause.

"Ladies and gentlemen!" shouted the manager, "we have now arrived at the final item in Saladin's entertainment. Saladin asks me to say that if any member of the audience will intrust himself to his care he is willing to carry him across the tight rope on his back."

There was a great silence, broken presently by the voices of those who pressed the offer on their neighbours. The manager repeated his proposal.

"I can assure you, ladies and gentlemen," he said, "that there is not the slightest danger. If any gentleman will cross the tight rope on Saladin's back, Saladin will absolutely guarantee his safe return."

Again there was a silence, growing gradually to a murmur; and then a long tempest of vociferous cheers as a man in evening dress was seen to rise in his place in the stalls and climb the flight of steps which gave access to the stage.

"Who is he?"

The question passed rapidly from mouth to mouth, and at first none could answer it. But presently a man in the front seats whispered to his neighbour:—

"By Jove! that's Lord Rider; the man whose fiancée ran away with Saladin!"

To which the neighbour replied:—"Ugly little brute. I'm not surprised. But what's his game, I wonder? He means mischief of some sort, I'll warrant. What do you think? Oughtn't we to tell the manager to stop it?"

"What's the use? It's not our business. Saladin can stop it himself if he wants to."

So they whispered to each other, while Lord Rider was hoisted, amid ringing rounds of cheers, to the platform where stood the man who had robbed him of his love.

To anyone who knew the story it would have seemed no wonder that the athlete had been preferred to him, even by the woman who wore his engagement ring. He saw all this himself; he had seen it and known it since his rival had come across his path; and the knowledge added both to his bitterness and to his hate.

The eyes of the two men met. It was the first time since the little woman had left her home that Saladin had seen the man whom he had wronged; and they looked at each other long and steadfastly. There were two attendants with them on the platform, and in their presence neither cared to speak the thoughts that were uppermost in his mind. But Saladin's face fell at length before the other's gaze, and fear was visible in his eyes, and he began to stammer out a refusal to go further with this last item of his entertainment.

"If you are afraid," the other whispered beneath his breath—"if you are afraid, it does not matter."

Still Saladin hesitated.

"Very well," the man said. "Now I see that you are a coward."

The word stung Saladin to the quick. He was not used to have his courage questioned; perhaps there were few men whose courage was less questionable. He gripped hold of one of the ropes, by which the platform was suspended, for a moment, while a crowd of thoughts shot through his brain.

"I am no coward. Come!"

And the attendant helped the man on to his back and handed him the balancing-pole, and they passed out together upon the tight rope.

Saladin had no delusions, no false hopes. He knew, though the other whispered no word of his intentions, that he was walking the tight rope for the last time in his life. It surprised him a little that no brutal recriminations were hissed in his ear. He did not understand this silent vengeance.

He regretted nothing. If he could have had his life again he would have done the same with it. What he had done still seemed worth while, even though this was what the doing of it brought him to. And yet it was an awful end!

He was near the platform now and he began to tremble. The balancing pole swayed in his hand. Shiver after shiver ran through his frame. The perspiration broke out in great beads on his forehead. He felt a sudden inclination to break into a run, and dared not.

Already the man on his back had knotted his fingers firmly round his throat. He was only five yards from the platform, and yet he knew that between him and the gaudy, velvet-covered stool lay death!

Saladin thought:

"If only the man would be quick."

The grip of the fingers round his throat tightened. The weight of the man on his back grew heavier.

"He is nerving himself to throw me over," thought the athlete.

At this moment Lord Rider pressed his mouth to the other's ear and whispered:

"This is my triumph!"

Saladin stood still. The waiting throng below sent up a cheer, but he heard nothing. The balancing-pole was steady now.

"You fiend!" he said. "Be quick." And shut his eyes. Nothing happened. He could hardly believe his senses. Then he sprang forward and reached the platform in safety.

Lord Rider had fainted.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A GIFT WORTH £3, AND WATCH, FREE.

THIS is a beautiful "Gladstone," open-face, STOP-WATCH; strong, exquisitely made and finished, gent's size, jewelled, Swiss movement, imitation gold; looks and wears like genuine 18-carat gold. Good enough for millionaires. The best watch ever sold so cheap. Only experts can tell it is not pure gold. I offer it to you from the factory in Switzerland at the lowest price, 16s., as an experiment, to learn if money can be saved by avoiding shopkeepers, and selling direct to the public at wholesale prices. This offer will never appear again, unless a large number of watches are sold from this offer. Special offer. Good for thirty days only. Send me only 16s., and promise to show this offer, also watches and Gift to your friends and acquaintances during this entire year, and I will make you a present of a Gift which costs £3 in London, and a beautiful "Rosebery" watch free. These are my special gifts to you, to pay you for the trouble to advertise my watches. This is an honest, bona fide offer, and may seem over-liberal only to persons ignorant of my business, and of the fact that £200,000 are expended annually for advertising purposes by many firms. The Gift worth £3 cannot be sent by Parcels Post, but an Order which will promptly secure it for you will be sent with the "Gladstone" and "Rosebery" watches, post paid, to any Lady or Gentleman, on receipt of only 16s. by P.O. Order. Write quick, to-day! Money cheerfully returned if not as represented. Address, H. C. DEAN, 36, Great Portland St., London, W.

Delicate Children become Bonny, Chubby, and Strong.

If your children have failing health from any cause, no matter whether they are healthy children but out of health, or are naturally pale, delicate, and thin, do not hesitate, but procure them a Tonic at once, for no time should be lost in improving the general health of delicate children.

The period of childhood calls loudly for strengthening remedies; remember nature is at work building up tissues, developing nerve sensibilities, as well as hardening bony structures. It is, therefore, the only rational treatment; in fact, it is a complete waste of time to give them anything else. Children's ailments when treated tonically yield at once, showing how urgently and terribly needed strengthening remedies are.

Infantina's Syrup is a simple, harmless, pleasant remedy, prepared from pure ingredients of a well-known curative and corrective character. The Hypophosphites of Iron and Lime are delicately united with other tonic and strengthening restoratives. These invaluable Iron and Lime Salts are absolutely essential for the growing tissues, and often health cannot be maintained without them.

Infantina's Syrup forms pure, rich, red blood, and strengthens bony, muscular, and nervous tissues, thus attacking the very root of the delicacy. By its use the appetite increases, flesh is gained, general health augmented, and the whole functions of the body are more energetically performed. Do not forget that consumption, scrofula, anæmia, fits, bow-legs, knock-knees, pigeon-breast, and rickets, as well as other stunted and distorted growths, are entirely due to neglected delicacy in childhood.

There is no better remedy for the ills and ailments of children from two to fifteen years of age than Infantina's Strengthening Syrup, which changes peevish, pale, delicate children into healthy, happy boys and girls.

Mrs. Hendry, writing from South Shields, states:—"Infantina's Syrup has done my children a world of good; in fact, I should not like to be without it."

Sold by Chemists and Patent Medicine Vendors at 1s. 1½d. per bottle. If you cannot obtain it promptly remit 15 penny stamps to the INFANTINA COMPANY, 6, Sloane Square, London, S.W., and it will be instantly sent post paid. Full instructions accompany each bottle.

Digitized by Google

THE QUEEN says: "Dulcemona Tea is EXCELLENT, MOST DELICATE in FLAVOUR, and REFRESHING to a degree."

1/6, 1/10, 2/-,
and 2/4 per Pound,
In Lead Packets and 3 lb. and 5 lb. Tins only.

AGENTS EVERYWHERE—FIRST-CLASS GROCERS. WHOLESALE ONLY: 11 & 11a, UPPER THAMES STREET, LONDON, E.C.

THE SOAP FOR HARD WATER.
LATHERS FREELY in the HARDEST WATER
THE SOAP FOR SOFT WATER.
WATSON'S
MATCHLESS CLEANSER
A HOUSEHOLD REQUISITE
LARGEST SALE OF 1lb TABLETS IN THE WORLD.
THE SOAP FOR HOT WATER
THE SOAP FOR COLD WATER.

Digitized by Google

THE MURDER IN THE RUE DE GAIETE. (See front page.)

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 318. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 2, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

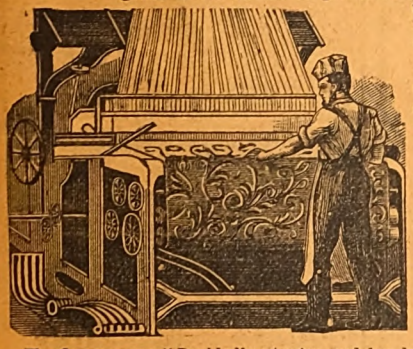
IF YOU INTEND TO BUY

Buy New Carpets at the Price of Old.

It would be ridiculous to buy old carpets, old designs, shop-worn, out-of-date goods, when you can purchase a stylish GENUINE, WOVEN, REVERSIBLE TRIUMPH CARPET suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., for

4/- Each. 4s. Postal Order or 50 Stamps, 4/- Each.

handsomely bordered and woven in fifty different patterns and colourings, to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY-SIZED ROOM. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for the goods of the British Carpet Weaving Company, below the actual cost of production. Thousands have already been sold at almost double above prices.



With every carpet we shall supply a very handsome Rug to match, for 1s. 3d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER—Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9s. 6d.; Four Carpets and Four Rugs for 18s.; Eight Carpets and Eight Rugs for 35s.

Money willingly returned if not approved.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value."

Hundreds of unsolicited testimonials are being received from delighted purchasers who have had these carpets in use for years.

Stafford Road Post Office, Wolverhampton. M. A. Dudley, writes:—"Having purchased two of your Carpets between three and four years ago, I am thoroughly satisfied, and have recommended them to several people, who I know have tried them, and are equally satisfied."

65, Abbey Street, Nuneaton, Warwickshire. "Mrs. Bostock will thank the British Carpet Weaving Co. to send her one of their Carpets, for which she encloses postal order. She has had one of these Carpets in constant wear for some years now, and finds it the best wearing and cheapest carpet she can get."

Do not miss this opportunity, it may not occur again.

CARPET ORDER FORM.

On receipt of this order form, and Postal Order or stamps, we guarantee to send any goods, as above, to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Money returned if not approved.

(Signed) THE BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.

All orders despatched in rotation same day as received. Cheques and Postal orders to be made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Secretary, and crossed "UNION BANK." Address—

The British Carpet Weaving Company,
31, OLD STREET, ALDERSGATE, LONDON, E.C.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S, LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS.

Heraldic Designs and Trade Marks and Tradesmen's Windows, Facias, Signs, or Tablets.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

MOST EFFECTIVE MEDIUM

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

Call and see our Stock or send for Price Lists.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd.,
61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

Digitized by Google

Cheerful Winter Evenings.

CAMPBELL'S MELODEONS.

Gold Medal.

They have Organ and Celestial Tone, and Charming Bell Accompaniments. NO HOME SHOULD BE WITHOUT ONE, The Solemn Psalm, the Soul-stirring Hymn, the Cheerful Song, and the Merry Dance, all can be played on these charming instruments. NO KNOWLEDGE OF MUSIC IS REQUIRED.

Special offer to the readers of "Short Stories."
CAMPBELL'S "GEM" MELODEON price only 6/6
CAMPBELL'S "MINIATURE" MELODEON,, 10/6
CAMPBELL'S "PARAGON" MELODEON ,, 14/-
CAMPBELL'S "FAVOURITE" MELODEON ,, 16/6
Either of the above sent Carriage Paid to any Address in Great Britain and Ireland.
Cut out this, and mention "Short Stories," when ordering. Worth double the money

NO DECEPTION HERE.
 100,000 TESTIMONIALS. ***
Important Testimonial from Professor Brown, the Champion Melodeon Player of Great Britain, Ireland, and Wales:—"Campbell's Patent Melodeons are the finest instruments that have ever come under my touch, and only require a trial to advertise themselves."
Campbell's Patent Melodeons are the only Genuine Melodeon in the Market.
BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.
N.B.—All lovers of music should at once send for our New Illustrated Privilege Price List for Season 1895 now ready. 150,000 of these valuable Lists sent out yearly. Send 1d. stamp to
CAMPBELL & Co., Musical Instrument Makers, 116, Trongate, Glasgow. (Established 50 years.)

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20 See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "Tobacconists' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. Estimates Free.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)
A. DASMAIL
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS
will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.
To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.
S. HARVEY, 12, Gaskarth Road, Balham Hill, London, S.W. Beware of injurious imitations.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.
Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—
THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.
EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BOILING WATER OR MILK.

BORD'S PIANOS
ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

Swift Gold Medal.
KNITTER
Knits (ribbed or plain) STOCKINGS GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TOO STOUT.
IF you require a reliable remedy for the relief of Superfluous Fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills No starvation required. You may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5 to 7 lbs. weekly. They are agreeable to take and harmless, being entirely of a vegetable preparation, are successful in the most stubborn cases, and never fail to improve both health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, and entirely free from inconvenience. They are pearl-coated and tasteless, and highly recommended by the Medical Profession. Price 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. Prof. F. A. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."
BEECHAM'S PILLS
FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
SUCH AS
Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver, & Female Ailments.
ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.
In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.
Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.
Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Exema
and all Skin Eruptions are cured by a Healing Cream widely known as
"Antexema."
"Antexema" is sold by all Chemists and Stores and may be had post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., and 4s 9d. of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.
Little Book Free. NAME THIS PAPER.

PLUCKY ADVERTISING.
NEW CUSTOMERS ONLY sending a Shilling for Three Ounces of our exquisite "MOSQUE" SMOKING MIXTURE, will be presented free with a Pipe, Rubber Tobacco-Pouch, and a Turkish Amulet. The whole sent in parcel per post on receipt of Twelve Stamps or P.O. Address—
P15, Eureka Manufacturing Co., Clapton, London, N.E.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.
Pattern and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.
JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

TO LADIES.
English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London N.E. Please name this paper.

A Real Boon to Ladies.
TO LADIES
Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and
OBSTINATE CASES,
NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD
RELIEF,
GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.
No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—
"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise."
A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.
Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.
Write privately to—
Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.
QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,
E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES
Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.
Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.
Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street, Liverpool.

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.
The most powerful and effective on earth.
For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. Herbal Institute, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.
Sold also by all Chemists.

TO WOMEN. IRREGULATIES, OBSTRUCTIONS, &c., removed by an ABSOLUTELY CERTAIN Method WITHOUT MEDICINE. No Pills, Mixtures, or Useless Injections. Greatest Discovery of Modern Medical Science. Send stamped envelope for particulars, testimonials, &c., to Mrs. SHAFFER-BENNYON, 328, High Holborn, London, W.C.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials. Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, &c., with Advice Form for Treatment to Dr. Horn, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 318.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 2, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

THE MURDER IN THE RUE de GAIETÉ.

CHAPTER I.

IN the year 18—— I obtained my degree of medicine in the University of London. My late hard studies had seriously injured my health, and taking the advice of friends I started on a Continental tour, in the hope that a change of life and scene might thoroughly recruit my shattered constitution.

In the course of travel I at length found myself in Paris, that gay city where life seems to be spent in one eternal whirl of pleasure. Naturally of a reserved and retiring disposition, I found little pleasure in the class of amusement that commends itself to most men.

One evening, after I had been located in Paris only a few weeks, I found that in pursuit of my favourite exercise I had wandered further from the city than had been my original intention. It was now quite dark, and I prepared at once to retrace my steps.

To my consternation I discovered that my mind had been so occupied with problems and theories in connection with my medical studies that I had entirely neglected to observe the route I had taken—in a word, I had lost my way.

At length, confused and bewildered, I came to a dead halt. At that moment the sound of a horse champing its bit fell on my ear. Guiding myself as best I could in the direction from whence the sound came, I suddenly came violently in contact with some dark object standing in the roadway.

Before I had time to recover from the shock a bright light flashed upon the spot where I stood, and I became aware that I was in the immediate vicinity of a palatial dwelling, one of the windows of which had that instant been illumined.

For some few seconds my eyes were rendered useless owing to the sudden transition from darkness to light. At length I was able to perceive that I was standing within a few inches of a horse, secured by its head to a light wooden paling surrounding the house.

I was just beginning to conjecture what could be the reason for the animal being left in this strange position, made more unaccountable by the fact of its owner not being present, when a low, grating sound, as of a window being softly drawn up, fell upon my ear. The next moment a suppressed cry of terror and alarm in a woman's voice broke the death-like silence, and the figure of a man was thrown on the blind of the window, from where the bright light shone.

An indescribable feeling of terror crept over me. There was no mistaking the meaning of that terrible cry. It was the cry of a human being in all the agony of hopeless despair. An irresistible impulse seized me. Climbing the low wooden fence I reached the building. A large peach tree, with spreading branches, was trained against the outside wall. By its friendly aid I soon reached the window, and what a scene met my view! Through a chink in the blind I saw the interior of the room distinctly. It was brilliantly lighted; only two persons were in it, a tall powerfully-built man, and a woman. The man had his back to me.

The murderer's right hand was raised.

The young girl was dressed in full evening costume; she had her face towards me; she was fast losing consciousness, her swollen, discoloured face, with its starting eyeballs, told me that. The murderer had his left hand on her throat. He was choking her. The struggle had evidently been a severe one, for the victim's dress was disarranged and torn, and her long golden hair had burst from its fastenings, and had fallen in disordered masses over her shoulders and bosom. The murderer's right hand was raised. In it he held a long dagger or knife. With one rapid movement it descended and, with a heavy gasping sigh, the girl sank lifeless on the floor.

I was petrified with horror. I seemed to be in a dream, and yet not dreaming. The horror of the scene I had witnessed froze the very blood in my veins. The power of speech, the power of reason, the power of preventing the fell work, all alike seemed taken from me. How I had presence of mind to retain my hold in the dangerous position in which I was placed I know not. I tried to scream for assistance, but my lips refused to give utterance to the slightest sound. I was fascinated with terror; my eyes were riveted on the terrible scene before me. The murderer stood motionless, gazing at his victim. A revulsion of feeling seemed suddenly to overwhelm him.

All Rights Reserved.

Digitized by Google

Throwing himself on the bleeding form of the young girl, he frantically kissed the cold lips of the corpse. Suddenly he started to his feet. The sound of approaching footsteps had alarmed him. He turned and saw my face at the window. With a hoarse cry he crossed the room and made his escape from the scene of his crime by an open window opposite, and was lost to my view in the dark shadows outside.

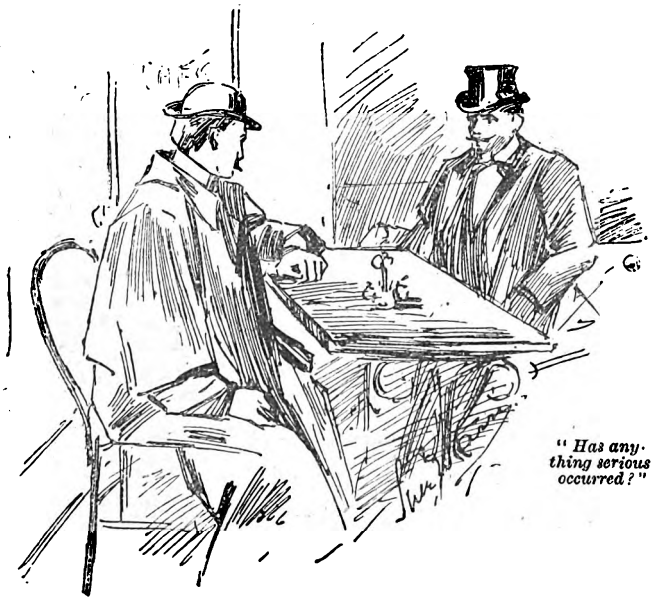
The natural instinct of self-preservation came strong upon me. I became aware of the peril in which I was placed. The risk I ran of being thought the perpetrator of a murder were I discovered in my present position. My imperfect acquaintance with the language of the country would make it utterly impossible for me to coherently relate, with any prospect of credence being given to my story, what I had just seen, and my present state of excitement would further increase the suspicion that would be sure to attach itself to me.

With a violent effort I freed myself from the chains of terror that bound me. As I reached the ground I heard a horse's hoofs clattering on the dark road, the sound gradually growing fainter and fainter, till at length it died away in the distance. I was haunted by the face of the murdered girl; every nook and corner seemed to contain her bleeding form.

In the excited state of my nerves the terrible scene I had witnessed was constantly before me. At length the moon rose, and by her pale blue light I was enabled to reach my home. I flung myself on a couch, where, with broken slumbers and horrible dreams, I wearily longed for the blessed light of day.

Next morning my memory vividly retained the events of the previous night. I was undecided what course to pursue. At first I thought of acquainting the authorities of what I had witnessed. The fear of being arrested myself for the crime deterred me, for I had enough knowledge of police procedure to be aware that, though the fact of my being in that locality could innocently enough be explained, the very simplicity of my story would in all likelihood make it the more difficult to be believed by men who, by reason of their vocation, had to deal with those whose every word was a lie, and every thought a crime.

Ultimately I decided on saying nothing about the matter till at least I heard whether the murderer had been captured or not. With this resolve I descended to the street, and soon found myself in a neighbouring café, which, as usual, was crowded with customers busily engaged in discussing the contents of the morning papers.



"Has anything serious occurred?"

I have said before that my knowledge of the French language was very limited, and, owing to the rapid manner in which my companions conversed, I found myself utterly unable to understand their remarks, but I could easily see from their excited gestures that something of unusual interest was the topic of conversation.

"Has anything serious occurred?" I asked of a man who sat at one of the tables, forgetting for the moment that it was possible he might not understand me.

The man looked at me for a few moments in astonishment, and then replied in broken English: "Has Monsieur not seen the papers? Has he not heard the terrible news?"

I answered in the negative.

"The Marchioness de C—— was murdered last night in her own house in the Rue de Gaieté."

The man must have noticed my excitement, for he immediately added:

"I see Monsieur is horrified. Choked first, Monsieur, then stabbed to the heart. The lovely Marchioness, who had the whole of Paris at her feet. Mon Dieu! what an end. It is ten thousand pities, Monsieur."

"And who committed this foul murder?" I asked.

"That is the question everyone is asking, Monsieur. No one saw the murder committed. The Marchioness was at an evening party last night, and, saying she felt unwell, left earlier than usual. She would not allow the Marquis to accompany her. The footman who opened the door when she arrived home says she looked flushed and excited. She retired at once to her private apartment alone.

"What occurred after no one knows, Monsieur. The Marquis, feeling anxious about his lady, left the party almost immediately after her. When he reached home he went straight to his wife's room, and, to his horror, found her lying on the floor in a pool of blood, dead.

"One of the windows in the room was wide open, but they say, Monsieur, that the murderer must have entered the room by the other window, for the great peach tree growing on the wall has many of its branches broken, as if someone had climbed up it, and there are marks of horse's hoofs on the road outside." The Frenchman stopped abruptly to sip his coffee.

"And—and," I stammered, scarcely knowing what I said, "have they discovered what was the reason for committing the murder?"

"That is the greatest mystery of all, Monsieur. Though the Marchioness was wearing thousands of francs' worth of jewellery, not so much as a ring was touched. It is whispered, Monsieur," lowering his voice as he spoke, "that the Marquis murdered his wife himself. He was terribly jealous of her. She was only a poor farmer's daughter in one of the Provinces when he married her. Such marriages seldom bring happiness with them, Monsieur."

"Describe her husband, the Marquis, to me," I eagerly demanded.

The Frenchman shrugged his shoulders and laughed.

"Surely Monsieur has not lived long in Paris, or he would know the Marquis de C——."

"Is he a tall, handsome man?" I inquired.

"Monsieur is surely joking. Would he call a hunchback, scarcely higher than this table, a tall man? No, Monsieur. If the husband had been murdered Paris would not have deplored it much; but to lose the loveliest of her women, it is hard to bear."

With this remark the little Frenchman lit his cigarette, and, bidding me good morning, left me.

And as I had been the solitary spectator of this mysterious crime, I felt thankful now that I had not divulged the secret, for I plainly saw that suspicion, made doubly strong by the fact of my being a foreigner, would have surely attached itself to me.

Paris had no attraction to me now. Next day I left the city.

CHAPTER II.

THE older a man becomes the faster do the years speed over his head, and I can scarcely bring myself to believe that ten years have elapsed since the events narrated in the preceding chapter occurred. It is long since I abandoned the medical profession; I soon found I could never hope to climb the ladder of fame by its aid.

Digitized by Google

My reserved manner made me little adapted to succeed in a walk of life where so much depends upon suavity and cheerfulness of disposition. I have devoted myself entirely to literary pursuits.

The efforts of my pen have been received with approbation by critics and public alike, and people point to me as being one of the most successful authors of the age.

I do not keep much company, though, Heaven knows, every post brings me invitations to all sorts of entertainments. I have only one friend, and he comes up to see me sometimes in my quiet apartment. He is manager of a well-known metropolitan theatre, and is a little, stout, cheery, chatty fellow, who seems to go through life with an eternal halo of sunshine around him.

One evening the conversation fell on the merits and demerits of a play creating a great sensation just then. After my friend left me, a sudden thought struck me: should I not write a drama myself? The more I considered the matter the more feasible the project appeared.

The long-forgotten murder in the Rue de Gaieté came vividly to my memory. Why not found my plot on it? I set my imaginative faculties to work, and some weeks later, when the drama was finished, I placed it in my friend's hand for his perusal. To my great satisfaction the play met with his utmost approval. "The white face at the window watching the mysterious murderer at his foul work is terribly sensational," he said. "How ever did you think of that?"

I told him what I had seen that night at the Rue de Gaieté.

"And the rest of the story is what you imagine would impel a man to commit such a crime. Quite likely; these Frenchmen are terrible fiends when their jealousy is aroused. Who are we to get to play the murderer? There's a man who joined my company a short time ago; from what I have seen of his acting I believe he would play the part to perfection. He speaks with a slightly foreign accent—all the better; it will make the character he depicts the more realistic."

After some further conversation my friend bid me good night and, departing, left me alone.

To my great disappointment I was unable to attend the rehearsals of my drama. A violent attack of rheumatism, an illness to which I was subject, confined me to my room. Days passed on, and to my satisfaction I found myself sufficiently recovered to be able to appear on the first night of the production of the play.

The large building was crowded to excess when I took my seat in the private box set apart for me. All the wealth, beauty, and talent of the great metropolis was there. The fact of the new drama being the work of an author who had already achieved success in a different branch of literature made it doubly attractive.

The overture is played, and the curtain rises slowly on the first act. As I sat in my box watching the development of the play, the whole of my attention was naturally concentrated on the actor who played the leading part, and on whom so much depended. He was a tall, powerfully-built, swarthy-complexioned man. To my astonishment he seemed strangely nervous and excited. His face was as pale as that of a corpse; he seemed to be labouring under some intense excitement; for, on more than one occasion, he passed his hand across his forehead as if with difficulty he was enabled to carry on his part.

Annoyed at the man's apathy, the audience showed distinct signs of disapprobation. Inwardly I cursed the stupidity of a manager who placed such an important part in the hands of a man utterly unfit to do it justice.

Of a sudden, the man's whole manner changed. With a violent effort he gained control over himself. The last scene in the first act was reached, and the culminating point in the drama approaches. Again I see the brilliantly lit room with the young girl in it; again I see the murderer approach her with stealthy cat-like stride; again I see the terrible struggle for life; again that wild cry rings in my ears, and I see, as I saw it years before, in all its terrible reality, the white, hopeless, despairing face of the terror-stricken girl.

Paralysed with terror, and for the moment forgetting entirely where I was, with a hoarse cry I sprang to my feet. The murderer turned, and saw my startled livid face. With a wild unearthly scream he raised his hands above his head, and fell with a heavy crash unconscious on the floor. The terrible truth flashed upon me now: he had been depicting the tragedy of his own life

"What spirit of darkness tempted you to write that play?"

The spectators, suddenly awakened from the spell that bound them, applauded vociferously; a dark coloured liquid trickled from the lips of the unconscious man; figures rushed from the wings to his assistance, and the curtain fell rapidly.

Something terrible had occurred, and the crowd conversed together in awe-stricken tones as they slowly left the theatre. I sat as if in a trance, speechless and motionless. A hand was suddenly placed on my shoulder. I turned and saw the face of my friend the manager.

Mechanically I rose and followed him. With all the tinsel and mockery of pleasure round him there, on a rude bed, the sufferer lay, with the clotted blood on his white lips.

"Monsieur," he muttered hoarsely, "they tell me you are the author of that play. You have written the secret of my life. For ten long years I have struggled to forget the past, but without avail. I am haunted by the face of that murdered girl. Even now," he continued wildly, "I see it as plainly as I saw it on that night of horror. God knows how I loved her. An irresistible fascination compelled me to play that part. It was the retribution of Heaven."

Suddenly he started, and with a violent effort he raised himself on his elbow.

"What spirit of darkness tempted you to write that play?" he asked fiercely.

"I saw the murder committed," I answered simply.

A terrible look passed over the dying man's face, and then he fell back. God had punished him—he was dead!

Digitized by Google

A GIRL OF SPIRIT

CHAPTER I.

"H, will you actually be too busy, Dick, to run down to Brighton except for an occasional Sunday or so?"

Dick Stevens, who had just entered on the practice of law, failed to meet the wistful gaze of his fiancée as he admitted the fact of several very important cases claiming his time and attention just then.

"But you will be a sensible girl, Marie," he added. "Don't deprive yourself of enjoyment simply because I'm not there to share it with you."

"But, Dick!" tears standing in her lovely eyes, "how lonely you will be when every one is out of town!"

Dick assented with a sigh: "Time will drag of course," he said, "but the thought of seeing you at intervals will shorten anything."

Dear Richard! How unworthy Marie felt herself as the chosen companion of such a man; a man who for duty's sake could forego the delights of Brighton, and—yes—with a blush—of her society; Richard, whose every want and desire was met and gratified by a father at once rich, proud and doting.

CHAPTER II.

It was a callow youth who, a few weeks later at Brighton, sought to entertain the distrait Miss Collinson with bits of London gossip.

"Weally, now," he was saying, "the chappies who stay in town duwin' the summer have the best of it, you know, they weally do. Your sympathies are quite thrown away, Miss Collinson, they weally are."

The look of sudden interest in his listener's eyes quite staggered the youth.

"Ah!" said she, incredulously, "how can that be, Mr Sap? Business, I should think, would be——".

"Business!" as she paused, "why it's not much business the chappies of our set do, Miss Collinson, at any time, don'cher know. Oh, no, the fellahs, you see, have learned a thing or two, they have," and Mr. Sap chuckled.

"Now there's Dick Stevens, for instance," delighted at the interest he had inspired; "you know Dick, perhaps, Miss Collinson."

"Slightly," dropping her eyes.

"Well, he's just having a high old time, a high old time, don'cher know."

"Yes?" coldly, "and what constitutes a high old time in your estimation, may I ask?"

"Why, when a feller has the exclusive right to the company of the werry prettiest girl in the Folly Opera Company, and attends the races, and gives wine suppers and goes a-yachting; and time can't go slow with Dick Stevens, Miss Collinson, it weally can't, don'cher know."

"I should think not," quietly said Marie, rising to depart; "but—but you are quite sure—about—about the girl of the Folly Opera Company, are you not?"

"Oh, quite," wondering a little at her interest upon that point. "It's the talk of all the fellahs about town;" and not until the following day did the callow youth know the mischief he had wrought in that one brief hour under the stars.

Wounded affection, outraged pride! With both had Marie to battle the long night through. Letter after letter did she write only to destroy. Too bitter the reproaches in one, too tender the chidings in another, the marks of tears upon all.

"I will wait until morning," she decided at last, wearily; "perhaps the—but, oh, Dick, Dick, can I ever forget you?"

CHAPTER III.

A rather blasé individual a few days later received at his club in Piccadilly a letter which both surprised and amused him.

"By Jove!" he exclaimed with a hearty laugh, "my niece Marie is a girl of spirit, and wonderfully clever. Let me see," re-reading the letter, "if the thing is quite feasible. I think it is; indeed," after reflection, "I will make it so," and before many hours Marie had received from her uncle a telegram which brought her at once to town.

The next evening, in the most bewitching costume conceivable, Dick's fiancée, accompanied by several men, appeared in a box at the Opera.

An unmistakable constraint sat upon the party. Two of the men cast from time to time embarrassed glances upon their pretty but silent companion. But once did she unclose her lips, and then only to question the man who sat well back among the shadows.

"Rest easy," he answered. "He will be here. I had the assurance from him but an hour ago. Ah, there he is now."

Marie Collinson cast one quick glance at the party entering the opposite box, then fell to chattering in the most animated manner with the man beside her.

Dick Stevens, with complacent smile on his handsome face, seated himself well in view of the audience by the side of a petite blonde, highly rouged and conspicuously attired, while the friend of his bosom hung over the chair of a brunette of similar description.

"Why," exclaimed the blonde catching a glimpse of Dick's eyes fixed in smouldering wrath upon the occupant of the box opposite, "whatever is the matter with you?"

"Who is that girl?" drawled the brunette, levelling her glass at Miss Collinson. "Whoever she is she's a stunner."

Dick's friend looked at him in dismay.

"Why, it's——" he began, but Dick stopped him with a quick gesture.

"You know the men, Griswold?" he inquired hoarsely, rising from his chair.

"Of course," replied the other, in some embarrassment, "who does not?"

Dick grew white to the lips.

"I will be back shortly," he said to the blonde, and with a curt nod strode from the box.

Smiling and placid, Marie, a few minutes later, gazed into his angry eyes.

"Permit me," with great empressement, "to introduce you, Mr. Stevens, to my friends Mr. Box and Mr. Game."

"Glad to meet you," awkwardly said those men, each extending a hand.

The look which sprang into Mr. Box's eyes as Dick ignored their salutations brought a smile to the lips of Marie.

"Will you not take a seat?" she said sweetly, as Dick stationed himself beside her chair.

"Not in such company," he whispered angrily.

For answer Miss Collinson levelled her glass upon the occupants of the opposite box.

"Who is your companion, the pretty blonde?" she inquired calmly.

Dick muttered something, whether an imprecation or a name Marie failed to distinguish.

"And who are your companions?" he retorted, glowering upon Mr. Box and Mr. Game.

"I introduced you to them. Have you so soon forgotten?" demurely.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, yes; but their characters I mean, Marie. Do you know their characters?"

"Why, no," reflectively. "How can a woman know the true character of any man, Mr. Stevens, even after months of companionship?"

Dick reddened.

"Well, their occupation, then?" less savagely.

"Yes," innocently, "they are professional men. Business detains them in town during the heated term, too, poor things."

Dick's hand trembled as he laid it gently upon her shoulder.

"Come," he said, huskily, "come, Marie! Let us leave the theatre."

"But the blonde across the way," coldly. "Surely you will lose her favour should you desert her thus?"

For one instant Dick Stevens wavered—for one instant—and then he said, his eyes fixed unwaveringly upon hers:

"Come, Marie! There is but one woman in the world or me. Come."

With a flash of triumph in her eyes, Miss Collinson arose.

"Good-night," coldly, to her abashed companions, "good-night," and without further ceremony she turned to leave the box.

"Ah!" said Dick, as the figure in the back ground came into view, "so, Marie was not left to—to——"

"The tender mercies of a middle-weight prize-fighter and a notorious gambler, eh?" finished her uncle, with a laugh. "No, no, my dear boy; not so bad as that, though it must have been a bitter pill to swallow to see your fiancée in such company. Still——"

A soft hand over the speaker's mouth put an end to the sentence.

Dick, they say, is on probation. How true it is I do not know, but the fact of the wedding being indefinitely postponed seems to lend an air of truth to the rumour.

TO THE BITTER END

ANTONIO FORLI was certainly dying. The sweat on his face and the difficult breathing told of it quite as much as the prayers of the priest, who every now and then came to a pause and lowered his head so that he could look over his spectacles at the sick man.

Forli's wife and his son Cesare were also in the darkened room.

The former's sobs were continuous. She was on her knees by her husband's bedside, holding the crucifix as the priest had directed her, and at each pause in his reverence's petitions she broke out into ejaculations of startling energy. One of her cries seemed to bring sudden vitality into the sallow, pinched face of the dying man.

"By the Virgin and San Antonio," she screamed, "have we not suffered enough wrong—we Forli? Let there be a blood reckoning between the Leonetti and us. Oh, my poor, handsome husband, see to it when thou art in Paradise!"

"Chut, chut!" interrupted the priest quickly. "Remember, woman, that he has been anointed. The time for such thoughts has passed."

But Antonio himself did not seem to think so. Resting himself up so that his back leaned against the wall, he opened his mouth as if to speak, and waved a weak hand toward his son Cesare.

"Come to thy father, son," said the woman with apparent acerbity.

Cesare Forli was but sixteen, though he had the muscles and stature of a man, and also the firm expression of a man on his dark face. He was Corsican to the toe tips.

Again the priest tried to interfere.

"The Holy Mother," he exclaimed, "likes not such compacts. Be advised. Let earthly dissensions be forgotten, and give thyself wholly to God."

"May I be forgotten of God if I do," said the sick man in a cavernous voice that sounded very grim. There was a flash in his dark eyes as he spoke. Then he turned to his son.

"I am going," he said, and it was as if he pitied himself. His wife's moans broke out afresh. "I am going, my son; but there is work for thee. Speed to the Sartene province of Corsica—ah! the dear land. I die exiled from it—and there kill first Giovanni Leonetti. Shoot him in the back as he shot thy dear brother who is in heaven. And afterwards kill all the other Leonetti in the land—like rats."

"I command you!" cried the priest. "This is infamy!"

But the dying man's voice rose above the priest's:

"It is not infamy; it is duty. See to it, Cesare. Place thy hand on my breast—ah!"

He slid down into the bed again and lay gasping. The lad, without moving a muscle of his countenance, did as his father bade him, and stood watching the struggle on his father's face.

"He is going," whispered the priest to the woman.

The latter rose to clasp her husband once more in her arms, but with a final effort the exile opened his mouth to speak:

"Swear," he sobbed, staring at the lad; "swear, or I——."

He could not finish. Even while Cesare was murmuring the words, "I swear it, father," with his right hand still on his father's breast, the man's jaws slipped and his eyes lost their life.

"It is a pity," said the priest, as he drew near, "men cannot be sensible in their last moments. But there, it is breath wasted to reproach him now; you Corsicans are all alike. Cesare, I absolve you from your bond to your poor father."

The lad lifted his eyes to the priest, but said nothing.

"Promises of so sacrilegious a kind, extorted by the dying, are not to be kept. In fulfilling them you do but protract his presence in purgatory. Dost hear me, my son?"

But the woman herself responded. She turned an inflamed face upon the priest.

"Father Correggio," she said, with terrible earnestness, "may the boy rot in this world and the next for ever if he forgets his oath! The living as well as the dead bind him."

The priest shrugged his shoulders, folded his spectacles, put his breviary in his pocket, shook his skirts to make sure they hung freely, shuffled to the corpse and made the sign of the cross on his forehead—with a protesting movement of his own head the while—and then murmuring "Benedicita!" left the room.

"They are fiends, these Corsicans!" the good father said to himself as he crossed the threshold.

II.

Barely a month later young Cesare was in Corsica with his gun. His was a pitiful errand, but he did not seem to think so; neither did his mother who, from the mainland, sent prayers and blessings in his wake, and confidently awaited his return with the blood of the clan of the Leonetti on his immature young hands.

Digitized by Google

In Bastia the lad bought black clothes like the native Corsicans; they went well with his set countenance and fierce eyes. His gun was his father's. It was old, but he believed it would do his work. It had shot men ere this. The experience might be of service to it and Cesare himself.

And so from Bastia Cesare walked down the coast line to the South, by the vineyards and through the orange groves of many a fertile though rather pestilential little village. He had nothing to do till he got to Portio Vecchio. For a week he could live the life of an honest man, enjoying the good gifts of sunshine and bewitching landscapes without either remorse or forebodings.

From Porto Vecchio he was to strike into the mountains and lay his snares for the Leonetti, who had their dwellings among the sources of the Stabiaccio.

It was a happy week, this that he spent between the mountains and the blue sea. But at the sight of the walls of Porto Vecchio he remembered his responsibilities to the uttermost.

Yet another brief respite was allowed him, however.

At the inn where he stayed was a lovely young girl named Caterina. She could not have been more than fifteen, though her large, sombre, blue eyes had a woman's expression. The twain soon made acquaintance. The girl's mother was fascinated by Cesare's looks, and would fain have learned all about him. But, of course, that was impossible. Nevertheless, the three days the lad spent in this ancient town were enough for both Cesare and Caterina.

"I will come back for you, my angel," said the lad, when on the fourth morning he had shouldered his gun and prepared for his hideous undertaking. "Be true to me."

The girl's eyes answered him sufficiently. But her tongue also bore witness for her.

"Thou hast all my heart, dear Cesare," she whispered.

From early morning until late in the afternoon, the lad clambered among the oaks and precipices, wondering how his task would come to him. He was bound for a village high up. Here he meant to mature his plans in the very midst of the Leonetti he had come to destroy.

But when it was near sun-down he fell in with a young man hardly older than himself, whose vivacity and gift of persuasion had a strange power over him.

"I am bent on a dark business," he told Cesare. "'Tis no less than bloodshed. We are in vendetta. Wilt join me?"

Cesare looked thunderstruck.

"I, too, am here in vendetta," he stammered out.

"Good! Then let us take an oath of friendship. You will help me this afternoon, and then I will do for you what you do for me."

"What is the name of the doomed one?" asked Cesare.

"That," replied the other, "I do not tell thee. Neither am I inquisitive about thy quarrel."

Then the thought flashed to Cesare's mind that it was Leonetti who was being pursued.

"I am thine," he said, offering his hand.

"And I thine," said the other, and they swore an oath in the matter.

This done, at the bidding of his friend, who said he might be called Carlo, Cesare loaded his gun afresh. Together they then stole by a scraggy path towards a highland glen, or, rather, basin, occupied entirely by a mountain torrent, a few pine trees, innumerable boulders, and a single black-browed hut.

"He has been away a long time," whispered Carlo, "perhaps he thinks he is forgotten. Ah! he shall be taught differently."

It was arranged that, having crept as near as possible to the house in the dusk, they should lie concealed behind the rocks until the man came out or showed in his doorway.

The plan worked only too well.

In less than a quarter of an hour a tall, broad-shouldered man opened the door to look forth.

"It is he," whispered Carlo. "Shoot!"

The victim dropped on the threshold. The two young men did not wait to hear more than one cry from the woman who rushed to the stricken man. They hurried down and down, and drew breath only when they were near the village of Carlo's home.

Here, when the houses showed, Cesare put the question that had of late hovered on his lips:

"Was he a Leonetti?"

The other laughed as he replied:

"Mother of God, no! I am a Leonetti! He was a Forli—the last of them in Corsica!"

Cesare was like to faint at first. He had not been bred in Corsica, and was unused to such shocks. Then he grasped his gun, and, looking Carlo in the face, said:

"I, too, am a Forli."

But Carlo, uplifting his gun, shouted:

"Remember our bond—we are friends. I have sworn and you have sworn."

Cesare yielded to the persuasion.

"It is terrible!" he muttered.

Nevertheless he consented to go home with Carlo, who gave him the name of Pinello to make it possible for him to receive the hospitality of the family.

III.

Giovanni Leonetti lived in the village. He was uncle to Carlo, and a stalwart Corsican to boot. He never moved five steps from his house without his gun—loaded.

Cesare slept little his first night in the very thick of the Corsican feuds. He was thinking of his father, of Caterina, of the man he had shot—his own father's half-brother, as it turned out—and of the vengeance he would sooner or later wreak on young Carlo.

But Giovanni Leonetti was to die first. His mother had told him why, ere he left the mainland. The man had shot her first-born, Angelo, when he was a pretty boy of eight—had shot him as you or I would shoot a partridge. It was not, of course, from personal enmity, but merely in perpetuation of the traditional feud. Immediately afterwards, the police had taken Antonio Forli. Antonio had shot two of them in his successful attempt to escape. And then he and his wife and the little Cesare had evaded the island.

The little Angelo remained unrevenged.

Giovanni Leonetti came and stared at Cesare.

"What is thy business in the mountains?" he asked. Something in the lad's face made him uneasy.

"He has none, uncle," said Carlo, answering for him. "He was lost, and he did us a service in helping to finish off Giacomo Forli."

"Good! Then we are friends," replied Giovanni. But if he could have seen the hungry look in Cesare's eyes when he turned to go he would have amended his words.

"Be patient," said young Carlo to Cesare; "you have bound me to aid you, I will do it. The afterward shall take care of itself. Only tarry till his granddaughter comes from the town. Let him see her; they are so fond of each other. Between ourselves, Cesare, I love that girl; but she loves not me, though perhaps she will do it. Let him see her once more and then we will decide it. There is the family feud, and there is the personal bond. The latter is stronger with the individual, the former with the clan. I would, however, we had never met."

"And I," said Cesare. The lad was perplexed. There were times when his hot blood urged him to take Carlo's life at once. And again there were times when he sobbed to himself that it was impossible he could kill his companion.

For three days this strange life went on. On the fourth day, at noon, when Cesare came in from the mountains, whither he had been roaming with his wild thoughts, Carlo told him the news.

"She has arrived."

"Who?" asked the other.

"Come and see," said Carlo.

They crossed the green village square, with the great chestnut tree growing in its midst, and approached Giovanni Leonetti's house. Then they entered.

Digitized by Google

"Good day, cara mia," exclaimed Carlo.

The girl he addressed turned, and Cesare stepped backward with a thumping heart.

"Caterina!" he exclaimed, involuntarily.

It was she, sure enough. But, though she was at first confused, she had the tact of her sex, and it was not difficult for her to explain to her grandsire her meeting with Cesare as if it were the most trivial matter under the sun. But the spark of jealousy had been struck in Carlo's soul. He saw more than his uncle saw. And when they were outside again he taxed his companion with it.

"Hast said aught of love to that girl, my friend?" he asked.

"What is that to thee?" retorted Cesare, all his pride of family in a flame.

"Good, or rather bad!" replied the other. "It makes things simpler, though it will mean the saying of more masses."

There were few words exchanged between the two young men that day. Late in the evening, however, Carlo, who had become saturnine in the extreme, called Cesare to the door.

"Let us talk," he said, "under the chestnut tree. There is a moon. You will not want a gun."

"I trust you," replied Cesare, and together they went out.

Then, with a numbed heart, Cesare listened to Carlo's cold-blooded plan for the shooting of his own uncle. The old man went out every day to see to his goats. They were to follow him by stealth the next morning. The rest would be easy.

"And afterwards?" suggested Cesare, almost trembling. His thoughts were with Caterina.

"Afterwards—we will see," responded Carlo, and his thoughts also were with Caterina.

They returned to the house in silence, and in silence each went to bed.

The morning opened with mist and rain. But that was nothing. They were used to both in the Corsican highlands. Neither deterred old Giovanni from seeking his goats, gun in hand. And neither kept the two lads from getting on his track and following him over the slippery rocks and wet grass until the opportunity presented itself.

They were close on his heels at length. He had stopped to light his pipe, with his back to them. Carlo gently touched his companion on the shoulder, pointed, and whispered:

"Behold your quarry!"

No shot could have been simpler. In one instant Cesare had his gun extended, and the next the rocks echoed with the report, and old Leonetti lay on his face, shot through the heart.

"Let us see how it has gone," said Carlo quietly.

They turned the old man over. He was dead as Julius Cæsar.

Thrilled with a demoniacal sense of elation, Cesare now offered his hand to his friend—to have it rejected with such scorn as few but Corsicans can express by word and look. Carlo was a-boil with passion—for his family's and his own sake.

"That is over," he said hoarsely, referring to their recent friendship. "There is no feud in all Corsica more mortal than ours. Load thy gun."

"But, Carlo——" began the poor lad.

"But nothing. I owe a life for this here—" pointing to his uncle's body—"and another for thy insolence in forestalling me with—with her."

Then Cesare understood. The pride of the Forli was a good match for the pride of the Leonetti.

Without another word the lad reloaded.

"Ten paces will do," said Carlo; "the signal shall be the croaking of the first raven after we are in station."

These were the last words they exchanged.

For nearly a minute they stood, each with gun leveled at the other's forehead. There was a raven hard by on a withered pine trunk, but it kept deathly silence for full fifty seconds. At last it croaked.

MR. GEORGE GRIFFITH'S NEW SERIAL STORY, which commences in PEARSON'S WEEKLY published on JANUARY 26th, is called

VALDAR THE OFT-BORN:

A Saga of Seven Ages.

In this romance the author has forsaken those fields of the future over which the air-ships of "The Angel," "The Syren," and "The Outlaws" sped upon their devastating errands, and will transport his readers far back into the past ages of the world's history. In the forgotten days of the Golden Age, and in Asgard of the Gods within the vanished Polar Paradise, the action will commence, and from hence the hero will set out upon those strange wanderings which will lead him through many and marvellous vicissitudes on to the tremendous stage on which, at the beginning of the present century, the destinies of the world were shaped anew.

He will visit lands whose names are almost forgotten, and cities whose sites are now only marked by their ruins. Through the chapters of the story the greatest world characters will pass in swift and brilliant array. Battles which have decided the fate of empires and races will be fought out anew, not by the puppets of the schoolmen's histories, but by the living, breathing characters, whom the magic of romance will recall from their graves. As the story of each of the seven great ages of the world is told, those who during it made or marred the fate of humanity will come back out of the shadows and work out their appointed destiny, fighting and scheming, winning and losing, loving and hating, just as they did while their names were yet words of terror upon earth; and through all the changing scenes, the splendours of peace, and the sterner glories of battle, the hero will move, the one enduring figure of them all, accompanied by her who, for love of him, has elected to share his fate, to the accomplishment of his predestined doom, and the end of his marvellous pilgrimage.

Thus VALDAR THE OFT-BORN will be a story of love and war, of empire-making and empire-breaking in many ages and climes, all linked together in the weirdly drawn and yet perfectly human personalities of the two principal actors in the drama, and those who follow them through all their swiftly changing fortunes will, I think, have good reason to believe with me that the author displays no less skill in recalling the real glories of the past than he has done in portraying the ideal splendours and terrors of that future which he predicted in his previous works.

Mr. Griffith writes exclusively for Short Stories and Pearson's Weekly, and his previous novels have been so well received by my readers that I am sure they will look forward to VALDAR THE OFT-BORN with a good deal of interest. It is to those who have not yet read any of his romances I wish to appeal. Let them but read the opening chapters of this fascinating story, and I can promise them an intellectual treat.

Digitized by Google

THE OUTLAWS OF THE AIR.

By George Griffith,

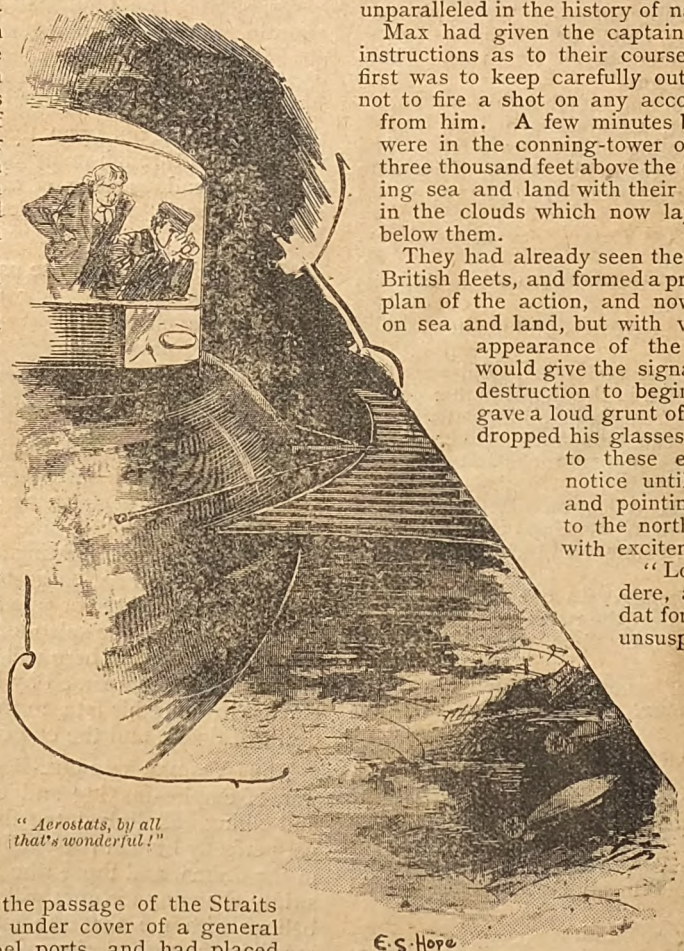
Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "The Syren of the Skies," etc.

CHAPTER XLI.

The Battle of the Sound.

As it was extremely unlikely that the Russian fleet would attempt to break the blockade of the Sound until it had the advantage of the darkness, Max decided to economise his motor fuel, and keep a speed of only fifty miles an hour across the German ocean. It was, therefore, close on eleven o'clock at night when the fleet arrived over what was to be the scene of action.

It was a dark, moonless, and somewhat cloudy night, but, as the ships sank through the clouds, their crews could distinctly make out the two irregular shores of the Sound, with their twinkling lights and the illuminated clusters which mark the position of the towns along them. To the north of Kronborg, in the triangular opening between Högenaes on the Swedish and Gilleleie on the Danish shore, was massed the main body of the British fleet.



"Aerostats, by all that's wonderful!"

Although Germany and Denmark had not yet declared war their governments had intimated to Russia that any attempt to violate the neutrality of the Sound, or to force the passages between the southern islands of Denmark would be considered as an act of war. The southern approaches to the exits from the Baltic were, therefore, patrolled by a powerful German fleet with Kiel and the Holstein Canal as its base, while the Danish fleet, supported by the land fortifications, barred the way to the Sound, and the Grön Sound, which forms the channel between the islands of Falster and Zealand, and the entrance to the Great Belt.

Thus the Russian fleet, strong as it was, would have been hopelessly outnumbered but for two facts. A French squadron of eight battle-ships, sixteen cruisers, and thirty-five torpedo boats had forced the passage of the Straits of Dover four days previously, under cover of a general attack on the English Channel ports, and had placed the British blockading squadron between two fires, just as the Russians would be if they once steamed into the Sound.

This was the first fact, and was by this time known to all Europe. The second fact had been kept a profound secret, confined to the Tsar and half a dozen of his most trusted engineers, who commanded a body of a hundred picked volunteers, sworn to secrecy, and chosen exclusively from the noblest families of Russia. For over five years the Russian engineering staff had been steadily experimenting in the directions of a solution of the problem of aerostation, and about six months before the outbreak of the war their efforts had been crowned with success, and a fleet of navigable aerostats had been secretly constructed far away from public observation, on one of the Tsar's private estates in the wilderness of the Urals.

The inactivity on the part of the Russian fleet in the Baltic, which had excited so much surprise, was in reality due to the necessity of waiting until the aerostats could co-operate with the battleships in forcing the passage of the Sound. No fewer than a hundred of these new engines of war had been built by the Russian Government, and fifty of them were to take part in the struggle for the command of the narrow sea, a battle which, as the event proved, was destined to be entirely unparalleled in the history of naval warfare.

Max had given the captain of his fleet strict and ample instructions as to their course of action, and of these the first was to keep carefully out of sight until night fell, and not to fire a shot on any account until he received a signal from him. A few minutes before eleven, Max and Hartog were in the conning-tower of the Revanche, floating about three thousand feet above the island of Moen, intently watching sea and land with their glasses through the white rifts in the clouds which now lay some five or six hundred feet below them.

They had already seen the French, German, Danish, and British fleets, and formed a pretty correct idea of the general plan of the action, and now they were waiting, like those on sea and land, but with very different feelings, for the appearance of the Russian fleet, whose arrival would give the signal for the work of death and destruction to begin. All of a sudden Hartog gave a loud grunt of astonishment, and very nearly dropped his glasses. Max, who was accustomed to these exclamations of his, took no notice until he caught him by the arm, and pointing down to a rift in the clouds to the northward, said in a voice husky with excitement:

"Look, mine friendt, look down dere, and tell me vhat you tink of dat for a nice trick to blay on dose unsuspecting sailors and soldiers vat are vaiting to plow each oder to pieces mit all the resources of Christianity and civilisation. By tam! I believe dose tings belong to de Russians, and if dey do dere will be der tuefel's own delight down dere before de sun rises."

Max looked down, and to his amazement saw three great elongated, cigar-shaped bodies drifting rapidly through the air to northward over the waters of the Sound.

"Aerostats, by all that's wonderful!" he ejaculated. "And pretty lively ones too at that. Those fellows aren't moving much less than fifty miles an hour, and what wind there is is against them. Yes, I remember now, Lea told me only the other day that she had heard rumours that the Tsar's engineers had succeeded in building some of those things in some out-of-the-way place and hoped to be able to use them in the war. Well, if they do belong to the Tsar, and he has a good few of them about, I hardly think there'll be much need for our assistance for some time yet. They'll smash one another up pretty completely without us."

Digitized by Google

"And den—" chuckled Hartog, rubbing his hands in anticipation of a perfect carnival of bloodshed—"den ven dey are all smashed ve can sail in and go for de remains, and den tackle de var balloons and bust dem up as vell. Mein Gott, dat vill be glorious fun!"

"I don't see why we should smash up the war-balloons, at any rate just yet," said Max quietly. "Just think of the damage they are able to do to those who are our enemies just as well as theirs. Of course I don't suppose they'd be any match for us, for we could fly two or three feet to their one, but for land and sea warfare they'll be better than anything the British or Germans have got. I think we'd better see what damage they can do before we interfere with them. It all helps on the good work of Anarchy you know. The more horrible war becomes the sooner the peoples of the earth will get disgusted with the rulers and politicians who are always dragging them into it. Let them do what destruction they can manage, and then we'll go in and finish."

"Max," said Hartog, in a tone of sententious mock reproof, "I am afraidt you haf very bloodtirsty tastes. I tink it vould be a fery great slaughter dat vould satisfy you."

"Yes," said Max, with a savage laugh, "a very big one; but look, there goes the main fleet! The first three we saw were only scouts, I suppose. I don't think it will be long now before the fun begins."

The rift in the clouds had widened now, and through it they saw a long line of the strange-looking shapes, curved in the form of a crescent, drift swiftly to the north, where the unsuspecting fleets and fortresses were waiting for a very different and far less formidable enemy.

"I hope our fellows won't take it into their heads to fire at those aerostats," continued Max. "That would spoil all the fun. I wish those clouds were a bit thicker, and I'd take the risk of signalling them."

"Vy not hoist a vite flag instead of de red one," suggested Hartog, "and then fly along past dem? Dey vill understand dat after your oder instructions."

"Yes, that's not a bad idea," said Max. "We'll try that."

Ten minutes later the Revanche had ascended a few hundred feet and passed along the long line of air-ships which extended north and south. At the southern end towards Fehmern Island, at the entrance to Kiel Bay, one of the ships stationed there ran alongside her. When they were within hail a slide was drawn back in her conning-tower, and her captain called to Max and asked him if he had seen the aerostats. Then, on learning that he had, he told him that another squadron had passed under him into the Bay apparently heading for Kiel.

"All right," replied Max.

"I suppose you understand what the white flag means?"

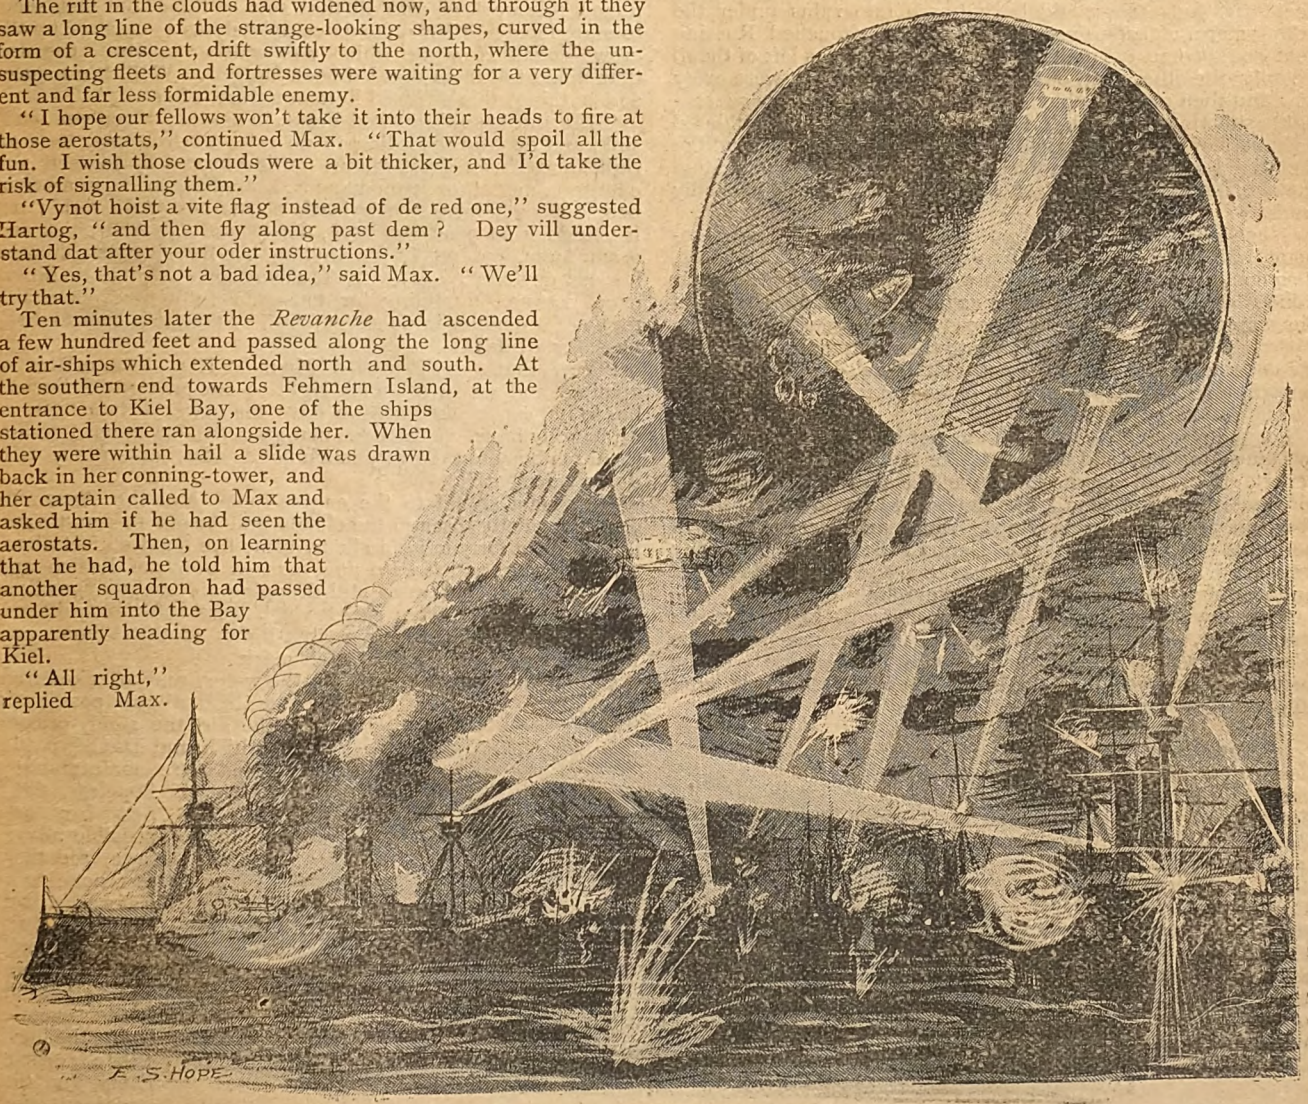
"Oh yes; you don't want us to do anything until they have got to work," was the reply. "I suppose you'll give the signal when you want us to start?"

"Yes, I'll fire the first gun. If you have nothing better to do, you may as well run along and speak the other ships, and tell them not to fire until I do, and to be careful of the ammunition, and to see that every shot does its work. I'm going to look for the Russian fleet now."

Max nodded to the captain of the Ravachol—for all the vessels of the Anarchist fleet, saving the Revanche and the captured Vengeur, had been named after the so-called heroes and martyrs of Anarchy—and then the flag-ship, once more flying the red flag, flew at a rapid pace toward the eastward. After half an hour's flight, during which they gradually descended to fifteen hundred feet, Max pointed ahead and said to Hartog:

"There they are, and a rare old crowd of them too! Why there must be over a hundred of them altogether."

"Jah, dat is so; and vat for a smoke and sparks dey are making. Dey will be going full speed now mit der forced draughts. Dey vill vait for der aerostats to make tings all anyhow in de Sound, and den make a rush to get trough. I tink ve had better go back or ve shall miss some of de fun."



A strange and terrible scene it was.

Digitized by Google

"Yes," said Max, swinging the Revanche's head round, "I suppose we had. The bombs will be beginning to fly by this time. I am rather curious to see how those things do their work."

In an hour the Revanche was over the scene of action, and a strange and terrible scene it was. The aerostats had dropped to a height of a thousand feet above the fortifications of Elsinore and the Danish ships guarding the Sound, and were raining mélinite and dynamite bombs on them with fearful effect. Search-lights were flashing up from the land and water in all directions seeking the terrible foe, until the whole air was ablaze with them, and those in the forts and on board the ships saw, to their horror, not only the aerostats, but, above them, the more distant shapes of the Anarchist air-ships.

Thousands of projectiles from machine guns were being hurled in showers into the air, but none seemed to strike the rapidly moving aerostats, which were able to dart hither and thither in the almost windless atmosphere at a speed of over fifty miles an hour, so that they swept through the beams of the search-lights and into the darkness again with such bewildering rapidity that it was little better than a waste of ammunition to fire at them.

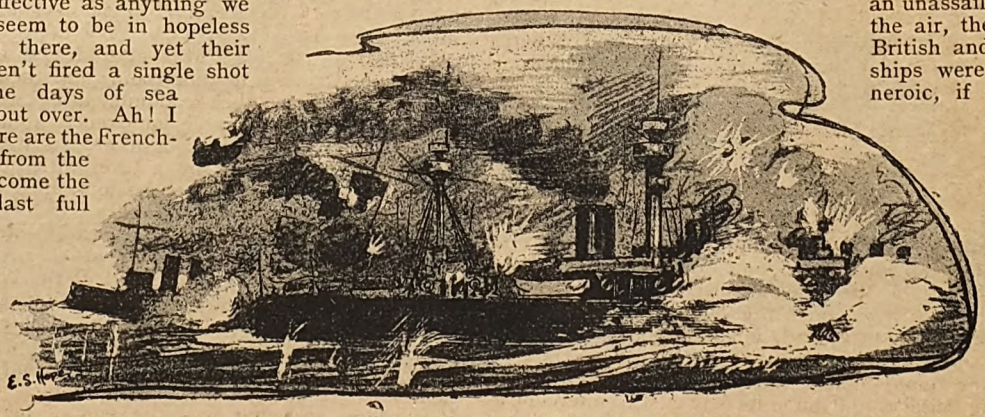
From their great size it was evident they could carry enough ammunition to keep the bombardment up for hours, possibly till daylight, and during all that time the British and Danish fleets and fortresses would be battered into ruins under the falling storm of explosives, and then the untouched Russian fleet would come and make short work of what was left of them.

As for the other fleet, one or two vessels of which were every now and then made visible by some chance ray of the search-lights shooting up through a rift in the clouds, the bewildered defenders of the Sound could make nothing of it beyond the fact that it evidently was not friendly, or it would have engaged the aerostats before they had had time to begin their deadly work.

When the Anarchists, from their unassailable vantage-point, had watched the bombardment for about three hours, they could see that Copenhagen was in flames and Elsinore in ruins; while, from the constant explosions that took place on the water, blazing up like volcanoes for a moment through the darkness, and then dying down into the night again, and from the constantly diminishing number of search-lights that were thrown up against the clouds, it was manifest that terrible execution had been done.

But the merciless destruction was not by any means confined to Danish territory and the Sound, for the air-ships brought up reports from the south to the effect that Kiel had been vigorously bombarded all the time, and was now little better than an area of blazing ruins; while another squadron of aerostats had attacked the German fleet, and not only prevented it getting out of the bay, but had greatly damaged and completely demoralised it into the bargain.

"I told you there would be no need for us to interfere for the present," said Max, who had received the news when the Revanche was floating over the Gut of Elsinore. "The organised Anarchy that these good people call war is, after all, nearly as effective as anything we can do. They seem to be in hopeless confusion down there, and yet their heavy guns haven't fired a single shot yet. Verily, the days of sea fighting are about over. Ah! I thought so. There are the Frenchmen closing in from the north, and here come the Russians at last full steam up from the south. I don't think there'll be much of the British fleet left by sunrise."



Through a storm of shot and shell.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE VICTORS VANQUISHED.

THE showers of sparks and plumes of flame now plainly visible north and south clearly proved that Max was right when he said that the French and Russian fleets were closing upon their more than half-disabled enemies. Under the highest speed that their forced draught would give them, the two great squadrons, loaded with potential death and destruction, rapidly converged upon the narrow waters in which the remains of the British and Danish fleets were now imprisoned.

"Ah, jah, now de big guns are beginning to speak!" cried Hartog, as the deep, dull booming of the battleships' artillery rose like distant thunder from the water.

Pale flashes of yellow-white flame streamed through the darkness to north and south of the Gut, to be answered by other flashes from the centre; and these, again, were supplemented by brilliant spheres of light which blazed out for a moment and then vanished, as the bombs from the aerostats fell on the decks of cruisers and battleships, and exploded, spreading death and ruin over them.

"Yes, that's pretty murderous work, considering that it's the latest outcome of nearly two thousand years of Christian civilisation, and the evolution of law and order," said Max, in a half-sneering, half-laughing tone. "Of course, it's fair and honourable warfare, and all that sort of thing, but they seem to mangle each other quite as completely as I smashed up the crowd round Newgate which was waiting to cheer the flag that would tell them that I'd been hanged. Well, it's a queer sort of thing, this civilised human nature, after all."

"Jah, dat is so," grunted Franz, in assent; "ven you burn, sink, and destroy according to de rules of de game, it is all right, and if you do it mitout getting busted up yourself you can get a medal, or a monument, according to de number of people dat you have sent in leetle pieces out of de vorld; but if you do it on your own hook, den you are an Anarchist, and a murderer, and not fit for anyting but hanging or guillotining ven dey catch you at it. It seems someting like de difference between gambling for tousands on a racecourse and tossing for pennies in de street; but, by tam, it is only foolishness, for all dat."

"Yes, that's so," replied Max. "It's all a matter of opinion, and we've as much right to our opinion as Society has to its, especially when we have the power to inforce it, as we happily have. I think we can go a bit lower now. They seem too busy to take very much notice of us, and if they do it doesn't matter."

He sent a signal to the engine-room, and the Revanche dropped quietly through the clouds and began to run to and fro, at about forty miles an hour, some five hundred feet above the aerostats, which were now massed over the British and Danish fleets, and were still dropping a ceaseless shower of bombs upon any of the ships which were sufficiently illuminated by the converging search-lights of the French and Russian squadrons to offer a fair mark.

Outnumbered as they were on the water, and attacked from an unassailable position in the air, the sorely-pressed British and Danish battleships were maintaining a heroic, if hopeless, fight, not for any possible advantage, for there was none to be gained; but simply with the object of doing as much damage as possible to their enemies before the inevitable came. Every gun that remained effective was served and fired with such rapidity and precision that the fighting force of the fleets seemed doubled, and cruiser after cruiser and battleship after battleship, when her guns were no longer serviceable, made a dash with the ram upon the nearest enemy, charging into her through a storm of shot and shell, and either sinking beside her or with her rather than haul down her flag in surrender.

Digitized by Google

The aerostat exploded like a huge bubble.

Indeed, so obstinately heroic was the resistance, or rather the dying struggle, of the allied fleets, that not until morning dawned, and the unequal fight had been prolonged for five hours, did the French and Russian fleets find the way of the Sound open, and steamed together southward past the silenced fortifications on land and the crippled and sinking wrecks of the blockading squadrons on sea.

To the south from the direction of the Great Belt and the Bay of Keil the sounds of conflict were still rolling up like peals of distant thunder. A portion of the Russian fleet had been detached, as soon as the defeat of the British and Danish force was assured, to co-operate with the second squadron of aerostats against the German fleet and the fortifications of Kiel. To the north the victory was complete, and so the united fleets, greatly diminished in numbers by the fierce struggle that their triumph had cost, but still in overwhelming strength, steamed south to complete the destruction that the aerostats had begun.

As the light increased a splendid, but what would have been to any other eyes a terrible spectacle, was unfolded before the gaze of the Anarchists, floating high above the smoke and din of the combat. To the south-west the smoke and flames of the burning town and docks and arsenal of Kiel were plainly visible over the low-lying land of Probstei. In the Fehmern Belt and Fehmern Sound one German fleet was making ready to attack the French and Russian squadrons, while to the eastward a second German fleet was coming up under full steam from Stralsund, apparently in the hope of catching the enemy between two fires.

As soon as the reinforcement was sighted the French fleet parted from the Russian and made its way east to intercept it. Meanwhile the aerostats had sunk down alongside a flotilla of transports which had been kept in the wake of the Russian fleet, and were taking in fresh supplies of ammunition. By the time the four fleets were fairly engaged again they mounted slowly into the air, divided into two equal squadrons of twenty-five each, and stationed themselves over the two divisions of the German force.

It was now quite light enough for Max and Hartog to see that the gas-holders of the aerostats, instead of being made of silk or balloon cloth, were really huge cylinders of a white metal, probably very thin sheet aluminium, which glistened with a silvery lustre in the beams of the rising sun, and that their cars, instead of being suspended by ropes, were simply lower compartments of one and the same structure. They also differed in another respect from all previous types of aerostats

Two propellers projected from the stern of the car, and a third and very much larger one revolved on a shaft projecting from the after part of the gas-holder itself. This was obviously an immense improvement on all previous forms, not only as regards speed, but also in stiffness and facility of management. From the jets of white vapour which constantly escaped from the stern of the cars, it was plain that their motive power was derived from steam engines, and as a matter of fact their engines had been designed and built from the published descriptions of those which had been used to propel the Maxim aeroplanes.

As soon as the sun got fairly above the horizon the clouds began to melt away rapidly, and before long the Anarchist fleet was plainly visible to the eyes of the astonished combatants, flying round and round in wide curves at just sufficient speed to keep the vessels supported on the air-planes with the smallest possible expenditure of motive power. They maintained themselves at an almost uniform speed of between forty and fifty miles an hour, and a height that varied from two to three thousand feet, as they alternately sank and soared in their swift and graceful evolutions.

That they had an interest in the combat was manifest from the fact that they remained on the scene of action, but they took no part whatever in the struggle until a signal from the Russian flagship sent three aerostats into the upper regions of the air to investigate.

"Those fellows had better mind their own business," said Max, who still remained with Hartog on the conning-tower of the Revanche. "If they come too close, they'll be getting hurt. We'll let them rise a bit further just to satisfy their curiosity, and then if they don't go down again we'll send them down. I wonder how they manage to rise without throwing out any ballast."

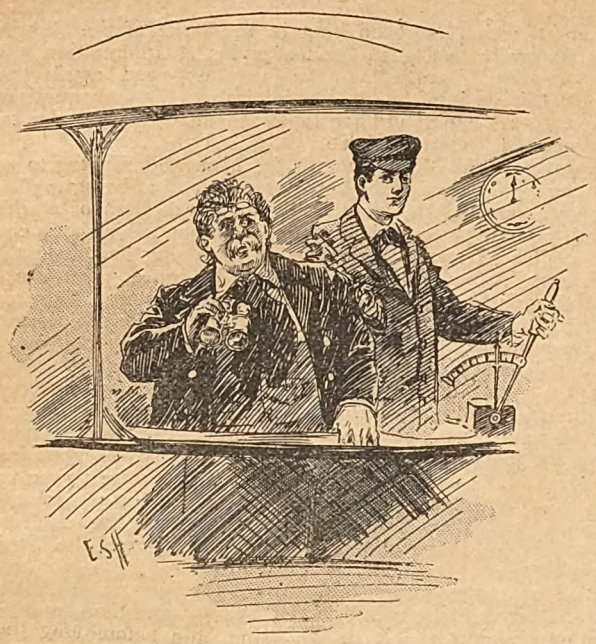
"Oh, I tink I can tell you how dat is done," said Hartog. "Dey haf a collapsible air-chamber inside de gas holder. Ven dey vant to go down dey pump air into it, vich is fourteen times heavier dan dere hydrogen, so down they go, and ven dey vant to rise dey draw de air out and den de hydrogen expands and takes its place, getting lighter de more it spreads, and so dey go up. It is very simple ven you know how. But look, von of dose fellows is coming at us as dough he tought he can do us some damage. Maybe he tinks he can fly as fast as ve can. Vill you not show him vat a foolish mistake dat is?"

Instead of replying, Max uttered a short scornful laugh, sent a signal to the engine-room, and then gave some rapid orders down the tubes communicating with the gun-room. The Revanche immediately quickened up a little. Max gave the wheel a turn, and brought her stern on to the aerostat which was now almost on a level with her, and about five hundred yards away. Then he took up one of the speaking-tubes and said into it:

"After guns—fire when you're ready," and then he looked back to watch the effect of his order. A minute later the two shells struck the forward part of the car, close under the gasholder of the aerostat, almost simultaneously, and burst.

The aerostat exploded like a huge bubble in the midst of a momentary mist of flame. Her car, with its cargo and machinery, plunged downwards into the water from a height of nearly two thousand feet, just missing one of the Russian battleships, and that was the end of her. The other two

Digitized by Google



"Your fellows don't fight so well as the British.'

needed no second hint not to continue the investigation. They sank rapidly on a slanting course towards where the French and German fleets were now hotly engaged, leaving the Anarchists in undisputed possession of the upper regions of the air.

"Dot vill be a nice little surprise for dem," chuckled Hartog, as he watched the fearful effects of the two shells. "I suppose dey tought ve came here just to see de fun as ve might haf come to a circus, and so dey came to say goot morning to us. Perhaps dey vill attend more strictly to pusiness now."

"Yes," said Max, with something like a snarl, as though the fate of the aerostat had whetted his appetite for destruction. "We'll give them business when they've crippled each other a bit more. Those poor beggars of Germans are making a precious poor show against their new enemies of the air. Your fellows don't fight as well as the British did, Franz."

"No, dey don't," snapped Hartog savagely. "Mein Gott, I am ashamed of dem! Dey seems to tink dey are at a review. If I was only down dere in my old Destroyer I vould show dem vat proper fighting is."

"Until you got a shell on top of you from one of those aerostats," laughed Max, "and then you'd wish you were up here again I think."

"Ach, Himmel, jah! I forgot dat. No; sea fighting is no good mit air-ships. It is not a fair game, unless you happen to be in de air-ship. But don't you tink it's about time for us to join in de fun, friendt Max? Look, dey haf half crippled each oder all ready."

This was true, for ever since daybreak the fighting had been fast and furious between the fleets, and the aerostats had been discharging their fresh cargoes of bombs upon the German vessels with fearful effect. Their fire was visibly slackening, and each of their squadrons had lost at least a dozen battleships and cruisers, which had either been blown up by the bombs from the air or been sunk by torpedoes.

The French and Russian loss had also been fairly heavy, for, despite Max's characteristically French sneer, the Germans had fought their ships splendidly, considering the fearful disadvantage at which they were placed by the assault of the aerostats. At length Max, tired of watching in inactivity, yielded to Hartog's persuasions and his own inbred love of destruction, and flew from the flagstaff of the Revanche the signal which, according to the Anarchist code, meant: "Fleet to engage. Destroy everything."

The captains of the air-ships went to work in obedience to the signal with a business-like alacrity which proved how impatiently they had been waiting to take their share in the work of destruction. Max had reconsidered his decision as to the aerostats, and therefore had included them in the general order. In the first place, he felt it very unlikely that they would be the only vessels of the kind in the possession of the Russians, and secondly, he thought that it would not be safe to leave too great a destructive power at the disposal of Society.

The Revanche devoted herself exclusively for the time being to the aerostats, and almost as fast as her guns could be loaded and fired the well-aimed shells struck the huge gas-holders which offered such a splendid mark for the gunners. The impact of the shells pierced the thin metal envelope, and, as the hydrogen rushed out to mix with the air, the explosion ignited it, rending the envelope to fragments with a shock that shook the air for a hundred yards about it, and sending the car, with its crew and cargo, plunging headlong into the depths below.

The crews of the war-ships looked upwards in wondering dismay at the marvellous spectacle presented by the two contending aerial fleets, the aerostats vainly trying to outsoar or escape from the guns of their agile enemies, and ever and anon bursting with a flash and a bang, like gigantic shells, as the fatal missiles struck them, while the air-ships, like gigantic birds of prey, outsoared and outflew them, sweeping hither and thither in bewilderingly rapid curves, and then stopping for a moment or two to send their terrible shells home.

In less than an hour the marvellous but unequal battle was over, and the remains of the last aerostat had plunged in fragments into the sea. No fewer than five of them, deliberately driven by the Anarchists over the fleets, had fallen amongst them, exploding their cargoes of bombs in their midst, wrecking the helpless battleships and cruisers, and blowing the torpedo boats and catchers into atoms.

At first the Germans had thought that the air-ships were the British craft belonging to the Syndicate about which so many rumours had been flying through the Continent; but, as soon as the last aerostat had been destroyed, they were speedily undeceived, for the Anarchists now went to work with terrible effectiveness on French, Germans, and Russians alike. The war-ships, already half-crippled in their struggle with each other, fell an easy and a helpless prey to the twenty-one aerial cruisers which, from their unassailable altitudes, swept their decks with storms of Maxim bullets followed by showers of shells and bombs charged with Anarchite and fire-mixture.

By mid-day, out of the four great fleets, only six battleships and four cruisers remained afloat. Of the lighter craft, not one had escaped, and of the big ships that remained floating more than half the crews had been killed, the guns were useless, the engines crippled, and the ships themselves were only kept afloat by their water-tight compartments. And so ended the great Battle of the Baltic—in the indiscriminate destruction of victors and vanquished by the common enemy of them both.

"Dat is about de most unprofitable sea-fight vatever vas fought I should tink," chuckled Hartog, as Max flew the signal to cease firing. "I suppose you vill leave dose fellows to get home as best dey can, and tell de story for de edification of Europe?"

"Yes," said Max, "we shall produce the best effects that way I think, and they certainly aren't worth wasting more ammunition on now."

(To be continued.)

IF YOU LIKE THIS STORY, YOU WILL BE SURE TO ENJOY
"VALDAR THE OFT-BORN,"
By the same Author,
Now appearing in "PEARSON'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google

THE TURNING OF THE WORM

JOHN ROGERS looked impatiently at the clock. He had waited now exactly half-an-hour, and was beginning to get a little restless. "Half-past ten is a pretty hour to go to a party!" he murmured to himself. He began to walk up and down the floor, and then stopped suddenly as he heard a light step on the stairs. He moved towards the door, but the light faded from his face as a trim maid entered, bearing a great bunch of yellow roses in her hand.

"Pardon, monsieur," she said, "but mam'selle says it is impossible that she should wear yellow roses."

He looked at her blankly.

"She wants you to change them—it is the pink rose that mam'selle prefers to-night."

"Oh, she wants pink roses, does she? Well, I'd like to know where I can get any at this time of night."

"The florist's is two corners off, if monsieur will go, and it is La France roses that mam'selle must have to-night, and she will be quite ready on the return of monsieur."

So John Rogers took his yellow roses and bundled into his carriage, not in the most amiable frame of mind. All his annoyance disappeared, however, when he came back and found that Miss Cora Fenton was indeed ready. She stood in the drawing-room pulling on her long gloves—a vision of rosy loveliness. Her white neck and arms rose out of a pink fleecy cloud, and dazzled him.

"Such a shame to keep you waiting," she said, "but I never had such a miserable time getting into my clothes before. Everything seemed bewitched, and my hair looks like a fiend's now. I was so sorry about the roses, but you see yourself it would have been enough to give one a headache with yellow roses and this dress."

The maid threw her long cloak round her, and in a few minutes they were seated side by side on their way to Mrs. Dillingham's cotillon.

It was not the first time that John Rogers had been her escort, but he was just beginning to realise how bitter-sweet a pleasure it was. He was an old friend, so old and trusted that often he went with her, as to-night, without a chaperon.

She was "poor Cora Fenton" in this, that although young, beautiful, and an heiress, she was an orphan, and in a certain sense without a home. To be sure, her brother with whom she lived, was devoted to her, but he cared very little for the society which she loved, and his wife was entirely engrossed with the four little children, who seemed to be all babies at once.

Cora felt dimly that it would be a relief to them both if she were married and established in a home of her own, and perhaps it was this very feeling that made her so wilful and hard to please. No girl likes to be driven along the matrimonial path. She prefers to be guided, and by nothing less masterful than fate itself. She knew perfectly well how satisfied everyone would be if she should marry John Rogers, and the thought of their satisfaction irritated her. She wanted to be her own Columbus, and cross an unknown sea, instead of travelling over a well-worn road, with a sign-post at every corner, and dozens of friendly eyes watching her as she went.

The immediate effect of all this was that she was sometimes quite rude and chilling to poor John Rogers. She was dissatisfied with things in general, and, in the slang phrase, she "took it out of him." On this particular evening at Mrs. Dillingham's she seemed more illusive and distant than ever.

John Rogers watched her dancing with other men nearly all the evening, and it was with a feeling of relief that he helped her into the carriage at last and slammed the door behind them.

"I hope you have enjoyed yourself," he said grimly.

"Indeed I have," she answered airily. "I thought it quite the prettiest cotillon this winter. The Dillinghams always do things so well—don't you think so?"

"Yes," he said, feeling that they had not done particularly well for him.

"It was such a pretty idea," she went on, "having those snowball favours of swansdown. But, do you know, they were heavier than lead. I threw one at Will Lawrence, and it nearly knocked off his ear."

"Did it?" he replied, so wearily that she hastened to say: "Do you know, I believe you were bored to death the whole time."

"You know I love to go anywhere with you, Cora, but this is somehow so unsatisfactory." There was a moment's silence, and then he added impetuously: "I want you all to myself, not shared with all those chattering idiots. I said I wouldn't worry you, and I don't mean to, but if you knew how hard this waiting was. But why can't you decide now, Cora? Why can't you tell me to-night? I love you so——"

Her clear laugh interrupted him. "I never heard anything so ridiculous! Proposing in a carriage at two o'clock in the morning. Why, there isn't room to answer in."

"There's room enough to say 'yes.'"

"Don't be ridiculous. You know I like you better than anyone, but I don't want to marry for a long, long time."

They were silent until the carriage stopped, when she sprang quickly out, as if eager to escape. At the door she paused.

"You're going to take me to the Barclays' on Tuesday, aren't you?"

"Yes, I expected to. Is your sister going?"

"Yes, she and Charlie too. You won't forget?"

So, with the cheerful prospect before him of repeating his evening's experiences, he drove home alone. He remarked to himself several times that he was a fool, and he felt quite sure of it the night at the Barclays' dance. He had been "flocking by himself" for some time, and wondering why on earth he allowed Cora to drag him to these ghastly entertainments. He was standing by a screen of palms, when he suddenly became conscious of voices on the other side of it.

"There is no chance that you should ever think differently!" a man's voice was saying.

"I think not," answered the girl, gently and softly.

John Roger's heat leaped within him, for it was Cora's voice. He knew he ought not to listen, knew that he ought to walk promptly in an opposite direction—but—but—here was another man proposing to his Cora.

"Of course," the man's voice said humbly, "if there is someone else——" he hesitated, and there was a little silence.

"There is someone else," said Cora, in a very low voice that trembled slightly. "I have always thought the least a girl could do was to be perfectly frank and honest, and so I will trust you—I will tell you. We are not engaged, and I have treated him very badly, but—it is John Rogers. I think I have always cared more for him than for anyone. Oh, I am so sorry!" she added impulsively.

Just then there was the hum of other voices, and they moved away, or were silent, for John Rogers could not hear them any more.

He stood for a moment, dazed and blinded by his happiness. Cora's low broken words were ringing in his ears. He came out of his corner with such a beaming face, and his spirits were so high for the rest of the evening, that several of his partners had doubts as to his sobriety. It seemed as if he could not wait to see Cora alone. Her brother and sister were in the carriage driving home, but he contrived to find Cora's hand, and to press it hard. To his surprise she drew it quickly away.

Digitized by Google

"May I come to see you in the morning?" he asked at the door.

"In the morning?" she questioned, with a puzzled look.

"Yes, I must see you. I cannot possibly wait."

Cora kept him waiting a long time next morning, and when she finally appeared, looking very lovely in her morning dress, she seemed entirely oblivious of her confession and his happiness.

"I was in the hall behind the palms, Cora, last night. I don't know who he was. I don't want to know; but I heard you tell him—oh, Cora—I heard you tell him that you cared for me." His voice sank almost to a whisper, and his face was quivering with the intensity of his feeling.

A deep wave of colour swept over the girl's face. Then she grew very pale, and it seemed as if her whole attitude toward him stiffened and hardened. "May I ask," she said, "if it is your habit to go round listening to conversation that is intended for other people?"

"I know it was wrong," he answered, in a troubled, humble way; "but, Cora, I heard him speak before I had a chance to get away, and then, oh, Cora, it was so sweet to hear your answer."

He looked at her imploringly, but there was no relenting in her face or manner.

"I think it was, to say the least, a most ungentlemanly thing to do. However, since you did see fit to listen, I cannot possibly understand how you could twist the conversation into any reference to you whatever."

He seemed bewildered. "Why, you said——" he began.

"I said," she interrupted calmly, "that I cared for someone else. If you, in your vanity and complacency, think I meant you, I cannot help it."

"And you meant nothing! Oh, Cora, I can't believe it! I have been so happy. I thought that at last you knew your heart, and now it is a thousand times worse than ever!"

"I am very sorry for your misunderstanding," she said, coldly; "but really if people will listen——" she stopped abruptly, struck by the dumb despair in his face. "Don't let's talk about it any more," she said, in a kinder tone. "You dine with us to-morrow, you know—New Year's Day."

"I shall never dine here again," he answered grimly; "I am a worm of the dust before you. You are as cold and heartless as a stone image. At times I hate you. If you were only honest, if you would only tell me frankly that you cared nothing for me, why, I'd crawl away and try to get over it somehow. But you are a flirt; you are not true. You give me a little hope and then grow more distant than ever. You are a thorough flirt—a woman without a soul!"

Cora Fenton trembled a little at this arraignment, but her voice was steady as she answered: "If this be so, I advise you to have nothing more to do with me. It is easy to leave me, and I shall not follow you."

They eyed each other fixedly, measuring their strength. Then the man quailed. "It's no use," he said miserably. "What do you want me to do?"

"Behave like a sane person in general, and come to dinner to-morrow in particular."

"And then?"

"Oh, John, how can I tell?" She looked at him appealingly, and put a little white hand on his arm. She had conquered. She could afford to be generous. "You know you are the dearest friend I have," she continued, in a soft, caressing voice. "It nearly kills me when you talk to me like that. I do care for you, truly, honestly—only I cannot tell yet. How is a girl to know? I am not a flirt. I like to have a good time, and to have attention—what girl doesn't? But I hate to have you feel so. Cheer up. Perhaps it will all come out right yet." And she looked at him shyly and sweetly.

"Well," he said gloomily, "perhaps it will."

"And you will come to dinner to-morrow?"

"I suppose so; although it seems such a farce."

"Well, that won't affect the menu, and—we all want you, John!"

And so the worm, having been well trodden upon, crawled off to prepare for the New Year. But he was very unhappy.

He remained in his own room that evening restless and uneasy. He lighted a number of cigars, which he allowed to go out, and then tried to read. Finally, he found a volume that interested him, slightly at first, and then more deeply, till pushing all the other books and papers aside he read on into the night. It struck him simply as the truthful story of a woman's heart, the book being a masterpiece of Balzac's.

"By George!" he exclaimed, throwing the book from him and walking up and down the room; "that's the way to treat such a woman!"

Then he thought of Cora, and the little fire of resentment that had burned in his heart ever since parting from her suddenly glowed afresh. He thought a long time, and when he finally put out his light, and went to sleep, he was a different John Rogers from the disheartened fellow he had been all day. Determination had taken the place of endurance; long-suffering had ended in resolution. It would have disturbed Miss Cora Fenton's dreams had she known that the worm had made up its mind to turn.

New Year's Day dawned with a sharp frost, a gleam of sunshine on the icicles and a hint of snow in the air.

It was just the day for a drive, and Cora Fenton, although a little surprised, was delighted when John Rogers came for her in the afternoon. His pretty turn-out stood waiting at the door, while his prettier horse pawed the snow, and shook his head as if impatient to be off.

"I shall be glad to go," said Cora graciously. "All houses seem stuffy such a day as this. You're not going far?"

"That depends," he answered smilingly. "We'll come home whenever you say the word."

She looked at him, and was suddenly struck by the fact that he was a very handsome man, tall and straight, with broad shoulders, and such a kind, good face. But to-day it seemed to Cora that his honest eyes were a deeper blue than usual, and she had never before noticed how firm and strong the lines of his mouth were, half hidden under his brown beard. She was unusually light-hearted, and chattered gaily as they drove along.

Everybody they met seemed smiling and happy, and the drive was so pleasant that it was with a feeling of regret Cora finally said:

"Oughtn't we to turn round now? I've lost all track of time."

"I don't think we'd better turn," he answered steadily, "until I have asked you a few questions and you have answered them."

Something in his voice surprised her. She looked at him in amazement.

"I want to know," he continued, in a low tone, "if you have made up your mind to marry me."

"Why, John," she said uneasily, "how queer you are! Everything has been so nice and pleasant, and now you must needs go and rake up that old subject."

There was a cold gleam in his eye that she didn't like. She watched him for a moment in troubled silence. Then she added:

"I've told you over and over again that I didn't know how much—I cared."

"Well," he said quietly, "I propose to drive until you find out."

"What?"

"Just that. You will have to know your own mind to-day. You can take all the time you want, and I won't interrupt you while you think."

"Why, John!" she exclaimed. "You're perfectly mad! Take me home at once! I never heard of such a thing. Take me home—or I'll—I'll jump out."

He put his hand on her arm, and held her firmly. "Look here, Cora," he said quietly, "you can't jump out. Of course you can scream, if you want to, and attract attention, but you know well enough that that means publicity, and perhaps notoriety. You know that you can trust me, Cora. I wouldn't hurt a hair of your head, but to-day you've got to answer me."

Digitized by Google

"How long are you going to drive?" she asked indignantly.

"Until you answer."

"But if I don't?"

"Oh, you will before to-morrow morning."

"To-morrow morning!" she gasped.

"Yes," he said calmly; "it's going to be a beautiful moonlight night. I've got plenty of wraps and robes. I see no reason why we shouldn't drive all night."

"I don't believe you," she cried; "you're not in earnest."

He turned to look at her squarely. "You're very much mistaken if you think this is a joke," he said soberly. "I never was more serious in my life."

"And do you think this is a manly, honourable way to act? Do you think a gentleman would steal a helpless girl like this, and run off with her? I call it mean and contemptible," and her eyes flashed at him.

"You are mistaken, Cora," he said, in the same even tone; "I am not running away with you at all. It is in your power to make me turn round this minute. I want you to say 'John Rogers, I love you, and I will marry you,' or, if you cannot say that, look me in the face and say, 'I do not love you, and never want to see you again,' and in either case I will turn instantly and take you home. One or the other you shall say before you leave this cart."

She began to cry. "Very well," she said, between her sobs, "if you are so anxious to hear it I'll say it. John Rogers, I cannot bear the sight of you. There!"

"I didn't tell you to say that, and, besides, you never looked me in the face."

"I will."

"Very well, do."

She raised her tearful eyes to his, and began, bravely enough: "John Rogers, I do not l——" and then she faltered, and turned her head away.

"You do not dare to say it," he cried triumphantly.

She was silent.

"Oh, Cora," he pleaded, "why won't you yield? I know you love me. I have felt sure of it ever since that night at the Barclays'. Nothing you said has really shaken my faith in it. Why, I heard you say so, dear. Say it again, darling, and make me happy for ever."

But she did not answer, and they drove on in silence.

"Are we far from home?" she asked, in a choked voice.

"About fifteen miles, I should say."

"They will wonder what has become of us."

"Yes," he assented, "they will."

"Don't you think this is very unfair—very ungenerous?"

"No; not when I consider the woman I am dealing with."

There was another long pause.

"Are you very sure you care for me, John?"

"Sure! Good Heavens! Why, Cora, I haven't had a thought but for you for years. I haven't been able to work, to think, or to do anything. You've just filled the world for me, Cora."

"Well," she said hesitatingly, "I don't like this trick of yours at all; I think it's horrid; but I—I will, John—there! are you satisfied?"

He dropped the reins and put his arms round her.

"My darling," he began, but she struggled away from him and cried:

"You said you'd turn round!"

A little chilled in his rapture, he turned his horse. Then he looked at her. She was very pretty in the dim light. Her eyes were shining, and in the gathering twilight he could still see the clear bright colour in her cheeks.

"Oh, Cora," he exclaimed, "I think I am the happiest man on earth!"

She looked at him archly.

"I have said I would marry you, John, because you made me, but I didn't say when. It won't be for a long time yet!"

He felt faint and sick. Was all this struggle for nothing then? She was playing with him again, like a cat with a mouse.

"What do you mean?" he said hoarsely. "Won't you marry me now—soon? I have waited so long."

She smiled and shook her head. "Not for years and years," she said cheerfully.

He drew the horse up so suddenly that it reared and nearly fell over backwards. Then he turned it sharply in the opposite direction. He muttered something under his breath, gave the horse a quick cut with the whip, and off they drove again.

This time there was a long silence. The stars began to come out. They were well out in the country, and could see the lights in the few houses that they passed. They were almost alone upon the road. Now and then a solitary figure passed them.

Cora looked at him furtively, but he never looked at her. His face was fixed and stern, and there were some ugly lines between his eyebrows.

Presently she said, softly, "John."

At first he paid no attention, but when she repeated his name he answered sharply, "What?"

"John," she said timidly, "isn't it very late? What time is it?"

He pulled out his watch and tried to look at it, but the moon was not yet bright enough. Then he lighted a match, which went out. The second was more successful. "It's a quarter past eight," he said at last.

"Oh, what will Charlie and Nettie think?" she said, with a little sob. "It's long past dinner time."

He made no answer.

"And it's New Year's Day, too," she added, tremulously.

"Yes," he said.

Presently she spoke again. "John, don't look like that! Don't, don't! I cannot bear it! I will promise you anything, John—anything!"

"I couldn't trust you if you did."

She cried softly to herself for a few minutes. Then she said in a low voice, leaning towards him a little as she spoke, "John, I will marry you whenever you want me to."

"I am not sure that I ever want you to," he answered grimly.

She gave a little cry, and turned away from him, and for a long time he heard her stifled sobs. By-and-bye she turned towards him again.

"You are killing me!" she said, and she gave one last look at his stern set face. He looked at her in return, unmoved and unrelenting. Then, with a little quivering sob, she put both arms round his neck and kissed him full upon his lips. "Oh, John," she said, "I love you—love you, with all my heart!"

He believed her then, and gathered her to him, and she was calmed and comforted. He was not elated because he had conquered, only joyfully happy, because at last he had secured her; but she knew that she had been vanquished by something stronger than anything within her, and in her heart she rejoiced over her defeat.

PART III. OF PEARSON'S PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTFOLIO OF
FOOTLIGHT FAVOURITES IS NOW ON SALE.
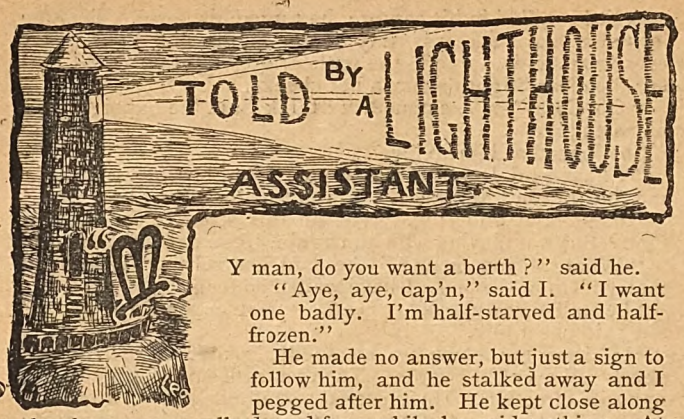
Contains 34 Beautiful Portraits.
Our Charge, 6d. The Print-seller's Charge, £6 9s. 0d.

DRESSMAKING AT HOME.
February Number now on Sale.
EVERY LADY SHOULD BUY A COPY.
FILLED WITH THE NEWEST FASHIONS.
Price 1½d. On the 1st of each Month.
A Paper Pattern given away with Every Number.

Digitized by Google



Y man, do you want a berth?" said he.

"Aye, aye, cap'n," said I. "I want one badly. I'm half-starved and half-frozen."

He made no answer, but just a sign to follow him, and he stalked away and I pegged after him. He kept close along the shore as we walked, and for a while he said nothing. At last, however, he turned and pointed seaward.

"You see that?" he asked.

He indicated a lighthouse on a lonely rock.

"I'm the keeper," said he. "I want you to cook my meals and keep my bachelor's hall for me. Now and then I shall want you to row in and buy provisions. The work won't be hard. I think the pay will suit you. Do you know why I chose you?"

"No, cap'n," said I.

"Because I saw that hope was at an end with you," he said. "It is only a man who has come to that who could live with me in a lighthouse."

"I was on a desert island once," said I. "After that I shan't be afraid of a lighthouse."

I'd been in a lighthouse before; it was no new thing to me, but after I'd been there a few hours I wondered what my master hired me for. It was like being pensioned off; there was nothing to do. But, mark ye, when night came on, and the wind began to moan about the lighthouse, and the lamps were lit and all outside was black as pitch, and all the sound we heard was the swash, swash, swash, of the waves, my master mixed some grog and called me to sit along with him. That looked sociable, but I can't say he did. He sat glowering over his glass for a while, and opening his mouth as if to speak, and shutting it again. Then said he:

"What's your name?"

"Ben Dare," said I.

"Would you mind calling yourself Brace?" he asked.

"I've no reason to be ashamed of my name," said I.

"Look here," said he, "I am a gentleman born and bred. I never came to earning my living before. I'm ashamed of it. This is what I mean. If any strangers come out here and ask for William Brace, why, you can say you are the man. You claim to be lighthouse-keeper. It's easy. I don't suppose much company will call; but I choose not to see them, if they do. That's what I hired you for."

"Oh," said I.

"You see," said he, "I got this place through a rich man who had influence. Those who gave it to me never saw me. If I die some day, why, here you are in the place. If I go off, and I may, here you are still until then. I'll pay you well, and you know your duties."

"Well, it's shamming," said I. "But, after all, what does anyone care what my name is, and what shall I call you?"

"Call me nothing," said he. "Call me Captain, as you did when I met you, but never speak of me to any one."

Gentleman or no, he wasn't lazy. He didn't care how he worked. The lamps were as bright as jewels. There wasn't a speck of dirt in the whole tower. But let any boat come nigh us, away he went and hid himself, and came out with a white, scared face and a shaking hand. At night he was afraid to go up to the lamps alone, and he'd look over his shoulder and turn white as we stood together. At last he took a new turn. He stood staring for awhile. Then he spoke to me in a low voice:

"Brace, do you believe in ghosts?"

"I hadn't considered the question," I answered.

"Well," said he, softer than before, "look into that corner," and he pointed. I looked.

"Don't you see anything?" he asked.

"No," said I; "no, cap'n."

"Ah," he muttered, "very well, very well, I'm glad you don't."

But that wasn't nothing to what happened the very next night. We slept in two bunks nigh each other, and naturally, when he woke up with a yell, I woke too. He was shrieking and shaking and wringing his hands.

"The woman! the woman!" he said. "She stood here just now, all red with blood. It dripped down the white ruffles. It dripped on her hands. Stop her! Stop her! She has gone to call them. Stop her! Stop her!"

"Where did she go?" I asked.

He stared at me with his wide-open eyes, all the whites showing, below and above.

"She couldn't have been here," said he. "It was a dream."

"Lord love you—a nightmare," said I.

So we went to sleep again. But I heard of the woman so often after that I grew used to her. The cap'n, as I called him, got to be worse and worse every day. I wanted to go ashore and fetch the doctor, but he wouldn't hear of it. He raved if I tried to leave him.

At last there came a hot night in June. It was burning hot all day, and a dead calm at night. About dark the cap'n went to sleep, and I went and sat where I could see the water and the lights ashore. It was so clear that I could hear the sailors in a Spanish ship moored not far away singing in their foreign lingo. And I was sort of quiet and dreamy like, when something happened that waked me mightily wide and sudden. Something was standing on the steps below me, something white. Something came towards me.

It was a little slender figure, with long hair all about its shoulders. I couldn't see its face. I don't think I really saw it plainly at all. But it went by me so softly while I looked, and I knew it was a woman in a white ruffled gown, and that she had gone to the room where my master lay. I shook too hard for a moment to move; but as soon as I could I started up to go to him. Just then a voice cried:

"Lighthouse, ahoy!"

I answered "Aye, aye," and stopped a bit. Duty first of all things with a sailor.

A boat lay at the foot of the steps, and four men jumped out of it.

"We want William Brace, keeper of this lighthouse," said one, a big man in a linen overcoat.

"I'm one that answers to the name," says I.

He swung a lantern over my face.

"Search the place, my men," said he.

There was no use saying anything, but I did try to stop them.

"I've got a sick friend aloft," says I. "Don't disturb him. I'm afraid the woman will skeer him, he's so low."

"What woman?" said he.

"The one that came aboard with you, sir," said I.

"No woman came with us," he snarled.

"Stand aside. Men do your duty."

They went upstairs. I followed. I saw them walk into the cap'n's room. I heard them cry out and stand still. When I got to the door they stood in a row looking down on the bed. I looked too. Man nor woman couldn't frighten the cap'n more. He was dead.

"What had he done?" I asked the officer.

"Killed his wife," said he, "that's all. No doubt she deserved it; but it's not allowed by law when they do."

"Heaven help him," said I.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:—

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HOW SHOULD STOUT LADIES DRESS?

Some considerable controversy has been going on in one of the American fashion magazines on this subject, started by the threatened inundation of crinolines.

Fancy a fat lady in a crinoline! Or better still, fancy ten fat ladies in ten fat crinolines, with, say, five a side in a none too fat omnibus!

The Yankee humorist says: "A fat lady can beat a fat man; she can stick a stiletto-like pin through her head till it comes out the other side and hold on her bonnet, but the fat man can't." Let's have those ten pins to complete the picture of those ten crinolines. Would we of the sterner sex not like to "lynch" the fiend who invented mountainous hats and feathers for front rows in theatres? Blondin can walk across Niagara on a tight rope, but can he walk a theatre corridor with three ladies' trains in front of him? The fashion miscreant, and the barbed wire inventor, have much to answer for. One fashion paper argues that if the portly lady adds a little slashing of light on a dark backgrouud, artistically and judiciously, it has the effect of apparently reducing her size by half a stone. How ludicrous all this seems! What is the seven pounds imitation reduction? We have known Mr. Russell, the eminent Specialist on Corpulency, reduce a lady eleven pounds in seven days, and not an imitation reduction, but an absolute fact, at a cost of probably less than is paid to the "faking" dressmaker. Those who are acquainted with his methods, or have read his work, "Corpulency and the Cure," can bear us out that he talks with as glib unconcern of fourteen-pound, twenty-eight pound, and even half-hundredweight reductions of unhealthy waste accumulations as a steamboat stoker would talk of coal. The dressmaker simply attempts to hide the disease—creating adipose, carried about by the unfortunate victim to obesity—whereas Mr. Russell (of Woburn House, 27, Store Street, London, W.C.) aims to remove the cause, and thus impart health. Of course, no lady likes the brute of a man who enters into a crusade against tight-lacing in a blunt common-sense way; but he is, however, right when he claims that tight stays with embonpoint is suicidal, especially when a few doses of a most pleasant, agreeable, and exhilarating tonic, made entirely from herbs, will reduce one's weight so easily with a corresponding improvement of health and strength, and with it that bright eye and healthy complexion which we all like to see in a lady. If our roof leaks and lets the rain in, we can shelter ourselves from it by opening an umbrella; but if we get the slater to stop the cause, he is the true benefactor, and not the umbrella maker. So it is with the reducer of fat and the dressmaker. The fair sex begin to see that he is their benefactor; he does not ruthlessly rip up the bodice, like uncouth Dr. Abernethy; he is better informed, for he actually knows that in twenty-four hours that identical inimical appendage will be in a state of subjugation. In other words, a dangerously tight lacing on Monday will be slack by Tuesday, after taking three simple doses of his mixture. "Has one to starve one's self?" asked a lady once. Not at all, for it is a singular fact that one eats more under his treatment.

It is perhaps not singular, if we investigate. A fat man is unhealthy; he is, in fact, diseased; as the disease is being cured the organs become healthy, the patient is more buoyant, and takes more exercise, and requires more food (it is also traceable to other reasons without exercise). Then, again, with stilt-like high heels, fashion—well, I think we had better drop this theme, we shall get into hot water with our fair readers; we are married. We generally get the old bachelor-editor to write on these subjects; he is not a bit afraid of women, as he calls them.

But seriously, if any lady, or gentleman, as far as that goes, wishes to reduce their weight, we commend them to Mr. Russell's work, "Corpulency and the Cure," which is published at Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., and only costs 4d. in stamps, post free. But to revert to the subject of crinolines, honestly we are pleased to see the really sensible and steadfast way in which ladies have made their standpoint, and we suggest that they should have a medium of their own to rule the fashions to their own liking, and not be the victims of the profit-seeking professional modiste.

DO STOUT PEOPLE LIVE LONG?

This is a question which has occupied the attention of medical authorities from time immemorial. Some argue that the lean kind take longer to shuffle off the mortal coil than their stout brethren. The statistics naturally favour this argument, and no doubt are correct to a great extent, because sufferers from obesity are more susceptible to disease in consequence of the debilitated state of the system when clogged with abnormal adipose tissue; but a curious fact has been overlooked, viz., that corpulency generally commences about the age of thirty-five to fifty, after which time it seems to decrease; therefore, before the proverbial "three score and ten" is reached, the whilom fat man is, by a natural process, again reduced to what may only be called moderate plumpness, and thus cheats the statistician. Stout persons can now, thanks to science, reduce their weight in a most extraordinarily rapid manner, without the slightest injury to their constitutions, or without resorting to those drastic remedies which only operate for a time, or by the continuance of the use of toxical drugs extending over such a period that renders it baneful to the long-suffering patient. An eminent Continental therapeutist recommends the victim to obesity to eat fat meat, while an equally eminent American prescribes lean ditto, and the stomach is to risk an accumulation of serious disorder by swallowing a pint of hot water daily, a most nauseous remedy, we should think, and not unattended with danger. The past master in the cure of corpulence is Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., whose book (256 pages), entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," price only 4 stamps, seems to impress us considerably, for he reduces more weight by his system than the Continental and American physicians, without any of the absurd restriction which would make life scarcely worth living. He uses simple herbs, the properties of which he seems to possess a more than usual knowledge of, and he makes but little secret of his method, so refreshing after the mystery made of most chemical and herbal concoctions of various complaints.—Wetherby News.

Digitized by Google

WHAT A HOST OF US FEEL THIS WAY.

HALFWAY measures and halfway situations are often more disagreeable than extreme ones. Knowing this from experience, we can the better understand what Mr. James Sutcliffe means when he says that at a certain time in June, 1891, he was "too well to lie up and too ill to be at work." In case one is downright ill and no mistake about it; ill enough to go to bed indefinitely, and to leave everything to others—why, there is a sort of completeness and sincerity in it that brings some consolation. And, to be sure, when one is well and hearty from top to toe; as full of life as an egg is of meat—why, that is a plain, simple, and enjoyable situation. But to be responsible for work without the vim or ability to do it right, or to be ailing without those sharp symptoms that make our friends concerned about us—that is a mean, nasty attitude to be in.

Yet as an actual fact the great bulk or proportion of the suffering borne by humanity—physical, mental, and moral suffering—is borne by the very people in this condition, not by those who lie quietly on beds at home or receive intelligent and expert attention in hospitals. There now! We have said it, and it's true.

Mr. Sutcliffe will be understood, therefore, by millions who are in the form he was in; who work away and do their best; who seldom or never grumble; and yet—who need help, every man and woman of them.

He (Mr. Sutcliffe we mean, of course) says that no terrible pains took him, nothing scaring, nothing that made him send somebody to fetch the doctor, but he just felt bad; low, weary, languid, tired, out of sorts. Dear, dear, what a crowd, what a host, of us there is who can fit every one of those words on himself as though they were coats that had been made to measure. We don't feel like work, we hate to give up—that is where we are; and we should be more grateful, really, for a medicine that would set us right just now than we are likely to be for some magic balm which shall bring us back to the world in the hour when its vain sights and shows are fading in the mists of death.

Well, well. Let us hear Mr. Sutcliffe out; he has but a few words to say: "My energy seemed gone out of me. In my mouth there was a bad, sickening taste, worse in the mornings than at other times. I lost all relish for my meals, and what I did eat I ate because we all do eat as long as we can, whether we feel like it or not. I was much troubled with flatulence, and in short was too well to lie up and to ill to be at work. In this way I continued about four months; nothing doing me any good. After a while something put it into my mind that maybe Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup might help me. So I began to take it, and in three weeks I felt much better. This gave me reason for keeping on with it, and I did keep on. The result was that my appetite returned and my food agreed with me and did me good. In this way the improvement went on until I was as well as ever, and I have been in the best of health ever since. I know many persons living in Low Moor who have found great benefit from using Seigel's Syrup. (Signed) James Sutcliffe, 110, St. Paul's Street, Low Moor, Clitheroe, December 1st, 1893."

We have no doubt of it, dear Mr. Sutcliffe, no doubt of it at all. People who have found benefit from that medicine are to be come across all over the earth. They speak almost every tongue known to human lips, and the words "Mother Seigel's Syrup" have been translated into every one of them.

And, what is better still, most of them are like you—thankful, not for having been rescued from impending death (although that often happens), but for having been picked up out of the vile middle ground between illness and health, and put where they wanted to be—squarely on their legs, with a relish for their meals and a relish for their work. Good luck to the people of Low Moor.

Digitized by Google

ONCE BOUGHT, ALWAYS BOUGHT.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 319. FOR WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 9, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY.

1 RISING SUN STOVE POLISH. EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD.

In HALF the TIME with HALF the LABOUR you can produce MORE POLISH with TWO Penny Packets of RISING SUN than with HALF-DOZEN of ordinary Blacklead.

Sold in ½d., 1d. & 2d. Packets

THREE GREAT BOONS

3 MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS GLOSS, BORAX, GUM, WAX, &c. &c.

REQUIRES no addition or preparation. SAVES time, labour, and uncertainty. PRODUCES beautiful white glossy linen. Sold in 1d. Packets, or 3d. and 6d. Boxes.

Sample of any one post free 2 stamps C. Chancellor & Co., London, E.C.

2 RISIN' SUN METAL POLISH. GIVES TO ALL KINDS OF METALS A BEAUTIFUL SOFT BRILLIANT POLISH.

With the MINIMUM of LABOUR this LIQUID POLISH produces a MOST BRILLIANT APPEARANCE, which lasts much longer than that produced by any Paste Polish.

Sold in 1d, 3d, 6d, & 1/- Bottles

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS!

NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

The BEST of all TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT.

Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, & Free from Injurious Drugs.

SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOTTLES AT 1/1½, 2/9, AND 11/- EACH.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

PREPARED BY NORTON'S, LIMITED, 21, SPITAL SQUARE, LONDON, E.

Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY

BRONCHONIA

A MARVELLOUS REMEDY for all COUGHS, whether arising from CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, or THROAT IRRITATIONS.

Its Marvellous Effects are Testified to by Eminent Physicians.

2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per Bottle, of all Chemists; or Post Free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d., from J. HOWARD, 21, QUEENHITHE, LONDON, E.C. One Trial will Prove its Efficacy.

Digitized by Google

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

A FACT!

To introduce our Marvellous Cheap DRESS PATTERNS we will also enclose you 6 yards of pretty Ribbon, 6 yards of charming Lace, 3 yards of handsome Apron Material a package of choice Toilet Articles Perfume, Magic Glove Cleaner; also Diametti's Hair Beautifier. The whole sent per return Parcels Post for a Two Shilling P.O. Address—

DEPT. B.

The Job Drapery Co., Warehouse, 65, Chatsworth Road, London, N.E.

LADIES OF ANY AGE.

Don't risk swallowing poisonous compounds for your complexion, but adopt the marvellous result of scientific research, ARSENICOLIA is the queen of complexion balms. It acts like magic on the worst skins. Used by thousands, praised by thousands. Post free, under cover, with full directions, 4/9, from—The Toilet Aid Supply Association (Dept. S.), 79, Strand, London, W.C. Send for our Companion to the Toilet, free, One Stamp.

TOO STOUT.

IF you require a reliable remedy for the relief of Superfluous Fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills No starvation required. You may eat and drink what you like yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5 to 7 lbs. weekly. They are agreeable to take and harmless, being entirely of a vegetable preparation, are successful in the most stubborn cases, and never fail to improve both health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, and entirely free from inconvenience. They are pearl-coated and tasteless, and highly recommended by the Medical Profession. Price 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d. and 11s. Prof. F. A. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ROSY CHEEKS

and a Lovely Complexion, clear as alabaster, immediately produced by one box of our ARSENIC AND IRON PILLS, no matter how pale or bad your complexion may be at present. Price per large box, post free 2s. 9d., from—

The LONDON TOILET COMPANY' 190, Acre Lane, London, S.W.

Warranted perfectly harmless.

To Tobacconists Commencing.

£20

See Illus. Guide. 259 pp. 3d. "How to open a Cigar Stores from £20 to £1,000." "Tobacconists' Co.," 186, Euston Road, London. Manager — H. Myers. Estab. 1866. N.B.—Shopfitters and Show Case Makers for all trades. Estimates Free.

PLUCKY ADVERTISING.

NEW CUSTOMERS ONLY sending a Shilling for Three Ounces of our exquisite "MOSQUE" SMOKING MIXTURE, will be presented free with a Pipe, Rubber Tobacco-Pouch, and a Turkish Amulet. The whole sent in parcel per post on receipt of Twelve Stamps or P.O. Address—

P15, Eureka Manufacturing Co., Clapton, London, N.E.

TO WOMEN.

IRREGULATIES, OBSTRUCTIONS, &c., removed by an ABSOLUTELY CERTAIN Method WITHOUT MEDICINE. No Pills, Mixtures, or Useless Injections. Greatest Discovery of Modern Medical Science. Send stamped envelope for particulars, testimonials, &c., to Mrs. SHAFFER-BENNYON, 328, High Holborn, London, W.C.

ONE BOX OF

DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d. S. HARVEY, 12, Gaskarth Road, Balham Hill, London, S.W. Beware of injurious imitations.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science: they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from—

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, enclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

BALDNESS CURED

in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials Press Criticism, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair &c., with Advice Form for Treatment, to Dr. Horn, Hair Specialist, Newport Isle of Wight.

NEW HARRISON SWIFT GOLD MEDAL

KNITTER

Knits STOCKINGS (ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. TRIUMPHANT AWARD at PARIS. The only WINNER in the WORLD of 7 GOLD MEDALS and 19 other Honours.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Exema

and all Skin Eruptions are cured by a Healing Cream widely known as

"Antexema."

"Antexema" is sold by all Chemists and Stores and may be had post free for 1s. 8d., 2s. 9d., and 4s 9d of the ANTEXEMA Co., 83, Castle Road, London, N.W.

Little Book Free. NAME THIS PAPER.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemist, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

A BOON TO LADIES

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, &c., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street, Liverpool.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards. Marking Linen, etc. Monograms two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Pattern and Price Lists post free.

Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

A Real Boon to Ladies.

TO LADIES

Especially to those who wish to know of a safe, certain, and speedy remedy for all irregularities and obstructions, a remedy which, under the most trying circumstances and in the most difficult and

OBSTINATE CASES,

NEVER FAILS TO AFFORD

RELIEF,

GENERALLY IN A FEW HOURS.

No case hopeless, failure is simply impossible, as Mrs. Snow, of Denmark Hill, Camberwell, writes:—

"By adopting your treatment my anxiety and misery was over within twenty-four hours, although I had been daily taking pills and other things in vain. Half the quantity you sent proved effective, to my intense joy and surprise."

A sworn guarantee is enclosed with all testimonials and medicine, which is inexpensive, as one bottle at 4s. 6d. (by post, 4s. 9d.) is usually sufficient for any case.

Full particulars will be gladly forwarded to any lady on receipt of addressed envelope.

Write privately to—

Mrs. P. S. S.,
145, STOCKWELL ROAD,
LONDON, S.W.

TO LADIES

SEAMLESS

STOCKINET

MADAME FRAIN'S FAMOUS FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. Herbal Institute, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

ENAMELLED COPPER LETTERS.

Heraldic Designs and Trade Marks and Tradesmen's Windows, Facias, Signs, or Tablets.

SWINGING SIGNS IN GREAT VARIETY.

The Durability, Elegance, and Striking Brilliancy of these have earned for them the reputation of being the

MOST EFFECTIVE MEDIUM

of all kinds of Indoor and Outdoor Advertisements.

Call and see our Stock or send for Price Lists.

THE GARNIER ENAMELLED LETTER & ADVERTISING SIGN CO., Ltd.,

61, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

(Near the Farringdon Road Station.)

INVENTORS AND MANUFACTURERS. AGENTS WANTED.

BORD'S PIANOS

ON SALE, with 25 per cent. Discount for Cash, or 14s. 6d. per month (Second-hand 10s. 6d. per month) on the three years' system.—Lists Free of C. STILES and CO., 40 and 42, Southampton-row, Holborn, London. Pianos Exchanged.

TO ADVERTISERS

Wishing to reach families, a Test Advertisement in Short Stories will bring profitable results. Scale of charges as follows:—

Front Page, £12 10s. per insertion
Back or Inside, £10 per insertion
Per Inch, 5s. per insertion ...

Less 5 per cent. for 13 times.
,, 10 per cent. for 26 times.

All communications respecting Advertisements should be sent to the Advertisement Department, 167, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 319.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING FEBRUARY 9, 1895. [PRICE ONE PENNY

A SAINT IN PAWN

ON the 20th of May, 189—, a light carriage rolled rapidly along one of the finest highways in the world—that which leads from Sorrento to Salerno. On the narrow little back seat sat Count Dietrich von Dölsberg and his bride, the lovely daughter of Councillor von Gumpel.

They had spent three weeks on the Riviera, and along the Gulf of Naples, and for the last week had engaged separate apartments at the inns, and had omitted the good-night kiss. Little misunderstandings had arisen between the newly-married pair.

The Countess Lenore was a petted child, exacting, and a little imperious, and, above all, very obstinate. She was as deeply in love with her husband as he with her, but she greatly resented any attempt to exercise authority over her; so now they sat, side by side, cold and silent.

Count Dietrich was keenly appreciative of the beauties of nature, and would gladly have thrown his strong arms about her and whispered in her pretty little ear, "Lenore, only open your eyes and look about you. How can you be so cold among such scenes? How can you give yourself up to such petty whims in the presence of such grandeur and beauty?"

But he said nothing till, at a sudden turn in the road, one of the picturesque old Saracenic towns lay before them. Flat-roofed grey stone houses, with outside staircases, arched bridges over the court yards and narrow alleys. Then he could no longer repress an exclamation of delight and surprise.

"Lenore, look! how wonderfully picturesque! It is the most enchanting little nest in all Italy. We must stop here. Do you hear, coachman? Drive us to the best hotel!"

The coachman smiled pityingly. "The best hotel! There is no choice here. I think we had better drive on. There is nothing here for your Excellencies."

"All the same, here I shall stop, if I have to sleep on straw. I must see the place by daylight."

The coachman protested in vain, and the young Countess made a few sharp observations on her husband's inconsiderate self-will, but Count Dietrich insisted on stopping.

They turned into the principal street of the little town. An excited crowd stood in front of one of the best houses, shouting and screaming. The carriage was obliged to halt, and the coachman called out to ask what was the matter. At least twenty voices hastened to satisfy his curiosity, but the Count and Countess could only make out that Santa Elena had something to do with it.

Now a door opened in the high wall of the house, and out stepped a priest.

The excited crowd rushed up the steps and pushed the old gentleman back against the door, which had been closed behind him. A hundred voices called out a question, then stopped to hear his answer.

The old priest shrugged his shoulders and said, shaking his head, "Nothing can be done. He is as stubborn as a donkey."

Then arose such a howl of rage that even the Neapolitan carriage horses—well used to such demonstrations—shied violently.

Fists were shaken in the air and a few stones thrown at the small windows in front of the house, but at last the old priest managed to make himself heard again, and finally succeeded in dispersing the crowd. The "Golden Eagle" was only a few steps away, and the young couple soon reached it in safety.

Out stepped a priest.

The stout little round-faced host received his distinguished guests with the utmost cordiality, and led them through a little orange garden and up a stairway to a flat roof, then over an arched stone bridge and up another stairway to the lodgings assigned them. It was a lofty, vaulted room, with glass doors at either end. The scanty furniture was old fashioned and rickety, and a slight odour of mould and dust filled the dim, cellar-like apartment.

The Count found this ancient banqueting hall far more attractive than the finest rooms in a modern hotel, but Lenore shrugged her shoulders, and sniffed suspiciously about. "It is more like a potato cellar than a bedroom," said she, "and looks as if it had not been dusted since the last century. Pah! how stifling!"

Half an hour afterwards, the host came and escorted them to supper, which was well cooked and daintily served. The fat, curly-headed host was also cook and waiter. Count Dietrich made up for his wife's silence by a lively conversation with the landlord; and, after praising the excellent supper, asked for an explanation of the popular disturbance which he had witnessed.

"Ah, you mean the scene before Novelli's house," answered Curly-head.

All Rights Reserved

Digitized by Google

"May the plague take—beg pardon, Signora. The people have good cause to be angry with this Signor Novelli. The worst of it is that he is, not only the cloth merchant, banker, usurer, and cut-throat Novelli, but he is also our Podesta (Mayor). If it were not for that, you would probably have seen him hanged over his own doorstep."

"Ah, per Bacco! this begins to be interesting," said the Count.

"Well, your Excellency must know that the day after to-morrow, the 22nd of May, is the feast of St. Elena, our patron saint, and there are not many little towns in Italy which can boast such a celebration as ours on her fête-day. People flock here from all the country round. It costs us hard work and a great deal of money to do honour to our most holy patroness, but we have good reason to make a special effort, for our church is lucky enough to possess an ancient treasure which is the envy of all Christendom. It is a solid silver bust of the saint, set with precious stones, and with a golden crown upon her head. Our Bishop has an old document which he will show you if your Excellency cares——"

"Not particularly," said the Count, smiling. "I would rather hear what Signor Novelli has to do with your St. Elena."

"Ah," said the little man, "that is a story! I am ashamed to be fellow-citizen to such a villain. Our cathedral dates back to Saracenic times, and is naturally rather out of repair, and experts have pronounced it unsafe. But, as we are very poor, we trusted to the dear Lord's protection and St. Elena's intercession, till a large stone fell from the wall and killed an old woman. Then, of course, we took up the matter in earnest.

"The people gave all they could, and His Holiness the Pope added something; but it fell far short. Then Novelli offered to make up the deficiency if we would make him Podesta and give him the Saint's bust as security. Of course, we had to accept his terms. Money is power all the world over, and the devil is in every gold piece. So, Heaven forgive us, Signor Novelli has the key of the Saint's shrine, and will only give it up when his interest is paid. We have managed to pay it for five years, but these are hard times.

She danced about with him until he quieted down.

"The women and the priests have tried to influence him through his young wife, the most beautiful little woman in all the country round, and a perfect angel—of course, a man can buy anything with money. The old ruffian is desperately fond of her, but even Signora Elena can do nothing with him when there is money in the question."

Early the next morning, the Count opened the door and stepped out on the balcony which looked out toward the sea. His wife was still asleep, and the young husband, as he bent over her, could hardly refrain from waking her with a kiss. But he must not be weak, and so lose the upper hand for life.

Count Dietrich gazed gloomily out upon the smiling heavens and the pretty old town bathed in sunshine; bit his lip and tugged nervously at his moustache. How happy they might be if only this self-willed young creature—— How would it all end? And yet every day he was more and more in love with her.

He paced slowly up and down the broad balcony, then went on tip-toe back into the room. Lenore was awake, and her eyes were full of tears. He saw that, though she turned her head away.

"Good morning, Lenore. Will you not at least say good morning to me?"

"Good morning."

That was all. He stamped his foot, got his field-glass and went out again, slamming the door behind him. The distant sounds of the gay Southern street-life filled the fresh morning air. Children's voices came shrill from some quarter near at hand, and when he turned his glass in that direction, he saw, on a flat roof, perhaps fifty feet distant, three lovely children, from three to six years old. The youngest, an exquisitely beautiful child, was kicking and crying furiously in his little sister's arms and she tried in vain to quiet him.

A door opened and out came a young girl in a loose white gown, over which fell her luxurious black hair. She took the crying child in her arms, wiped his eyes, kissed him, and danced about with him until he quieted down. Then she came to the edge of the parapet and pointed out to the little one all sorts of things to divert his mind.

If Count Dietrich had admired the child, he was enraptured with the lovely face which glowed in tender freshness from its frame of coal-black hair. Through his glass he could see even her white teeth and the dimple in her round cheek when she smiled. Now she turned and looked directly at him. What eyes! Alas! she saw him looking at her, and went quickly into the house with the child in her arms.

A hand was laid on his arm, and he started like a sinner caught in the act.

"What interests you so much?" asked Countess Lenore in a cold, indifferent tone.

The Count was annoyed and spoke with exaggerated admiration of his charming neighbours, thinking to arouse her jealousy.

The Countess looked through the glass, then said, turning away:

"Strange taste! Shall we not go down to breakfast?"

He made her a formal little bow and accompanied her to the guest-room below.

"Don Pasquale," said he to the host, "there is a raving beauty in your neighbourhood. Are there many such pretty girls in your town?"

Curly-head bowed and said: "Your Excellency is very kind. We have indeed some pretty girls, but I do not know which of them lives near here."

Count Dietrich described the locality, and had hardly mentioned the three children when Don Pasquale interrupted him.

"Ah, it must be Signora Novelli herself."

"But she looks like a girl of sixteen."

"Quite true; she looks very young, but it must be the Signora, for all the other women in the house are old."

"Corpo-di-Bacco!" cried the Count enthusiastically, "then I solemnly swear that for a kiss from that angel, I will gladly pay the thousand lire out of my own pocket to her skinflint of a husband."

"Your Excellency must be joking," said Don Pasquale incredulously.

"And your joke is in rather bad taste," murmured the Countess in German.

Count Dietrich pretended not to hear her remark, and insisted that his offer was made in all seriousness. The guest who was willing to give one thousand lire for a kiss, went up several degrees in Don Pasquale's estimation, and shortly after the Count found him in close conversation at the door

Digitized by Google

